PREFACE

TO THE

POETICAL BOOKS.

These five books of scripture, which I have here endeavoured, according to the measure of the gift given to me, to explain and improve, for the use of those who desire to read them, not only with understanding, but to their edification—though they have the same divine origin, design, and authority, as those that went before, yet, upon some accounts, are of a very different nature from them, and from the rest of the sacred writings: such variety of methods has Infinite Wisdom seen fit to take, in conveying the light of divine revelation to the children of men, that this heavenly food might have (as the Jews say of the manna) something in it agreeable to every palate, and suited to every constitution. If every eye be not thus opened, every mouth will be stopped, and such as perish in their ignorance will be left without excuse. We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced: we have mourned unto you, and ye have not lamented, Mat. xi. 17.

1. The books of scripture have hitherto been, for the most part, very plain and easy narratives of matter of fact, which he that runs may read and understand, and which are milk for babes, such as they can receive and digest, and both entertain and nourish themselves with. The waters of the sanctuary have hitherto been to the ankles or to the knees, such as a lamb might wade in, to drink of and wash in; but here we are advanced to a higher form in God’s school, and have books put into our hands, wherein are many things dark, and hard to be understood, which we do not apprehend the meaning of so suddenly and so certainly as we could wish; the study whereof requires a more close application of mind, a greater intenseness of thought, and the accomplishing of a diligent search, which yet the treasure hid in them, when it is found, will abundantly recompense. The waters of the sanctuary are here to the loins, and still, as we go forward, we shall find the waters still risen in the prophetic books, waters to swim in, (Isa. xl. 3--5.) not fordable, nor otherwise to be passed over; depths in which an elephant will not find footing; strong meat for strong men. The same method is observable in the New Testament, where we find the plain history of Christ and his gospel placed first in the Evangelists, and the Acts of the Apostles; then the mystery of both in the Epistles, which are more difficult to be understood; and, lastly, the prophecies of things to come, in the Apocalyptic visions.

This method, so exactly observed in both the Testaments, directs us in what order to proceed, both in studying the things of God ourselves, and in teaching them to others; we must go in the order that the scripture does; and where can we expect to find a better method of divinity, and a better method of preaching?

1. We must begin with those things that are most plain and easy, as, blessed be God, those things are which are most necessary to salvation, and of the greatest use. We must lay our foundation firm, in a sound experimental knowledge of the principles of religion, and then the superstructure will be well-reared, and stand firm. It is not safe to launch out into the deep at first, or to venture into points difficult and controverted, until we have first thoroughly digested the elements of the oracles of God, and turned them in succum et sanguinem—juice and blood. Those that begin their Bible at the wrong end, commonly use their knowledge of it in the wrong way.

And, in training up others, we must be sure to ground them well at first in those truths of God which are plain, and in some measure level to their capacity, which we find they take and relish, and know how to make use of, and not amuse those that are weak with things above them, things of doubtful disputation, which they cannot apprehend any certainty of, or advantage by. Our Lord Jesus spake the word to the people as they were able to hear it, (Mark iv. 33.) and had many things to say to his disciples which he did not say, because as yet they could not hear them, John xvi. 12, 13. And those whom St. Paul could not speak to as unto spiritual—though he blamed them for their backwardness, yet he accommodated himself to their weakness, and spake to them as unto babes in Christ, 1 Cor. iii. 1, 2.

2. Yet we must not rest in these things; we must not be always children, that have need of milk, but, nourished up with that, and gaining strength, we must go on to perfection, (Heb. vi. 1.) that, having, by reason of use, our spiritual senses exercised, we may come to full age, and put away childish things, and, forgetting the things which are behind, (Heb. v. 14.) that is, so well remembering them, (Phil. iii. 13.) that we need not be still poring over them, as those that are ever learning the same lesson, we may reach faith to the things which are before. Though we must never think to learn above our Bible, as long as we are here in this world, yet we must still be getting forward in it. Ye have dwelt long enough in this mountain; now turn you, and take your journey onward in the wilderness toward Canaan: our motto must be Plus ultra—Onward. And then shall we know, if thus, by regular steps, (Hos. vi. 3) we follow on to know the Lord, and what the mind of the Lord is.

II. The books of scripture have hitherto been mostly historical, but now the matter is of another nature; it is doctrinal and devotional, preaching and praying. In this way of writing, as well as in the former, a great number of valuable prophets have served for inscriptions for the present time, and to those who know to use, not only what others did that went before us, and how they feared, but what their notions and sentiments were, what their thoughts and affections were, that we may, with the help of them, form our minds aright.

Plutarch's Morals are reputed as useful a treasure in the commonwealth of learning as Plutarch's Lives; and the wise disquisitions and discourses of the philosophers, as the records of the historians; nor is this divine philosophy, (if I may so call it,) which we have in these books, less needful, or less serviceable, to the church, than the sacred history was. Blessed be God for both.

III. The Jews make these books to be given by a divine inspiration somewhat different from that both of Moses and the prophets. They divided the books of the Old Testament into the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms—the Writers, which Epiphanius emphatically translates Ἁγγεία—Holy Writings, and these books are more commonly called among the Greeks 'Αγιογραφία—Holy Writings: the Jews attribute them to that distinct kind of inspiration which they call γένεσις—The Holy Spirit. Moses they supposed to write by the Spirit, in a way above all the other prophets, for with him God spake mouth to mouth, even apparently; knew him, (Num. xii. 8.) that is, conversed with him face to face, Deut. xxxiv. 10.

He was made partner of divine revelation, (as Maimonides distinguishes, De Fund. Legis, c. 7.) per vigiliam—while awake,* whereas God-manifested himself to all the other prophets in a dream or vision: and he adds, that Moses understood the words of prophecy without any perturbation or astonishment of mind, whereas the other prophets commonly feared and were troubled. But the writers of the Hagiography, and those who have treated of the Jews, have been more or less below that of the other prophets, and to receive divine revelation, not as they did, by dreams, and visions, and voices, but (as Maimonides describes it, More Nauochim—part 2. ch. 45.) they perceived some power to rise within them, and rest upon them, which urged and enabled them to write or speak far above their own natural ability, in psalms, or hymns, or in history, or in rules of good living, still enjoying the ordinary vigour and use of their senses.

Let David himself describe it. The Spirit of the Lord spake by me, and his word was in my tongue: the God of Israel spake to me, 2 Sam. xxiii. 2, 3. This gives such a magnificent account of the inspiration by which David wrote, that I see not why it should be made inferior to that of the other prophets, for David is expressly called a prophet, Acts ii. 36.

But, since our hand is in with the Jewish masters, let us see what books they account Hagiography. Those are that are now before us come, without dispute, into this rank of sacred writers, and the book of the Lamentations is not unfitly added to them. Indeed, the Jews, when they would speak critically, reckon all those songs which we meet with in the Old Testament among the Hagiography; for, though they were penned by prophets, and under the direction of the Holy Ghost, yet, because they were not the proper result of a vision prophetici—prophetic vision, they were not strictly prophecy. As to the Historical Books, they distinguish; (but I think it is a distinction without a difference;) some of them they assign to the prophets, calling them the prophetici priores—the former prophets, namely, Joshua, Judges, and the two books of the Kings; but others they rank among the Hagiographa, as, the book of Ruth, (which yet is but an appendix to the book of Judges,) the two books of Chronicles, with Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther, which last the Rabbins have a great value for, and think it is to be had in equal esteem with the law of Moses itself, that it shall last as long as it lasts, and shall survive the writings of the prophets. And, lastly, they reckon the book of Daniel among the Hagiographa, for no reason can be given, since he was not inferior to any of the prophets in the gift of prophecy: and, therefore, the learned Mr. Smith thinks that their placing him among the Hagiographical writers was fortuitous, and by mistake.*

Mr. Smith, in his Discourse, before quoted, though he supposes this kind of divine inspiration to be more 'pacate and serene than that which was strictly called prophetici, not acting so much upon the imagination, but seating itself in the higher and purer faculties of the soul, yet shows that it manifested itself in a divine nature, not only as it always acted pious souls into straits of devotion, or moved them strangely to dictate matters of true piety and goodness, but as it came in abruptly upon the minds of those holy men, and transported them from the temper of mind they were in before; so that they perceived themselves captivated by the power of some higher light than that which their own understanding commonly poured out upon them; and this, says he, was a kind of vital form to that light of divine and sanctified reason which they were perpetually possessed of, and that constant frame of holiness and goodness which dwelt in their hallowed minds. We have reason to glorify that God of Israel who gave such power unto men, and has here transmitted to us the blessed products of that power.

IV. The style and composition of these books are different from those that go before and those that follow. Our Saviour divides the books of the Old Testament into the Law, the Prophets. It will be of great use in verse, according to the ancient rules of versifying, though not according to the Greek and Latin prosodics.

Some of the ancients call these five books the second Pentateuch of the Old Testament, five sacred volumes, which are as the satellites to the five books of the law of Moses. Gregorius Nazianzen, (caur. 33, p. 98,) calls these si εικος πεντε—five metrical books; first, Job, (so he reckons them,) up then David, the twelve Psalms, Hymns, Ecclesiastes, Song, and Proverbs. Ambrose, Bishop of Ticinum, in his Isicic Poem to Socrates, reckons them up particularly, and calls them εικος πεντε σοληνοο—the five verse-books. Epiphanius, (lib. de ponder. et mensur. p. 533.) ἡ τῶν στιχίων τῶν ἑπταθερμῶν—

the five verse-books. And Cyril. Hierosol. Collect. 4. p. (mihi—in my copy.) 30. calls these five books τὰ στιχία—books in verse. Polychronius, in his prologue to Job, says, that, as those that are without, call their tragedies and comedies ποιησις—Poetics, so, in sacred writ, those books which are composed in Hebrew metre, (of which he reckons Job the first,) we call στιχος, ἔπη—Books in verse, written στίχων στίχων—according to order. What is written in metre, or rhythm, is so called from μέτρον—a measure, and ςτίχων—a number, the metres of syllables, which please the ear with their smoothness and cadency, and so insinuate the matter the more movingly and powerfully into the fancy.
Sir William Temple,* in his essay upon poetry, thinks it is generally agreed to have been the first sort of writing that was used in the world; nay, that, in several nations, poetical compositions preceded the very invention or usage of letters. The Spaniards (he says) found in America many strains of poetry, and such as seemed to flow from a true poetic vein, before any letters were known in those regions. The same (says he) is probable of the Scythians and Grecians: the oracles of Apollo were delivered in verse; so were those of the Sibyls. And Tacitus says, that the ancient Germans had no annals or records but what were in verse. Homer and Hesiod wrote their poems (the very Alcoran of the Pagan Demonology) many ages before the appearing of any of the Greek philosophers or historians; and, long before them, (if we may give credit to the antiquity of Greece,) even before the days of David, Orpheus and Linus were celebrated poets and musicians in Greece; and, at the same time, Carmenta, the mother of Evander, who was the first that introduced letters among the natives of Greece, was so called a carmine—from a song, because she delivered herself in verse. And in such veneration was this way of writing among the ancients, that their poets were called Vates—Prophets, and their muses were defied.
But, which is more certain and considerable, the most ancient composition that we meet with in scripture was the song of Moses at the Red Sea, (Exod. xv.) which we find before the very first mention of writing, for that occurs not until Exod. xvii. 14. when God bade Moses write a memorial of the war with Amalek. The first, and indeed the true and general end of writing, is, the help of memory; and poetry does somewhat pretend to this end. So, in sacred writing, metal may be the most useful to writing, helps to preserve the remembrance of ancient things. The book of the Miscellaneous, (lives of the Lord, (N.T.) and the book of Jasher, (Josh. x. 13. 2 Sam. i. 18.) seem to have been both written in poetic measures.
Many sacred songs we meet with in the Old Testament, scattered both in the historical and prophetic books, penned on particular occasions, in the opinion of very competent judges, "have in them as true and noble strains of poetry and picture as are met with in any other language whatsoever, in spite of all the disadvantages from translations into so different tongues and common prose;" nay, are nobler examples of the true sublime style of poetry than any that can be found in the Pagan writers; the images are so strong, the thoughts so great, the expressions so divine, and the figures so admirably bold and moving, that the wonderful manner of these writers is quite inimitable." It is fit that what is employed in the service of the sacred oracles should be of such a nature as is useful, and what and what they contain is more fitted to our hand, and made ready for use, than any part of the Old Testament; upon which account, if we may be allowed to compare one star with another, in the firmament of the scripture, these will be reckoned stars of the first magnitude.
All scripture is profitable (and this part of it in a special manner) for instruction in doctrine, in devotion, and in the right ordering of the conversation. The book of Job directs us what we are to believe concerning God; the book of Psalms, how we are to worship him, pay our homage to him, and maintain our communion with him; and then the book of the Proverbs shows very particularly how we are to govern ourselves in πάντα έσωπροσόν—every turn of human life: thus shall the man of God, by a due attendance to these lights, be perfect, thoroughly furnished for every good work. And these are placed according to their natural order, as well as according to the order of time; for very fitly are we first led into the knowledge of God, our judgments rightly formed concerning him, and our mistakes rectified; and then instructed how to worship him, and to choose the things that please him.
We have here much of natural religion, its principles, its precepts—much of God, his infinite perfections, his relations to man, and his government both of the world and of the church: here is much of Christ, who is the Spring, and Soul, and Centre, of revealed religion, and whom both Job and David were eminent types of, and had clear and happy prospects of. We have here that which will be of use to enlighten our understandings, and to acquaint us more and more with the things of God, with the deep things of God, speculation to entertain the mind contemplative, and discoveries to satisfy the most inquisitive, and increase the knowledge of those that have the best in its kind. Here is that also which, with a divine light, will bring into the soul the heat and influence of a divine fire, will kindle and inflame pious and devout affections, on which wings we may soar upward, until we enter into the holiest. We may here be in the mount with God, to behold his beauty; and when we come down from that mount, if we retain (as we ought) the impressions of our devotion upon our spirits, and make conscience of doing that good which the Lord our God here requires of us, our faces shall shine before all with whom we converse, who shall take occasion hence to gloryify our Father which is in heaven, Mat. v. 16.
Thus great, thus noble, thus truly excellent, is the subject, and thus capable of being improved, which gives me the more reason to be ashamed of the meanness of my performance, that the comment breathes so little of the life and spirit of the text. We often wonder at those that are not at all affected with the great things of God, and have no taste or relish of them, because they know little of them: but, perhaps, we have more reason to wonder at ourselves, that, conversing so frequently, so intimately, with them, we are not more affected with them, so as even to be wholly taken up with them, and in a continual transport of delight in the contemplation of them. We hope to be so shortly, in the meantime, though, like the three disciples that were the witnesses of Christ's transfiguration upon the mount, we are but dull and sleepy, yet we can say, Master, it is good to be here; here let us make tabernacles, Luke ix. 32, 33.

I have nothing here to boast of, nothing at all; but a great deal to be humbled for, that I have not come up to what I have aimed at, in respect of fulness and exactness. In the review of it, I find many defects, and those who are critical perhaps will meet with some mistakes in it; but I have done it with what care I could, and desire to be thankful to God, who, by his grace, has carried me on in his work thus far: let that grace have all the glory, (Phil. ii. 13.) which works in us both to will and to do whatever he will or do, that is good, or serves any good purpose. What is from God, I trust, shall be to him, shall be graciously accepted by him, according to what a man has, and not according to what he has not, and shall be of some use to his church; and what is from myself, that is, all the defects and errors, shall, I trust, be favourably passed by and pardoned. That prayer of St. Austin is mine, Domine Deus, quæcumque dixi in his libris de tuo, agnoscant et tu; et quæ de meo, et tu ignoscet et tu—Lord God, whatever I have maintained in these books correspond with what is contained in thine, grant that thy people may approve as well as thyself; whatever is but the doctrine of my book, forgive thou, and grant that thy people may forgive also.

I must beg likewise to own, to the honour of our great Master, that I have found the work to be its own wages; and that the more we converse with the word of God, the more it is to us as the honeycomb, Ps. xix. 10. In gathering some gleanings of this harvest for others, we may feast ourselves; and when we are enabled, by the grace of God, to do so, we are best qualified to feed others. I was much pleased with the passage I lately met with of Erasmus, that great scholar and celebrated wit, in an epistle dedicatory before his book De Ratione Concionandi, where, as one weary of the world and the hurry of it, he expresses an earnest desire to spend the rest of his days in secret communion with Jesus Christ, encouraged by his gracious invitation to those who labour and are heavy-laden to come unto him for rest; (Matth. xi. 28.) and this alone is that which he thinks will yield him true satisfaction. I think his words worth transcribing, and such as deserve to be inserted among the testimonies of great men to serious godliness. Neeque quisquam facilis credat quàm miserè animus jamudum affectet ab his laboribus in tranquillum omium secedere, quodque suærest vité, (suærest autem vice brevis falsus sine fugitibus,) solum cum eo solo colloqui, qui clamavit olim, (ne hodie mutat vocem suam,) "Veni ad me, omnes qui laboratis, et onerati estis, ego refeciam vos;" quandoquidem in tam turbulento, ne dicam furente, seculo, in tot molestiis quas vel ipsa tempora publicè inveheunt, vel privataù adserit eis ac valetudo, nihil referio in quo mens mea libentius conquaciet quàm in hoc arcano colloquio—No one will easily believe how anxiously, for a long time past, I have wished to retire from these labours into a scene of tranquillity, and, during the remainder of life, (dwindled, it is true, to the shortest span,) to converse only with him who once cried, (nor does he now retract,) "Come unto me, all ye that labour, and are heavy-laden, and I will refresh you;" for in this turbulent, not to say furious, age, the many public sources of diquittedune connected with the infirmities of advancing age leave no solace to my mind to be compared with this secret communion. In the pleasing contemplation of the divine beauty and benignity we hope to spend a blessed eternity, and therefore in this work it is good to spend as much as may be of our time.

One volume more, containing the Prophetical books, will finish the Old Testament, if the Lord continue my life, and leisure, and ability of mind and body for this work. It is begun, and I fir.; it will be larger than any of the other volumes, and longer in the doing; but as God, by his grace, shall furnish me for it, and assist me in it, (without which grace I am nothing, less than nothing,) it shall be carried on with all convenient speed; and sat ciò, si sat bene—if with sufficient ability, it will be with sufficient speed. I desire the prayers of my friends, that God would minister seed to the sower, and bread to the eaters, (Isa. lv. 10.) that he would multiply the seed sown, and increase the fruits of our righteousness; (2 Cor. ix. 10.) that so he who soweth and they who reap may rejoice together; (John iv. 36.) and the great Lord of the harvest shall have the glory of all.

Chester, May 13, 1710.

M. H.
This book of Job stands by itself, is not connected with any other, and is therefore to be considered alone. Many copies of the Hebrew Bible place it after the book of Psalms, and some after the Proverbs, which perhaps has given occasion to some learned men to imagine it to be written by Isaiah, or some of the later prophets. But, as the subject appears to have been much more ancient, so we have no reason to think but that the composition of the book was, and that therefore it is most fitly placed first in this collection of divine morals; also, being doctrinal, it is proper to precede, and 'introduce, the book of Psalms, which is devotional, and the book of Proverbs, which is practical; for how shall we worship or obey a God whom we know not?

As to this book,

I. We are sure that it is given by inspiration of God, though we are not certain who was the penman of it. The Jews, though no friends to Job, because he was a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel, yet, as faithful conservators of the oracles of God committed to them, always retained this book in their sacred canon. The history is referred to by one apostle; (James, v. 11.) and one passage (ch. v. 13.) is quoted by another apostle, with the usual form of quoting scripture, It is written, 1 Cor. iii. 19. It is the opinion of many of the ancients, that this history was written by Moses himself in Midian, and delivered to his suffering brethren in Egypt, for their support and comfort under their burdens, and the encouragement of their hope that God would, in due time, deliver and enrich them, as he did this patient sufferer. Some conjecture that it was written originally in Arabic, and afterward translated into Hebrew, for the use of the Jewish church, by Solomon, (so Monsieur Jurieu,) or some other inspired writer. It seems most probable to me, that Elihu was the penman of it, at least of the discourses, because (ch. xxiii. 15, 16,) he mingles the words of an historian with those of a disputant: but Moses perhaps wrote the two first chapters and the last, to give light to the discourses; for in them God is frequently called Jehovah, but not once in all the discourses, except ch. xii. 9. That name was but little known to the patriarchs before Moses, Exod. vi. 3. If Job wrote it himself, some of the Jewish writers themselves own him a prophet among the Gentiles; if Elihu, we find he had a spirit of prophecy which filled him with matter, and constrained him, ch. xxxii. 18.

II. We are sure that it is, for the substance of it, a true history, and not a romance, though the dialogues are poetical. No doubt there was such a man as Job; the prophet Ezekiel names him with Noah and Daniel, Ezek. xiv. 14. The narrative we have here of his prosperity and piety, his strange afflictions and exemplary patience, the substance of his conferences with his friends, and God's discourse with him out of the whirlwind, with his return, at length, to a very prosperous condition, no doubt, is exactly true, though the inspired penman is allowed the usual liberty of putting the matter of which Job and his friends discoursed, into his own words.

III. We are sure that it is very ancient, though we cannot fix the precise time either when Job lived, or when the book was written. So many, so evident, are its hoary hairs, the marks of its antiquity, that we have reason to think it of equal date with the book of Genesis itself, and that holy Job was contemporary with Isaac and Jacob; though not co-heir with them of the promise of the earthly Canaan, yet a joint-expectant with them of the better country, that is, the heavenly. Probably, he was of the posterity of Nahor, Abraham's brother, whose first-born was Us, (Gen. xxii. 21.) and in whose family religion was, for some ages, kept up, as appears, Gen. xxxvi. 53. where God is called, not only the God of Abraham, but the God of Nahor. He lived before the age of man was shortened to 70 or 80, as it was in Moses's time; before sacrifices were confined to one altar; before the general apostasy of the nations from the knowledge and worship of the true God; and while yet there was no other idolatry known than the worship of the sun and moon, and that punished by the Judges, ch. xxxi. 26, 28. He lived while God was known by the name of God Almighty, more than by the name of Jehovah; for he is called Shaddai—the Almighty, above thirty times in this book: he lived while divine knowledge was conveyed, not by writing, but by tradition; for to that appeals are here made, ch. viii. 8.—xxi. 29.—xv 18.—v. 1. And we have therefore reason to think that he lived before Moses, because here is no mention at all of the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, or the giving of the law. There is indeed one passage which might be made to allude to the drowning of Pharaoh, (ch. xxxvi. 12.) He divided the sea with his power, and by his understanding he smite through Rahab; which name Egypt is very frequently called by in scripture, as Ps. lxxxvii. 4.—lxxxix. 18. Isa. li. 9. But that may as well refer to the proud waves of the sea. We conclude therefore that we are here got back to the patriarchal age, and, beside its authority, we receive this book with veneration for its antiquity.

IV. We are sure that it is of great use to the church, and to every good Christian, though there are many passages in it dark and hard to be understood. We cannot perhaps be confident of the true meaning of every Arabic word and phrase we meet with in it. It is a book that finds a great deal of work for the critics; but enough is plain to make the whole profitable, and it was all written for our learning. This noble poem presents to us, in very clear and lively characters, these five things among others:

1. A monument of primitive theology. The first and great principles of the light of nature, on which natural religion is founded, are here, in a warm, and long, and learned, dispute, not only taken for granted on all sides, and not the least doubt made of them, but by common consent plainly laid down as eternal truths, illustrated and urged as affecting commanding truths. Were ever the being of God, his glorious attributes and perfections, his unsearchable wisdom, his irresistible power, his inconceivable glory, his inflexible justice, and his incontestable sovereignty, disclosed of with more clearness, fulness, reverence, and divine eloquence, than in this book? The creation of the world, and the government of it, are here admirably described, not as matters of nice speculation, but as laying most powerful arguments upon us to fear and serve, to submit to, and trust in, our Creator, Owner, Lord, and Ruler. Moral good and evil, virtue and vice, were never drawn more to the life, (the beauty of the one and the deformity of the other,) than in this book; nor the inviolable rule of God's judgment more plainly laid down. That happy are the righteous, it shall be well with them; and wo to the wicked, it shall be ill with them. These are not questions of the schools, to keep the learned world in action, nor engines of state, to keep the unlearned world in awe; no, it appears by this book that they are sacred truths of undoubted certainty, and which all the wise and sober part of mankind have in every age subscribed and submitted to.

2. It presents us with a specimen of Gentile piety. This great saint descended, not from Abraham, but Nahor; or, if from Abraham, not from Isaac, but from one of the sons of the concubines that were sent into the east country; (Gen. xxv. 6.) or, if from Isaac, yet not from Jacob, but Esau; so that he was out of the pale of the covenant of peculiarity, no Israelite, no proselyte, and yet none like him for religion, nor such a favourite of heaven upon this earth. It was a truth, therefore, before St. Peter perceived it, that, in every nation, he that fears God, and works righteousness, is accepted of him, Acts x. 35. There were children of God scattered abroad, (John xl. 52.) beside the incorporated children of the kingdom, Matth. viii. 11, 12.

3. It presents us with an exposition of the book of Providence, and a clear and satisfactory solution of many of the difficult and obscure passages of it. The prosperity of the wicked, and the afflictions of the righteous, have always been reckoned two as hard chapters as any in that book; but they are here expounded, and reconciled with the divine wisdom, purity, and goodness, by the end of these things.

4. It presents us with a great example of patience, and close adherence to God, in the midst of the sorest calamities. Sir Richard Blackmore's most ingenious pen, in his excellent preface to his paraphrase on this book, makes Job a hero proper for an epic poem; for, (says he,) "He appears brave in distress, and valiant in affliction, maintains his virtue, and with that his character, under the most exasperating provocations that the malice of hell could invent, and thereby gives a most noble example of passive fortitude, a character no way inferior to that of the active hero," &c.

5. It presents us with an illustrious type of Christ, the particulars of which we shall endeavour to take notice of as we go along. In general, Job was a great sufferer, was emptied and humbled, but in order to his greater glory. So Christ abased himself, that we might be exalted. The learned Bishop Patrick quotes St. Jerom more than once speaking of Job as a type of Christ, who, for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, who was persecuted for a time by men and devils, and seemed forsaken of God too, but was raised up to be an intercessor even for his friends that had added affliction to his misery. When the apostle speaks of the patience of Job, he immediately takes notice of the end of the Lord, that is, of the Lord Jesus, (as some understand it,) typified by Job, James v. 11.

In this book we have,

1. The history of Job's sufferings, and his patience under them, (ch. i. ii.) without a mixture of human frailty, ch. iii. (2.) A dispute between him and his friends upon them, in which, [1.] The opponents were Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar. [2.] The respondent was Job. [3.] The moderators were, First, Elihu, ch. xxxix. xxxvii. Secondly, God himself, ch. xxxviii. xli.

2. The issue of all in Job's honour and prosperity, ch. xlii. Upon the whole, we learn, that many are the afflictions of the righteous, but that, when the Lord delivers them out of all, the trial of their faith will be found to praise, and honour, and glory.
CHAPTER I.

The history of Job begins here, with an account, I, of his great piety in general, (v. 1.) and in a particular instance, v. 5. 8. Of his great prosperity, v. 9. 4. Of the malice of Satan against him, and the permission he obtained to try his constancy, v. 6. 12. IV. Of the surprising troubles that befell him; the ruin of his estate, (v. 13. -17.) and the death of his children, v. 18, 19. V. Of his unceasing patience and piety under these troubles, v. 20. -22. In all which, he is set forth for an example of suffering affliction, from which no prosperity can secure us, but through which integrity and uprightness will preserve us.

I. THERE was a man in the land of Uz, whose name was Job; and that man was perfect and upright, and one that feared God, and eschewed evil. 2. And there were born unto him seven sons and three daughters. 3. His substance also was seven thousand sheep, and three thousand camels, and five hundred yoke of oxen, and five hundred she-asses, and a very great household; so that this man was the greatest of all the men of the east.

Concerning Job, we are here told,
I. That he was a man; therefore subject to like passions as we are. He was Ish, a worthy man, a man of note and eminency, a magistrate, a man in authority. The country he lived in was the land of Uz, in the eastern part of Arabia, which lay toward Chaldea, near Euphrates, probably not far from Ur of the Chaldees, whence Abraham was called. When God called one good man out of that country, accurately, yet he left not himself without witness, but raised up another in it to be a preacher of righteousness. God has his remnant in all places, sealed ones out of every nation, as well as out of every tribe of Israel, Rev. vii. 9. It was the privilege of the land of Uz to have so good a man as Job in it; now it was Arabia the Happy indeed; and it was the praise of Job, that he was eminently good in so bad a place, and these were others were round about him, the better he was.

His name Job, or Jrob, (some say,) signifies one hated, and counted as an enemy; others make it to signify one that grieves, or groans; thus the sorrow he carried in his name might be a check to his joy in his prosperity. Dr. Cave derives it from Jab, to love, or desire, intimating how welcome his birth was to his parents, and how much he was the desire of their eyes; and yet there was a time when he cursed the day of his birth. Who can tell what the day may prove, which yet begins with a bright morning?

II. That he was a very good man, eminently pious, and better than his neighbours. He was perfect and upright. This is intended to show us, not only what reputation he had among men, (that he was generally taken for an honest man,) but what was really his character; for it is the judgment of God concerning him, and we are sure that is according to truth. 1. Job was a religious man, one that feared God, that is, worshipped him according to his will, and governed himself by the rules of the divine law in every thing. 2. He was sincere in his religion; he was perfect, not sinless; he himself owns, (ch. ix. 20.) If I say I am perfect, I shall be judged false. But, having a respect to all God's commandments, aiming at perfection, he was really as good as he seemed to be, and did not resemble in his profession of piety; his heart was sound, and his eye single. Sincerity is gospel-perfection; I know no religion without it. 3. He was upright in his dealings both with God and man; was faithful to his promises, steady in his counsels, true to every trust reposed in him, and made conscience of all he said and did. See Isa. xxxiii. 15. Though he was not of Israel, he was indeed an Israelite without guile. 4. The fear of God reigning in his heart was the principle that governed his whole conversation. That made him perfect and upright, inward and entire for God, universal and uniform in religion; that kept him close and constant to his duty. He feared God, had a reverence for his majesty, regard to his authority, and a dread of his wrath. 5. He dreaded the thought of doing what was wrong; with the utmost abhorrence and detestation, and, with a constant care and watchfulness, he eschewed evil, avoided all appearances of sin and approaches to it, and this, because of the fear of God, Neh. v. 13. The fear of the Lord is to hate evil; (Prov. viii. 13.) then, by the fear of the Lord men depart from evil, Prov. vi. 12.

III. That he was a man who prospered greatly in this world, and made a considerable figure in his country. He was prosperous, and yet pious. Though it is hard and rare, it is not impossible, for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven: with God, even this is possible, and by his grace the temptations of worldly wealth are not insuperable. He was rich, and his piety was a friend to his prosperity; for goodness has the promise of the life to come, as now is. He was prosperous, and his prosperity put a lustre upon his piety, and gave him, who was so good, so much greater opportunity of doing good. The acts of his piety were grateful returns to God for the instances of his prosperity; and, in the abundance of the good things God gave him, he served God the more cheerfully.

He had a numerous family; he was eminent for religion, and yet not a heretic; not a man of strife, but the father and master of a family. It is an instance of his prosperity, that his house was filled with children, which are a heritage of the Lord, and his reward, Ps. cxxii. 7. He had seven sons and three daughters, v. 2. Some of each sex, and none of the more noble sex, in which the family is built up. Children must be looked upon as blessings, for so they are, especially to good people, that will give them instructed instructions, and set them good examples, and put up good prayers for them. Job had many children, and yet he was neither oppressor nor uncharitable, but very liberal to the poor, ch. xxxi. 17, &c. Those that have great families to provide for ought to consider, that what is prudently given in alms is set out to the best interest, and put into the best fund for their children's benefit.

2. He had a good estate for the support of his family; his substance was considerable, v. 3. Riches are called substance, in conformity to the common form of speaking; otherwise, to the soul and another world, they are but shadows, things that are not, Prov. xxiii. 5. It is only in heavenly wisdom that we inherit substance, Prov. viii. 11. In those days, when the earth was not fully peopled, it was, as now, in some of the plantations, men might have land enough upon easy terms, if they had but where-withal to stock it; and therefore Job's substance is described as land. Job, it is likely, had silver and gold, as well as Abraham; (Gen. xiii. 2.) but then men valued their own and their neighbours' estates by that which was for service and present use, more than by that which was for show and state, and fit only to be hoarded. As soon as God had made man, and provided for his maintenance by the herbs and fruits, he made him rich and great, by giving him dominion over the creatures, Gen. i. 28. That, therefore, being still continued to man, notwithstanding his defection, (Gen. ix. 2.) is still to be reckoned one of the most considerable instances of men's wealth, honour, and power, Ps. vi. 6.

(2.) By his servants; he had a very good household or husbandry, many that were employed for him and maintained by him; and thus he both had honour and did good; yet thus he was involved in a great deal of care and appetite to a great deal of charge. See the vanity of this world; as goods are increased, they must be increased that tend them and occupy them, and they will be increased that eat them; and what good has the owner thereof, save the beholding of them with his eyes? Eccles. v. 11.

In a word, Job was the greatest of all the men of the east; and they were the richest in the world; those were rich indeed who were replenished more than the east. Isa. ii. 16. Job's wealth, with his wisdom, entitled him to the honour and power he had in his country, which he describes, ch. xxxix. and made him sit chief. Job was upright and honest, and yet grew rich, nay, therefore grew rich; for honesty is the best policy, and piety and charity are ordinarily the surest ways of thriving. He had a great household and much business, and yet kept up the fear and worship of God; and he and his house served the Lord. The account of Job's piety and prosperity comes before the history of his great afflictions, to show that neither will scour us from the common, nor from the uncommon, calamities of human life. Piety will not secure us, as Job's mistaken friends thought, for all things come alike to all; prosperity will not, as a careless world thinks; (Isa. lvi. 8.) I sit as a queen, and therefore shall see no sorrow.

4. And his sons went and feasted in their houses every one his day; and sent and called for their three sisters, to eat and to drink with them. 5. And it was so, when the days of their feasting were gone about, that Job sent and sanctified them, and rose up early in the morning, and offered burnt-offerings according to the number of them all: for Job said, It may be that my sons have sinned, and cursed God in their hearts. Thus did Job continually.

5. We have here a further account of Job's prosperity and his piety.

I. His great comfort in his children was a taken notice of, as in place of his prosperity; for it temporal comforts are borrowed, depend upon others, and are as those about us are. Job himself mentions it as one of the greatest joys of his prosperous estate, that his children were about him, ch. xxxix. 5. They kept a circular feast at some certain times; (v. 4.) they went and feasted in their houses. It was a comfort to this good man, 1. To see his children grown up and settled in the world; all his sons were in the possession of their own, properly married; and to each of them he had given a competent portion to set up with. They that had been olive-plants round his table, were removed to tables of their own. 2. To see them thrive in their affairs, and able to feast another, as well as to feed themselves. Good parents desire, promote, and rejoice in, their children's wealth and prosperity, as their own. 3. To see them in health, no sickness in their houses; for that would have spoiled their feasting, and turned it into mourning. 4. Especially to see them live in love and unity, and mutual good affection; no jars or quarrels among them, no strangeness one of another, no strait-handedness; but, though every one knew his own, they lived with as much freedom as if they had had all in common. It is comfortable to the hearts of parents, and comely in the eyes of all, to see brethren thus knit together; Behold, how good and how pleasant it is! Ps. cxxxviii. 1. 5. It added to the comfort, to see the brothers so kind to their sisters, that they sent for them to feast with them; who were so modest, that they would not have gone, if they had not been sent for. Those brothers that slight their sisters, care not for their company, and have no concern for their comfort, are ill-bred and ill-natured, and very unlike Job's sons. It seems their feast was so sober and decent, that their sisters were good company for them at it. 6. They feasted in their own houses, not in public houses, where they would be more exposed to temptations, and which we not speak of.

We do not find that Job himself feasted with them; doubtless they invited him, and he would have been the most welcome guest at any of their tables; nor was it from any sorrness or moralness of temper, or for want of natural affection, that he kept away, but he was old and dead to those things, like Barzillai, (2 Sam. xix. 35.) and considered that the young people would be more free and pleasant, there were none but themselves. Yet he would not restrain his children from that diversion which he denied himself. Young people may be allowed a youthful liberty, provided they flee youthful lusts.

II. His great care about his children is taken notice of as an instance of his piety: for that we are really, which we are relatively. Those that are good will be good to their children, and especially do what they can for the good of their souls. Observe, (v. 5.) Job's pious concern for the spiritual welfare of his children.

1. He was jealous over them with a godly jealousy: and so we ought to be over ourselves and those that are dearest to us, as far as is necessary to our care and endeavour for their good. Job had given his children a good education, had comfort in them, and good hope concerning them; and yet he said, "It may be my sons have sinned in the days of their feasting, more than at other times; have been too merry, have taken too great a liberty in eating and drinking, and have cursed God in their hearts," that is, "have entertained atheistical, profane, thoughts in their minds, unworthy notions of God and his providence, and the exercises of religion." When they were full, they were ready to deny God, and to say, Who is the Lord? ready (Prov. xxx. 9.) to forget God, and to say, The power of our hand has gotten us this wealth, Deut. vii. 12, 13. Nothing alienates the mind more from God than the interest and love of the world.

2. As soon as the days of their feasting were over, he called them to the solemn exercises of religion: not while their feasting lasted; (Let them take their time for that; there is a time for all things;) but, when it was over, their good father reminded them that they must know when to take up, and not think to fare sumptuously every day; though they had their days of feasting the week round, they must not think to have the same the year round; they had something else to do. Note, Those that are merry must find a time to be serious.

3. He sent to them to prepare for solemn ordinances, sent and sanctified them; ordered them to examine their own consciences, and repent of what they had done amiss in their feasting; to lay aside their vanity, and compose themselves for religious exercises. Thus he kept his authority over them for their good, and they submitted to it, though they were got into houses of their own. Still he was the priest of the family, and at his altar they all attended, valuing their share in his prayers more than their share in his estate. Parents cannot give grace to their children, (it is God that sanctifies,) but they exercise reasonable admonitions and counsels, to further their sanctification. In their baptism they were sanctified to God; let it be our desire and endeavour that they may be sanctified for him.

4. He offered sacrifice for them, both to atone for the sins he feared they had been guilty of in the days of their fasting, and to implore for them mercy and pardon, and grace to prevent, the debauching of their minds, and corrupting of their manners, by the liberty they had taken, and to preserve their piety and purity.

For he, with mournful eyes, had often spy'd,
Scatter'd on Pleasure's smooth but treach'rous tide,
The spoils of virtue overpow'd by sense,
And flouting wrecks of rul'd innocence.

Sir R. Blackmore.

Job, like Abraham, had an altar for his family, on which, it is likely, he offered sacrifice daily; but, on this extraordinary occasion, he offered more sacrifices than usual, and with more solemnity, according to the number of them all, one for each child. Parents should be particular in their addresses to God for the several branches of their family; “For this child I prayed, according to its particular temper, genius, and condition,” to which the prayers, as well as the endeavours, must be accommodated.

When these sacrifices were to be offered, (1.) He rose early, as one in care that his children might not lie long under guilt, and as one whose heart was upon his work, and his desire towards it. (2.) He required his children to attend the sacrifice, that they might join with him in the prayers he offered with the sacrifice, that the sight of the killing of the sacrifice might humble them much for their sins, for which they deserved to die, and the sight of the offering of it up might lead them to a Mediator. This serious work would help to make them serious again, after the days of their gaiety.

Lastly, Thus he did continually; not only whenever an occasion of this kind occurred, for he that is washed, needs to wash his feet: (John, xiii. 10.) the acts of repentance and faith must be often renewed, because we often repeat our transgressions; but, all days, every day, he offered up his sacrifices, as constant to his devotions, and did not omit them any day. The occasional exercises of religion will not excuse us from those that are stated. He that serves God uprightly will serve him continually.

6. Now there was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord, and Satan came also among them. 7. And the Lord said unto Satan, Whence comest thou? Then Satan answered the Lord, and said, From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it. 8. And the Lord said unto Satan, Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God, and escheweth evil? 9. Then Satan answered the Lord, and said, Doth Job fear God for nought? 10. Hast not thou made a hedge about him, and about his house, and about all that he hath on every side? Thou hast blessed the work of his hands, and his substance is increased in the land: 11. But put forth thy hand now, and touch all that he hath, and he will curse thee to thy face. 12. And the Lord said unto Satan, Behold, all that he hath is in thy power, only upon himself put not forth thy hand. So Satan went forth from the presence of the Lord.

Job was not only so rich and great, but withal so wise and good, and had such an interest both in heaven and earth, that one would think the mountain of his wisdom, and the height of his understanding, as it were not moved; but here we have a thick cloud gathering over his head, pregnant with a horrible tempest. We must never think ourselves secure from storms, while we are in this lower region.

Before we are told how his troubles surprised and seized him here in this visible world, we are here told how they were concerted in the world of spirits; that the Devil having a great enmity to Job for his eminent piety, begged and obtained leave to torment him. It does not come from all depths of the credibility of Job's story in general, to allow that this discourse between God and Satan, in these verses, is parabolical, like that of Micaiah, (1 Kings xxii. 19, &c.) and an allegory designed to represent the malice of the Devil against good men, and the divine check and restraint that malice is under. Only thus much further is intimated, that the affairs of this earth are very much the subject of the counsels of the unseen world. That world is dark to us, but we lie very open to it.

Now here we have,

I. Satan among the sons of God, (v. 6.) an adversary (so Satan signifies) to God, to men, to all good. He thrust himself into an assembly of the sons of God, that came to present themselves before the Lord. This means, either, 1. A meeting of the saints on earth. Professors of religion, in the patriarchal age, were called sons of God; (Gen. vi. 2.) they had both their religious assemblies, and stated times for them. The king came in to see his guests; the eye of God was on all present: but there was a serpent in paradise, a Satan among the sons of God; when they come together, he is among them to distract and disturb them, stands at their right hand to resist them; the Lord rebuke thee, Satan! Or, 2. A meeting of the angels in heaven; they are the sons of God, ch. xxxviii. 7. They came to give an account of their negotiations on earth, and to receive new instructions. Satan was one of them originally; but how art thou fallen, O Lucifer! He shall no more stand in that congregation; yet he is here represented as coming among them, either summoned to appear as a criminal, or convicted at, for the present, though an intruder.

II. His examination, how he came thither; (v. 7.) The Lord said unto Satan, Whence comest thou? He asked very well, and with what design he came thither; that, as the good angels came to do good, he came for a permission to do hurt; but he would, by calling him to an account, show him that he was under check and control. Whence comest thou? He asks this, 1. As wondering what brought him thither. Is Saul among the prophets? Satan among the sons of God? Yes, for he transformeth himself into an angel of light, (2 Cor. xi. 13, 14.) and would seek to deceive one of them. Note, It is possible that a man may be a child of the Devil, and yet be found in the assem bles of the sons of God in this world, and there may pass undiscovered by men, and yet be challenged by the all-seeing God; Friend, how camest thou in hither? Or, 2. As inquiring what he had been doing before he came thither, the same question was put to the rest of the company, and presented themselves before the Lord, Whence came you? We are accountable to God for all our haunts, and all the ways we traverse.

III. The account he gives of himself, and the tour he had made. I come (says he) from going to and fro on the earth. 1. He could not pretend he had been doing any good, could give no such account of himself as the sons of God could, who bring forth (as I xxxii. 14) in the laborious work, *and in the invention of the time* (Gen. i. 29, 30), and after executing his orders, serving the interest of his kingdom, and ministering to the heirs of salvation. 2. He would not own he had been doing any hurt; that he had been drawing men from their allegiance to God, deceiving and destroying souls; no, I have done no wickedness, Prov. xxx. 20. Thy servant went no whither. In saying that he had walked to and fro through the earth, he intimates that he had kept himself within the bounds allotted him. He could have been tethered for the dragon is cast out into the earth, (Rev. xii. 9,) and not yet confined to his place of torment. While we are on this earth, we are within his reach; and with so much subtlety, swiftness, and industry, does he penetrate into all the corners of it, that we cannot be in any place secure from his temptations. 3. He yet seems to give some representation of his own character. (1.) Perhaps it is spoken proudly, and with an air of haughtiness, as if he were indeed the prince of this world, as if the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them were his, (Luke iv. 6,) and he had now been walking in circuit through his own territories. (2.) Perhaps it is spoken fretfully, and with discontent; he had been walking to and fro, and could find no rest, but was as much a fugitive and a vagabond as Cain in the land of Nod. (3.) Perhaps it is spoken carefully; I have been hard at work, going to and fro, or (as some read it) seeking to work in the earth, as if he really in quest of an opportunity to do mischief. He walks about seeking whom he may devour. It concerns us therefore to be sober and vigilant.

IV. The question God puts to him concerning Job, (v. 8.) Hast thou considered my servant Job? As when we meet with one that has been in a distant place, where we have a friend we dearly love, we are ready to ask, You have been in such a place; pray did you see my friend there? Observe, 1. How honourably God speaks of Job; he is my servant. Good men are God's servants, and he is pleased to reckon himself honoured in their services, and that they are to him for a name and a praise, (Jer. xiii. 11,) and a crown of glory, Isa. lxxxii. 3. Yonder is my servant Job; there is none like him, none value I like him of all the princes and potentates of the earth, one such saint as he is worth than the all. The saints of old of mankind, in comparison with Job, many do well, but he excelleth them all; there is not to be found such great faith, no not in Israel.* Thus Christ, long after held up the centurion and the woman of Canaan, who were both of them, like Job, strangers to that commonwealth. The saints glory in God; Who is like thee among the gods? And he is pleased to glory in them; Who is like Israel among the people? So here, none but he and Job are there in the heavens, that state of imperfection; those in heaven do indeed far outshine him; those who are least in that kingdom are greater than he; but on earth there is none like his. There is none like him in that land: so some good men are the glory of their country.

2. How closely he gives to Satan this good character of Job, Hast thou set thy heart on my servant Job? Designing hereby, (1.) To aggravate the apostasy and misery of that wicked spirit; How unlike him art thou! Note, The holiness and happiness of the saints are the shame and torment of the Devil, and the Devil with hypocrisy. To answer the Devil's seeming boast of the interest he had in this earth; I have been walking to and fro in it, says he, and it is all my own; all flesh have corrupted their way; they all sit still, and are at rest in their sins; Zech. i. 10, 11. Nay hold, saith God, "Job is my faithful servant." Satan may boast, but he shall not triumph. (3.) To anticipate his accusations, as if he had said, "Satan, thou art the accuser of the servants of God; how do you propose to inform against Job; but hast thou considered him?" Does not his unquickness character give thee the lie? Note, God knows all the malice of the Devil and his instruments against his servants; and we have an Advocate ready to appear for us, even before we are accused.

V. The Devil's base insinuation against Job, in answer to God's encomium of him. He cannot deny that Job feared God, but suggests that he feared God from motives of profit, not love, not from the pure love of God, (v. 9.) Dost Job fear God for naught? Observe, 1. How impatient the Devil was of hearing Job praised, though it was God himself that praised him. Those are like the Devil, who cannot endure that any body should be praised but themselves, and grudge at the just share of reputation others have, as Saul, (1 Sam. xviii. 5, &c.) and the Pharisees, Matth. xxii. 15. 2. How much at a loss he was for something to object against him; he could not accuse him of any thing that was bad, and therefore charges him with by-ends in doing good. Had the one half of that been true, which his angry friends, in the heat of dispute, charged him with, (ch. xv. 4.—xxii. 5,) Satan would, no doubt, have brought it against him now; but no such thing could be alleged, and therefore, 3. See how slyly he censures him as a hypocrite; not asserting that he was so, but only asking, Is he not so? This is the common way of slanderers; they only, to suggest that, by way of query, which yet they have no reason to think is true; whisperers, backbiters! Note, It is not strange if those that are approved and accepted of God, be unjustly censured by the Devil and his instruments; if they are otherwise unexceptionable, it is easy to charge them with hypocrisies, as Satan charged Job, and they have no way to clear themselves, but patiently to wait for the judgment of God. As there is nothing we should dread more than being hypocrites, so there is nothing we need dread less than being called and counted so without cause. 4. How unjustly he accuses him as mercenary, to prove him a hypocrite. It was a great truth that Job did not fear God for naught; he got well by it, for godliness is great gain; but it was a falsehood that he would not have feared God if he had not got this by it, as the event proved. Satan charges him falsely, because he was greatly afflicted; Satan, because he greatly prospered. It is no hard matter for those to calumniate that seek an occasion. It is not mercenary to look at the eternal recompense, in our obedience; but to aim at temporal advantages in our religion, and to make it subservient to that, is spiritual idolatry, worshipping the creature more than the Creator, and is likely to end in a fatal apostasy; men cannot long serve God and mammon.

VI. The complaint Satan made of Job's prosperity, v. 10. Observe, 1. What God had done for Job. He had protected him, made a hedge about him, for the defence of his person, his family, and all his possessions. Note, God's peculiar people are taken under his special protection, and they and all that belong to them; divine grace makes a home about their spiritual life, and do not prove a curse about their natural life, so they are safe and easy. He had prospered him, not in idleness or injustice, (the Devil could not accuse him of,) but in the way of honest diligence; Thou hast blessed the work of his hands without that blessing, be the hands ever so strong, ever so skillful, the work will not prosper; but with that, his substance is wonderfully increased in the land of his inheritance. Let us see whether Satan himself or not. 2. What notice the Devil took of it, and how he improved it against him. The Devil speaks of it with vexation; I see thou hast made a hedge about him, round about; as if he had walked it round, to see if he could spy ever a gap in it, for him to enter in at, to do him a mischief; but he was disappointed; it was a complete hedge. The wicked one sees it, and was grieved, and argued against Job, that the only reason he was served God well, because he prospered him. “No thanks to him be true to the government that prefers him, and to serve a Master that pays him so well.”

VII. The proof Satan undertakes to give of the hypocrisy and mercenaryness of Job's religion, if he might but have leave to strip him of his wealth. “Let it be put to this issue,” says he, v. 11. “make him poor, frown upon him, turn thine hand against him;” to make him as much as he can, to what he has, and it will appear what he is. If he curse thee not to thy face, let me never be believed, but posted for a false accuser. Let me perish, if he curse thee not. So some supply the improcement, which the Devil himself modestly conceded; but the profane swearers of our age impudently and daringly speak out. Observe, 1. How slightly he speaks of the affliction he desired that Job might be tried with; “Do but touch all that he has, do but begin with him, do but threaten to make him poor; a little cross will change his tone.” 2. How spitefully he speaks of the impression it would make upon Job. “He will not only let fall his devotion, but turn it into an open defiance; not only think hardly of thee, but even curse thee to thy face.” The word translated curse is barac, the same that ordinarily and ordinarily signifies to bless; but cursing God is so impious a thing, that the holy law would not admit the name: but that, where the sense requires it, it must be so understood, is plain from 1 Kings xxi. 10-13. where the word is used concerning the crime charged on Naboth, that he did blaspheme God and the king.

Now, (1.) It is likely that Satan did think that Job, if impoverished, would renounce his religion, and so disprove his profession, and if so, (as a learned gentleman has observed in his Mound of Spirits,) Satan had made out his own universal empire among the children of men. God declared Job the best man then living: now, if Satan can prove him a hypocrite, it will follow God that had not one faithful servant among men, and that there was no such thing as true and sincere piety in the world, but religion was all a sham, and Satan was king de facto—in fact, over all mankind. But it appeared that the Lord knows them that are his, and is not deceived in them; for though to the Devil it should appear that his religion, Satan would have the satisfaction to see him sorely afflicted: he hates good men, and delights in their griefs, as God has pleasure in their prosperity.

VIII. The permission God gave to Satan to afflict Job for the trial of his sincerity. Satan desired God to do it, Put forth thy hand now. God allowed him to do it; (v. 12.) “All that he has is in thy hand; make the trial as sharp as thou canst, do my worst at him.” Now, (1.) His matter of wonder that God should give Satan such a permission as this, should deliver the soul of his turtle-dove into the hand of the adversary, such a lamb to such a lion; but he did it for his own glory, the honour of Job, the explanation of Providence, and the encouragement of his afflicted people in all ages; to make a case, which, being adjudged, might be a useful precedent. He suffered Job to be tried, as he suffered Peter to be sifted; but took care that his faith should not fail, (Luke xxxii. 32.) and then the trial of it was found unto praise, and honour, and glory, 1 Pet. i. 7. But, (2.) It is matter of comfort that God has the Devil in a chain, Rev. xx. 1. He could not afflict Job without leave from God first asked and obtained, and then no further than he had leave; “Only upon himself put not forth thine hand; meddle not with his body, but only with his estate.” It is a limited power that the Devil has; he has no power to debauch men, but that they give him themselves, nor power to afflict men, but what is given him from above.

Lastly, Satan's departure from this meeting of the sons of God. Before they broke up, Satan went forth (as Cain, Gen. iv. 16.) from the presence of the Lord; no longer detained before him (as Doeg was, 1 Sam. xxi. 7.) than until he had accomplished his malicious purpose. He went forth, 1. Glad that he had gained his point; proud of the permission he had to do mischief to a good man; and, 2. Resolved to lose no time, but speedily to put his project in execution: he went forth now, not to go to and fro, rambling through the earth, but, with a direct course, to fall upon poor Job, who is carefully going on the way of his duty, and knows nothing of the matter. What passes between good and bad spirits concerning us, we are not aware.

13. And there was a day when his sons and his daughters were eating and drinking wine in their eldest brother's house: 14. And there came a messenger unto Job, and said, The oxen were plowing, and the asses feeding beside them; 15. And the Sabean fell upon them, and took them away; yea, they have slain the servants with the edge of the sword; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee. 16. While he was yet speaking, there came also another, and said, The fire of God is fallen from heaven, and hath burnt up the sheep, and the servants, and consumed them; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee. 17. While he was yet speaking, there came also another, and said, The Chaldeans made out three bands, and fell upon the camels, and have carried them away, yea and slain the servants with the edge of the sword; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee. 18. While he was yet speaking, there came also another, and said, Thy sons and thy daughters were eating and drinking wine in their eldest brother's house, 19. And, behold, there came a great wind from the wilderness, and smote the four corners of the house, and it fell upon the young men, and they are dead; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

We have here a particular account of Job's troubles:
JOB, 1.

1. Satan brought them upon him on the very day that his children began their course of feasting, at their eldest brother's house, (v. 13.) where, he having (we may suppose) the double portion, the entertainment was the richest that the household could provide. The false Philistine, doubt, was in perfect repose, and all were easy, and under no apprehension of trouble, nor when they revived this custom; and this time Satan chose, that the trouble, coming now, might be the more grievous; The night of my pleasure has he turned to fear, Isa. xxxi. 4.

2. They all come upon him at once; while one messenger of evil tidings was speaking, another came; and, before he had told his story, a third, and a fourth, followed immediately. Thus Satan, by the divine permission, ordered it, 1 That there might appear a more than ordinary displeasure of God against him in his troubles, and by that he might be exasperated against Divine Providence, as if it were resolved, right or wrong, to ruin him, and not give him time to speak for himself. 2 That he might not have leisure to consider and collect himself, and reason himself into a gracious submission, but might be overwhelmed and overpowered by complication of calamities. If he have not room to pause a little, he will be apt to speak in haste, and then, if ever, he will curse his God. Note, The children of God are often in heaviness, through manifold temptations: deep calls to deep, waves and billows, one upon the neck of another. Let one affliction therefore quickly and help us to prepare for another; for how deep soever we have drunk of the bitter cup, as long as we are in this world, we cannot be sure that we have drunk our share, and that it will finally pass from us. 3. They took from him all that he had, and made a full end of his enjoyments. The detail of his losses answers to the foregoing inventory of his possessions.

1. He had 500 yoke of oxen, and 300 she-asses, and a competent number of servants to attend them; and all those he lost at once, v. 14, 15. The account he has of this, lets him know, [1.] That it was not through any carelessness of his servants, for then his resentment might have spent itself upon them: the oxen were ploughing, not playing, and the asses not suffered to stray, and so taken up as waifs, * but feeding beside them, under the servants' eye, each in their place; and they that pastured them were instructed by us, may suppose, him in person, and said, God speed the flocks. Note, All our prudence, care, and diligence, cannot secure us from affliction, no not from those afflictions which are commonly owing to imprudence and negligence. Except the Lord keep the city, the watchman, though ever so wakeful, wakes but in vain; yet it is some comfort under a trouble, if it found us in the way of our duty, and not in any by-path. [2.] That it was through the wickedness of the Sabeans, a sort of robbers, perhaps, that lived by spoil and plunder; they carried off the oxen and asses, and slew the servants that faithfully and bravely did their best to defend them, and one only escaped, not in kindness to him or his master, but that Job might have the certain intelligence of it by an eye-witness, before he heard it by a flying report, which would have brought it upon him suddenly. We have here a reason that either Job or his servants had given any provocation to these Sabeans to make this inroad; but Satan put it into their hearts to do it, to do it now, and so gained a double point, for he made both Job to suffer, and them to sin. Note, When Satan has God's permission to do mischief, he will not want mischievous men to be his instruments in doing it, for he is a spirit that works in the children of disobedience.

2. He had seven thousand sheep, and shepherds that kept them; and all those he lost at the same time by lightning, v. 16. Job was perhaps, in his own mind, ready to reproach the Sabeans, and fly out against them for their injustice and cruelty, when the next news immediately directs him to look upward; The fire of God is fallen from heaven. As thunder is his voice, so lightning is his fire: but this was such an extraordinary lightning, and so directly against Job, that all his sheep and shepherds were not only killed, but consumed, by it at once, and one shepherd only left alive to carry the news to poor Job. The Devil, aiming to make him curse God and renounce his religion, managed this part of the trial very artfully, in order thereunto. [1.] His sheep, with which especially he used to honour God in sacrifice, were all taken from him, as if God were angry at his offerings, and would punish him in those very things which he had employed in his service. Having misrepresented Job to God as a false servant, in pursuance of his old design to set Heaven and earth at variance, he here misrepresented God to Job as a hard Master, who would not protect those flocks out of which he had so many burnt-offerings: this would tempt Job to say, It is vain to serve God. [2.] The messenger called the lightning the fire of God, and, probably, Satan thereby designed to strike into his mind this thought, that God was turned to be his enemy, and fought against him, which was much more grievous to him than all the insults of the Sabeans. He owns, (ch. xxxi. 23.) that destruction from God was a terror to him. How terrible then were the tidings of this destruction, which came immediately from the hand of God! Had the fire from heaven not only taken the sheep and the shepherd, but have contrived it into a token of God's favour; but the fire consuming them in the pasture, he could not but look upon it as a token of God's displeasure: there had not been the like since Sodom was burned.

3. He had three thousand camels, and servants tending them; and he lost them all at the same time by the Chaldeans, who came in three bands, and drove them away, and slew the servants of these camels, which fell to Job's honest servants, who were in the way of their duty, had fallen upon the Sabeans and Chaldean robbers who were doing mischief, God's judgments therein would have been, like the great mountains, evident and conspicuous; but when the way of the wicked prosperers, and they carry off their booty, when just and good men are suddenly cut off, God's righteousness is like the great deep, the bottom of which we cannot sound. Ps. xxxvi. 6.

4. His dearest and most valuable possessions were his ten children; and to conclude the tragedy, news is brought him, at the same time, that they were killed, and buried in the ruins of the house in which they were feasting, and all the servants that waited on them, except one that came express with the tidings of it, v. 18, 19. This was the greatest of Job's losses, and which could not but grieve the quick indeed. [1.] They all died together, and not one of them was left alive. David, though a wise and good man, was very much disposed...
by the death of one son; how hard then did it bear upon poor Job, who lost them all, and, in one moment, was written childless! [2.] They died suddenly: had they been taken away by some lingering disease, he had had notice to expect their death, and prepare for the breach; but this came upon him without giving him any warning. [3.] They died when they were feasting and making merry; had they died suddenly, when they were praying, he might have better have borne it; he would have hoped that death had found them in a good frame, if their blood had been mingled with their sacrifices; but to have it mingled with their feast, where he himself used to be jealous of them, that they had sinned, and cursed God in their hearts—to have that day come upon them at unawares, like a thief in the night, when perhaps their heads were overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness; this could not but add much to his grief, considering what a tender concern he always had for his children's souls; and that they were now out of the reach of the sacrifices he used to offer, according to the number of them all. See how all things came alike to all. Job's children were constantly prayed for by his father, and lived in love one with another, and as tender towards one another as possible. He always had a care for them, and ordered for them. [4.] They died by a wind of the Devil's raising, who is the prince of the power of the air; (Eph. ii. 2.) but it was looked upon to be an immediate hand of God, and a token of his wrath. So Bildad construed it; (ch. viii. 4.) They children have sinned against him, and he has cast them away in their transgressions. [5.] They were taken away when he had most need of them to comfort him under all his other losses. Such miserable comforters are all creatures; in God only we have a present help at all times.

20. Then Job arose, and rent his mantle, and shaved his head, and fell down upon the ground, and worshipped. 21. And said, Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither: the Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord. 22. In all this Job sinned not, nor charg'd God foolishly.

The Devil had done all he desired leave to do against Job, to provoke him to curse God; he had touched all he had, touched it with a witness; he whom the rising sun saw the richest of all the men in the east, before night was poor to a proverb. If his riches had been, as Satan insinuated, the only principle of his religion, now that he had lost his riches, he had certainly lost his religion; but the account we have, in these verses, of his pious department under his affliction, sufficiently proved the Devil a liar, and Job an honest man.

1. He conducted himself like a man, under his afflictions; not stupid and senseless, like a stock or stone, nor in any foolish manner, to beg the death of his children and servants; no. (v. 20.) he arose, and rent his mantle, and shaved his head, which were the usual expressions of great sorrow, to show that he was sensible of the hand of the Lord that was gone out against him; yet he did not break out into any indecencies, nor discover any extravagant passion; he did not faint away, but arose, as a champion to the combat; he did not, in a heat, throw off his clothes, but very gravely, in conformity to the custom of the country, rent his mantle, his cloak, or outer garment; he did not passionately tear his hair, but deliberately shaved his head; by all which it appeared that he kept his temper, and bravely maintained the possession and repose of his own soul, in the midst of all these provocations.

The time when he began to show his feelings is observable; it was not till he heard of the death of his children, and then he arose, then he rent his mantle. A worldly unbelieving heart would have said, 'Now that the meat is gone, it is well that the mouth is washed.' But Job saw that there are no portions, it is well that there are no comforts. Job knew better, and would have been thankful if Providence had spared his children, though he had had little or nothing for them, for Jehovah-jireh, the Lord will provide. Some expositors, remembering that it was usual with the Jews to read their clothes when they heard blasphemy, conjecture that Job rent his clothes in a holy indignation at the blasphemous thoughts which Satan now cast into his mind, as his heart was now hardened against God. So Job here is sold.

II. He conducted himself like a wise and good man, under his affliction, like a perfect and upright man, and one that feared God, and eschewed the evil of sin more than that of outward trouble.

1. He humbly himself under the hand of God, and accommodated himself to the providences he was under, as one that knew how to want as well as how to abound. When God called to weeping and mourning, he kept himself restrained; his mantle, and shaved his head, abased himself even to the dust before God, he fell down upon the ground, in a penitent sense of sin, and a patient submission to the will of God, accepting the punishment of his iniquity. Hereby he showed his sincerity; for hypocrites cry not when God binds them, Job xxxvi. 13. Hereby he prepared himself to get good by the affliction; for how can we improve the grief which we will not feel?

2. He composed himself with ingenuous considerations, that he might not be disturbed, and put out of the possession of his own soul by these events: he reasons from the common state of human life, which he describes with application to himself; Naked came I (as others do) out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither, into the lap of our common mother, the earth; as the child, when it is sick or weary, lays its head in its mother's bosom. Dust we were in our original, and dust we return to the earth as we were; (Ecc. xi. 7.) naked shall we return thither, whence we were taken, namely, to the clay, Job xxxix. 6. St. Paul refers to this of Job, (1 Tim. vi. 7.) We brought nothing of this world's goods into the world, but have them from others; and it is certain that we can carry nothing out, but must leave them to others. We come into the world naked; not only unarmed, but unchelthed, helpless, shiftless, not so well covered and fenced as other creatures. The sin we are born in, makes us naked to our shame, in the eyes of the holy God. We go out of the world naked; the body does, though the sanctified soul goes clothed, 2 Cor. v. 3. Death strips us of all our enjoyments; clothing can neither warm nor adorn a dead body. This consideration silenced Job under all his losses.

1. He is but where he was at first; he looks upon himself only as naked, not maltimed, not wounded; he was himself still his own man; when nothing else was his own, and therefore but reduced to his first condition. Nemo tam fauuer potest esse quam natura est—No one can be so poor as he was when born. Mm. Felix. If we are impoverished, we are not wronged, nor much hurt, for we are but as we were born. (2.) He is but where he must have been at last, and is only unclothed, or unchelthed, rather, a little sooner than he expected. If we put off our clothes before we go to bed, it is some inconvenience, but it may be the better borne when it is near bed-time.

3. He gave glory to God, and expressed himself upon this occasion with a great veneration for the Divine Providence, and an awful submission to its dispositions; we may well rejoice to find Job in this good frame, because this was the very thing upon which the trial of his integrity was put, though he did not know it. The Devii said that he would, under his affliction, curse God; but he blessed him, and so proved himself an honest man. (1.) He acknowledged the favour of God both in the mercies he had formerly enjoyed, and in the afflictions he was now exercised with: The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away. We must own the Divine Providence, [1] In all our comforts, God gave us our being, made us, and not we ourselves, gave us our wealth; it was not our ingenuity or industry that enriched us, but God’s blessing on our cares and endowments; he gave us power to get wealth; not only made us a people for himself, but bestowed upon us his share. [2] In all our crosses, The same that gave, hath taken away; and may we not do what he will with his own? See how he looks above instruments, and keeps his eye upon the First Cause; he does not say, “The Lord gave, and the Sabean and Chaldean have taken away; God made me rich, and the Devil has made me poor;” but, “He that gave, has taken;” and, for that reason, he is dumb, and has nothing to say, because God did it: He that gave, may take which and where and how and how much, he pleases. Seneca could argue thus, Abstulit, sed et dedit—He took away, but he also gave; and Epicetus excellently, (cap. 15.) “When thou art deprived of any comfort, suppose a child taken away by death, or a part of thy estate lost, say not, He took; I have lost it; but, He has restored it to the right owner. But thou wilt object, (says he) Ananias and Aquila, He is a bad man, that has robbed Aquila; to which he says, What is it to thee, what hand he that gives remainds what he gave?”

(2.) He adores God in both. When all was gone, he fell down and worshipped. Note, Afflictions must not divert us from, but quicken us to, the exercise of religion. Weping must not hinder sowing, nor hinder worshipping. He eyed not only the hand of God, but the name of God, in his afflictions, and gave glory to that, Blessed be the name of the Lord. He was still the same man, and had all the good thoughts of God that ever he had, and is as forward as ever to speak them forth to his praise; and can find in his heart to bless God, even when he takes away, as well as when he gives. Thus must we sing both of mercy and judgment, Ps. ch. 1. [1] He blesses God for what was given, though now it was taken away. When our comforts are removed from us, we must thank God that ever we had them, and had them so much longer than we deserved. Nay, [2] He adores God, even in taking away, and gives him honour by a willing submission; nay, he gives him thanks for good designed him by his afflictions, for gracious supports under his afflictions, and the believing hopes he had of a happy issue at last.

Lastly, Here is the honourable testimony which the Holy Ghost gives to Job’s constancy and good conduct under his afflictions. He passed his trials with applause, v. 22. In all this, Job did not act amiss, for he did not attribute folly to God, nor in the least reflect upon his wisdom in what he had done. Discontent and impatience do, in effect, charge God with folly. Against the workings of these, therefore, Job carefully watched; and so must we, acknowledging, that as God has done right, but we have done wickedly, so God has done wisely, but we have done foolishly, very foolishly. They who not only keep their temper under crosses and provocations, but keep up good thoughts of God and sweet communion with him, whether their praise be of men or no, it will be of God, as Job here was.

CHAP. II.

We left Job honourably acquitted, upon a fair trial between God and Satan concerning him. Satan had leave to touch, to touch and take, all he had, and was confident that he would then curse God to his face; but, or the contrary, he blessed him, and so he was proved an honest man, and Satan a false accuser. Now, one would have thought, this had been conclusive, and that Job should never have had his reputation called in question again; but Job is known to be armour of proof; and therefore is here set up for a mark, and brought upon his trial, a second time. 1. Satan moved for another trial which should touch his bone and his flesh, v. 1. 5. II. God, for holy ends, permits it, v. 6. III. Satan smites him with a very painful and loathsome disease, v. 7, 8. IV. His wife tempts him to curse God, but he resists the temptation, v. 9, 10. V. His friends come to console him, and to comfort him, v. 11. 13. And in this that godly man is set forth for an example of suffering affliction and of patience.

1. AGAIN there was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord, and Satan came also among them to present himself before the Lord. 2. And the Lord said unto Satan, From whence comest thou? And Satan answered the Lord, and said, From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it. 3. And the Lord said unto Satan, Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God, and escheweth evil? and still he holdeth fast his integrity, although thou movest me against him, to destroy him without cause. 4. And Satan answered the Lord, and said, Skin for skin; yea, all that a man hath will he give for his life: 5. But put forth thy hand now, and touch his bone and his flesh, and he will curse thee to thy face. 6. And the Lord said unto Satan, Behold, he is in thy hand; but save his life.

Satan, that sworn enemy to God and all good men, is here pushing forward his malicious prosecution of Job, whom he hated because God loved him, and did all he could to separate between him and his God, to sow discord, and make mischief, between them, urging God to afflict him, and then urging him to blaspheme God. One would have thought that he had enriched of his former attempt upon Job, in which he was so shamefully haffled and disappointed; but malice is restless, the Devil and his instruments are so. They that calumniate good people, and accuse them falsely, will have their saying, though the evidence to the contrary be ever so plain and full, and they have been cast in the issue which they themselves have put it upon. Satan will have Job’s cause called over again. The malicious, unreasonable, importunity of that great persecutor of the saints is represented, (Rev. xii. 10,) by his accusing them before our God day and night, still repeating and urging that against them which has been many a time and again, and did Satan here accuse Job day after day. Here is,

I. The court set, and the prosecutor, or accuser, making his appearance, (v. 1, 2.) as before, ch. i. 6, 7. The angels attended God’s throne, and Satan among them. One would have expected him to come and confess his malice against Job, and his mistake concerning him; to cry, Peccavi—"I have done wrong," for belying one whom God spake well of, and to beg pardon; but, instead of that, he comes with a further design against Job. He is asked the same question as before, Whence comest thou? And answers as before, From going to and fro in the earth; as if he had not been doing harm, though he had been abusing that good man. II. The Judge himself of counsel for the accused, and pleading for him; (v. 3.) "Hast thou considered my servant Job better than thou didst, and art thou now at length convinced that he is a faithful servant of mine, a perfect and an upright man; for thou seest he still holds fast his integrity?" This is now added to his character as a further achievement; instead of jetting go his religion, and cursing God, but they were not his. He, as that which he has now more than ordinary occasion for; he is the same in adversity that he was in prosperity, and rather better, and more hearty and lively in blessing God than ever he was, and takes root the faster for being thus shaken. See, 1. How Satan is condemned for his allegations against Job; Thou movest me against him, as an accuser, to destroy him without cause. Or, "Thou in vain movest me to trouble him; for I will never disturb him of that nature, thine endeavours to do it make him hold it the faster; instead of losing ground by the temptation, he gets ground." God speaks of it with wonder, and pleasure, and something of triumph in the power of his own grace; Still he holds fast his integrity. Thus the trial of Job's faith was found to his praise and honour, 1 Pet. i. 7. Constancy crowns integrity. III. The accusation further prosecuted, v. 4. Who except Satan can make for the failure of his former attempt? What can be the advantage of being so forward when he had been so very confident that he should gain his point? Why, truly, he has this to say, Skin for skin, and all that a man has, will he give for his life. Something of truth there is in this, that self-love and self-preservation are very powerful commanding principles in the hearts of men. Men love themselves better than their nearest relations, even their children, that are pieces of themselves; will not only venture, but give, their estates to save their lives. All account life sweet and precious, and while they are themselves in health and at ease, they can keep trouble from their hearts, whatever they lose. We ought to make a good use of this consideration, and while God continues to us our life and health, and the use of our limbs and senses, we should the more patiently bear the loss of other comforts. See Matth. vi. 25.

But Satan brings this an accusation of Job, silyly representing him, 1. As unnatural to those about him, and one that laid not to heart the death of his children and servants, nor cared how many of them had their skins (as I may say) stripped over their ears, so long as he slept in a whole skin himself. As if he that was so tender of his children's souls, could be careless of their bodies, and, like the ostrich, hardened against his young ones, as if he would have preserved their outward beauty, and no more, his beauty being thought the ornament of his soul. He might have been as wholly selfish, and minding nothing but his own ease and safety, as if his religion made him sour, and morose, and ill-tempered, and very ill-natured. Thus are the ways and people of God often misrepresented by the Devil and his agents.

IV. A challenge given to make a further trial of Job's integrity; (v. 5.) Put forth thine hand now, if I find my hand too short to reach him, and too weak to hurt him,) and touch his bone and his flesh, (that is with him the only tender part, make him sick with smiting him, Mic. vi. 13.) and then, I dare say, he will curse thee to thy face, and let go his integrity. See, 1. Satan does it, and he finds it by experience, that nothing is more tedious and loathsome to the thoughts, and put the mind into disorder, than acute pain and distemper of body. There is no disputing against sense. St. Paul himself had much ado to bear a thorn in the flesh, nor could he have borne it without special grace from Christ, 2 Cor. xii. 7. 9.

V. A permission granted to Satan to make this trial, v. 6. Satan would have had God put forth his hand and do it; but he afflicts not willingly, nor takes any pleasure in grieving the children of men, much less his own children; (Lam. iii. 38.) and therefore, if it must be done, let Satan do it, who delights in such work: He is in thine hand, do thy worst with him; (but with a proviso and limitation:) only save his life, or his soul. Afflict him, but not to death. Satan hunted for the precious life, would have taken that if he might, in hopes that dying agonies would have forced Job to curse his God; but God had mercy in store for Job after this trial, and therefore he must survive it, and, however he is afflicted, must have his life given him for a prey. If God did not chain up the roaring lion, how soon would he devour us! As far as he permits the wrath of Satan and wicked men to proceed against his people, he will make it turn to his praise and their's, and the remainder thereof, he will restrain, Ps. lxxvi. 10. Save his soul, that is, "his reason;" (so some) "preserve to him the use of that, for, otherwise, it will be no fair trial; if, in his delivery, he should curse God, that will be no disproving of his integrity. It would be the language not of his heart, but of his distemper."

Job, in being thus maligned by Satan, was a type of Christ, the first prophecy of whom was, that Satan should bruise his heel, (Gen. iii. 15.) and so he was foiled, as in Job's case. Satan tempted him to let go his integrity, his adoption; (Matth. iv. 6.) He show be against God. He entered into the heart of Judas who betrayed Christ, and (some think) with his terrors put Christ into his agony in the garden. He had permission to touch his bone and his flesh, without exception of his life, because by dying he was to do that which Job could not do; destroy him that had the power of death, that is the Devil.

7. So went Satan forth with the presence of the Lord, and smote Job with sore boils, from the sole of his foot unto his crown. And he took him a potsherd to scrape himself withal; and he sat down among the ashes. 9. Then said his wife unto him, Dost thou still retain thy integrity? Curse God, and die. 10. But he said unto her, Thou speakest as one of the foolish women speaketh. What! shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil? In all this did not Job sin with his lips. The Devil, having got leave to tear and worry poor Job, presently fell to work with him, as a tormentor first, and then attempt him. His own children he tempts first, and draws them to sin, and afterward tormenters, when whereby he has brought them to ruin; but this child of God he tormented with affliction, and then tempted to make a bad use of his affliction. That which he aimed at, was, to make Job curse God; now here we are told what course he took both to move him to it, and move it to him; both to give him the provocation, else it would be to no purpose to urge him to it, and to give him the information, else he would not have thought of it. Thus Satan tempted him against his own integrity, and all the stability of the old serpent, who is here playing the same game against Job that he played against our first parents; (Gen. 3.) aiming to seduce him from his allegiance to his God, and to rob him of his integrity.

I. He provokes him to curse God, by smiting him with sores boils, and so making him a burthen to himself, v. 7, 8. The former attack was extremely violent, but Job kept his head, bravely made good the pass, and carried the day: yet he is still but girding on the harness, there is worse behind; the clouds return after the rain; Satan, by the divine permission, follows his blow, and now deep calls unto deep. 1. The disease was very grievous with which Job was seized; Satan smote him with boils, sore boils, all over him, from head to foot; with an evil inflammation, so some render it; a cryphela, perhaps, in a higher degree than cole, when it is gathering, is most painful, and gives a man abundance of pain and uneasiness. What a condition was Job then in, that had boils all over him, and no part free, and those of as raging a heat as the Devil could make them, and, as it were, set on fire of hell! The small-pox is a very grievous and painful disease, and would be much more terrible than it is, but that we know the extremity of it ordinarily lasts but a few days; how grievous then was that disease, and however it was taken another with sore boils or grievous ulcers, which make him sick at heart, put him to exquisite torture, and to spread themselves over him, that he could lay himself no way for any ease. If at any time we be exercised with sore and grievous distempers, let us not think ourselves dealt with any otherwise than as God has sometimes dealt with the best of his saints and servants. We know not how much Satan may have a hand in such a divine distemper, with which the children of men, and especially the children of God, are afflicted; what infections that prince of the air may spread, what inflammations may come from that fiery serpent. We read of one whom Satan had bound many years, Luke xiii. 16. Should God suffer that roaring lion to have his will against any of us, how miserable would he soon make us!

2. His management of himself, in this distemper, was very strange, v. 8. (1.) Instead of healing salves he took a potsherds, a piece of a broken pitcher, to scrape himself withal: a very sad pass this poor man was come to. When a man is sick and sore, he may bear it the better, if he be well tended and carefully looked after; many rich people have, with a soft and tender hand, charitably ministered to the poor in such a condition as this; even Lazarus had some case from the tongues of the dogs that came and licked his sores; but poor Job has no help afforded him. [1] Nothing is done to his sores but what he does himself, with his own hands. His children and servants are all dead, his wife unkind, ch. xix. 17. He has not wherewithal to fee a physician, or surgeon; and, which is most sad of all, none of those he had formerly been kind to had so much sense of honour and gratitude as to minister to his distress: he distemper to no surgeon to dress, or to wipe his running sores, either because the disease was lothsome and noisome, or because they apprehended it to be infectious. Thus it was in the former days, as it will be in the last days; men were i vers of their own selves, unhumble, and without natural affection. [2.] All that he does to his sores is, to scrape them; they are not bound up with soft rags, nor mollified with ointment, not washed or kept clean; no healing plasters laid upon them, no ointments, no antiseptic, ministered to his patient parts to regulate the heat, and compose his pain, rest, nor any cordials to support his spirits; all the operation is the scraping of the ulcers, which, when they were come to a head, and began to die, made his body all over like a scurf, as is usual in the end of the small-pox. It would have been an endless thing to dress his boils one by one, he therefore resolves thus to do it by wholesale; a remedy which one would think as bad as the disease. [3.] He has nothing to do with this but a potsherds, no surgeons instrument proper for the purpose, but that which would rather rake into his wounds, and add to his pain, than give him any ease. People that are sick and sore, have need to be under the discipline and direction of others, for they are often but bad managers of themselves.

(2.) Instead of exposing himself in a soft and warm bed, he sat down among the ashes. Probably he had a (for, if he had been stripped, we do not find that his house was burnt or plundered;) but he chose to sit in the ashes, either because he was weary of his bed, or because he would put himself into the place and posture of a penitent, who, in token of his self-abhorrence, lay in dust and ashes, ch. xili. 6. Isa. lviii. 5. Jon. iii. 6. Thus did he humble himself under the mighty hand of God, and bring his mind to the meanness and poverty of his condition. He compassed, (ch. vii. 5.) that his flesh was clothed with worms, and clods of dust; and therefore dust to dust, ashes to ashes. If God lay him among the ashes, there he will contentedly sit down: a low spirit becomes low circumstances, and will help to reconcile us to them. The Septuagint reads it, He sat down upon a dunghill without the city; (which is commonly said, in mentioning this story;) but the original says no more than that he sat in the midst of the ashes, which he might do through his houinge.

II. He urges him, by the persuasions of his own wife, to curse God, v. 9. The Jews (who covet much to be wise above what is written) say that Job's wife was Dinah, Jacob's daughter: so the Chaldee paraphrase. It is not likely that she was; but, whoever it was, she was to him like Michael to David, a scoffer at his piety. She was spared to him, when the rest of his comforts were taken away, for this purpose, to be a troubler and tempter to him. If Satan leaves any thing that he has permission to take away, it is with a design of mischief. It is policy to send his temptations by the hand of those that are dear to us, as he tempted Adam by Eve, and Christ by Peter. We must therefore carefully watch, that we be not drawn to say or do a wrong thing by the influence, interest, or entreaty, of any, no not those for whose opinion and favour we have ever so great a value. Observe how strong this temptation was.

I. She banters Job for his constancy in his religion; "Dost thou still retain thine integrity? Art thou so very obstinate in thy religion, that nothing will cure thee of it? So tame and sheepish, as thus to trucule to a God, who is so far from rewarding thy services with marks of his favour, that he seems to take a pleasure in making thee miserable, strips thee of what encreaseth thee, without any provocation given? Is this a God to be still loved, and blessed, and served?"

Dost thou not see that thy devotion's vain?
What have thy prayers procured, but woe and pain?
Hast thou not yet found it to be true, of thee,
Perversely righteous, and absurdly good?
Those painful scenes, and all thy losses, show
(1 Tim. iv. 1) Heaven regards the foolish saints below.
Insincerely pious? Can't thy God Reform thy stupid virtue with his rod?

R. E. BLACKMORE.

Thus Satan still endeavours to draw men from God, as he did our first parents, by suggesting hard thoughts of him, as one that envies the happiness, and delights in the misery, of his creatures, than which nothing is more false. Another artifice he uses, is, to drive men from their religion, by leading them with scoffs and reproaches for their adhesion to it: we have reason to expect it, but we are not surprised when Satan himself has undergone it, we shall be abundantly recompensed for it, and with much more reason may we revert it upon the scoffers, "Are you such fools as still to retain your impudence, when you might bless God, and live?"

2. She urges him to renounce his religion, to blaspheme God, set him at defiance, and dare him to do his worst; "Curse God, and die; live no longer in dependence upon God, wait not for relief from him, but be thine own deliverer, by being thine own executioner, end thy troubles by ending thy life, better die once than be always dying thus; thou art now despair of having any help from thy God, even curse him, and hang thyself.'"

These are two of the blackest and most horrid of all Satan's temptations, and yet such as good men have sometimes been violently assaulted with: nothing is more contrary to natural conscience than blasphemying God, nor to natural sense than self-murder; therefore the suggestion of either of these may well be suspected to come immediately from Satan. Lord, lead us not into temptation, not into such, not into any, tempting, but deliver us from the evil one.

III. He bravely resists and overcomes the temptation, v. 10. He soon gave her an answer, (for Satan spared him the use of his tongue, in hopes he would curse God with it,) which showed his constant resolution to cleave to God, to keep his good thoughts of him, and not to let go his integrity.

See, 1. How he resented the temptations; he was indignant at having such a thing mentioned to him; "What! Curse God? I abhor the thought of it; get thee behind me, Satan." In other cases, Job reasoned with his wife with a great deal of mildness, saying what he would do, but what would she? (xii. 17.) He entreated for the children's sake of my own body. But when she persuaded him to curse God, he was much displeased; Thou speakest as one of the foolish women speaketh. He does not call her a fool, and an atheist, nor does he break out into any indecent expressions of his displeasure, as those who are sick and sore are apt to do, and think they may be excused; but he shows her the evil of what she said, that she spoke the language of the infidels and idolaters, who, when they are hardly beset, fret themselves, and curse their king and their God, Is. viii. 21. We have reason to suppose, that, in such a pious household as Job had, his wife was one that had been well-affect ed to religion, but that now, when all their estate and comfort were gone, she could not bear the loss with that temper of mind that Job had; but that she stood in the breach, as it were, with a determined dis tember, was a great provocation to him, and he could not forbear thus showing his resentment.

Note, (1.) Those are angry and sin not, who are angry only at sin, and take a temptation as the greatest affront; who cannot bear them that are evil, Rev. ii. 2. When Peter was a Satan to Christ, he told him plainly, Thou art an offence to me. (2.) If those whom we think wise and good, at any time speak that which is foolish and bad, we ought to reprove them faithfully for it, and show them the evil of what they say, that we suffer not sin upon them. (3.) Temptations to curse God ought to be rejected with the greatest abhorrence, and not be parleyed with: whoever persuades us to that, must be looked upon as our enemy, to whom if we yield it is at our peril. Job did not curse God, and then think to come off with Adam's excuse, The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she persuaded me to it, (Gen. iii. 12.) which had in it a tacit reflection on God, his ordinance, and providence; no, if thou scarest, thou alone shalt bear it. 2. How he reasoned against the temptation. Shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil also? Those whom we reprove, we must endeavour to convince; and it is no hard matter to give a reason why we should still hold fast our integrity, even when we are stripped of every thing else. He considers that though good and evil are contraries, yet they do not come from contrary causes, but both from the hand of God; (Isa. xlv. 7. Lam. iii. 38.) and therefore that in both we must have our eye up unto him, with thankfulness for the good he sends, and without fretfulness at the evil. Observe the force of his argument,

Shall we not receive evil? that is, [1.] "Shall we not expect to receive it? If God give us so many good things, shall we be surprised, or think it strange, if he sometimes afflicts us, when he has told us that prosperity and adversity are set the one over against the other?" 1 Pet. iv. 12. [2.] "Shall we not set ourselves to receive it aright?" The word signifies to receive as a gift, and denotes a pious affection and disposition of soul under our afflictions, neither despising them nor fainting under them, accounting them gifts; (Phil. i. 29.) accepting them as punishments of our iniquity; (Lev. xxvi. 41,) acquiescing in the will of God in them; ("Let him do with me as seemeth him good;") and accommodating ourselves to them, as those that know how to wait as well as how to abound, Phil. iv. 12. When the heart is humbled, and weaned, by humbling wean ing providences, then we receive correction, (Zech. iii. 2.) and take up our cross.

(2.) What he argues from; "Shall we receive so much good as has come to us from the hand of God, during all those years of peace and prosperity that shall have before we have been taken away? Shall we not be amazed, when God thinks fit to lay it on us?" Note, The consideration of the mercies we receive from God, both past and present, should make us receive our afflictions with a suitable disposition of spirit. If we receive our share of the common good in the seven years of plenty, shall we not receive our share of the common evil in the years of famine? Qui sentit commodum, sentire debet et unus—He who feels the sweet, must also feel the bitter of the privation. If we have so much the more reason to thank God, why should we not be content with that which pleases God? If we receive so many comforts, shall we not receive some afflictions, which will serve as fuels to our comforts, to make them the more valuable; (we are taught the worth of mercies, by being made to want them sometimes;) and as allays to our comforts, to make them the less dangerous, to keep the balance of things in due weight, that we may not be lifted up above measure? 2 Cor. xii. 7. If there be so much good for the body, shall we not receive some good for the soul; that is, some afflictions, by which we partake of God's holiness; (Heb. xii. 10,) something which, by saddening the countenance, makes the heart better? Let murmuring, therefore, as well as boasting, be for ever excluded.

IV. Thus, in a good measure, Job still held fast his integrity; and Satan's design against him was defeated. In all this did not Job sin with his lips; he not only said this well, but all he said, at this time, was under the government of religion and right reason: in the midst of all these grievances, he did not speak a word amiss; and we have no reason to think but that he also preserved a good temper of mind, so that though there might be some stirrings and risings of corruption in his heart, yet grace got the upper hand, and he took care that the root of bitterness might not spring up to trouble him, Heb. xii. 15. The abundance of his heart was for God, produced good things, and suppressed the evil that was there, which was out-voted by the better side. If he did think any evil, yet he laid his hand upon his mouth, (Prov. xxx. 32.) stifled the evil thought, and let it go no further; by which it appeared, not only that he had true grace, but that it was strong, and victorious; in short, that he had not forfeited the character of a perfect and upright man; for so he appears to be, who, in the midst of such temptation, offends not in word, Jas. iii. 2. Ps. xvi. 3.

11. Now when Job's three friends heard of this evil that was come upon him, they came every one from his own place; Eliphaz the Temanite, and Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite: for they had made an appointment together to come to mourn with him, and to comfort him. 12. And when they lifted up their eyes afar off, and knew him not, they lifted up their voice and wept; and they rent every one his mantle, and sprinkled dust upon their heads toward heaven. 13. So they sat down with him upon the ground seven days and seven nights, and none spake a word unto him: for they saw that his grief was very great.

We have here an account of the kind visit which Job's three friends made him in his affliction. The news of his extraordinary troubles spread into all parts; he being an eminent man, both for greatness and goodness, and the circumstances of his troubles being very uncommon. Some, who were his enemies, triumphed in his calamities; (ch. xvi. 10.-xx. 18.-xxx. 1, &c.) perhaps they made badges on him: but his friends concerned themselves for him, and endeavoured to comfort him; a friend loveth at all times, and a brother is born for adversity. Three of them are here named, (v. 11.) Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar. We shall meet with a fourth after, who, it should seem, was present at the whole conference, namely, Elihu; whether he came as a friend of Job, or only as an auditor, does not appear; these three are said to be his friends, his intimate acquaintances, as David and Solomon had each of them one in their court, that was called the king's friend. These three were eminently wise and good men, as appears by their discourses; they were old men, very old, they had a great reputation for knowledge, and much deference was paid to their judgment, ch. xxxii. 6. It is probable that there were many of figure in their country—princes, or heads of houses. Now observe,

I. That Job, in his prosperity, had contracted a friendship with them: if they were his equals, yet he had not that jealousy of them; if his inferior, yet he had not that disdain of them, which was any hindrance to an intimate converse and correspondence with them. To have such friends, added more to his happiness in the day of his prosperity, than all the heads of cattle he was master of. Much of the comfort of this life lies in acquaintance and friendship with those that are prudent and virtuous; and he that has a few such friends, ought to value himself highly. Job's three friends were disposed to be all of them of the posterity of Abraham, which, for some descents, even in the families that were shut out from the covenant of peculiarity, retained some good fruits of that pious education which the father of the faithful gave to those under his charge. Eliphaz descended from Teman, the grandson of Esau; (Gen. xxxvi. 11.) Bildad (it is probable) from Shuah, Abraham's son by Keturah, (Gen. xxvi. 11.) Zophar from Naamath, and the same with Zepho, a descendant from Esau, Gen. xxxvi. 11. The preserving of so much wisdom and piety among those that were strangers to the covenants of promise, was a happy presage of God's grace to the Gentiles, when the partition wall should, in the latter days, be taken down. Esau was rejected; yet many that came from him inherited some of the best blessings.

II. That they continued their friendship with Job in his adversity, when most of his friends had forsaken him, ch. xix. 14. Two ways they showed their friendship.

1. By the kind visit they made him in his affliction, to mourn with him, and to comfort him, v. 11. Probably, they had been wont to visit him in his prosperity, not to hunt or hawk with him, not to dance or play at cards with him, but to entertain and edify themselves with his learned and pious conversation; and now, that he was in adversity, they came to share with him in his griefs, as formerly they had come to share with him in his comforts. These were wise men, whose heart was in the house of mourning, Eccl. vii. 4. Visiting the afflicted, sick or sore, fatherless or childless, in their sorrow, is made a branch of pure religion and undefiled; (Jas. i. 27.) and, if done from a good principle, will be abundantly recompensed shortly, Matth. xvi. 26. By visiting the sons and daughters of affliction, we may contribute to the improvement, (1.) Of our own graces; for many a good lesson is to be learned from the troubles of others; we may look upon them, and receive instruction, and be made wise and serious. (2.) Of their comforts; by putting a respect upon them, we encourage them, and some good word may be spoken to them, which may help to make them easy. Job's friends came, not to satisfy their curiosity with an account of his troubles, and the strangeness of the circumstances of them; much less, as David's false friends, to make invi dious remarks upon him, (Ps. xii. 6-8.) but to mourn with him, to mingle their tears with his, and so to comfort him. It is much more pleasant to visit those in affliction, to whom comfort belongs, than to those to whom we must first speak conviction.

Concerning these visitants, observe, [1.] That they were not sent for, but came of their own accord; (ch. xxii. 23.) whence Mr. Caryl observes, that it is good manners to be an unbidden guest at the house of mourning, and in comforting our friends, to prevent their invitations. [2.] That they made an appointment to come. Note, Good people should make appointments among themselves for doing good, so exciting and obliging one another to it, and assisting and encouraging one another in it. For the carrying out of any pious design, let hand join in hand, and let the hearts of all within them work in love. (1 Cor. xiii. 4.) In order to this, we have reason to think it was a sincere design) to comfort him, and yet proved miserable comforters, through their unskilful management of his case. Many that aim well, by mistake, come short of their aim.
2. By their tender sympathy with him and concern for him in his affection; when they saw him at some distance, he was so disfigured and deformed with his sores, that they knew him not, v. 12. His face was foul with weeping, (ch. xvi. 16.) like Jerusalem's Naza res, that had been rudely as the ruber, but was now blacker some. Lam. iv. 7, 8. What a change will a sore disease, or, without that, oppressing care and grief, make in the countenance, in a little time! Is this Naomi? Ruth i. 19. So, Is this Job? How art thou fallen! How is thy glory stained and sullied, and all thine honour laid in the dust! God fit us for such changes!

Observing him thus miserably altered, they did not leave him, in a fright or loathing, but expressed so much the more tenderness toward him, (as is usual,) revived him with their undissembled grief in all the then usual expressions of that passion; they went aileud; the sight of them, (as is usual,) revived Job's grief, and set him a-weeping afresh, which fetched floods of tears from their eyes. They rent their clothes, and sprinkled dust upon their heads, as men that would strip themselves, and abuse themselves, with their friend that was stripped and abused.

(3.) Coming now to comfort him, they sat down with him upon the ground, for so he received visits; and they, not in compliment to him, but in true compassion, put themselves into the same humble and uneasy place and posture. They had many a time, it is likely, sitten with him on his couches, and at his table, in his prosperity, and were therefore willing to share with him in his grief and poverty, because they had shared with him in his joy and plenty. It was not, as before, that they came only to his house, that they might be admitted to his company, and to converse with him in his apparel and company; but they came to deal with him, and to comfort him, as his companions in tribulation, and exceptions from that rule, Nuntius ad admissas ibit amicus opes—They who have lost their wealth, are not to expect the visits of their friends.

They sat with him, but none spake a word to him, only they all attended to the particular narratives he gave of his troubles. They were silent, as men astonisht and amazed: Cura leves loquantur, ingentes stultificant—Our lighter griefs have a voice; those which are more offensive, are mute; or, according to Sir R. Blackmore,

So long a time they held their peace, to show
A reverence due to such prodigious woe.

They spake not a word to him, whatever they said one to another, by way of instruction, for the improvement of the present providence. They said nothing to that purpose to which afterward they said much—nothing to grieve him; (ch. iv. 2.) because they saw his grief was very great already, and they were loath at first to add affliction to his afflicted. There is a time to keep silence, when either the wicked is before us, and by speaking we may harden them, (Ps. xxxix. 1.) or when by speaking we may offend the generation of God's children, Ps. lxiii. 15. Their not entering upon the following solemn discourses till the seventh day, may perhaps intimate that it was the sabbath-day, which, thither being observed in the patriarchal age, and to that day they adjourned the intended conference, because, probably, then company resorted, as usual, to Job's house, to join him with his devotions, who might be edified by the discourse. Or rather, by their silence so long, they would intimate, that what they afterwards said was well considered and digested, and the result of many thoughts. The heart of the wise studies to answer. We should think twice before we speak once, especially in such a case as this, think long, and we shall be the better able to speak short and to the purpose.

CHAP. III.

Ye have heard of the patience of Job, says the apostle, Jam. v. 11. So we have, and of his impatience too. We wondered that a man should be so patient as he was; (ch. i. and ii.) but we wondered also, that a good man should be so impatient as he is here in this chapter, where we find him cursing his day, and, in passion, I. Complaining that he was born, v. i. 10. II. Complaining that he did not die as he was born, v. ii. 19. III. Complaining that his life was now comfortless, when he was in misery, v. 20. 26. In this, it must be owned that Job sinned with his lips, and it is written, not for our imitation, but our admonition, that he who thinks he stands, may take heed lest he fall.

1. AFTER this opened Job his mouth, and cursed his day. 2. And Job spake, and said, 3. Let the day perish wherein I was born, and the night in which it was said, There is a man child conceived. 4. Let that day be darkness; let not God regard it from above, neither let the light shine upon it. 5. Let darkness and the shadow of death stain it; let a cloud dwell upon it; let the blackness of the day terrify it. 6. As for that night, let darkness seize upon it; let it not be joined unto the days of the year; let it not come into the number of the months. 7. Lo, let that night be solitary; let no joyful voice come therein. 8. Let them curse it that curse the day, who are ready to raise up their mourning. 9. Let the stars of the twilight thereof be dark; let it look for light, but have none; neither let it see the dawning of the day: 10. Because it shut not up the doors of my mother's womb, nor hid sorrow from mine eyes.

Long was Job's heart hot within him; while he was musing, the fire burned, and the more for being stifled and suppressed; at length, he spake with his tongue, but not such a good word as David spake after a long pause, Lord, make me to know my end, Ps. xxxix. 3, 4. Seven days the prophet Ezekiel sat down astonished with the captives, and then (probably on the sabbath-day) the word of the Lord came to him, Ezek. iii. 15, 16. So long Job and his friends sat thinking, but said nothing; they were afraid of speaking what they thought, lest they should grieve him, and he durst not give vent to his thoughts, lest he should offend them. They came to comfort him, but, finding his afflictions very extraordinary, they began to think comfort did not belong to him, suspicious of his sect, and therefore they said nothing. But Job's think they may have leave to speak, and therefore Job gives vent first to his thoughts. Unless they had been better, it had been well if he had kept them to himself.

In short, he cursed his day, the day of his birth, wished he had never been born, could not think or speak his own birth without regret and vexation. Whereas men usually observe the annual return of their birth-day with rejoicing, he looked upon it as the unhappiest of the day of the year, because the unhappiness of his life, being the inlet into all his woe.

Not a Day.

1. This was bad enough. The extremity of his trouble and the discomposure of his spirits may excuse it in part, but he can by no means be justified in it.
Now he has forgotten the good he was born to, the lean kine have eaten up the fat ones, and he is fi-illed with thoughts of the evil only, and wishes he had never been born.
The prophet Jeremiah himself expressed his resentment of his calamities, in language that is as much his own fault as God's: "Let that mother, that thou hast borne me!" (Jer. xv. 10.)

Cursed be the day wherein I was born, Jer. xx. 14, &c.
We may suppose that Job, in his prosperity, had many a time addressed God for the day of his birth, and reckoned it a happy day; yet now he brands it with all possible marks of infamy. When we consider the iniquity in which we were conceived and born, we have reason enough to reflect with shame and shame upon the day of our birth, and to say that the day of our death, by which we are freed from sin, (Rom. vi. 7.) is far better, Eccl. vii. 1. But to curse the day of our birth, because then we entered upon the calamitous scene of life, is to quarrel with the God of nature, to despise the dignity of our being, and to indulge a passion which our own calm and sober thoughts will make us ashamed of. Certainly there is no condition of life a man can be in in this world, but he may, in it, (at God's not liking his fruit,) so honour God, and work out his own salvation, and make sure a hap-iness for himself in a better world, that he will have no reason at all to wish he had never been born, but a great deal of reason to say that he had his being to good purpose. Yet it must be owned, if there were not another life after this, and divine consolations to support us in the prospects of it, so many are the sorrows and troubles of this, that we might sometimes be tempted to say that we were made in vain (Ps. lx. xxxix. 4.) and to wish we had never been.
There are those in hell, who, with good reason, wish they had never been born, as Judges, Matth. xxvi. 24. But, on this side hell, there can be no reason for so vain and ungrateful a wish. It was Job's folly and weakness to curse his day; we must say of it, This was his infirmity; but good men have sometimes failed in the exercise of these graces which they have been most eminent for,
that we may understand, that, when they are said to have been made in vain, it is to mean that there is right, not that they were sinless. Lastly, Let us observe it, to the honour of the spiritual life above the natural, that, though many have cursed the day of their first birth, never any cursed the day of their new birth, nor wished they never had had grace, and the spirit of grace given them; those are the most excellent gifts, above life and being itself, and which will never be a burthen.

He was...Job's...Adam's. The truth is, God had as Satan promised himself: Job cursed his day, but he did not curse his God; was weary of his life, and would gladly have parted with that, but not weary of his religion; he resolutely cleaves to that, and will never let it go.
The dispute between God and Satan concerning Job, was not whether Job had his infirmities, and whether he was subject to like passions as we are;
(though was granted;) but whether he was a hypocrite, and secretly hated God, and, if he were proved wicked, would show it. The import of that was no such man. Nay, all this may consist with his being a pattern of patience; for though he did thus speak unadvisedly with his lips, yet, both before and after, he expressed great submission and resignation to the holy will of God, and repented of his impiety; he condemned himself for it, and therefore God did not condemn him; nor must we,
but watch the more carefully over ourselves, lest we sin after the similitude of this transgression.

The particular expressions which Job used, in cursing his day, are full of poetical fancy, flame, and rapture; and create as much difficulty to the critics as the thing itself does to the divines: we need not be particular in our observations upon them.

When he would express his passionate wish that he had never been, he falls foul upon the day; and,
1. He wished that earth might forget it; Let it perish, v. 5. Let it not be joined to the days of the Jupiter, v. 6. Let it be not only not inserted in the calendar in red letters, as the day of the king's natility useth to be," (and Job was a king, ch. xxix.
ule.) "but let it be rased and blotted out, and ried in oblivion. Let not the world know that ever such a man as I was born into, and lived in it, who made such a spectacle of misery."

2. That Heaven might frown upon it; Let not God regard it from above, v. 4. "Every thing is indeed as it is with God; that day is honourable on which he puts honour, and which he distinguishes and crowns with his favour and blessing, as he did the seventh day of the week, but let my birth-day never be so honour ed, let it be negro carbone notandus—marked as with a black coal, for an evil day,
by him that determines the times before appointed.
The Father and Fountain of light appointed the greater light to rule the day, and lesser lights to rule the night; but let that want the benefit of both." (v. 9.) Let that day be darkness (v. 4.) and if the light of the day be darkness, how great is that darkness! It is terrible, because then we look for light. Let the gloominess of the day represent Job's condition, whose sun went down at noon. (2.)
As for that night too, let it want the benefit of moon and stars, and let darkness seize upon it, thick darkess, darkness that may be felt, which will not be friend the repose of the night by its silence, but rather disturb it with its terrors.

3. That all joy might forsake it; "Let it be a melancholy night, solitary, and not a merry night of music or dancing; let no joyful voice come therein;" (v. 7.) "let it be a long night, and not see the eye-lids of the morning," (v. 9.) "which bring joy with them."

4. That all curses might follow it; (v. 8.) "Let none ever desire to see it, or bid it welcome when it comes, but, on the contrary, let them curse it that curse the day. Whatever day any are tempted to curse, let it be the day of their birth; particularly upon my birth-day; particularly those that make it their trade to raise up mourning a' masters with their ditties of lamentation. Let them that curse
the day of the death of others, in the same breath curse the day of my birth." Or, these who are so fierce and daring as to be ready to raise up the Leviathan, for that is the word here; who, being about to strike the whale or crocodile, curse it with the bitterest curse they can invent, hoping by its contemplation to strike weakness into themself masters of it. Probably some such custom might there be used, to which our divine poet alludes. Let it be as odious as the day wherein men beware the greatest misfortune, or the time wherein they see the most dreadful appallments; so Bishop Patrick, I suppose, taking the Leviathan here to signify the Devil, as others do, who understand it of the curses used by conjurers and magicians in praying that these might fall upon him who has raised a devil that they cannot lay.

But what is the ground of Job's quarrel with the day and night of his birth? It is because it shut not up the doors of his mother's womb, v. 10. See the tolly and madness of a passionate discontent, and how absurdly and extravagantly it talks, when the reins are laid on the neck of it. Is this Job, who was so much admired for his wisdom, that unto him men gave ear, and kept silence at his counsel, and after his words they spake not again? ch. xxix. 21, 22. Surely his wisdom failed him, (1.) When he took so much pains to express his desire that he had never been born, which, at the best, was a vain wish, for it is impossible to make that which has been, not to have been. (2.) When he was so liberal of his curses upon a day and a night, that could not be hurt, or made ever the worse for his curses. (3.) When he wished a thing so very barbarous to his own mother, as that she might not have brought him forth, when her full time was come; which must inevitably have been her death, and a miserable death. (4.) When he despised the goodness of God to him, (in giving him a being, such a being, so noble and excellent a life, such a life, so far above that of any other creature in this lower world, and undervalued the gift, as not worth the acceptance, only because transit cum onere—It was clogged with a proviso of trouble, which now, at length, came upon him, after many years' enjoyment of its pleasures. What a foolish thing it was to wish that his eyes had never seen the light, that so they might not have seen sorrow, which yet he might hope to see through, and beyond which he might see joy! Did Job believe and hope that he should see in his flesh God at the latter day; (ch. xix. 26.) and yet would he wish he never had had a being capable of such a bliss, only because, for the present, he had sorrow in the flesh? God, by his grace, arm us against this foolish and hurtful lust of impatience!

11. Why did I not from the womb? why did I not give up the ghost when I came out of the belly? 12. Why did the knees prevent me? or why the breasts that I should suck? 13. For now should I have lain still and been quiet, I should have slept: then had I been at rest, 14. With kings and counsellors of the earth, which built desolate places for themselves; 15. Or with princes that had gold, who filled their houses with silver: 16. Or as a hidden untimely birth I had not been; as infants which never saw light. 17. There the wicked cease from troubling; and there the weary be at rest. 18. There the prisoners rest together; they hear not the voice of the oppressor. 19. The small and great are there; and the servant is free from his master.

Job, perhaps reflecting upon himself for his folly in wishing he had never been born, follows it, and thinks to mend it, with another, little better, that he would wish himself never born, since he enlarges upon these verses. When our Saviour would set forth a very calamitous state of things, he seems to allow such a saying as this, Blessed are the barren, and the wombs that never bore, and the haps which never gave suck; (Luke xxiii. 29.) but blessing the barren womb is one thing, and cursing the fruitful womb is another! It is good to make the best of afflictions, but it is not good to make the worst of mercies. Our rule is, Bless, and curse not. Life is good, and death is better, and all is vanity; yet Job here very absurdly complains of life and its supports, as a curse and plague to him, and covets death and the grave, as the greatest and most desirable bliss. Surely Satan was deceived in Job, when he applied that maxim to him, All that a man hath will he give for his life; for never any man valued life at a lower rate than he did. 1. He ungratefully quarrels with life, and is angry that it was not taken from him as soon as 't was born; and when he was young, Why did I not die from the womb? See here, 1. What a weak and helpless creature man is when he comes into the world, and how slender the thread of life is, when it is first drawn. We are ready to die from the womb, and to breathe our last, as soon as we begin to breathe at all. We can do nothing for ourselves, as other creatures can, but should drop into the grave, if the knees did not prevent us; and the lamp of life, when first lighted, would go out of itself, if the breasts given us by which we should suck, did not supply it with fresh oil. 2. What a merciful and tender care Divine Providence took of us, at our entrance into the world. It was owing to this, that we died not from the womb, and did not give up the ghost when we came out of the belly. Why were we not cut off as soon as we were born? Not because we did not deserve it, justly might such weeds have been plucked up, as soon as they appeared, justly might such cockatrices have been crushed in the egg: not because we did, or could, take any care of ourselves and our own safety; no creature comes into the world so shiftless as man. It was not our might, or the power of our hand, that preserved us these beings; but God's power and providence upheld our frail lives, and his pity and patience spared our forfeited lives. It was owing to this that the knees prevented us. Natural affection is put into parents' hearts by the hand of the God of nature: and hence it was, that the doors of the breast attended those of the womb. 3. What a great deal of vanity and vexation of spirit attends human life. If we had not a God to serve in this world, and better things to hope for in another world, considering the faculties we are endued with, and the troubles we are surrounded with, we should be strongly tempted to wish that we had died from the womb, which had prevented a great deal both of sin and misery.

He that is born to-day, and dies to-morrow, Loses some hours of joy, but months of sorrow.

4. The evil of impatience, fretfulness, and discontent; when they thus prevail, they are unreasonable and absurd, impious and ungrateful; they are a slighting and undervaluing of God's favour. How much sooner life is illibtered, we must say, "It was of the Lord's mercies that we died not from the womb, that we were not consumed." Hatred of life is a contradiction to the common sense and sentiments of mankind, and our own at another time. Let discontented people declare ever so much against life, they will be loath to part with it when it comes to the point. When the old man in the fable, being tired with his burden, threw it down with discontent, and called for death, and death came to him, and asked him what he would have with him, he then answered, "Nothing, but help me up with my burden." He passionately applauds death and the grave, and seems quite in love with them. To desire to die, that we may be with Christ, that we may be free from sin, and that we may be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven, is the effect and evidence of grace; but to desire to die, only that we may be quiet in the grave, and delivered from the troubles of this life, savours of corruption. Job's considerations here may be of good use to reconcile us to death, when it comes, and to make us easy under the arrest of it; but they ought not to be made use of as a pretence to quarrel with life while it is continued, or to make us uncasy under the burdens of it. It is our wisdom and duty to make the post of that which is, be it living or dying, and so to live to the Lord, and die to the Lord, and to be his in both, Rom. xiv. 8.

Job here frets himself with thinking, that, if he had but died as soon as he was born, and been carried from the womb to the grave,

1. His condition would have been as good as that of the best. I should have been (says he, v. 14.) with kings and counsellors of the earth, whose power, policy, and arts, carry them, and keep them, out of the reach of death, nor secure them from the grave, nor distinguish their's from common dust in the grave. Even princes, who had gold in abundance, could not, with it, bribe death to overlook them when he came with commission; and though they filled their houses with silver, yet they were forced to leave it all behind them, no more to return to it. Some, by the desolate place which the kings and counsellors are here said to build for themselves, understand the sepulchres or monuments they prepared for themselves in their life-time; as Sheba (Isa. xxii. 16.) hewed him out a sepulchre; and by the gold which the princes had, and the silver with which they filled their houses, they understand the treasures which, they say, it was usual to deposit in the graves of great men. Such arts have been used to preserve their dignity, if possible, on the other side, to keep themselves from lying even with those of inferior rank; but it will not do; death is, and will be, an irresistible leveler; Mors spectra ligeons spectat—Death mingles spectres with spectres. Rich and poor meet together in the grave; and there, a hidden untimely birth, (v. 16.) a child that either never saw light, or but just opened its eyes, and peeped into the world, and, not liking it, closed them again, and hastened out of it, lies soft and easy, lies as high and safe, as kings, and counsellors, and princes that had gold; "And therefore," says Job, "would I had lain there in the dust, rather than live to lie here in the ashes!"

2. His condition would have been much better than now it was, v. 13. "Then should I have lain still and been quiet, which now I cannot do, I cannot be, but am still tossing and unquiet; then I should have slept, whereas now sleep departeth from mine eyes; whereas now, I, and in the morning, I am awake." Now these holy immortals are brought to a much clearer light by the gospel than before they were placed in, good Christians can give a better account than this of the gain of death; "Then should I have been present with the Lord, then should I have seen his glory face to face, and no longer through a glass darkly," but all that poor Job dreamt of, was rest and quietness in the grave, out of the fear of evil tidings, and out of the feeling of sore boils. Then should I have been quiet; and had he kept his temper, his even easy temper still, which he was in, in the two foregoing chapters, entirely resigned to the holy will of God, and acquiescing in it, he might have been quiet now; his soul, at least, might have dwelt at ease, even when his body lay in pain, Ps. xxv. 13. Observe how finely he describes the repose of the grave; which (provided the soul also be at rest in God) may much assist our triumph over it. (1.) Those that now are troubled, will there be out of the reach of trouble; (v. 17.) There the wicked cease from troubling: when persecutors die, they can no longer persecute, their hatred and envy are now perished. Herod had vexed the church, but when he became a prey for worms, he ceased from troubling. When the persecutors die, they are out of the anger, and doing any further trouble. Had Job been at rest in his grave, he had had no disturbance from the Sabians and Chaldeans, none of all his enemies had created him any trouble.

(2.) Those that are now toiled, will there see the period of their toils; *there the weary are at rest heaven is more than a rest to the souls of the saints, but the grave is a rest to their bodies; their pilgrimage is a weary pilgrimage; sin and the world they are weary of; their services, sufferings, and expectations, they are wearied with; but in the grave they rest from all their labours, Rev. xvi. 13. Isa. lxvii. 2. They are easy there, and make no complaints; there believers sleep in Jesus.

There are no more insulted and trampled upon, monecated and terrified, by their cruel task-masters; they hear not the voice of the oppressor. They were here forced to perpetual servitude, that could call no thing their own, no not their own bodies, are there no longer under command or control; there the servant is free from his master; which is a good reason why those that have power should use it moderately, and those that are in subjection should bear it patiently, yet a little while. (4.) Those that were at a vast distance from all others, there are upon a level, v. 19. The small and great are there, there the same, there all one, all alike free among the dead. The tedious pomp and state, which attend the great, are at an end there; all the inconveniences of a poor and low condition are likewise over; death and the grave know no difference.

Leveil'd by death, the conqueror and the slave,
The wise and foolish, cowards and the brave,
Lie mix't and undistinguished in the grave.
Sir R. Blackmore.

20. Wherefore is light given to him that is in misery, and life unto the bitter in soul; 21. Which long for death, but it cometh not; and dig for it more than for hid treasures; 22. Which rejoice exceedingly, and are glad when they can find the grave? 23. Why is light given to a man whose way is hid, and whom God hath hedged in? 24. For my sighing cometh before I eat, and my roarings are poured out like the waters. 25. For the thing which I greatly feared is come upon me, and that which I was afraid of is come unto me. 26. I was not in safety, neither had I rest, neither was I quiet; yet trouble came.

Job, finding it to no purpose to wish either that he had not been born, or had died as soon as he was born, here complains that his life was now continued, and not cut off. When men are set on quarrelling, there is no end of it; the corrupt heart will carry on the humour: having cursed the day of his birth, here he courts the day of his death. The beginning of this strife and impatience is as the letting forth of water.

1. He thinks it hard, in general, that miserable lives should be prolonged; (v. 20. 22.) *Wherefore is light given to them that are bitter in soul? Bitterness of soul, through spiritual grievances, makes life itself bitter. Why doth he give light? So it is in the original: he means God, yet does not name him, though the Devil had said, 'He will curse thee to thy face;' but he tacitly reflects on the Divine Providence as unjust and unkind, in continuing life, when the comforts of life are removed.
Life is called light, because pleasant and serviceable for walking and working; it is candle-light, the longer it burns, the shorter, and the nearer to the socket, it grows. This light is said to be given us; for if it were not daily renewed to us by a fresh gift, it would be lost. But Job reckons, that, to those who are in misery, it is graver than all gifts and no gift, a gift that they had better be without, while the light only serves them to see their own misery by. Such is the nature of life, that, in it, they may be vexed into a vexation of spirit; and so alienable is the property of death, that, though dreadful to nature, it may become even desirable to itself. He speaks of those here, (1.) Who long for death, when they have out-lived their comforts and usefulness, are burdened with age and infirmities, with pain or sickness, poverty or disgrace, and yet it comes not; while, at the same time, it comes to many who dread it, and would put it far from them. The continuance and period of life must be according to God’s will, not according to our’s. It is not fit that we should be consulted how long we would live, and when we would die: our times are in a better hand than our own. (2.) Who dig for it as for hid treasures; that is, would give any thing for a fair dismissal out of this world, which supposes that then the thought of men’s being their own executioners was not so much as entertained or suggested, else those who longed for it needed not take much pains for it, they might soon accomplish it, as Saturn tells them. If they thus thought of it, as if it was a pleasure to them, it may be a sin to long for death, but I am sure it is no sin to long for heaven.

2. He thinks of himself, in particular, hardly dealt with, that he might not be eased of his pain and misery by death, when he could not get ease any other way. To be thus impatient of life, for the sake of the troubles we meet with, is not only unnatural in itself, but ungrateful to the Giver of life, and argues a sinful indulgence of our own passion, and a sinful inconsideration of our future state. Let it be our great and constant care to get ready for another world, and then let us leave it to God to order the time and manner of our departure, to let him think fit: “Lord, when and how thou pleasest,” and this with such an indifferency, that if he should refer it to us, we would refer it to him again. Grace teaches us, in the midst of life’s greatest comforts, to be willing to die, and, in the midst of its greatest crosses, to be willing to live.

Job, to excuse himself in this earnest desire which he had to die, pleads the little comfort and satisfaction he had in life.

1. He in his new afflicted state, troubles were continually felt, and were likely to be so. He thought he had cause enough to be weary of living, for, [1.] He had no comfort of his life; My sighing comes before I eat, v. 24. The sorrows of life prevented and anticipated the supports of life; nay, they took away his appetite for his necessary food. His griefs returned as duly as his meals, and affliction was his daily bread. Nay, so great was the extremity of his pain and anguish, that he did not only sigh, but roar, and his murrings were poured out like the waters in a full and constant stream. Our Master was acquainted with grief, and we must expect to be so too. [2.] He had no prospect of bettering his condition, his way was hid, and God had hedged him in, v. 23. He saw no way open of deliverance, nor knew he what course to take; his way was hedged up with thorns, that he could not find his path. See ch. xxviii. 8. Lam. iii. 7.

2. Even in his former prosperous, state troubles were continually feared; so that then he was never easy, v. 23, 25. He knew so much of the vanity of the world, and the troubles to which, of course, he was born, that he was not in safety, neither had he rest then. That which made his grief new now the most, was, his coming to be conscious of any great degree either of new sin or security in the day of his prosperity, which might provoke God thus to chastise him. [1.] He had not been negligent and unmindful of his affairs, but kept up such a fear of trouble as was necessary to the maintaining of his guard: he was afraid for his children, when they were feasting, lest they should offend God; (ch. i. 5.) afraid for his servants, lest they should offend his neighbours; he took all the care and pains he could, to hide himself and his affairs with all possible precaution; yet all would not do. [2.] He had not been secure, nor indulged himself in ease and softness, had not trusted in his wealth, nor flattered himself with the hopes of the perpetuity of his mirth; yet trouble came, to convince and remind him of the vanity of the world, which yet he had not forgotten when he lived at ease. Thus his way was laid, for he knew not wherefore God contended with him. He knew this to be the order of Providence, yet to be safe he would not, might rather serve to alleviate it: nothing will make trouble easy so much as the testimony of our consciences for us, that, in some measure, we did our duty in a day of prosperity: and an expectation of trouble will make it sit the lighter when it comes. The less it is a surprise, the less it is a terror.

CHAP. IV.

Job having warmly given vent to his passion, and so broken the ice, his friends here come gravely to give vent to their judgment upon his case; which perhaps they had communicated to one another apart, compared notes upon it, and talked it over among themselves; and found they were all agreed in their verdict, that Job’s afflictions certainly proved him to have been a hypocrite; but they did not attack Job with this high charge, till by the expressions of his discontent and impatience, in which they thought he reflected on God himself, he had compromized himself in the opinion in the contrary conceived of him and his character. Now they set upon him with great fear. The dispute begins, and it soon becomes fierce. The opponents are Job’s three friends, Job himself is respondent, Eliphaz appears, first, as Senator, and, at length, God himself gives judgment upon the controversy, and the management of it. The question in dispute is, whether Job was an honest man or not? The same question that was in dispute between God and Satan in the two first chapters. Satan had yielded it, and durst not pretend that his cursing of his day was a constructive cursing of his God; no, he cannot deny but that Job still holds fast his integrity; but Job’s friends will needs have it, that, if he were an honest man, he would not have been thus sorely and thus tediously afflicted, and therefore urge him to confess himself a hypocrite in the profession he had made of religion, v. 4. Job says that I will not do; I have offended God, but no by his law, but by his authority, which God has been upbraid with him;

After this discourse, Eliphaz begins his answer, v. 2. He compliments Job with an acknowledgment of the eminency and usefulness of the profession he had made of religion, v. 5. The charge he had against him was for his present troubles, and his conduct under them, v. 5. To make good the inference, he maintains, that man’s wickedness is that which always brings God’s judgments, v. 7-11. V. He corroborates his assertion by a vision which he had, in which he was reminded of the incontestable purity and justice of God, and the meanness, weakness, and sinfulness, of man, v. 12-21.
By all this he brings down Job's spirit, and to make him both patient and patient under his afflictions.

1. THEN Eliphaz the Temanite answered and said, 2. If we assay to commune with thee, wilt thou be grieved? But who can withhold himself from speaking? 3. Behold, thou hast instructed many, and thou hast strengthened the weak hands. 4. Thy words have upheld him that was falling, and thou hast strengthened the feeble knees. 5. But now it is come upon thee, and thou faintest; it toucheth thee, and thou art troubled. 6. Is not this thy fear, thy confidence, the uprightness of thy ways, and thy hope?

In these verses,

1. Eliphaz excuses the trouble he is now about to give to Job by his discourse; (v. 2.) "If we assay a word with thee, offer a word of reproof and counsel, wilt thou be grieved, and take it ill? We have reason to fear thou wilt: but there is no remedy; Who can refrain from words?" Observe, 1. With what modesty he speaks of himself and his own attempt. He will not undertake the management of the cause alone, but very humbly joins his friends with him; "We will commune with thee;" they that plead God's cause, must be glad of help, lest it suffer through their weakness. He will not promise much, but begs leave to assay or attempt, and try if he could propose any thing that might be pertinent, and suit Job's case. In difficult matters, it becomes us to pretend no further, but only to try what we can, and do the best we can. Many excellent discourses have gone under the modest title of "Essays."

2. With what tenderness he speaks of Job, and his present afflicted condition; "If we tell thee our mind, wilt thou be grieved? wilt thou take it ill? Wilt thou lay it to thine own heart as thine affliction, or to our charge as our fault? Shall we be reckoned unkind and cruel, if we deal plainly and faithfully with thee? We desire we may not, and should be sorry if that should be ill resented which is well intended." Note, We ought to be afraid of grieving any, especially those that are already in grief, lest we add affliction to the afflicted, as David's enemies, Ps. lxi. 26. We should show ourselves backward to say that which we foresee will be grievous, though ever so necessary. God himself, though he afflicts justly, yet he does not afflict willingly, Lam. iii. 33. 3. With what assurance he speaks of the truth and pertinency of what he was about to say; Who can withhold himself from speaking? Surely it was a pious zeal for God's honour, and the spiritual welfare of Job, that laid him under this necessity of speaking; Who can forbear speaking in vindication of God's honour, which we have reproved, in love to thy soul, which we see endangered? Note, It is foolishity to prove our friends, even our friends in affliction, for what they say or do amiss, only for fear of offending them. Whether men take it well or ill, we must with wisdom and meekness do our duty, and discharge a good conscience.

II. He exhibits a twofold charge against Job.

1. As to his particular conduct under this affliction; he charges him with weakness and faint-heartedness; this was of the worst sort. There was too much ground for, v. 3. 4. And here, (1.) He takes notice of Job's former serviceableness to the comfort of others. He owns that Job had instructed many, not only his own children and servants, but many others, his neighbours and friends, as many as fell within the sphere of his activity. He did not only encourage these who were teachers by office and call, and ministered them, and pay for the teaching of those who were poor, but he did himself instruct many: though a great man, he did not think it below him. King Solomon was a preacher: though a man of business, he found time to do it, went among his neighbours, talked to them above and below, and gave them reasons for their faith. O that this example of Job were imitated by our great men! If he met with those who were ready to fall into sin, or sink under their troubles, his words upheld them: a wonderful dexterity he had in offering that which was proper to fortify persons against temptations, to support them under their burdens, and to comfort afflicted consciences. He had, and used, the tongue of the learned, knew how to speak a word in season to them that were weary, and employed himself much in that good work. With suitable counsels and comforts he strengthened the weak hands for work and service and the spiritual warfare, and the feeble knees for bearing up the man in his journey and under his load. It is not our duty only to lift up our own hands, that hang down, by quickening and encouraging ourselves in the way of duty, (Heb. xii. 12.) but we are bound to set ourselves to minister to others, as there is occasion, and do what we can to confirm their feeble knees, by saying to them that are of a fearful heart, Be strong, Is. xxxv. 3, 4. The expressions seem to be borrowed thence. Note, They who have abundance of spiritual riches, should abound in spiritual charity. A good word, well and wisely spoken, may do more good than perhaps we think of.

But why does he add mention this here? (1.) Perhaps he praises him thus for the good he had done, that he might make the intended reproof the more passable with him. Just commendation is a good preface to a just reprehension, will help to remove prejudices, and will show that the reproof comes not from ill-will. Paul praised the Corinthians before he chid them, 1 Cor. xi. 2. [2.] He remembers how Job had comforted others as a token that he might justly expect to be himself comforted; But when thou hast comforted others, was not this as a reward, in order to comfort, they must be excused if they applied themselves to that first: the Comforter shall reprove, John xvi. 8. [3.] He speaks this, perhaps, in a way of pity, lamenting, that, through the extremity of his affliction, he could not apply those comforts to himself which he had formerly administered to others. It is easier to give good counsel than to take it; to preach meekness and patience than to have it. Facile omnes, cum valentus, rectum concilium negotios damus— We all find it easy, when in health, to give good advice to the sick. Terent. [4.] Most think that he mentions it as an aggravation of his present discontent, upbraiding him with his knowledge, and the good offices he had done for others, as if he had said, Thou hast comforted others; dost thee now thus deplore thyself? Is not this an evidence of thine hypocrisy, that thou hast prescribed that medicine to others which thou wilt not now take thyself, and so contradictest thyself, and actest against thine own known principles? Thou that teachest another not to faint, dost thou faint? Rom. ii. 21. Physician, heal thyself. They who have rebuked others, must expect to hear of it, if they themselves become obnoxious to rebuke. [5.] He upbraids him with the manner of his low-spiritedness, v. 5. Now that it is come upon thee, now that it is thy turn to be afflicted, and the bitter cup, that goes round, is put into thy hand, now that it touches thee, thou faintest, thou art troubled.
Here, [1.] He makes too light of Job's afflictions; "It touches thee." The very word that Satan himself used, ch. i. 11.—[ii. 5. Had Eliphaz felt but the one half of Job's afflictions, he would not speak as he did; it is only a piece of what Job's afflictions, he makes a mere trifle of it; "It touches thee, and thou canst not bear to be touched;" Vidi me tangere—Touch me not. [2.] He makes too much of Job's resentments, and aggravates them; "Thou failest, or thou art beside thyself; thou raves, and knownst not what thou sayst." Men in deep distress must have grains of allowance, and a favourable construction put upon what they say, or they are likely to be every word they do not as we would be done by.

2. As to his general character before this affliction, he charges him with wickedness and false-heartedness; that article of his charge was utterly groundless and unjust. How unkindly does he banter him, and upbraid him with the great profession of religion he had made, as if it were all now come to nothing, and proved a sham; (v. 6.) "Is not thy fear, thy confidence, thy hope, and the uprightness of thy ways? Does it not all appear now to be a mere pretence? For, hadst thou been sincere in it, God would not thus have afflicted thee, nor wouldst thou have behaved thus under the affliction." This was the very thing Satan aimed at, to prove Job a hypocrite, and disprove the character God had given of him: when he could not: himself do this to God, but He still saw and said, Job is perfect and upright, then he endeavoured, by his friends, to do it to Job himself, and to persuade him to confess himself a hypocrite: could he have gained that point, he would have triumphed, Habes confidentem reum—Out of thine own mouth will I condemn thee. But, by the grace of God, Job was enabled to hold fast his integrity, and would not bear false witness against himself. Note, Those that pass rashi and uncharitable censures upon their brethren, and condemn them for hypocrises, do Satan's work, and serve his interest, more than they are aware of. I know not how it comes to pass that this verse is differently read in several editions of our common English Bibles; the original, and all the ancient versions, put thy hope before the uprightness of thy ways. So does the Geneva and most of the editions of the last translation; but I find one of the first, in 1612, has it, Is not this thy fear, thy confidence, the uprightness of thy ways, and thy hope? Both the Arber translations, and Mr. Poole, have that reading; and an edition in 1660 reads it, "Is not thy fear thy confidence, and the uprightness of thy ways thy hope? Does it not appear now, that all the religion, both of thy devotion, and of thy conversation, was only in hope and confidence that thou shouldst grow rich by it? Was it not all mercenary?" The very thing that Satan suggested. Is not thy religion thy hope, and thy righteousness thy confidence? Or, Was it not? Didst thou not think that what would have been thy protection? But thou art deceived." Or, "Would it not have been so? If it had been sincere, would it not have kept thee from this despair?" It is true, if thou faint in the day of adversity, thy strength, thy grace, is small; (Prov. xxiv. 10.) but it does not therefore follow that thou hast no grace, no strength at all. A man's character is not to be taken from a single act.

7. Remember, I pray thee, who ever perished, being innocent? or where were the righteous cut off? 8. Even as I have seen, they that plow iniquity, and sow wickedness, reap the same. 9. By the blast of God they perish, and by the breath of his nostrils are they consumed. 10. The roaring of the lion, and the voice of the fierce lion, and the teeth of the young lions, are broken. 11. The old lion perisheth for lack of prey, and the stout lion's whelps are scattered abroad.

Eliphaz here advances another argument to prove Job a hypocrite, and will have not only his impatience under his afflictions to be evidence against him, but even his afflictions themselves, being so very great and extraordinary, and there being no prospect at all of his deliverance out of them. To strengthen this argument, he here lays down these two principles, which seem plausible enough.

I. That good men were never thus ruined: for the proof of this, he appeals to Job's own observation; (v. 7.) "Remember, I pray thee; recollect all that thou hast seen, heard, or read, and give me an instance of any one that was innocent and righteous, and yet perished as thou dost, and was cut off as thou art." If we understand it of a final and eternal destruction, his principle is true. None that are innocent and righteous, perish for ever: it is only a man of sin that is a son of perdition, 2 Thess. ii. 3. But then it is ill applied to Job; he did not thus perish, nor was he cut off: a man is never under the same trial in hell. But, if we understand it of any temporal calamity, his principle is not true. The righteous perish; (Isa. lvii. 1.) There is one event both to the righteous and to the wicked, (Eccl. ix. 2.) both in life and death; the great and certain difference is after death. Even before Job's time, (as early as it was,) there were instances sufficient to contradict this principle, Did not righteous Abel perish being innocent; and was he not cut off in the beginning of his days? Was not righteous Lot burnt out of house and city? Was he not forced to retire to a melancholy cave? Was not righteous Jacob, a Syrian, ready to perish? Deut. xxvi. 5. Similar instances, no doubt, there were, which are not on record.

II. That wicked men were often thus ruined; for the proof of this, he vouches his own observation; (v. 8.) "Even as I have seen, many a time, They that plough iniquity, and sow wickedness, by the threefold fruit of the earth, and for the same: So sows men, so shall they reap. Or, What is that? Didst thou not think that what would have been thy protection? But thou art deceived." Or, "Would it not have been so? If it had been sincere, would it not have kept thee from this despair?" It is true, if thou faint in the day of adversity, thy strength, thy grace, is small; (Prov. xxiv. 10.) but it does not therefore follow that thou hast no grace, no strength at all. A man's character is not to be taken from a single act. The prayer is, that God would give him to bear his sufferings, as long as he can; and, when he cannot bear them, to give him a speedy deliverance. But, if it be not his lot to escape, to give him a peaceful death. So that, if it be his lot to suffer, to give him a prospect of an eternal happiness; and, if he must be cut off this way, to give him a suitable end.
in the cords of those ploughers, Ps. xxxix. 3, 4. They themselves are destroyed, which is the just punishment of their iniquity. They perish, that is, they are destroyed utterly; they are consumed, that is, they are destroyed gradually; and this, by the blast and breath of God, that is, (1.) By his wrath: his anger is the ruin of sinners, who are therefore called vessels of wrath, and his breath is said to kindle the fire, Isa. xxx. 33. Who knows the power of his anger? Ps. xc. 11. (2.) By his word: it is done, easily and of itself, for the destruction of God, in the word, consumes sinners; with that he slays them, Hos. vi. 5. Saying and doing are not two things with God. The man of sin is said to be consumed with the breath of Christ's mouth, 2 Thess. ii. 8. Compare Isa. xi. 4. Rev. xix. 21. Some think that in attributing the destruction of sinners to the blast of God, and the breath of his nostrils, he refers to the wind which blew the house down upon Job's children, as if they were therefore sinners above all men, because they suffered such things, Luke xii. 2.

2. He speaks particularly of tyrants and cruel oppressors, under the similitude of lions, v. 10, 11. Observe, (1.) How he describes their cruelty and oppression. The Hebrew tongue has several names for lions, and they are all here used to set forth the terrible terrors power, fierceness, and cruelty, of proud oppressors; they roar, and rend, and prey, upon all about them, and tear up their young ones to devour them. Ezek. xix. 3. The Devil is a roaring lion; and they partake of his nature, and do his lusts. They are strong as lions, and subtle; (Ps. x. 9.—xvii. 12.) and, as far as they prevail, lay all desolate about them. (2.) How he describes their destruction; the destruction both of their power and of their persons; they shall be restrained from doing further hurt, and reckoned with for the hurt they have done. An effectual course shall be taken, [1.] That they shall not terrify; the voice of their roaring shall be stopped. [2.] That they shall not tear; God will disarm them, will take away their power to do hurt, the teeth of the young lions are broken, Ps. iii. 7. Thus shall the remainder of wrath be restrained. [3.] That they shall not enrich themselves with the spoil of their neighbours. Even the old lion is ashamed, and perishes for lack of prey; they have surfeited on spoil and rapine, are perhaps reduced to such straits as to do worse than they; (4.) That they shall not pretend, as they promise themselves, leave a succession; the stout lion's whelps are scattered abroad, to seek for food themselves, which the old ones used to bring in for them, Nah. ii. 12. The lion did eat in pieces for his whelps, but now they must shift for themselves. Perhaps Eliphaz intended, in this, to reflect upon Job, as if he, being the greatest of all the men of the east, had got his estate by spoil, and used injustice, in oppressing his neighbours: but now, his power and estate were gone, and his family scattered: if so, it was pity that a man whom God praised, should be thus abused.

2. Now a thing was secretly brought to me, and mine ear received a little thereof. 13. In thoughts from the visions of the night, when deep sleep falleth on men, 14. Fear came upon me, and trembling, which made all my bones to shake. 15. Then a spirit passed before my face; the hair of my flesh stood up: 16. It stood still, but I could not discern the form thereof: an image was before mine eyes; there was silence, and I heard a voice, saying, 7. Shall mortal man be more just than God? shall a man be more pure than his Maker? 13. Behold, he put no trust in his servants; and his angels he charged with folly: 19. How much less on them that dwell in houses of clay, whose foundation is in the dust, which are crushed before the moth? 20. They are destroyed from morning to evening: they perish for ever, without any regarding it. 21. Doth not their excellency which is in them go away? they die, even without wisdom.

Eliphaz, having undertaken to convince Job of the sin and folly of his discontent and impatience, here vouches a vision he had been favoured with, which he relates to Job for his conviction. What comes immediately from God, all men will pay a particular deference to, and Job, no doubt, as much as any. Some think Eliphaz had this vision now lately, since he came to Job, putting words into his mouth wherewith to reason with him; and it had been well if he had kept to the purport of this vision, which would serve for a ground on which to reprove Job for his murmuring, but not to condemn him for a hypocrite. Others think he had it formerly; for God did in this way often communicate himself to the children of men in those first ages of the world, ch. xxxiii. 15. Probably, God had sent Eliphaz this messenger and message some time or other, when he was himself in an unexpected and new frame, to calm and pacify him. Note, As we should comfort others with that wherewith we have been comforted, (2 Cor. i. 4.) so we should endeavour to convince others with that which has been powerful to convince us.

The people of God had not then any written word to quote, and therefore God sometimes notified to them even common truths, by the extraordinary ways of his revelation. We that have Bibles, have there (thanks be to God) a more sure word to depend upon than even visions and voices, 2 Pet. i. 19. Observe, 1. The manner in which this message was sent to Eliphaz, and the circumstances of the conveyance of it to him. 1. It was brought him secretly, or by stealth; some of the sweetest communion gracious souls have with God, is in secret, where he only, who is all eye, can perceive. God has ways of bringing conviction, counsel, and comfort, to his people, unknown by the counsel or order of men, by secret messages, secret whispers, secret papers, as powerfully and effectually as by the public ministry. His secret is with them, Ps. xxv. 14. As the evil spirit often steals good words out of the heart, (Matth. xiii. 19.) so the good Spirit sometimes steals good words into the heart, or ever we are aware. 2. He received a little thereof, v. 12. And it is but little of divine knowledge that the best receive in this world; we know little, in comparison with what they that are partakers of the spiritual knowledge know when we come to heaven. How little a portion is heard of God! ch. xxvi. 14. We know but in part, 1 Cor. xiii. 12. See his humility and modesty. He pretends not to have understood it fully, but something of it he perceived. 3. It was brought him in the visions of the night; (v. 13.) when he was retired from the world and the hurry of it, and all about him was composed and quiet. Note, The way we have for entering into the things of it, the fitter we are for communion with God. When we are communing with our own hearts, and are still, (Ps. iv. 4.) then is a proper time for the Holy Spirit to commune with us.

When others were asleep, Eliphaz was ready to receive this vision from Heaven, and probably, like David, was meditating upon God in the night.
watched: in the midst of those good thoughts, this thing was brought to him. We should hear more from God, if we thought more of him; yet some are surprised with convictions in the night, ch. xxxiii. 14, 15. 4. It was prefaced with terrors; *Fear came upon him, and trembling, v. 14. It should seem, in some manner or other, God had put a terror into this man, he was seized with this trembling, which should have his bones, and perhaps the bed under him. A holy awe and reverence of God and his majesty being struck upon his spirit, he was thereby prepared for a divine visit. Whom God intends to honour, he first humbles and lays low, and will have us all to serve him with holy fear, and to rejoice with trembling.

42. The messenger by whom it was sent; a spirit, one of the good angels, who are employed not only as the ministers of God's providence, but sometimes as the ministers of his word. Concerning this apparition which Eliphaz saw, we are here told, (v. 15, 16.) 1. That it was real, and not a dream, not a fancy; an image was before his eyes, he plainly saw it; at first, it passed and repassed before his face, moved up and down, but, at length, it stood still to speak to him. If some have been so knavish as to impose false visions on others, and some so foolish as to dream visions of their own, shall not, therefore, follow that there have been no apparitions of spirits, both good and bad. 2. That it was indistinct, and somewhat confused. He could not discern the form thereof, so as to frame any exact idea of it in his own mind, much less to give a description of it. His conscience was to be awakened and informed, not his curiosity gratified. We know little of spirits, we are not capable of knowing much of them, nor is it fit we should; all in good time: wisdom for the understanding of spirits, and shall then be better acquainted with them. 3. That it put him into a great consternation, so that his hair stood on end. Ever since man sinned, it has been terrible to him to receive an express from Heaven, as conscious to himself that he can expect no good tidings thence; apparitions, therefore, even of good spirits, have always made deep impressions of fear, even upon good men. How well it is for us, that God sends us his messages, not by spirits, but by nature. If we expect the message of the so-called spirits, and shall not make us afraid! See Dan. vii. 28.—x. 8, 9.

III. The message itself; before it was delivered, there was silence, profound silence, v. 16. When we are to speak either *from God, or to him, it becomes us to address ourselves to it with a solemn pause, and so to set bounds about the mount on which God is to come down, and not be hasty to utter any thing. It was in a still small voice that the message was delivered, and this was it, (v. 17.) Shall mortal man be more just than God? the immortal man? Shall a man be thought to be, or pretend to be, more pure than his Maker? Away with such a thought! 1. Some think that Eliphaz aims hereby to prove that Job's great afflictions were a certain evidence of his being a wicked man; a mortal man would be thought unjust and very impure, if he should thus correct and punish a servant or subject, unless he had been guilty of some very great crimes. If, therefore, these were not some great crimes for which God thus punishes thee, man would be more just than God, which is not to be imagined." 2. I rather think it is only a reprofe of Job's murmuring and discontent; *Shall a man pretend to be more just and pure than God? More truly to understand, and more strictly to observe, the rules and laws of equity, than God? Shall Enosh, mortal, miserable, man, be so insane; nay, shall Geber, the strongest and most eminent man—man at his best estate, pretend to compare with God, or stand in competition with him?" Note, It is most impious and absurd to think either others or ourselves more just and pure than God. Those that quarrel and find fault with the directions of the divine law, the dispensations of the divine grace, or the disposals of the divine providence, make themselves more just and pure than God; and they who thus reprofe God, let them answer it. What! would mankind be more just than God, and as it were men, not beings! short-sighted man! Shall he pretend to be more just, more pure, than God, who, being his Maker, is his Lord and Owner? Shall the clay contend with the potter? What justice and purity is there in man, God is the Author of it, and therefore is himself more just and pure. See Ps. xxiv. 9, 10.

IV. The comment which Eliphaz makes upon this; so it seems to be; yet some take all the following verses to be spoken in vision. It comes all to one. 1. He shows how little the angels themselves are in comparison with God, v. 18. Angels are God's servants, waiting servants, working servants, they are his ministers; (Ps. civ.) bright and blessed things they are; but God neither needs them, nor is benefitted by them, and is himself infinitely above them; and therefore, (1.) He put no trust in them, did not rest upon them for their assistance; (2.) We may do in those we cannot live without; there is no sense in which he employs them, but, if he pleased, he could have it done as well without them. He never made them his confidants, or of his cabinet-council, Matth. xxiv. 36. He does not leave his business wholly to them, but his own eyes run to and fro through the earth, 2 Chron. xvi. 9. See this phrase, ch. xxxix. 11. Some give this sense of it, "So mutable is even the angelical nature, that God would not employ them, that less integrity; if he had, they would all have done, as some suppose, as their first estate; but he saw it necessary to give them supernatural grace to confirm them. (2.) He charges them with folly, vanity, weakness, infirmity, and imperfection, in comparison with God. If the world were left to the government of the angels, and they were trusted with the sole management of affairs, they would take false steps, and every thing would not be done for the best, as now it is. Angels, not infinite ones. Though not chargeable with injustice, yet with prudence. This last clause is variously rendered by the critics. I think it would bear this reading, repeating the negation, which is very common. He will put no trust in his saints. In angels suis non ponet gloriationem—Nor will he glory in his angels, or make his boast of them, as if their praises or services added any thing to him: it is his glory, that he is infinitely happy without them.

2. Thence he infers how much less man is, how much less to be trusted in, or grieved in: if there is such distance between God and angels, what is there between God and man! See how man is represented here in his meanness. (1.) Look upon man in his life, and he is very mean, v. 19. Take man in his best estate, and he is a very despicable creature in comparison with the holy angels; though honourable, if compared with the brute; it is true, angels are spirits, and the souls of men are spirits; but, 11. Angels are angels, and the spirits, the souls of men dwell in houses of clay, such the bodies of men are. Angels are free, human souls are housed, and the body is a cloud, a dlog, to it, it is its cage, it is its prison. It is a house of clay, mean and mouldering; an earthen vessel, soon broken, as it was first formed, according to the good pleasure of the potter. It is a cottage, not a house of cedar, or a house of ivory, but of clay, which would soon be in ruins, if not kept in constant repair. [2.] Angels are fixed; but the very four dation of that house of clay in which man dwells, is in the dust. A house of clay, if built upon a rock, might stand long; but, if founded in the dust, the destruction of that rock, or the addition of the dust, will hasten its fall, and it will sink with its own weight. As man was made out of the earth, so he is maintained and supported by that which comes out of the earth. Take away that, and his body returns to its earth. We stand but upon the dust; some have a higher heap of dust to stand upon than others, but still it is the earth that stays us up, and will shortly swallow us up. [3.] Angels are immortal, but man is soon crushed, the earthly house of his tabernacle is solved, he dies and passes away, is crushed like a moth between one’s fingers, as easily, as quickly; one may almost as soon kill a man as kill a moth. A little thing will do it; he is crushed before the face of the moth, so the word is. If any lingering distemper, which consumes like a moth, be commissioned to destroy him, he can no more resist it than he can resist an acute distemper, which comes roaring upon him like a lion. See Hos. v. 12, 14. Is such a creature as this to be trusted in, or can any security be expected from him, by that God who puts no trust in angels themselves? [2.] Look upon him in his death, and he appears yet more despicable, and unfit to be trusted. Men are mortal, and dying, v. 20, 21. [1.] In death, they are destroyed, and perish for ever, as to this world; it is the final period of their lives, and all their employments and enjoyments here; their place will know them no more. [2.] They are dying daily, and continually wasting; destroyed from head to foot, and therefore, if any one amongst us, like a mole digging our grave at each remove, and we so continually lie exposed, that we are killed all the day long. [3.] Their life is short, and in a little time they are cut off; it lasts perhaps but from morning to evening. It is but a day; (so some understand it) their birth and death are but the sun-rise and sun-set of the same day. [4.] In death, all their excellency passes away; beauty, strength, learning, not only cannot secure them from death, but die with them; nor shall their pride in their wealth, or power, descend after them. [5.] Their wisdom cannot save them from death; they die without wisdom, die for want of wisdom, by their own foolish management of themselves, digging their graves with their own teeth. [6.] It is so common a thing that no body heeds it, or takes any notice of it; they perish without any regarding it, or laying it to heart. The deaths of others are much the subject of common talk, but little the subject of serious thought.

Some think the eternal damnation of sinners is here spoken of, as well as their temporal death. They are destroyed, or broken to pieces, by death, from morning to evening; and if they repent not, they perish for ever, so some read it, v. 20. They perish for ever, because they regard not God and their duty, they consider not their latter end, Lam. i. 9. They have no excellency but that which death takes away, and they die, they die the second death, for want of wisdom to lay hold on eternal life. Shall such a mean, weak, foolish, sinful, dying, creature as this, pretend to be more just than God, and more pure than his Maker? No, instead of quarrelling with his afflictions, let him wonder than he is out of hell.

CHAP. V.
Eliphaz, in the foregoing chapter, for the making good of his charge against Job, had use of a word from Heaven, sent him in a vision. In this chapter, he appeals to those that bear record on earth, to the saints, the faithful witnesses of God’s truths, in all ages, v. 1. They will testify, v. 2. That the sin of sinners is their ruin, v. 2-4.

II. That yet affliction is the common lot of mankind, v. 6.

III. That when we are in affliction, it is our wisdom and duty to apply to God, for he is able and ready to help us, v. 8-16. IV. That the afflictions which are borne well will end well; and Job particularly if he would come to a better temper, might assure himself that God had great mercy in store for him, v. 13-27. V. That he could not discourse in some what a better humour than he began it.

1. CALL now, if there be any that will answer thee; and to which of the saints wilt thou turn? 2. For wrath killeth the foolish man, and envy slayeth the silly one. 3. I have seen the foolish taking root; but suddenly I cursed his habitation. 4. His children are far from safety, and they are crushed in the gate, neither is there any to deliver them. 5. Whose harvest, the hungry eateth up, and taketh it even out of the thorns, and the robber swalloweth up their substance.

A very warm dispute being begun between Job and his friends, Eliphaz here makes a fair motion to put the matter to a reference; in all debates, perhaps, the sooner that is done the better, if the cont ending does not end it between themselves. So well assured is Eliphaz of the goodness of his own cause, that he moves Job himself to choose the arbitrators; (v. 1.) Plain and simple, sure and true answer over thee; that is, 1. "If there be any that sufferest as thou sufferest: canst thou produce an instance of any one, that was really a saint, that was reduced to such extremity as thou art now reduced to? God never dealt with any that love his name so as he deals with thee, and therefore surely thou art none of them," 2. "If there be any that say as thou sayest: did ever any good man curse his day as thou dost? Or, will any of the saints justify thee in these heats or passions, or say that these are the spots of God’s children? Thou wilt find none of the saints that will be either thine advocates, or mine antagonists. To which of the saints wilt thou turn? Turn to whom thou wilt, and thou wilt find they are all of my mind; I have the communis sensis fideland— the unanimous vote of all the saints on my side; they will all subscribe to what I am going to say." Observe, (1.) Good people are called saints, even in the Old Testament; and therefore I know not why we should, in common speaking, (unless because we must loqui cum vulgo—speak as our neighbours, ) appropriate the title to those of the New Testament, and not say St. Abraham, St. Moses, and St. Isaiah, as well as St. Matthew, and St. Mark; and St. David the psalmist, as well as St. David the British Bishop. Aaron is expressly called the saint of the Lord. (2.) All that are themselves saints, will turn to those that are so; will choose them for their friends, and converse with them; will choose them for their judges, and consult with them. See Ps. cxix. 79. Those saints shall judge the world, 1 Cor. vi. 1, 2. Walk in the way of good men, (Prov. ii. 20.) the old way, the footsteps of the flock. Every one chooses some sort of people or other to whom he studies to recommend himself, and whose sentiments are to him the test of honour and dishonour: now all true saints endeavour to recommend themselves to those that are such, and to stand right in their opinion. (3.) There are some truths so plain, and so universally known and believed, that one may venture to appeal to any of the saints concerning them. However there are some things, about which they unhappily differ, there are many more, and more considerable, in which they are agreed; as the evil of sin, the vanity of the world, the worth of the soul, the necessity of a holy life, and the like. Though they do not all live up, as they should, to their belief of these truths, yet 'tis all ready to bear their testimony to them.

Now there are two things which Eliphaz here maintains, and in which he doubts not at all the saints concur with him.

I. That the sin of sinners directly tends to their own ruin; (v. 2.) Wrath kills the foolish man, his own wrath, and therefore he is foolish for indulging it; it is a fire in his bones, in his blood, enough to put him into a fever; envy is the rottenness of the bones, and so slays the silly one that frets himself with it. So it is with thee; says Eliphaz; while thou quarrellest with the estate thou dost thyself, v. 3. the greatest mischief, thine anger at thine own troubles, and thine envy at your prosperity, do but add to thy pain and misery: turn to the saints, and thou wilt find they understand themselves better.”

Job had told his wife she spake as the foolish women, now Eliphaz tells him he acted as the foolish men, the silly ones. Or, it may be meant thus: “If men are ruined and undone, it is always their own folly that ruins and doth them. They kill themselves by some lust or other; therefore, no doubt, Job, thou hast done some foolish thing, by which thou hast brought thyself into this calamitous condition.”

Many understand it of God’s wrath and jealousy. Job needed not be uneasy at the prosperity of the wicked, for the world’s smiles can never shelter them from God’s frowns; they are foolish and silly, if they think they will. God’s anger will be the death, the eternal death, of those on whom it fastens. What is hell, but God’s anger without mixture or period or time.

II. That their prosperity is short, and their destruction certain, v. 3-5. He seems here to parallel Job’s case with that which is commonly the case of wicked people.

1. Job had prospered for a time, seemed confirmed, and was secure in his prosperity; and it is common for foolish wicked men to do so. I have seen them taking root, planted, and, in their own and another’s apprehension, fixed, and likely to continue. See Jer. xii. 2. Ps. xxxvii. 35, 36. We see worldly men taking root in the earth; on earthly things they fix the standing of their hopes, and from them they draw the sap of their comforts. The outward estate may be flourishing, but the soul cannot prosper that takes root in the earth.

2. Job’s prosperity was now at an end, and so has the prosperity of other wicked people quickly been.

(1.) Eliphaz foresaw their ruin with an eye of faith. They who looked only at present things, blessed their habitation, and thought them happy, blessed it long, and wished themselves in their condition. But Eliphaz cursed it, suddenly cursed it, as soon as he saw them begin to take root, that is, he plainly foresaw and foretold their ruin; not that he prayed for it, (I have not desired the woeeful day,) but he prognosticated it. He went into the sanctuary, and there understood their end, and heard their doom read, (Ps. lxxxiii. 17, 18.) That the prosperity of fools will destroy them, Prov. i. 32. They who believe the word of God, can see a curse in the house of the wicked, (Prov. iii. 33.) though it be ever so finely and firmly built, and ever so full of all good things; and can foresee that it will, in time, infallibly consume it, with the terrors of the Lord, (Prov. vii. 24.)

(2.) He saw, at length, what he had foreseen: he was not disappointed in his expectation concerning him, the event answered it; his family was undone, and his estate ruined. In these particulars, he plainly and very injudiciously reflects on Job’s calamities. [1.] His children were crushed, v. 4. They thought themselves safe in their eldest brother’s house, but were far from safety, for they were crushed in the gate; perhaps the door or gate of the house was highest built, and fell head foremost upon them, and there was none to deliver them from perishing in the ruins. This is commonly understood of the destruction of the families of wicked men, by the execution of justice upon them to oblige them to restore what they have ill-gotten. They leave it to their children; but the descent shall not bar the entry of the rightful owners, who will crush their children, and cast them by due course of law, (and there shall be none to help them,) or perhaps by oppression, Ps. cix. 9, 10. [2.] His estate was plundered, v. 5. Job’s was so; the hungry robbers, the Sabeans and Chaldeans, ran away with it, and swallowed it; and this, says he, I have often observed in others. What has been got by spoil and rapine, has been lost the same way. The careful owner hedged it about with thorns, and then thought it safe; but the fence proved insignificant against the greediness of the spoilers, (if hunger will break through stone-walls, much more through thorn-hedges,) and against the divine curse, which will go through the thorns and briars, and burn them together, Isa. xxvii. 4.

6. Although affliction cometh not forth of the dust, neither doth trouble spring out of the ground, 7. Yet man is born unto trouble, as the sparks fly upward. 3. I would seek unto God, and unto God would I commit my cause; 9. Which doeth great things and unsearchable; marvelous things without number: 10. Who giveth rain upon the earth, and sendeth waters upon the fields: 11. To set upon high those that be low; that those which mourn may be exalted to safety. 12. He disappointeth the devices of the crafty, so that their hands cannot perform their enterprise. 13. He taketh the wise in their own craftiness; and the counsel of the froward is carried headlong. 14. They meet with darkness in the day-time, and grope in the noon-day, as in the night. 15. But he saveth the poor from the sword, from their mouth, and from the hand of the mighty. 16. So the poor hath hope, and iniquity stoppeth her mouth.

Eliphaz, having touched Job in a very tender part, in mentioning both the loss of his estate and the death of his children, as the just punishment of his sin, that he might not drive him to despair, here begins to encourage him, and puts him in a way to make himself easy. Now he very much changes his voice, (Gal. iv. 20.) and accosts Job gently, as if he would alone for the hard words he had given him.

I. He reminds him, that no affliction comes by chance, nor is to be attributed to second causes. It doth not come forth of the ground, as the grass doth, v. 6. It doth not come of course, at certain seasons of the year, as natural productions do, by a chain of second causes. The proportion between prosperity and adversity is not so exactly observed by Providence, as that between day and night, summer and winter, but according to the will and counsel of God, when and as he thinks fit. Some read it, Sine comes not forth of the dust, nor iniquity out of the ground. If men be bad, they must not lay the blame upon the soil, the climate, the ground, but the thought, so thou alone shalt bear it. We must not attribute our afflictions to fortune, for they are from God, nor our sins to fate, for they are from ourselves; so that, whatever trouble we are in, we must own that God sends it upon us, and we procure it to ourselves; the former is a reason why we should be very patient, the latter why we should be very penitent, when we are afflicted.

11. He reminds them, that the human and natural afflictions are what we have grown to expect in this world. Man is born to trouble; (v. 7) not as man, (had he kept his innocency, he had been born to pleasure,) but as sinful man, as born of a woman, (ch. xiv. 1) who was in the transgression. Man is born in sin, and therefore born to trouble. Even those that are born to honour and estate, yet are born to trouble in the flesh. In our fallen state, it is become natural to us to sin, and the natural consequence of that, is trouble. This is, and remains, so in this world we are born to, and can truly call our own, but sin and trouble; both are as the sparks that fly upward. Actual transgressions are the sparks that fly out of the furnace of original corruption; and, being called transgressors from the womb, no wonder that we deal very treacherously, Is. xlvi. 8. Such too is the frailty of our bodies, and the vanity of all our enjoyments, that our troubles also thence arise as naturally as the sparks fly upward; so must we be as the thick and so fast does one follow another. Why then should we be surprised at our afflictions as strange, or quarrel with them as hard, when they are but what we are born to? Man is born to labour, so it is in the margin, is sentenced to eat his bread in the sweat of his face, which should inure him to hardness, and make him bear his afflictions the better.

12. He directs him, how to behave himself under his afflictions (v. 8). I would seek unto God; surely I excel so it is in the original. Here is, 1. A tacit reproof to Job for not seeking to God, but quarrelling with Him; "Job, if I had been in thy case, I would not have been so peevish and passionate as thou art, I would have acquiesced in the will of God." It is easy to say what we would do, if we were in such a one's case; but, when it comes to the trial, perhaps it will be found not so easy to do as we say. 2. Very good and seasonable advice to him, which Eliphaz transfers to himself in a figure; "For my part, the best way I should think I could take, if I were in thy condition, would be to apply myself to God." Note, We should give our friends no other counsel than what we would take ourselves if we were in their case, that we may be easy under our afflictions, may get good by them, and may see a good issue of them. (1.) We must by prayer fetch in mercy and grace from above. God sends him as a Father and Friend, though he could not, what scorn as one who is able to support and succour. His favour we must seek, when we have lost all we have in the world; to him we must address ourselves, as the Fountain and Father of all good, all consolation. Is any afflicted? Let him pray. It is heart's-case, a salve for every sore. (2.) We must by patience refer ourselves and our cause to him. To God would I commit my cause; having spread it before Him, I would leave it with him; having laid it at his feet, I would lodge it in his hand; Here I am, let the Lord do with me as seemeth him good. If our cause be indeed a good cause, we need not fear committing it to God, for he is both just and kind. They that would seek so as to speed, must refer themselves to God.

IV. He encourages him thus to seek to God, and commit his cause to him. It will not be in vain to do so, for he is one in whom we shall find effectual help. He recommends to his consideration God's authority power and sovereignty. And men who think:

1. In general, he doeth great things; (v. 9.) great indeed, for he can do any thing; he doth do every thing; and all according to the counsel of his own will; great indeed, for the operations of his power are, (1.) Unsearchable, and such as can never be fathomed, can never be found out from the beginning to the end, Eccl. iii. 11. The works of nature are mysteries; the most curious searches come far short of finding what secret store. And men who have owned themselves at a loss. The designs of Providence are much more deep and unaccountable, Rom. xi. 33. (2.) Numerous, and such as never can be reckoned up. He doeth great things without number; his power is never exhausted, nor will all his purposes ever be fulfilled till the end of time. (3.) They are marvellous, and such as never can be sufficiently admired; eternity itself will be short enough to be spent in the admiration of them. Now, by the consideration of this, Eliphaz intends, [1.] To convince Job of his fault and folly in quarrelling with God. We must not pretend to pass a judgment upon his works, for they are unsearchable and above our inquiries; nor must we strive with our Maker, for he will certainly be too hard for us, and is able to crush us in a moment. [2.] To encourage Job to seek unto God, and to refer himself to him. What more encouraging than to see that he is one whom he should go to? He can do great things and marvellous for our relief, when we are brought ever so low.

2. He gives some instances of God's dominion and power.

(1.) God doeth great things in the kingdom of nature: he gives rain upon the earth, (v. 10.) put here for all the gifts of common providence, all the fruitful seasons, by which he filleth our hearts with good and pleasant thoughts, Acts xiv. 16. He can observe, When he would show what great things God doeth, he speaks of his giving rain, which, because it is a common thing, we are apt to look upon as a little thing; but if we duly consider both how it is produced, and what is produced by it, we shall see it to be a great work, both of power and goodness.

(2.) He doeth great things in the affairs of the children of men: not only enriches the poor, and comforts the needy, by the rain he sends, (v. 10.) but, in order to the advancing of those that are low, he disappoints the devices of the crafty; for v. 11. is to be joined to v. 12. and compared with Luke i. 51. 55. He hath scattered the proud in the imagination of their hearts, and so hath exalted them of low degree, and filled the hungry with good things.

See, [1.] How he frustrates the counsels of the proud and politic, v. 12.-14. There is a supreme power over the affairs of men, who are themselves free and absolute, and fulfil its own purposes in despite of their projects. Observe, First, The froward, that walk contrary to God and the interest of his kingdom, are often very crafty, for they are the seed of the old serpent, that was noted for subtlety. They think themselves wise, but, at the end, will be fools. Secondly, The froward enemies of God's kingdom have their devices, their crafty operations, and their own successes, and triumphs, against the loyal faithful subjects of it. They are restless and unwearied in their designs, close in their consultations, high in their hopes, deep in their politics, and fast linked in their confederacies, Ps. ii. 1, 2. Thirdly, God easily can, and (as far as is for his glory) certainly will, blast and defeat all the designs of his and his people's enemies. How were the plots of Ahithophel, Sanballat, and Haman, baffled! The confederates of Syria and Ephraim against Judah, of Gabacl, and Ammon, and Amaleck, against God's Israel, the kings of the earth, and the princes, against the Lord and against his anointed, broken! The hands that have been stretched out against God, and his church, have not performed their enterprise, nor have the weapons formed against Zion prospered. Fourthly, That which enemies have designed for the ruin of the church, has often turned to their own ruin; (v. 13.) He takes the wine in their own craftiness, and smears them in the work of their own hands, Ps. vii. 15, 16.—ix. 13, 16. This is quoted by the apostle, (1 Cor. iii. 19.) to show how the learned men of the heathen were befouled by their own vain philosophy. Fifthly, When God infatuates men, they are perplexed, and the loss, even in those things that seem most plain and easy; (v. 14.) They meet with darkness even in the day-time; now, as it is in the margin, They run themselves into darkness by the violence and precipitation of their own counsels. See ch. xii. 20, 24, 25.

First, He exalts the humble, v. 11. Those whom proud men contrive to crush, he raises from under their feet, and sets them in safety, Ps. xii. 5. The lowly in heart, and those that mourn, he advances, comforts, and makes to dwell on high, in the mansions of rocks, Isa. xxxiii. 16. Zion's mourners are the sealed ones, marked for safety, Ezek. ix. 4.

Secondly, He delivers the oppressed, v. 15. The designs of the crafty are to ruin the poor: tongue, and hand, and sword, and all, are at work in order to this; but God takes under his special protection those who, being poor, and unable to help themselves, being his poor, and devoted to his praise, have committed to say against them to God, from the mouth that speaks hard things against them, and the hand that does hard things against them; for he can, when he pleases, tie the tongue, and wither the hand.

The effect of this is, (v. 16.) 1. That weak and timorous saints are comforted: so the poor, that began to despair, has hope. The experiences of some are encouragements to others to hope the best in the worst of times; for it is the glory of God to send help to the helpless, and hope to the hopeless. 2. That daring threatening sinners are confounded; iniquity stops her mouth, being surprised at the strange- ness of the deliverance, ashamed of its enmity against those who appear to be the favourites of Heaven, mortified at the disappointment, and compelled to acknowledge the justice of God's proceedings, having nothing to object against them. Those that domi- ned over God's poor, that frightened them, menaced them, and falsely accused them, will not have a word to say against them when God appears for them. See Ps. lxiii. 8, 9. Isa. xxxvi. 11. Mic. vii. 16.

17. Behold, happy is the man whom God correcteth; therefore despise not thou the chastening of the Almighty: 18. For he maketh sore, and bindeth up; he woundeth, and his hands make whole. 19. He shall deliver thee in six troubles; yea, in seven there shall no evil touch thee. 20. In famine he shall redeem thee from death; and in war from the power of the sword. 21. Thou shalt be hid from the scourge of the tongue; neither shalt thou be afraid of destruction when it cometh. 22. At destruction and famine thou shalt laugh: neither shalt thou be afraid of the beasts of the earth. 23. For thou shalt be in league with the stones of the field; and the beasts of the field shall be at peace with thee. 24. And thou shalt know that thy tabernacle shall be in peace, and thou shalt visit thy habitation, and shalt not sin. 25. Thou shalt know also that thy seed shall be great, and thine offspring as the grass of the earth. 26. Thou shalt come to thy grave in a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in in his season. 27. Lo this, we have searched it, so it is; hear it, and know thou it for thy good.

Eliphaz, in this concluding paragraph of his discourse, gives Job (what he himself knew not how to take) a comfortable prospect of the issue of his afflictions, if he did but recover his temper, and accommodate himself to them.}

Observe,

I. The seasonable word of caution and exhortation that he gives him; (v. 17.) "Despise not thou the chastening of the Almighty; Call it a chastening, which comes from the father's love, and is designed for the child's good. Call it the chastening of the Almighty, with whom it is madness to contend, to whom it is wisdom and duty to submit, and who will be a God all-sufficient" (for so the word signifies) "to all those that trust in him. Do not despise it;" it is a copious word in the original. 1. "Be not averse to it. Let grace conquer the antipathy which nature has to suffering, and reconcile thyself to the will of God in it." We need the rod, and we deserve it; and therefore we ought not to think it either strange or hard if we feel the smart of it. Let not the heart rise against a bitter pill or potion, when it is prescribed for us for our good. 2. "Do not think ill of it, do not put it from thee, (as that which is either hurtful, or, at least, not useful, which there is no occasion for, nor advantage by,) only because, for the present, it is not joyous, but grievous. We must never scorn to stoop to God, nor think it a thing below us to come under his discipline, but reckon, on the contrary, that God magnifies man, when he thus visits and tries him, ch. vii. 17, 18. 3. "Do not overlook and disregard it, as if it were only a chance, and the production of second causes, but take great notice of it as the voice of God, and a messenger from Heaven." More is implied than is expressed: "Reverence the chastening of the Lord; have an humble, awful, regard to his correcting hand, and tremble when the lion roars, Amos iii. 8. Submit to the chasten- ing, and only to answer the call, to answer the end of it, and then thou reverencest it." When God, by an affliction, draws upon us for some of the effects he has intrusted us with, we must honour his bill by accepting it, and subscribing it, resigning his own when he calls for it.

II. The comfortable words of encouragement which he gives him, thus to accommodate himself to his condition, and (as he himself had expressed it) to receive evil from the hand of God, and not despise it, for it is not worth the accepting. If his affliction was thus borne.

1. The nature and property of it would be altered: though it looked like a man's misery, it would really be his bliss. Happy is the man whom God correcteth, if he make but a due improvement of the correction. A good man is happy, though he be afflicted; for, whatever he has lost, he has not lost his enjoyment of God, nor his title to heaven; nay, he is happy, because he is afflicted; correction is an evidence of his sonship, and a means of his sanctification; it mortifies his corruptions, weans his heart from the world, draws him nearer to God, brings him to his Bible, brings him to his knees, works him for, and so is working for him, a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory; Happily therefore is the man whom God correcteth. 1. Sam. xxii. 19.

2. The issue and consequence of it would be very good, v. 18. (1.) Though he makes sore the body with sore boils, the mind with sad thoughts, yet he binds up at the same time; as the skilful surgeon binds up the wounds he had occasion to make with his incision-knife. When God makes sores by the rebukes of his providence, he binds up by the consolations of his Spirit, which oftentimes abound, as most afflictions do abound, and balances the effects of the patient sufferers. (2.) Though he wounds, yet his hands make whole in due time: as he supports his people, and makes them easy under their afflictions, so in due time he delivers them, and makes a way for them to escape. All is well again; and he comforts them according to the time wherein he afflicted them. God’s usual method is first to wound, and then to heal, first to convince, and then to comfort, first to humble, and then to exalt; and (as Mr. Caryl observes) he never makes a wound too great, too deep, for his own cure. Una eademque manus vulnus ofque tuli—The hand that inflicted the wound, afflicts the cure. God tears the wicked, and goes away, let them heal that will, if they can; (Hos. v. 14.) but the humble and penitent may say, He has torn, and he will heal us, Hos. vi. 1. This is general; but in the following verses he applies himself directly to Job, and gives him many precious promises of great and kind things which God would do for him, if he did but humble himself under his hand. Though then they had no Bibles that we know of, yet Eliphaz had sufficient warrant to give Job these assurances, from the general discoveries God had made of his good will to his people. And though, in every thing which Job’s friends said, they were not directed by the Spirit of God, (for they spake both of God and Job some things that were not right,) yet the general doctrine they laid down spoke the pious sense of the patriarchal age; and as St. Paul quoted, v. 13. for canonical scripture, and as the command, v. 17. is, no doubt, binding on us, so these promises here may be, and must be, received and applied as divine promises, and we may, through patience and comfort of this part of scripture, have hope.

Let us therefore give diligence to make sure our interest in these promises, and then view the particulars of them, and take the comfort we need from them. [1.] First, that as afflictions and troubles do recur, supports and deliverances shall be graciously repeated, be it never so often. In six troubles, he shall be ready to deliver thee; yea, and in seven. This intimates, that, as long as we are here in this world, we must expect a succession of troubles, that the clouds will return after the rain; after six troubles may come a seventh. After many, look for more; but out of them all will God deliver. Isa. lxxvii. 18. (2.) That, whether troubles good men may be in, there shall no evil touch them, they shall do them no real harm; the malignity of them, the sting, shall be taken out; they may hiss, they cannot hurt, Ps. xci. 10. The evil one toucheth not God’s children’s feet, 1 John v. 18. Being kept from sin, they are kept from the evil of every trouble. [3.] That, when desolating judgments are abroad, they shall be taken under special protection, v. 20. Do many perish about them, for want of the necessary supports of life? They shall be supplied. In famine he shall redeem thee from death: whatever becomes of others, thou shalt be kept alive, Ps. xxxiii. 19. Verily thou shalt be fed, nay, even in the days of famine thou shalt be satisfied, Ps. lxxx. 27. v. 19. “For time will come, when on thy right and left hand, he shall redeem thee from the power of the sword. If God pleases, it shall not touch thee; or, if it wound thee, if it kill thee, it shall not hurt thee; it can but kill the body, nor has it power to do that, unless it be given from above.” [4.] That whatever is maliciously said against them, it shall not affect them, to do them any hurt, v. 21. “Thou shalt not only be protected from the killing sword, but shalt be hid from the scourge of the tongue, which, like a scourge, is vexing and painful, though not mortal.” The best men, and the most inoffensive, cannot, even with their innocency, secure themselves from calumny, reproach, and false accusation. From these a man cannot hide himself, but God can hide him, so that the most malicious slanders shall be so little heeded by him, as not to disturb his peace; and so little need be by others, as not to blemish his reputation: and the remainder of his wrath God can and does restrain, for it is owing to the hold he has of the consciences of bad men, that the scourge of the tongue is not the ruin of all the comforts of good men in this world. [5.] That they shall have a holy security and serenity of mind, arising from their hope and confidence in God, even in the worst of times. When dangers are most threatening, they shall be easy, believing themselves safe; and shall not be afraid of destruction, no, not when they see it coming. (v. 21.) nor the beasts of the field, when they set upon them, nor of men as cruel as beasts; nay, at destruction and famine thou shalt laugh, (v. 22.) not so as to despise any of God’s chastenings, or make a jest of his judgments, but so as to triumph in God, and his power and goodness, and therein to triumph over the world and all its grievances; to be not only easy, but cheerful and joyful, in tribulation. Blessed is Paul Jacobeth at destruction, when he says, “Christ shall be at ease and triumph when he dieth, where is my sting?” When, in the name of all the saints, he defined all the calamities of this present time to separate from the love of God, concluding, In all these things we are more than conquerors, Rom. viii. 37, &c. See Isa. xxxvi. 22.

[6.] That, being at peace with God, there shall be a covenant of friendship between them and the whole creation, v. 23. “When thou walkest thy grounds, thou shalt not need to fear stumbling, for thou shalt be at league with the beasts of the field, not to dash thy foot against any of them; nor shalt thou be in danger from the beasts of the field, for they all shall be at peace with thee;” compare Hos. ii. 18, I will make a covenant for them with the beasts of the field. This implies, that while man is at enmity with his Maker, the inferior creatures are at war with him; but Tranquillus Deus tranquillat omnia—A reconciled God reconciles all, and “When thou walkest through the land,” Ps. lxxxiii. 19. former deliverances are earnest of, not, as among men, excuses from, further deliverances, Prov. xix. 19. [7.] That, whatever troubles good men may be in, there shall no evil touch them, they shall do them no real harm; the malignity of them, the sting, shall be taken out; they may hiss, they cannot hurt, Ps. xci. 10. The evil one toucheth not peace and piety in the family will make it so. “Thou shalt know and be assured that thy tabernacle is, and shall be, in peace; thou mayest be confident both of its present and its future prosperity. That peace is thy la bernacle, so the word is. Peace is the house in which they dwell, who dwell in God, and are at home in him; "Thou shalt visit," that is, "inquire into, the affairs of thy habitation, and take a review of them, and shalt not sin." First, God will provide a settlement for his people, mean, perhaps, and moveable, a cottage, a tabernacle, but a fixed and quiet habitation, which shall not, but shall have some substantial satisfaction, that peace is sure to thee and thine, having the word of God for it." Providence may change, but the promise cannot. Fourthly, They shall have wisdom to govern their families aright, to order their affairs with discretion, and to look well to the ways of their household, which is here called visiting their habitation; masters of families must not be strangers at home, but have a watchful eye over what they have, and what their servants do. Fifthly, They shall have grace to bear the concerns of their families after a godly sort, and not to sin in the management of them. They shall call their servants to account without passion, pride, covetousness, worldliness, or the like; they shall look into their affairs without discontent at what is, or distrust of what shall be. Family piety crowns family peace and prosperity. The greatest blessing, both in our employments, and in our enjoyments, is to live in peace. If there be in our habitation, and we are abroad, it is comfortable to hear that our tabernacle is in peace; and when we return home to visit our habitation, with satisfaction in our success, that we have not failed in our business, and with a good conscience, that we have not offended God.

8. That their posterity should be numerous and prosperous. Job had lost all his children; "But," says Eliphaz, "if thou return to God, he will again build up thy family, and thy seed shall be many, and as great as ever. Do thou abstain from all vain conversation, and hear and flourishing as the grass of the earth." (v. 25.) "and thou shalt know it." God has blessings in store for the seed of the faithful, which they shall have, if they do not stand in their own light, and forfeit them by their folly. It is a comfort to parents to see the prosperity, especially the spiritual prosperity, of their children: if they are truly good, they are truly great, how small a figure soever they make in the world.

9. That their death shall be reasonable, and they shall finish their course, at length, with joy and honour. v. 26. It is a great mercy, First, To live to a full age, and not to have the number of our months cut off in the midst. If the providence of God do not give us long life, if the grace of God give us to be satisfied with the time allotted us, we may be said to come to a full age. That man lives long enough that has done his work, and is fit for another world. Secondly, To be willing to die, to come cheerfully to the grave, and not be forced thither, as he whose soul was required of him. Thirdly, To die seasonably, as the corn is cut and housed when it is full ripe; not till then, but then not suffered to stand a day longer, lest it shed. Our times are in God's hand; it is well they are so, for he will take care that those who are his die in the best time: however their death may seem to us untimely, it will be found not unseasonable.

In the last verse, he recommends those promises to Job, 1. As faithful sayings, which he might be confident of the truth of: "Lo, this we have searched, and so it is. We have indeed received these things by tradition from our fathers, but we have not taken them upon trust, we have carefully searched them, have compared spiritual things with spiritual, have diligently studied them, and been confirmed in our belief of them, from our own observation and experience; and we are all of a mind that so it is. Job 1. 5. is a treasure that is well worth digging for, diving for, and the people shall know both how to value it ourselves, and how to communicate it to others, when we have taken pains in searching for it. 2. As well worthy of all acceptation, which he might improve to his great advantage! "Hear it, and know thou it for thy good." It is not enough to hear and know the truth, but we must improve it, and be made wiser and better by it, receive the impressions of it, and submit to the commanding power of it. Know it in thyself, so the word is; with application to thyself, and thy own case; not only This is true, but This is true concerning me. That which we thus hear and know for ourselves, we hear and know for our souls, as we are nourished by the meat which we digest. That is, indeed, a good sermon, which does us good.

CHAP. VI.

Eliphaz concluded his discourse with an air of assurance: very confident he was that what he had said was so plain and so pertinent, that nothing could be objected in answer to it. But it appears that what is in his own cause, seems just, yet his neighbour comes, and his complaint is not condemned by all he has said, but still justifies himself in his complaints, and condemns him for the weakness of his arguing. 1. He shows that he had just cause to complain, a thing of this kind, which would appear to any impartial judge, v. 2.-7. II. He continues his passionate wish, that he might speedily be cut off by the stroke of death, and so be eased of all his miseries, v. 8.-13. III. He represents the ends of his friends for their unmerituous censures of him, and the unhappy treatment, v. 14.-30. It must be owned that Job, in all this, spake much that was not meet, but with a mixture of passion and human immodesty. And in this contest, as indeed in most contests, there was fault on both sides.

1. But Job answered and said, 2. Oh that my grief were thoroughly weighed, and my calamity laid in the balances together! 3. For now it would become more than the sand of the sea: therefore my words are swallowed up. 4. For the arrows of the Almighty are within me, the poison whereof drinketh up my spirit: the terror of God do set themselves in array against me. 5. Dost the wild ass bray when he hath grass? or loweth the ox over his fodder? 6. Can that which is unsavoury be eaten without salt? or is there any taste in the white of an egg? 7. The things that my soul refused to touch are as my sorrowful meat.

Eliphaz, in the beginning of his discourse, had been very sharp upon Job: and yet it does not appear that Job gave him any answer at all. We are to understand him patiently, till he had said all he had to say, and then they that would make an impartial judgment of a discourse, must hear it out, and take it entire. But when he had concluded, he makes his reply, in which he speaks very feelingly.

1. He represents his calamity, in general, as much heavier than either he had expressed it, or he had apprehended it, v. 2. 3. He could not fully describe it, they would not fully apprehend it, or, at least, not own that they did; and therefore he would gladly appeal to a third person, who had just weights and just balances with which to weigh his grief and calamity, and would do it with an impartial hand; he wished that they would set his grief in one scale, and all the expressions of it; his calamity in the other, and all the particulars of it; and (though he would not altogether justify himself in his grief, yet) they would find (as he says, ch. xxiii. 2.) that his stroke was heavier than his groaning; for, whatever his grief was, his calamity was more. He began with a declaration, and this declaration was aggravated, it was exaggerated, every grievance weighty, and all together numerous as the sand: Therefore (says he) my words are swallowed up; that is, "Therefore you must excuse both the brokenness and the bitterness of my expressions; do not think it strange if my speech be not so fine and polite as that of an eloquent orator, or so grave and regular as that of a morose philosopher; no, in these circumstances I can pretend neither to the one nor to the other; my words are, as I am, quite swallowed up." Now, 1. He hereby complains of it as his unhappiness, that his friends undertook to administer spiritual physic to him, before they thoroughly understood his case, and knew the worst of it. It is seldom that those who are at ease themselves, rightly weigh the afflictions of the afflicted; every one feels most from his own burthen, few feel for others; and the more exasperated expressions he had used when he cursed his day. Though he could not himself justify all he had said, yet he thought his friends should not thus violently condemn it, for really the case was extraordinary, and that might be condemned at in such a man of sorrows as he now was, which, in any common grief, would by no means be allowed of. 3. He beooks the charitable and compassionate sympathy of his friends with him, and hopes, by representing the greatness of his calamity, to bring them to a better temper toward him. To those that are pain ed, it is some ease to be pitied. II. He complains of the trouble and terror of mind he was in, as the sorest part of his calamity, v. 4. Herein he was a type of Christ, who, in his sufferings, complained most of the sufferings of his soul; Now is my soul troubled, John xii. 27. My soul is exceeding sorrowful, Matth. xxvi. 37. My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? Matth. xxvii. 46. Poor Job sadly complains here, 1. Of what he felt: The arrows of the Almighty are within me. It was not so much the troubles themselves he was under that put him into this confusion, his poverty, disgrace, and bodily pain; that which cut him to the heart, and put him into this agitation, was, to think that the God he loved, and served, had brought all this upon him, and laid him under these marks of his displeasure. Note, Trouble of mind is the sorest trouble: a wounded spirit who can bear? Whatever burden of affliction, in body or estate, God is pleased to lay upon us, we may well afford to submit to it as long as he continues to use the purpose of our reason, and the peace of our consciences; but if, in either of these, we be disturbed, our case is sad indeed, and very pitiable. The way to prevent God's fiercest storms is, to press the hand of the Lord to quench Satan's fiery darts of temptation. Observe, He calls them the arrows of the Almighty; for it is an instance of the power of God above that of any man, that he can with his arrows reach the soul. He that made it can make his sword to approach to it. The poison or heat of these arrows is said to drink up his spirit, because it disturbed his reason, shook his resolution, exhausted his vigour, and threatened his life; and therefore his passionate expressions, though they could not be justified, yet might be excused. 2. Of what he feared. He saw himself charged by the terrors of God, as by an army set in battle-array, and surrounded by them. God, by his terrors, fought against him: as he had no comfort when he retired inward into his own bosom, so he had none when he looked upward toward Heaven. He that used to be encouraged with the consolations of God, not only wanted those, but was amazed with the terrors of God. III. He reflects upon his friends for their severe censures of his complaints, and their unskilful management of his case. 1. Their reproofs were causeless. He complained, it is true, now that he was in this affliction, but he never used to complain, as those who do are of a fretful unquiet spirit, when he was in prosperity: he did not pray when he had grass, nor lay over his fodder, v. 5. But now, that he was utterly deprived of all his comforts, he must be a stock or a stone, and not have the sense of an ox or a wild ass, if he did not give some vent to his grief. He was forced to eat unsavoury meats, and was so poor, that he had not a grain of salt, wherewith to relish them, nor to give a little taste to the white of an egg, which was now the choicest dish he had at his table, v. 6. Even that food which once he would have scorned to touch, now he was glad of, and it was his sorrowful meat, v. 7. Note, It is wisdom not to use ourselves or our children to be nice and dainty about meat and drink, because we know not how we or they may be reduced, nor how that which we now disdain may be made acceptable by necessity. 2. Their comforts were sapsless and insipid; so some understand, v. 6, 7. He complains he had nothing now offered him for his relief, that was proper for him; no cordial, nothing to revive and cheer his spirits; what they had afforded, was in itself as tasteless as the white of an egg, and, when applied to him, as wholesome and tiresome as the most sorrowful meat. I am sorry he should say thus of what Eliphaz had excellently well said, ch. v. 8, &c. But peevish spirits are too apt thus to abuse their comforters. 8. Oh that I might have my request; and that God would grant me the thing that I long for; 9. Even that it would please God to destroy me; that he would let loose his hand, and cut me off! 10. Then should I yet have comfort; yea, I would harden myself in sorrow: let him not spare; for I have not concealed the words of the Holy One. 11. What is my strength, that I should hope? and what is mine end, that I should prolong my life? 12. Is my strength the strength of stones? or is my flesh of brass? 13. Is not my help in me? and is wisdom driven quite from me? Ungoverned passion often grows more violent when it meets with some rebuke and check: the troubled sea, raged with it; and dashes against the solid rock; it has been courting death, as that which would be the happy period of his miseries, ch. iii. For this, Eliphaz had greatly reproved him; but he, instead of unsaying it, says it here again with more vehemence than before; it is as ill said as almost any thing we meet with in all his discourses, and is recorded for our admonition, not our imitation.
JOB, VI.

39 grace and devotion, he might make even these days of affliction good days; he could see no end of his trouble but death, and had not patience to wait the time appointed for that. He has a request to make, there is a thing he longs for: (v. 8.) and what is that? One would think it should be, That it wouild please God to deliver me, and restore me to my prosperity again; no, That it would please God to destroy me. Once he has used his hand to make me poor, and then to make me sick, let him loose it once more to put an end to my life. Let him give the fatal stroke; it shall be to me the stroke of favour," as in France, they call the last blow which dispatches them that are broken on the wheel. There was a time when destruction from the Almighty was a terror to Job; (ch. xxxi. 23.) yet now he courts the destruction of the flesh, but in hopes that the spirit should be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.

Observe, Though Job was extremely desirous of death, and very angry at its delays, yet he did not offer to destroy himself, nor to take away his own life; only he begged that it would please God to destroy him. Seneca's morals, which recommend self-murder as the lawful redress of insupportable grievances, were not then known, nor will ever be entertained by any that have the least regard to the laws of nature and reason. In the book of Job we have a picture over the soul's confinement in the body may be, it must by no means break prison, but wait for a fair discharge.

II. He puts this desire into a prayer, that God would grant him this request, that it would please God to do this for him. It was his sin, so passionately to desire the hastening of his own death, and offering up that desire to God made it no better; nay, what looked ill in his wish, looked worse in his prayer, for we ought not to ask any thing of God but what we can ask in faith, and we cannot ask any thing in faith, but what is agreeable to the will of God. Passionate prayers are the worst of passionate expressions; for we should lift up pure hands without wrath.

III. He promises himself effectual relief, and the redress of all his grievances, by the stroke of death; (v. 10.) "Then should I yet have comfort, which now I have not, nor ever expect till then." See, 1. The grief and the hope of the soul is, it that often proves men's greatest burthen, and nothing is so desirable as to get clear of it. Let grace make us willing to part with it, whenever God calls; for it may so happen, that even sense may make us desirous to part with it before he calls. 2. The hope which the righteous have in their death. If Job had not had a good conscience, he could not have spoken with this assurance of comfort on the other side death, that circumstance which made all the difference between the rich man and Lazarus; Now he is comforted, and thou art comforted.

IV. He challenges death to do its worst. If he could not die without the dreadful preludes of bitter pains and agonies, and strong convulsions; if he must be racket before he be executed, yet, in prospect of dying at last, he would make nothing of dying pangs. "I would harden myself in sorrow, with pain receive my last breath, and not shrink from them; let him not spare; I desire no mitigation of that pain which will put a happy period to all my pains. Rather than not die, let me die so as to feel myself die." These are passionate words, which might better be spared. We should soften ourselves in sorrow, that we may receive the good impressions of it, and, by the sadness of the countenance, our hearts, being made tender, may be made better; but, if we harden ourselves, we provoke God to proceed in his controversy; for when he judgeth, he will overcome. It is great presumption to dare the Almighty, and to say, Let him not spare; for, Are we stronger than he? 1 Cor. x. 22. We are much inclined to sparing mercy; it is bad indeed with us when we are weary of that. Let us rather say, with David, O spare me a little.

V. He grounds his comfort upon the testimony of his conscience for him, that he had been faithful in a firm, ardent, and unshaken profession of religion, and in some degrees useful and serviceable in the cause of God in his generation; I have not concealed the words of the Holy One. Observe, 1. Job had the words of the Holy One committed to him. The people of God were, at that time, blessed with divine revelation. 2. It was his comfort, that he had not concealed them, had not received the grace of God therein in vain. (1.) He had not kept them from himself, but had given them full scope to operate upon him, and in every thing to guide and govern him. He had not stifled his convictions, ignorings the truth in unrighteousness, nor done any thing to hinder the digestion of this spiritual food, and the operation of this spiritual physic. Let us never conceal God's word from ourselves, but always receive it in the light of it. (2.) He had not kept them to himself, but had been ready, on all occasions, to communicate his knowledge for the good of others, was never ashamed or afraid to own the word of God in his heart; nor remiss in his endeavours to bring others into an acquaintance with it. Note, Those, and these only, may promise themselves comfort in death, who are good, and do good, while they live.

VI. He justifies himself in this extreme desire of death, from the deplorable condition he was now in, v. 11, 12. Eliphaz, in the close of his discourse, had put him in hopes that he should yet see a good issue of his troubles; but poor Job puts these cordials away from him, refuses to be comforted, abandons himself to despair, and very ingenuously, yet perversely, argues against the encouragements that were given him. Disconsolate spirits will reason strangely against themselves. In answer to the pleasing prospects Eliphaz had flattered him with, he here intimates, 1. That he had no reason to expect any such thing: "What is my strength, that I should live?" You see how I am weakened and brought to be unable; I am to grapple with my distempers; and therefore shall be unable to hope that I should outlive them, and see better days? Is my strength the strength of stones? Are my muscles brass, and sinews steel? No, they are not, and therefore I cannot hold out always in this pain and misery, but must needs sink under the lead. Had I strength to grapple with my distemper, I might hope to look through it; but, alas! I have not," the weakening of my strength in the day will certainly be the weakening of my days, Ps. cii. 23. Note, All things considered, there is no reason to count upon the long continuance of life in this world. What is our strength? It is depending strength; we have no more strength than God gives us, for in him we live and move: it is decaying strength; we are daily spending the stock, and by degrees it will be exhausted. It is disproportionate to the encounters we may meet with; the strength that is to be depended upon, when two or three days' sickness will make us die as we do water? Instead of expecting an long life, we have reason to wonder that we have lived hitherto, and to feel that we are hastening off space. 2. That he had no reason to desire any such thing: "What is my end, that I should desire to prolong my life? What comfort can I promise myself in life, comparable to the comfort I promise myself in death?" Note, Those who, through grace, are ready for an other world, cannot see much to invite their stay in this world, or to make them fond of it. That, if it be God’s will, we may do him more service, and may get to be fitter and ripe for heaven, is an end for which we may wish the prolonging of life, in some facility to our chief end; but, otherwise, what can we propose to ourselves in desiring to tarry here? The longer life is, the more grievous will its burthen be, (Eccl. xii. 1.) and the longer life is, the less pleasant will be its delights, 2 Sam. xix. 34, 35. We have already seen the best of this world, but we are not sure that we have seen the worst of it.

VII. He obviates the suspicion of his being delirious. 13.) Is not my help in me? that is, “Have I not the use of my reason, with which, I thank God, I can help myself, though you do not help me? Do you think wisdom is driven quite from me, and that I am gone distracted? No, I am not mad, most noble Eliphaz, but speak the words of truth and soberness.” Note, Those who have grace in them, who have the evidence of it, and have it in exercise, have wisdom in them, which will be their help in the worst of times. Sat lucis intus—They have light within.

14. To him that is afflicted pity should be shewed from his friend; but he forsaketh the fear of the Almighty. 15. My brethren have dealt deceitfully as a brook, and as the stream of brooks they pass away; 16. Which are blackish by reason of the ice, and wherein the snow is hid: 17. What time they wax warm they vanish: when it is hot, they are consumed out of their place. 18. The paths of their way are turned aside; they go to nothing, and perish. 19. The troops of Tema looked, the companies of Sheba waited for them. 20. They were confounded because they had hoped; they came thither, and were ashamed. 21. For now ye are nothing; ye see my casting down, and are afraid.

Eliphaz had been very severe in his censures of Job; and his companions, though as yet they had said little, yet had intimated their concurrence with him: their unkindness therein poor Job here complains of, as an aggravation of his calamity, and a further excuse of his desire to die; for what satisfaction could he ever expect in this world, when those that should be his comforters, thus proved his tormentors?

I. He shows what reason he had to expect kindness from them. His expectation was grounded upon the common principles of humanity; (v. 14.) “To him that is afflicted, and that is wasting and melting under his affliction, pity should be shewed, and be not shown that pity, forsakes the fear of the Almighty.” Note, 1. Compassion is a debt owing to those that are in affliction. The least which those that are at ease can do for those that are pained and in anguish, is, to pity them, to manifest the sincerity of a tender concern for them, and to sympathize with them; to take cognizance of their case, inquire into their grievances, hear their complaints, and mingle tears with theirs, to comfort them, and do all we can to help and relieve them: this well becomes the members of the same body, who should feel for the grievances of their fellow-members, not knowing how soon the same may be their own. 2. Inhumanity is impiety and irreligion. He that withholds compassion from his friend, forsakes the fear of the Almighty. So the Chaldee. How dwells the love of God in that man? 1 John iii. 17. Surely those have no fear of God who have dealt deceitfully as a brook.” They come by appointment, with a great deal of ceremony, to mourn with him, and to comfort him; (ch. ii. 11.) and some extraordinary things were expected from such great men, such good men, such wise, learned, knowing men, and Job’s particular friends; none questioned but that the drift of their discourses would be to comfort Job with the remembrance of his former piety, the assurance of God’s favour to him, and the prospect of a glorious issue; but, instead of this, they most barbarously fall upon him with their reproaches and censures, condemn him as a hypocrite, insult over his calamities, and pour vinegar, instead of oil, into his wounds, and thus they dealt deceitfully with him. Note. 1. It is fraud and deceit not only to violate our engagements to our friends, but to frustrate their just expectations from us, especially the expectations we have raised. 2. It is our wisdom to cease from man; we cannot expect too little from the creature, nor too much from the Creator. It is no new thing even for brethren to deal deceitfully; (Jer. ix. 4, 5. Mic. vii. 5.) let us therefore put our confidence in the Rock of ages, not in broken reeds; in the Fountain of life, not in broken cisterns. God will outdo our hopes as much as men come short of them.

This disappointment which he met with, he here illustrates by the failing of brooks in summer.

1.) The similitude is very elegant, v. 15-20. [1.] Their pretensions are fitly compared to the great show which the brooks make, when they are swelled with the waters of a land-flood, by the melting of the ice and snow, which makes them blackish or muddy, v. 16. [2.] His expectations from them, which their coming so solemnly to comfort him had raised, he compares to the expectation which the weary thirsty travellers have of finding water in the desert; but they, who have often seen it in great abundance in the winter, v. 19. The troops of Tema and Sheba, the caravans of the merchants of those countries, whose road lay through the desert of Arabia, looked and waited for a supply of water from those brooks: “Hard by here,” says one, “A little further,” says another, “when I last travelled this way, there was water enough, we shall have that to refresh us.” Whereupon, he says, the rest of God upon whom Job confided, he was apt to expect it again; and yet it does not follow: for, [3.] The disappointment of his expectation is here compared to the confusion which seizes the poor travellers, when they find heaps of sand where they expected floods of water. In the winter, when they were not thirsty, there was water enough; every one will applaud and admire those that are full and in prosperity: but, in the heat of summer, when thirsty and ravening, who should not be ashamed, when it was consumed, (v. 17.) it was turned aside, v. 18. When those who are rich and high, are sunk and impoverished, and stand in need of comfort, then those who before gathered about them, stand aloof from them, who before commended them, are forward to run them down; thus they who raise their expectations high from the creature, will find it fail them then when it should help them; whereas they who make God their confidence have help in the time of need, Heb. iv. 16. They who make gold their hope, sooner or later will be ashamed of it, and of their confidence in it; (Ezek. vii. 19.) and the greater their confidence was, the greater their shame will be; They were confounded because they had hoped, v. 20. We prepare confusion for ourselves by our vain hopes: the reeds break under us, because we lean upon them. (Isa. xliii. 15.) He said, we shall certainly be confounded, for it will fall in the storm, and we must thank ourselves for being such fools to expect it would stand. We are not deceived unless we deceive ourselves.

(2.) The application is very close; (v. 21.) For now ye are nothing. They seemed to be somewhat, but in conversation they added nothing to him. Allude to Gal. ii. 6. He was never the wiser, never the better, for the visit they made him. Note, Whatever complacency we may take of whatever confidence we may put, in creatures, how great soever they may seem, and how dear soever they may be, to us, one time or other we shall say of them, Now ye are nothing. When Job was in prosperity, his friends were something to him, he took complacency in them and their society; but Now ye are nothing, how I can find no comfort but in God." It were well for us, if we had always such comparisons of the vanity of the creature, and its insufficiency to make us happy, as we have sometimes had, or shall have, on a sick-bed, a death-bed, or in trouble of conscience; "Now ye are nothing. You are not what you have been, what you should be, what you pretend to be, what I thought you would have been; for you see my casting down, and are said. When you saw me in my elevation, you caressed me; but, now that you see me in my dejection, you are shy of me, are afraid of showing yourselves kind, lest I should take boldness thence, to beg something of you, or to borrow." (compare v. 22.) "You are afraid, lest, if you own me, you should be obliged to keep me." Perhaps they were afraid of catching his distemper, or of coming within smell of the noisomeness of it. It is not good, either out of pride or niceness, for love of our purses, or of our bodies, to be shy of those in distress, and afraid of coming near them. Their case may soon be our own.

22. Did I say, Bring unto me? or, Give a reward for me of your substance? 23. Or, Deliver me from the enemies' hand? or, Redeem me from the hand of the mighty? 24. Teach me, and I will hold my tongue; and cause me to understand wherein I have erred. 25. How forcible are right words! but what doth your arguing reprove? 26. Do ye imagine to reprove words, and the speeches of one that is desperate, which are as wind? 27. Yea, ye overwhelm the fatherless, and ye dig a pit for your friend. 28. Now, therefore, be content: look upon me: for it is evident unto you if I lie. 29. Return, I pray you, let it not be iniquity: yea, return again, my righteousness is in it. 30. Is there iniquity in my tongue? Cannot my taste discern perverse things?

Poor Job goes on here to upbraid his friends with their unkindness, and the hard usage they gave him. He here appeals to themselves concerning several things which tended both to justify him and condemn them. If they would but think impartially, and speak as they thought, they could not but own,

I. That though he was necessitous, yet he was not craving, nor burlhsonome to his friends. Those that are so, whose troubles serve them to beg by, are commonly less pitied than the silent poor. Job would be glad to see his friends, but he did not say, Bring unto me, (v. 22.) or, Deliver me, v. 23. He did not desire to put them to any expense; did not urge his friends, to either make a collection for him, to set him up again in the world, or that he could plead that his losses came upon him by the hand of God, and not by any fault or folly of his own; that he was utterly ruined and impoverished; that he had lived in good condition, and that, when he had wherewithal, he was charitable, and ready to help those that were in distress; that his friends were rich, and able to help him; yet he did not say, Give me of your substance. Note, A good man, when troubled himself, is afraid of being troublesome to his friends. Or, 2. To raise the country for him, to help him to recover his cattle out of the hands of the Sabeans and Chaldeans, or to make reprisals upon them; "Did I send for you to deliver me out of the hand of the mighty? No, I never expected you should either expose yourselves to any danger, or put yourselves to any charge, upon my account; I will rather sit down content unto my affliction, and make the best of it, than spinse upon my friends." St. Paul wrought with his hands, that he might not be burlhsonome to any. Job's not asking their help, did not excuse them from offering it when he needed it, and it was in the power of their hands to give it; but it much aggravated their unkindness, when he desired no more from them than a good look, and a good word, and yet could not obtain them. It often happens that from man, even when we expect little, we have less, but from God, even when we expect much, we have more, Eph. iii. 20.

II. That though he differed in opinion from them, yet he was not obstinate, but ready to yield to conviction, and to strike sail to truth, as soon as ever it was made to appear to him that he was in an error; (v. 24, 25.) "If, instead of invidious reflections and uncharitable insinuations, you will give me plain instructions and solid arguments, which shall carry their own evidence along with them, I am ready to acknowledge to my own fault, my own mistake in a fault; Teach me, and I will hold my tongue, for I have often found, with pleasure and wonder, how forcible right words are: but the method you take will never make proselytes; what doth your arguing reprove? Your hypothesis is false, your surmises are groundless, your management weak, and your application peevish and uncharitable." Note, 1. parcel reasoning has a commanding power, and it is not easy for men are not conquered by it; but railing and foul language is impotent and foolish, and it is no wonder if men are exasperated and hardened by it. 2. It is the undoubtedly character of every honest man, that he is truly desirous to have his mistakes rectified, and to be made to understand wherein he has erred and that right words, when they appear to him to be so, though contrary to his former sentiments, are worth more to him and acceptable. 3. That though he had been indeed in a fault, yet they ought not to have given him such hard usage; (v. 26, 27.) "Do you imagine, or contrive with a great deal of art," (for so the word signifies, "to reprove words, some passionate expressions of mine in this desperate condition, as if they were certain indications of reigning impolicy and atheism? A little candour and charity would have served to excuse them, and to put a better con-is in it," that is, "I am in the right in this matter; and though I cannot keep my temper as I should, I know I am in the right, and have not said, or done, or suffered, any thing which will prove me other than an honest man." A just cause desires nothing more than a just hearing, and, if need be, a re-hearing.

CHAP. VII.

Job, in this chapter, goes on to express the bitter sense he had of his calamities, and to justify himself in his desire of death. He complains to himself and his friends of his troubles, and the constant agitation he was in, v. 1. 6. 1. He turns to God, and expostulates with him, v. 7. to the end. In which, 1. He pleads the final period of man, with the impossibility of his present state, v. 7. 11. 2. He passionately complains of the miserable condition he was now in, v. 11. 16. 3. He wonders that God will thus contend with him, and begs for the pardon of his sins, and a speedy release out of his miseries, v. 17. 21. It's hard to methodise the speeches of one who owned himself almost desperate, ch. vi. 26.

1. Is there not an appointed time to man upon earth? Are not his days also like the days of a hireling? 2. As a servant earnestly desireth the shadow, and as a hireling looketh for the reward of his work; 3. So am I made to possess months of vanity, and wearisome nights are appointed to me. 4. When I lie down, I say, When shall I arise, and the night be gone? and I am full of tossings to and fro unto the dawning of the day. 5. My flesh is clothed with worms and clods of dust; my skin is broken, and become loathsome. 6. My days are swifter than a weaver's shuttle, and are spent without hope.

Job is here excusing what he could not justify, even his inordinate desire of death. Why should he not wish for the period of life, which would be the period of his miseries? To enforce this reason, he argues,

I. From the general condition of man upon earth; (v. 1.) "He is of few days, and full of trouble. Every man must die shortly, and every man has some reason (more or less) to desire to die shortly; and, therefore, why should you impute to me as so heinous a crime, that I wish to die shortly?" Or thus: "Pray mistake not my desires of death. I thought the time appointed of God could be anticipated; no, I know very well that this is fixed; only in such language as this, I take the liberty to express my present uneasiness. Is there not an appointed time (a warfare, so the word is) to man upon earth? Are not his days here like the days of a hireling? Observe,

1. Man's present place: he is of few days, which God has given to the children of men, Ps. cxv. 16. This bespeaks man's meanness and inferiority: how much below the inhabitants of yonder elevated and refined regions he is situated! It also bespeaks God's mercy to him: he is yet upon the earth, not under it; on earth, not in hell. Our time on earth is limited and short, according to the narrow bounds of this earth; but heaven cannot be measured, nor the days of heaven numbered.

2. His continuance in that place: is there not a time appointed for his abode here? Yes, certainly there is, and it is easy to say by whom the appointment is made, even by Him that made us and set us here. We are not to be on this earth always, nor long, but for a certain time, which is determined by Him in whose hand our times are. We are not to think that we are governed by the blind fate of the Stoics, or by the blind fortune of the Epicureans, but by the wise, holy, and sovereign counsel of God.

3. His condition during that continuance: man's life is a warfare, and as the days of a hireling. We are not to consider it, as the Stoics have done, to look upon ourselves in this world, (1.) As soldiers, exposed to hardship, and in the midst of enemies; we must serve and be under command; and, when our warfare is accomplished, we must be disbanded, disarmed with either shame or honour, according to what we have done in the body. (2.) As day-labourers, that have the work of the day to do in its day, and must make up their account at night. This is his condition at this time. He had as much reason, he thought, to wish for death, as a poor servant or hireling, that is tired with his work, has to wish for the shadows of the evening, when he shall receive his penny, and go to rest. v. 2. The darkness of the night is as welcome to the labourer, as the light of the morning is to the watchman, Ps. cxxx. 6. The God of nature has provided for the repose of labours, and no wonder that they desire it. The sleep of the labouring mass is sweet to them. (12.) So plain to the Epicureans, and more generous, more relishing, to the luxurious, than rest to the labourers; nor can any rich man take so much satisfaction in the return of his rent-days, as the hireling in his day's wages. The comparison is plain, the application is concise, and somewhat obscure; but we must supply a word or two, and then it is easy: exactness of language is not to be expected from one in Job's condition. "As a servant earnestly desires the shadow, so, and for the same reason, I eagerly desire death, for I am made to possess, &c."

Hear his complaint:

1. His days were useless, and had been so a great while; he was wholly taken off from business, and utterly unfit for it. Every day was a burden to him, because he was in no capacity of doing good, or of spending it to any purpose. Evitit partem non attigit ullam—He could not fill up his time with any thing that would turn to account; this he calls possessing months of vanity, v. 3. It very much increases the affliction of sickness and pain, to be a good man, that he is thereby forced from his usefulness. He insists not so much upon it, that they are days in which he has no pleasure, as that they are days in which he does no good; on that account, they are months of vanity: but when we are disabled to work for God, if we will but sit still quietly for him, it is all one; we shall be accepted.

2. His nights were restless, v. 3, 4. The night relieves the toil and fatigue of the day, not only to the labourers, but to the sufferers: if a sick man can but get a little sleep in the night, it helps nature, and it is hoped that he will do well, John xi. 12. However, be the trouble what it will, sleep gives some intermission to the cares, and pains, and griefs, that afflict us; it is the parenthesis of our sorrows: but poor Job could not gain this relief. (1.) His nights were wearisome, and, instead of taking any rest, he did but tire himself more with toiling to and fro until morning. Those that are in great measiness, in pain of body, or anguish of mind, think, by changing sides, changing places, changing postures, to get some ease; but, while the cause is the same within, it is all to no purpose; it is but a resemblance of a fretful discontented spirit, that is ever shifting, but never easy. This made him dread the night as much as the servant desires it, and, when he lays down, to say, When will the night be over? (2.) These wearisome nights were appointed to him; God, who determines the times before appointed, had allotted him such nights as these. Whatever is, at any time, grievous to us, it is good to see it appointed for us, that we may acquiesce in the event, not only as unavoidable, because appointed, but as, therefore, designed for some holy end. When we have comfortable nights, we must see them also appointed to us, and be thankful for them; many better than we have wearisome nights.

3. His body was noisome, v. 5. His sores bred worms, the scabs were like clods of dust, and his skin was broken; so evil was the disease which cleaved fast to him. See what vile bodies we have, and what little reason we have to pamper them, or be proud of them; they have in themselves the principles of their own corruption: as fond as we are of them now, the time may come when we may loathe them, and long to get rid of them.

4. His life was hastening space towards a period, v. 6. He thought he had no reason to expect a long life, for he found himself declining fast; (v. 6.) My days are swifter than a weaver's shuttle, that is, "My time is now but short, and there are but a few sands more in my glass, which will speedily run out." Natural motions are more swift near the centre; Job thought his days ran swiftly, because he thought he should soon be at his journey's end. But he looked upon them as good as spent already, and he was therefore without hope of being restored to his former prosperity. It is applicable to man's life in general; our days are like a weaver's shuttle, thrown from one side of the web to the other, in the twinkling of an eye, and then back again, to and fro, until, at length, it is quite exhausted of the thread it carried; and then we cut off, like a weaver, our life, Isa. xxxviii. 12. Time hastens on space; the motion of it cannot be stopped, and, when it is past, it cannot be recalled. While we are living, we are sowing, (Gal. vi. 8.) so we are weaving; every day, like the shuttle, leaves a thread behind it; many weave the spider's web, which will fail them, ch. viii. 14. If we are weaving to ourselves holy garments and robes of righteousness, we shall have the benefit of them when our work comes to be reviewed, and every man shall reap as he sowed, and wear as he wove.

7. O remember that my life is wind: mine eye shall no more see good. 8. The eye of him that hath seen me shall see me no more: thine eyes are upon me, and I am not. 9. As the cloud is consumed and vanisheth away; so he that goeth down to the grave shall come up no more. 10. He shall return no more to his house, neither shall his place know him any more. 11. Therefore will I not refrain my mouth; I will speak in the anguish of my spirit; I will complain in the bitterness of my soul. 12. Am I a sea, or a whale, that thou testest a watch over me? 13. When I say, My bed shall comfort me, my couch shall ease my complaint; 14. Then thou searest me with dreams, and terrifiest me through visions: 15. So that my soul chooseth strangling, and death rather than my life. 16. I loathe it: I would not live always: let me alone; for my days are vanity.
his ear heavy. Yet we must not go to school to Job here, to learn how to speak to God, for, it must be confessed, there is a great mixture of passion and corruption in what he here says: but if God be not extreme to mark what his people say amiss, let us also make the best of it. Job is here begging of God either to ease him or end him. He here represents himself to God, 1. As a dying man, surely and speedily dying. It is good for us, when we are sick, to think and speak of death. Job had no purpose to put up a mind of it; and if we be duly mindful of it ourselves, we may, in faith, put God in mind of it, as Job does here; (v. 7.) O remember that my life is wind. He recommends himself to God as an object of his pity and compassion, with this consideration, that he was a very weak, frail, creature, his abode in this world short and uncertain, his removal out of it sure and speedy, and his return to it again impossible, and never to be expected; that his life was wind, as the lives of all men are, noisy perhaps, and blustering, like the wind, but vain and empty, soon gone, and, when gone, past recall. God had compassion on Israel, remembering that they were but flesh, a wind that passeth away, and cometh not again, Ps. lxxxviii. 38, 39. Observe, 1. The pious reflections Job makes upon his own life and death. Such plain truths as these concerning the shortness, fragility, and vanity of life, the unavoidableness and irrecoverableness of death, then do us good, when we think and speak of them with application to ourselves. Let us consider then, (1.) That we must shortly take our leave of all the things that are seen, that are temporal. The eye of the body must be closed, and shall no more see good, the good which most men set their hearts upon, for their cry is, Who will make us to see good? Ps. iv. 6. If we be such fools as to place our happiness in visible good things, what will become of us when they shall be for ever hid from our eyes, and we shall no more see good? Let us, therefore, live by that faith which is the substance and evidence of things not seen. (2.) That we must then remove to an invisible world: the eye of him that hath here seen me, shall see me no more there. It is Adon—an unseen state, v. 8. Death removes our lovers and friends into darkness, (Ps. lxxxviii. 18.) and will shortly remove us out of sight: when we go hence we shall be seen no more, (Ps. xxxix. 13.) but go to converse with the things that are not seen, that are eternal. (3.) That God can easily, and in a moment, put an end to our lives, and send us to another world; (v. 8.) Thine eyes are upon me, and I am not: thou canst look me into eternity, frown me into the grave, when thou pleasest. Shouldst thou, displeased, give me a frowning look, I sink, I die, as if with lightning struck. Sir R. Blackmore.

He takes away our breath, and we die; nay, he but looks on the earth, and it trembles, Ps. civ. 29, 32.

(4.) That when we are once removed to another world, we must never return to this. There is constant passing from this world to the other, but Vestigia nulla retrorsum—There is no repassing. "Therefore, Lord, show me kindness while I am here, for I shall return no more to receive kindness in this world." Or, "Therefore, Lord, kindly ease me by death, for that will be a perpetual ease, shall return no more to the calamities of this life. When we are dead, we are gone, to rest in no more," [1] From our house under ground, v. 9. He that goeth down to the grave, shall come up no more, until the general resurrection, shall come up no more to his place in this world. Dying is work that is to be done but once, and therefore it had need be well done: an error there is first retrieved. This is illustrated by the blotting out and scattering of a cloud. It is consumed, and vanisheth away, is resolved into air, and never knits again: other clouds arise, but the same cloud never returns: so a new generation of the children of men is raised up, but the former generation is quite consumed, and vanishes away. When we see a cloud which looks great, as if it would eclipse the sun and drown the earth, of a sudden dispersed and disappearing, let us say, "Just such a thing is the life of man; it is a vapour that appears for a little while, and then vanishes away." [2] To return no more to our house above ground, v. 10. He shall return no more to his house, to the possession and enjoyment of it, to the business and delights of it: others will keep it till they also resign to another generation. The rich man in hell desired Lazarus might be sent to his house, knowing it was to no purpose to ask that he might have leave to go himself. Glorified saints shall return no more to the cares, and burthens, and sorrows, of their house; nor damned sinners to the gaieties and pleasures of their house. Their place shall no more know them, no more own them, have no more sight of them, nor any benefit under their influence. It concerns us to secure a better place when we die, for this will no more own us.

2. The passionate inference he draws from it. From these premises he might have drawn a better conclusion than this, (v. 11.) Therefore I will not refrain my mouth, I will speak, I will complain. Holy David, when he had been meditating on the frailty of human life, made a contrary use of it; (Ps. xxxix. 9.) I know that my end is; and opened not my mouth: but Job, finding himself near expiring, hastens as much to make his complaint, as if he had been to make his last will and testament, or as if he could not die in peace until he had given vent to his passion. When we have but a few breaths to draw, we should spend them in the holy, gracious, breathings of faith and prayer, not in the noisome, noxious, breathings of sin and corruption. Be not preening and praising, thus die complain- ing and quarrelling.

II. As a dismembered man, sorely and grievously dismembered, both in body and mind. In this part of his representation, he is very peevish, as if God dealt hardly with him, and laid upon him more than was meet. Am I a sea, or a whale? v. 12. "A raging sea, that must be kept within bounds, to check its proud waves, or an unruly whale, that must be restrained by force from devouring all the fishes of the sea? Am I so strong, that there needs so much ado to hold me? So boisterous, that no less than all these mighty bonds of affliction will serve to tame me, and keep me within compass?" We are very apt, when we are in affliction, to complain of God and his providence, as if he had more restraint upon us than there is occasions for; whereas we are never in heaviness but when there is need, or beyond the just measure.

1. He complains that he could not rest in his bed, v. 13, 14. There we promise ourselves some repose, when we are fatigue with labour, rain, or travel; My bed shall comfort me, and my couch shall ease my complaint; sleep will, for a time, give me some relief; it does so; it is appointed for that end; many a time it has eased us, and we have awaked refreshed, and with new vigour. When it is so, we have great reason to be thankful; but it is not so with poor Job; his bed, instead of comfortting him, terrified him; and his couch, instead of easing his complaint, added to it; for if he dropped asleep, he was disturbed with his frightful dreams, and when those awakened, still he was haunted with dreadful apparitions. This was its, that made the night so unwelcome and wearisome to him as it was; (v. 4.) When shall I arise? Note, God can, when he pleases, meet us with terror there, where we promise ourselves ease and repose; nay, he can make us a terror to ourselves, and, as we have often contracted guilt, by the ravings of an unsanctified fancy, he can likewise, by the power of our own imagination, create as much grief, and so make that our punishment which he has often been our sin. In Job's dreams, though they might partly arise from his distemper, (in fevers, or small-pox, when the body is all over sore, it is common for the sleep to be unquiet,) yet we have reason to think Satan had a hand in them; Satan, who delights to terrify those whom it is out of his reach to destroy; but Job looked up to God, who permitted Satan to do this, (Thou searest me,) and mistook Satan's representations for the terrors of God setting themselves in array against him. We have reason to pray to God that our dreams may neither defile nor disquiet us, neither tempt us to sin, nor torment us with fear; that He who keeps Israel, and neither slumbers nor sleeps, may keep us when we slumber and sleep; that the Devil may not then do us a mischief, either as an insinuating serpent, or as a roaring lion; and to bless God if we lie down and our sleep is sweet, and we are not thus scared.

2. He covets to rest in his grave, that bed where there are no tossings to and fro, nor any frightful dreams, v. 15, 16. (1.) He was sick of life, and hated the thoughts of it; "I loathe it, I have had enough of it, I would not live alway; not only not live alway in this condition, in pain and misery, but not live alway in the most easy and prosperous condition, to be continually in danger of being thus reduced: my days are vanity at the best, empty of solid comfort, exposed to real griefs; and I would not be for ever tied to such uncertainty." Note, A good man would not (if he might) live always in this world, no, not though it smile upon him, because it is a world of sin and temptation, and he has a better world in prospect. (2.) He was fond of death, and pleased himself with the thoughts of it: his soul (his judgment, his thought, but really it was Satan's suggestion and death rather,) any death rather than such a life as this. Doubtless, this was Job's infirmity; for though a good man would not wish to live alway in this world, and would choose strangling and death rather than sin, as the martyrs did, yet he will be content to live as long as pleaseth God, not choose them rather than life, because life is our opportunity of glorifying God, and getting ready for heaven.

17. What is man that thou shouldest magnify him? and that thou shouldest set thy heart upon him? 18. And that thou shouldest visit him every morning, and try him every moment? 19. How long wilt thou not depart from me, nor let me alone till I swallow down my spittle? 20. I have sinned; what shall I do unto thee, O thou Preserver of men? why hast thou set me as a mark against thee, so that I am a burden to myself? 21. And why dost thou not pardon my transgression, and take away mine iniquity? for now shall I sleep in the dust; and thou shalt seek me in the morning, but I shall not be.

Job here reasons with God,

1. Concerning his dealings with man in general; (v. 17, 18.) What is man, that thou shouldest magnify him? This may be looked upon either, 1. As a passionate reflection upon the proceedings of divine justice; as if the great God did diminish and disparage himself, in contending with man. Great men think it below them to take cognizance of those who are much their inferiors, so far as to reprove and correct their follies and iniquities; why then does God magnify man, by visiting him, and trying him, and making so much ado about him? Why will he thus pour all his forces upon one that is such an unequal match for him? Why will he visit him with afflictions, which, like a quotidian ague, return as duly and constantly as the morning-light, and try, every moment, what he can bear? We mistake God, and the nature of his providence, if we think it any lessening to him, to take notice of the meanest of his creatures. Or,

2. As a pious admiration of the condescensions of divine grace, like that, Ps. viii. 4.—exlv. 3. He owns God's favour to man in general, even then when he complains of his own particular troubles. "What is man, miserable man, a poor, mean, weak creature, that Thou, the great and glorious God, shouldst deal with him as thou dost? What is man," (1.) That thou shouldest put such honour upon him; shouldest magnify him, by taking him into covenant and communion with thyself? (2.) "That thou shouldest concern thyself so much about him, shouldest set thy heart upon him, as dear to thee, and one thou hast a kind of passion to, and admire. The compassion every morning, as we daily visit a particular friend, or as the physician visits his patients every morning, to help them?" (4.) "That thou shouldest try him, shouldst feel his pulse, and observe his looks, every moment, as in care about him, and jealous over him?" That such a worm of the earth as man is, should be the darling and favourite of Heaven, is what we have reason for ever to admire.

II. Concerning his dealings with him in particular. Observe,

1. The complaint he makes of his afflictions, which he here aggravates, and (as we are all too apt to do) makes the worst of, in three particular respects.

(1.) That he was the butt to God's arrows; "Thou hast set me as a mark against thee," v. 20. "My case is singular, and none is shot at so as I am." (2.) That he was a burden to himself, ready to sink under the load of his own life. How much delight sooner we take in ourselves, God can, when he pleases, make us burdens to ourselves. What comfort can we take in ourselves, if God appear against us as an Enemy, and we have not comfort in him? (3.) That he had occasion of his griefs; (v. 19.) "How long wilt thou be ere thou cause thy rod to depart from me, or abate the rigour of the correction, at least, for so long as that I may swallow down my spittle?" It should seem, Job's distemper lay much in his throat, and almost choked him, so that he could not swallow his spittle. He complains, (ch. xxx. 18.) that it bound him about like the collar of his coat. "Lord," he says, "is it not thy hand that使我 some respite, some breathing time?" ch. ix. 18.

2. The concern he is in about his sins. The best men have sin to complain of, and the better they are, the more they will complain of it.

(1.) He ingenuously owns himself guilty before God; I have sinned. God had said of him, that he was a perfect and an upright man; yet he says of himself, "I have sinned. Those may be upright who yet are not sinless; and those who are sincerely penitent are accepted, through a Mediator, as evangelically perfect. Job maintained, against his friends, that he was not a God-savant, a wicked man; and yet owns to his God, that he had sinned. If we have been kept from gross acts of sin, it does not, therefore, follow that we are innocent. The best must acknowledge, before God, that they have sinned. His calling God the Observer, or Preserver, of men, may be looked upon as designed for an aggravation of his sin; "Though God has had his eye upon me, his eye upon me for good, yet against me. Why are we in affliction? Is it reasonable to confess sin, as the procuring cause of our affliction? Penitent confessions would drown and silence passionate complaints.

(2.) He seriously inquires how he might make his peace with God; "What shall I do unto thee, having done so much against thee?" Are we convinced that we have sinned, and are we brought to own it? We cannot but conclude that something must be done to answer the demands of the case, or the consequences of it. The matter must not rest as it is, but some course must be taken, to undo what has been ill done. And, if we are truly sensible of the danger we have run ourselves into, we shall be willing to do anything; to take a pardon upon any terms; and therefore shall be inquisitive as to what we shall do. (Mic. vi. 6, 7.) what shall we do to God, not to satisfy the demands of his justice, (that is done only by the Mediator,) but to qualify ourselves for the tokens of his favour, according to the tenor of the gospel covenant. In making this inquiry, it is good to eye God as the Preserver or Saviour of men, not the Destroyer. In our repentance, we must keep up good thoughts of God, as one that delights not in the ruin of his creatures, but would rather they should return and live. "Thou art the Saviour of men; be thy Saviour, for I cast myself upon thy mercy."

(3.) He earnestly begs for the forgiveness of his sins, vi. 21. The heat of his spirit, as, on the one hand, it made his complaints the more bitter, so, on the other hand, it made his prayers the more lively and importunate; as here, "Why dost thou not pardon my transgression? Art not thou a God of infinite mercy, that art ready to forgive? Hast not thou wrought repentance in me? Why then dost thou not give me the pardon of my sin, and make me to hear the voice of that joy and gladness?" Surely he means more than barely the removing of his outward trouble, and is herein earnest for the return of God's favour, which he complained of the want of, ch. vi. 4. "Lord, pardon my sins, and give me the comfort of that pardon, and then I can easily bear my afflictions," Matth. ix. 2. Isa. xxxixii. 24. When the mercy of God pardons the transgression that is committed by us, the grace of God takes away the iniquity that precedes, and forever removes the guilt of sin, he breaks the power of sin.

(4.) To enforce his prayer for pardon, he pleads the prospect he had of dying quickly; "For now shall I sleep in the dust; death will lay us in the dust, will lay us to sleep there, and perhaps now in a little time. Job had been complaining of restless nights, and that sleep departed from his eyes; (v. 3, 4, 13, 14.) but those who cannot sleep in a bed, who must sleep in a bivouac, but not be scared with dreams, nor tossed to and fro. "Thou shalt seek me in the morning, to show me favour, but I shall not be, it will be too late then. If my sins be not pardoned while I live, I am lost and undone for ever." Note, The consideration of this, that we must shortly die, and perhaps may die suddenly, should make us all very solicitous to get our sins pardoned, and our iniquity taken away.

CHAP. VIII.

Job's friends are like Job's messengers; those followed one another close with evil tidings, these with harsh censures; both would drive him from his integrity, these to drive him from the comfort of it. Eliphaz did not reply to what Job had said in answer to him, but left it to Bildad, whom he knew to be of the same mind with himself in this affair. Those are not the worst of the company, but the weak est rather, who covet to have all the talk. Let others speak in their turn, and let the first keep silence, 1 Cor. xiv. 30, 31. Eliphaz had undertaken to show, that, because Job was surely afflicted, he was certainly a wicked man; Bildad is much of the same mind, and will conclude Job a wicked man, unless God do speedily appear for his relief. In this chapter, he endeavours to convince Job, v. 2, 3. That he and his children had suffered justly, v. 3, 4. III. That, if he were a true penitent, God would soon turn his captivity, v. 5, 7. IV. That it was a usual thing for Providence to extinguish the joys and hopes of wicked men, as his were extinguished; and therefore that they had reason to suspect him for a hypocrite, v. 8, 15. V. That they should be abundantly confirmed in their suspicion, unless God did speedily appear for his relief, v. 20, 22.

1. THEN answered Bildad the Shuhite, and said. 2. How long wilt thou speak these things? and how long shall the words of thy mouth be like a strong wind? 3. Doth God pervert judgment? or doth the Almighty pervert justice? 4. If thy children have sinned against him, and he have cast them away for their transgression; 5. If thou wouldest seek unto God betimes, and make thy supplication to the Almighty; 6. If thou weri pure and upright; surely now he would awake for thee, and make the habitation of thy righteousness prosperous. 7. Though thy beginning was small, yet thy latter end should greatly increase.

Here, I. Bildad reproves Job for what he had said; (v. 2.) checks his passion, but perhaps, (as is too common,) with greater passion. We thought Job spake a great deal of good sense, and much to the purpose, and that he had reason and right on his side; but Bildad, like an 'anger angry disputant, turns it all off with this, How long wilt thou speak these things? taking it for granted that Eliphaz had said enough to silence him, and that therefore all he said was impertinent. Thus (as Caryl observes) reproofs are often grounded upon mistakes. Men's meaning is not taken aright, and then they are gravely rebuked, as if they were evil-doers. Bildad compares Job's discourse to a strong wind. Job had excused himself with this, that his speeches were but as wind, (ch. vi. 26.) and therefore they should not make such ado about them; "Yea, but" (says Bildad) "they are as a strong wind, blustering and threatening, boisterous and dangerous, and therefore we are concerned to fence against them."

II. He justifies God in what he had done. This he had no occasion to do at this time, for Job did not condemn God, nor did he think what he had done: and this he might have done, without reflecting upon Job's children, as he does here. Could not he be an advocate for God, but he must be an accuser of his brethren?
1. He is right in general, that God doth not pervert judgment, nor ever go contrary to any settled rule of justice, v. 3. Far be it from him that he should, and from that we should expect only. He never oppresses the innocent, nor lays more load on the guilty than they deserve. He is God, the Judge; and shall not the Judge of all the earth do right? Gen. xviii. 25. If there should be unrighteousness with God, how shall he judge the world? Rom. iii. 6. He is Almighty, Shaddai, All-sufficient. Men pervert justice, sometimes, for fear of the power of others; but God is Almighty, and stands in awe of none. Men had respect to the favour of others; but God is all-sufficient, and cannot be benefited by the favour of any. It is man’s weakness and impotency, that he often is unjust; it is God’s omnipotence, that he cannot be so.

2. Yet he is not fair and candid in the application: he takes it for granted that Job’s children (the death of whom was one of the greatest of his afflictions) had been guilty of some notorious wickedness, and that the unhappy circumstances of their death was sufficient evidence that they were sinners above all the children of the east, v. 4. Job readily owned that God did not pervert judgment; and yet it did not therefore follow either that his children were cast-aways, or that they died for some great transgression. It is true that we and our children have sinned against God, and we ought to justify him in all he brings upon us and ours; but extraordinary afflictions are not always the punishment of extraordinary sins, but sometimes the trial of extraordinary graces; and, in our judgment of another’s case, (unless the contrary appears,) we ought to take the more favourable side, as our Saviour directs, Luke xiii. 2, 4. Here Bildad missed it.

III. He puts Job in hope, that, if he were indeed upright, as he said he was, he should yet see a good issue of his present troubles: “Although thy children have sinned against him, and are cast away in their transgression, they have died in their own guilt; yet, if thou be pure and upright thyself, and, as an evidence of that, wilt now seek unto God, and submit to him, all shall be well yet,” v. 5...7. This may be taken two ways: either,

1. As designed to prove Job a hypocrite, and a wicked man, though not by the greatness, yet by the continuance, of his afflictions. “When thou wast impoverished, and thy children killed, if thou hadst not been pure and upright, and hadst not been so in the trial, God would, before now, have returned in mercy to thee, and comforted thee according to the time of thine affliction; but because he does not so, we have reason to conclude thou art not so pure and upright as thou pretendest to be. If thou hadst conducted thyself well under the former affliction, thou hadst not been struck with the latter. Herein Bildad was not in the right; for a good man may, and for his sake may be, very sorely, but very long, and yet, if for life, it is, in comparison with eternity, but for a moment. But, since Bildad put to it this issue, God was pleased to join issue with him, and proved his servant Job an honest man, by Bildad’s own argument; for, soon after, he blessed his latter end more than his beginning. Or,

2. As designed to direct and encourage Job, that he might turn himself into despair, and give up all for gone; yet there might be hope, if he would take the right course. I am apt to think Bildad here intended to condemn Job, yet would be thought to counsel and comfort him. (1.) He gives him good counsel, yet perhaps not expecting he would take it; the same that Eliphaz had given him, (ch. v. 8.) to seek unto God, and that betimes, that is, speedily and seriously, and not to be dilatory and trifling in his return and repentance. He advises him not to complain, but to petition, and to make his supplication to the Almighty with humility and faith; and he tells him that there was (what he feared had hitherto been wanting) sincerity in his heart, "That thou must be pure and upright," and honesty in his house, "That must be the habituation of thy righteousness, and not filled with ill-gotten goods; else God will not hear thy prayers," Ps. lxvi. 18. It is only the prayer of the upright that is the acceptable and prevailing prayer, Prov. xv. 8. (2.) He gives him good hopes that he should yet get again good days, secretly suspecting, however, that he was not qualified to see them. He promises that he would be early in seeking God, would awake for his relief, would remember him, and return to him, though now he seemed to forget him and forsake him; That if his habitation were righteous it should be prosperous; for honesty is the best policy, and inward piety a sure friend to outward prosperity. When we return to God in a way of duty, we have reason to hope that he will return to us in a way of mercy. Let not Job object that he had so little left to begin the world with again, that it was impossible he should ever prosper as he had done; no, "Though thy beginning should be ever so small, a little meal in the barrel, and a little oil in the cruse, God’s blessing shall multiply that to a great increase." This is God’s way of enriching the souls of his people with graces and comforts, not for saltum—as by a bound, but for gradum—step by step. The beginning is small, but the progress is to perfection. Dawning light grows to noon-day; a grain of mustard-seed to a great tree. Let us not therefore despise the day of small things, but hope for the day of great things.

3. For inquire, I pray thee, of the former age, and prepare thyself to the search of their fathers; 9. (For we are but of yesterday, and know nothing, because our days upon earth are a shadow:) 10. Shall not they teach thee, and tell thee, and utter words out of their heart? 11. Can the rush grow up without mine? can the flag grow without water? 12. Whilst it is yet in his greenness, and not cut down, it withereth before any other herb. 13. So are the paths of all that forget God; and the hypocrite’s hope shall perish: 14. Whose hope shall be cut off, and whose trust shall be a spider’s web. 15. He shall lean upon his house, but it shall not stand: he shall hold it fast, but it shall not endure. 16. He is green before the sun, and his branch shooteth forth in his garden. 17. His roots are wrapped about the heap, and seeth the place of stones. 18. If he destroy him from his place, then it shall deny him, saying, I have not seen thee. 19. Behold, this is the joy of his way, and out of the earth shall others grow.

Bildad here discourses well of the sad catastrophe of hypocrites and evil-doers, and the fatal process of all their doings; but he is too bold as to say, with Eliphaz, that none that were righteous were ever cut off thus; (ch. iv. 7.) yet he takes it for granted that God, in the course of his providence, does ordinarily bring wicked men, who seemed pious, and were prosperous, to shame and ruin in this world; and that, by making their prosperity short, he discovers their piety to be counterfeit. Whether this will certainly prove that all who are thus ruined must be concluded to have been hypocrites, he will not say, but rather suspects and thinks the application is easy.

I. He proves this truth, of the certain destruction of all the hypocrisies of hypocrites, by an appeal to authority, and the concurring sentiment and observation of all wise and good men. It is an un

1. He insists not on his own judgment, and that of his companions; "(v. 8.) 2. He perceived that Job had no opinion of their abilities, but thought they knew little; "We will own," says Bildad, "that we know nothing, are as ready to confess our ignorance as thou art to condemn it; for we are but as yesterday, in comparison, and our days are short and transient, and hastening away as a shadow. And therefore," (v. 1.) "We are not so near the fountain-head of divine revelation" (which hypothesis he opposed); and knew not what they said, and recount what we have been told of their sentiments." Blessed be God, now that we have the word of God in writing, and are directed to search that, we need not inquire of the former age, nor prepare ourselves to the search of their fathers; for, though we ourselves are but of yesterday, the word of God in the scripture is as nigh us as they; (Rom. x. 8.) and it is the certain word of prophecy, to which we must take heed. If we study and keep God's precepts, we may by them understand more than the ancients, Ps. cxix. 99, 100. (2.) "We do not live so long as they of the former age did, to make observations upon the methods of Divine Providence, and therefore cannot be such competent judges as they, in a cause of this nature." Note, The shortness of our lives is a great hindrance to the improvement of our knowledge; and so is the frailty and weakness of our bodies; for, "Vita brevis, aetas longa—Life is short, the progress of art boundless.

2. He refers himself to the testimony of the ancients, and to the confidence which Job himself had of their sentiments. "Do thou inquire of the former age, and let them tell thee, not only their own judgment in this matter, but the judgment also of their fathers; (v. 8.) they will teach thee, and in-form thee, (v. 10.) that, all along, in their time, the judgments of God followed wicked men. This they will utter of their hearts, that is, as that which they firmly believe themselves, which they are greatly affected with, and desire to acquaint and affect others with." Note, (1.) For the right un understanding of Divine Providence, and the unfolding of the difficulties of it, it will be of use to compare the observations and experiences of former ages with the events of our own day; and, in order thereunto, to consult history, especially the sacred history, which is the most ancient, probably truest, and written designedly for our learning. (2.) They that would fetch knowledge from the former ages, must search diligently, prepare for the search, and take pains in the search. (3.) Those words are most likely to reach to the hearts of the learners, that come from the hearts of the teachers. They shall teach thee best, that utter words out of their heart, that speak by experience, and not by rote, of spiritual and divine things.

dad, being a Shuhite, descended from Shuah, one of Abraham's sons by Keturah, Gen. xxv. 2. In this appeal which he makes to history, he has a particular respect to the rewards which the blessings of God secured to the pesterity of faithful Abraham, who hitherto, and long after, continued in such a situation. He refers to the destruction of those eastern people, neighbours to Job, (in whose country they were settled,) for their wickedness; whence he infers, that it is God's usual way to prosper the just, and root out the wicked, though for a while they may flourish. II. He illustrates this truth by some similitudes.

1. The hopes and joys of the hypocrites are here compared to a rush or flag, v. 11. 13. (1.) It grows up out of the mire and water. They can cause not to rise and bring his hope to the face rotten ground or other, out of which to raise it, and with which to support it and keep it alive, any more than the rush can grow without mire. He grounds it on his worldly prosperity, the plausible profession he makes of religion, the good opinion of his neighbours, and his own good conceit of himself, which are no solid foundation on which to build his confidence. It is all but mire and water; and the hope that grows out of it, is but rush and flag. (2.) It may look green and gay for a while, (thus the rush grows the grass,) but it is light, and hollow, and empty, and good for nothing. It is green for show, but of no use. (3.) It withers presently, before any other herb, v. 12. Even while it is in its greeness, it is dried away, and gone in a little time. Note, The best state of hypocrites and evil-doers borders upon withereth; even when it is green, it is going. The grass is cut down, and withers; (Ps. xci. 8.) but the rush is not cut down, and yet withers. It grows up; (Ps. cxix. 6.) as it has no use, so it has no continuance. So are the paths of all that forget God; (v. 13.) they take the same way that the rush does, for the hypocrite's hopes shall perish. Note, (1.) Forgetfulness of God is at the bottom of men's hypocrisy, and of the vain hopes with which they flatter and deceive themselves in their hypocrisy. Men would not be hypocrites, if they did not forget that the God with whom they have to do searches the heart, and requires truth there; that he is a Spirit, and has his eye on our spirits. Hypocrites could have no hope, if they did not forget that God is righteous, and will not be mocked with the torm and the lame. (2.) The hope of hypocrites is a great cheat upon themselves, and though it may flourish a while, it will certainly perish at last, and they with it. 2. They are here compared to a spider's web, or a spider's house, as it is in the margin; a cobweb, v. 14. 15. The hope of the hypocrite, (1.) Is woven out of his own bowels; it is the creature of his own fancy, and arises merely from a conceit of his own merit and sufficiency. There is a great deal of difference between the work of the bee and that of the spider; a diligent Christian, like the laborious bee, fetches in all his comfort from the heavenly dew of God's word; but the hypocrite, like the subtle spider, weaves his out of a false hypothesis of his own worth, and from the flattery of God, and the great deals of confidence which he has in himself. (2.) He is very fond of it, as the spider of her web; pleases himself with it, wraps himself in it, calls it his house, leaves upon it, and holds it fast. It is said of the spider, that she takes hold with her hands, and it is kings' palaces, Prov. xxx. 29. So does a carnal worldling hug himself in the fulness and firmness of his outward prosperity; he prides himself in that house as his palace, and fortiies himself in it as his castle, and can use that as a shelter of his in the day of distress. It is no sooner inscribed on the heart of him that is not inscribed on the heart, and has a mind to prey upon. So does a formal professor; he flatters himself in his own eyes, doubts not of his salvation, is secure of heaven, and cheats the world with his vain confidences. (3.) It will easily and certainly be swept away, as the cob-web with the besom, when God shall come to purge his house.

The prosperity of worldly people will fail them, when they expect to find safety and happiness in it. They seek to hold fast their estates, but God is plucking them out of their hands; and whose shall those things be which they have provided? or what the better will they be for them? The confidences of hypocrites will fail them; I tell you, I know you not. The house built on the sand will fall in the storm, when the builder most needs it, and had promised himself the benefit of it. When a wicked man dies, his expectation perisheth. The ground of his hope will prove false; he will be disappointed of that which he hoped for, in his foolish hope, with which he buoyed himself up, will be turned into endless despair; and thus his hope will be cut off, his web, that refuge of lies, swept away, and he crushed in it.

3. They are here compared to a flourishing and well-rooted tree, which, though it do not wither of itself, yet will easily be cut down, and its place know it no more. The secure and prosperous sinner may think himself wronged when he is compared to a rush and a flag, he thinks he has a better root; "We will allow him his conceit," (says Bildad,) "and give him all the advantage he can desire, and yet bring him in suddenly cut off." He is here represented, as Nebuchadnezzar was in his own dream, (Dan. iv. 10.) by a great tree. (1.) See this tree fair and flourishing, (v. 16.) like a green bay-tree, (Ps. xxxvii. 35.) green before the sun, that keeps its greenness in defiance of the scorching sun-beams, and its branch shoots forth under the protection of his garden-wall, and with the benefit of his garden-soil: see it fixed, and taking deep root, never likely to be overthrown by stormy winds, for his roots are interwoven with the stones; (v. 17.) it grows in firm ground, not as the rush, in mire and water. Thus does a wicked man, when he prospers in the world, think himself secure; his wealth is a high wall in his own conceit.

(2.) See this tree fallen and forgotten notwithstanding; destroyed from his place, (v. 18.) and so entirely extirpated, that there shall remain no sign or token where it grew; the very place shall say, I have not seen thee; and the standers by shall say the same, I sought him, but he could not be found, Ps. xxxvii. 36. He made a great show and a great noise for a time, but he is gone of a sudden, and neither root nor branch left him, Mal. iv. 1. This is the joy, that is, this is the end and conclusion of the sinner's ways, the utmost reach of his hopes and thoughts, with his joy comes to—The way of the ungodly shall perish, Ps. i. 6. His hope, he thought, would, in the issue, be turned into joy, but this is the issue, this is the joy, The harvest shall be heap in the day of grief and of desolater sorrow, Isa. xv. 11. This is the best of it; and what then is the worst of it? But shall he not leave a family behind him to enjoy what he has? No, out of the earth, (not out of heaven,) shall he bring it to the grave; that are nothing akin to him, and shall fill up his place, and rule over that for which he laboured. Others, namely, of the same spirit and disposition, shall grow up in his place, and be as secure as ever he was, not warned by his fall. The way of wordslings is their folly, and yet there is a race of them that approve their sayings, Ps. lxxxix. 13.

20. Behold, God will not cast away a perfect man, neither will he help the evil-doers; 21. Till he fill thy mouth with laughing, and thy lips with rejoicing. 22. They that hate thee shall be clothed with shame; and the dwelling-place of the wicked shall come to nought.

Bildad here, in the close of his discourse, sums up what he had to say, in a few words, setting before Job life and death, the blessing and the curse; envying one another, that as he was, so he should fare, and therefore they might conclude, that as he fared, so he was.

1. On the other hand, if he were a perfect upright man, God would not cast him away, v. 20. Though now he seemed forsaken of God, he would yet return to him, and, by degrees, would turn his mourning into dancing, (Ps. xxx. 11.) and comforts shoidd flow in upon him so plentifully, that his mouth should be filled with laughing, v. 21. So affecting should the tempter be, Ps. cxv. 2. They that loved him, would rejoice with him, but they that hated him, and had triumphed in his fall, would be ashamed of their insolence, when they see him restored to his former prosperity. God will not cast away an upright man; he may be cast down for a time, but he shall not be cast away for ever; it is true, that, if not in this world, yet in another, the mouth of the righteous shall be filled with rejoicing, though their sun should sit under a cloud, yet it shall rise again again, never more to be clouded; though they go mourning to the grave, that shall not hinder their entrance into the joy of their Lord. It is true, that the enemies of the saints will be clothed with shame, when they see them crowned with honour. But it does not there fore follow, that, if Job were not perfectly restored to his former prosperity, he forfeited the character of a perfect man.

2. On the other hand, if he were a wicked man and an evil doer, God would not help him, but leave him to perish in his present distresses; (v. 20.) and his dwelling-place should come to naught, 22. And here, also, it is true that God will not help the evil-doers; they throw themselves out of his protection, and forfeit his favour; he will not take the ungodly by the hand, so it is in the margin, will not have fellowship and communion with them; for what communion between light and darkness? He will not lend them his hand to pull them out of the miscarries, the eternal miscarries, into which they have plunged themselves; they will then stretch out their hand to him for help, but it is too late, he will not take them by the hand: Between us and you there is a great gulf fixed. It is true, that the dwelling-place of the wicked, sooner or later, will come to naught. Those only who make God their dwelling-place, are safe for ever, Ps. xc. 1.—sc. 1. They who make other things their refuge, will be disappointed. Sin brings ruin on persons and families. Yet to argue, (as Bildad, I doubt, silly does,) that because Job's family was sunk, and he himself, at present, seemed helpless, therefore he certainly was an ungodly wicked man, was neither just nor charitable, as long as there appeared no other evidence of his wickedness and ungodliness. Let us judge nothing before the time, but wait till the secret of all hearts shall be made manifest; and the present difficulty of Providence be solved, to universal and everlasting satisfaction, when the mystery of God shall be finished.

CHAP. IX.

In this, and the following chapter, we have Job's answer to Bildad's discourse, wherein he speaks honourably of God, humbly of himself, and feelingly of his troubles; but not one word by way of reflection upon his friends, or their unkindness to him, nor in direct reply to what Bildad had said. He seems desirous, as it were, to keep to the merits of the cause, and makes no remarks upon the person that managed it, nor seeks occasion against him. In this chapter, we have, I. The doctrine of God's justice laid down, v. 2. II. The proof of it, from his wisdom, power, and sovereign dominion, v. 3... 11. III. The application of it, in which, 1. He condemns himself, as not able to contend with God, either in law or battle, v. 14. 21. 2. He maintains his point, that we cannot judge of man's character by their outward condition, v. 22. 24. 3. He complains of the greatness of his troubles, the confusion he was in, and the loss he was at what to say or do, v. 25. 33.

1. THEN Job answered and said, 2. I know it is so of a truth: but how should man be just with God? 3. If he will contend with him, he cannot answer him one of a thousand. 4. He is wise in heart, and mighty in strength: who hath hardened himself against him, and hath prospered! 5. Which removeth the mountains, and they know not; which overturneth them in his anger; 6. Which shakest the earth out of her place, and the pillars thereof tremble; 7. Which commandeth the sun, and it riseth not, and sealeth up the stars; 8. Which alone spreadeth out the heavens, and treadeth upon the waves of the sea; 9. Which maketh Arcturus, Orion, and Pleiades, and the chambers of the south; 10. Which doeth great things past finding out, yea, and wonders without number. 11. Lo, he goeth by me, and I see him not; he passeth on also, but I perceive him not. 12. Behold, he taketh away, who can hinder him? Who will say unto him, What dost thou? 13. If God will not withdraw his anger, the proud helpers do stoo under him.

Bildad began with a rebuke to Job for talking so much, ch. viii. 2. Job makes no answer to that, though it had been easy enough to retort it upon himself; but what he next lays down as his principle, that God never perverts judgment, Job agrees with him in, I know it is so of a truth, v. 2. Note. We should be ready to own how far we agree with those with whom we dispute, and we should not slight, much less resist, a truth, though produced by another, and urged against us, but receive it in the light and love of it, though it have been misapplied. "It is so of a truth, that wickedness brings men to ruin, and the gods are taken under God's special protection. These are truths which I subscribe to; but how can any man make good his part with God?" In his sight shall no flesh living be justified, Ps. cxliii. 2. How should man be just with God? Some understand this as a passionate complaint of God's anger against his threatenings, and man's inability to come up to the standards of God's holiness. It is in the greatest ness of that can be, to think to contend with a God of infinite wisdom and power, who knows every thing, and can do every thing; who can be neither outwitted nor overpowered. The Devil promised himself that Job, in the day of his affliction, would curse God, and speak ill of him, but, instead of that, he sets himself to honour God, and to speak highly of him. As much pained as he is, and as much taken up with his own miseries, when he has occasion to reflect on the wisdom and power of God, he forgets his complaints, dwells with delight, and exults with a flood of eloquence, upon that noble useful subject. Evidences of the wisdom and power of God he fethes, 1. From the kingdom of nature, in which the God of nature acts with an uncontrolled power, and does what he pleases; for all the orders and all the powers of nature are derived from him, and depend upon him.

1. In dispute; (v. 3.) If he will contend with him, either at law or at an argument, he cannot answer him one of a thousand. (1.) God can ask a thousand puzzling questions, which those that quarrel with him, and arraign his proceedings, cannot give an answer to. When God spake to Job out of the whirlwind, he asked him a great many questions; Dost thou know this? Canst thou do that? To none of which Job could give an answer, ch. xxxvii. and xxxix. God can easily manifest the folly of the greatest pretenders to wisdom. (2.) God can lay to our charge a thousand offences, can draw up against us a thousand articles of impeachment, and we cannot answer him so as to acquit ourselves of the imputation of any of them, but must, by silence, give consent that they are true; we cannot set aside one as foreign, another as frivolous, and another as false; we cannot, as to one, deny the fact, and plead not guilty, and, as to another, deny the fault, confess, and justify; no, we are not able to answer him, but must lay our hand upon our mouth, as Job did, (ch. xl. 4, 5,) and cry, Guilty, Guilty.

2. In combat; (v. 4.) Who hath hardened himself against him, and hath prospered? The answer is very easy; You cannot produce any instance, from the beginning of the world to this day, of any daring sinner, who has hardened himself against God, has obstinately persisted in rebellion against him, who did not find God too hard for him, and pay dear for his folly. They have not prospered or had peace; they have had no comfort in it nor success. What did ever man get by trials of skill, or trials of titles, with his Maker? All the opposition given to God, Our cutting briars and thorns before a consuming fire; so foolish, so fruitless, so destructive, is the attempt, Isa. xxxvii. 4. 1 Cor. x. 22. Apostate angels hardened themselves against God, but did not prosper, 2 Pet. ii. 4. The dragon fights, but is cast out, Rev. xii. 8. Wicked men harden themselves against God, dispute his wisdom, disobey his laws, are impatient for their sins, and incorrigible, under their afflictions; they reject the offers of his grace, and resist the stirrings of his Spirit; they make a show of wisdom in their threatenings, and resist him against his interest in the world; but have they prospered? Can they prosper? No, they are but treasuring up for themselves wrath against the day of wrath. That they roll this stone, will find it return upon them.

II. He proves it by showing what a God he is, with whom we have to do: He is wise in heart, and therefore we cannot answer him at law; he is mighty in strength, and therefore we cannot fight it out with him. He is beyond the reach of man's fineness that can be, to think to contend with a God of infinite wisdom and power, who knows every thing, and can do every thing; who can be neither outwitted nor overpowered. The Devil promised himself that Job, in the day of his affliction, would curse God, and speak ill of him, but, instead of that, he sets himself to honour God, and to speak highly of him. As much pained as he is, and as much taken up with his own miseries, when he has occasion to reflect on the wisdom and power of God, he forgets his complaints, dwells with delight, and exults with a flood of eloquence, upon that noble useful subject. Evidences of the wisdom and power of God he fethes, 1. From the kingdom of nature, in which the God of nature acts with an uncontrolled power, and does what he pleases; for all the orders and all the powers of nature are derived from him, and depend upon him.

1. When he pleases, he alters the course of nature, and turns back its streams, v. 5. 7. By the common law of nature, the mountains are settled, and are therefore called everlasting mountains; the earth is established, and cannot be removed, (Ps. xciii. 1.) and the pillars thereof are immovably fixed, the sun rises in its season, and the stars shine their influences on this lower world; but, when God pleases, he can not only drive out the common track, but invert the order, and change the law, of nature. [1.] Nothing more firm than the mountains: when we speak of removing mountains, we mean that which is impossible; yet the divine power can make them change their seat; he removes them, and they know not; removes them whether they will or no; he can make them lower their heads; he can level them, and overturn them in his anger; he can spread the mountains as easily as the husbandman spreads the mole-hills, be they ever so high, and large, and rocky. Men have much ado to pass over them; but God, when he pleases, can make them pass away. He made Shinar shake, Ps. lxxviii. 8. The hills skipped, Ps. civ. 4. The everlasting mountains were moved, Hab. iii. 6.

[2.] Nothing more fixed than the earth on its axle-tree; yet God can, when he pleases, shake that out of its place,heave it off its centre, and make even its pillars to tremble: what seemed to support it, will itself need support, when God gives it a shock. See how much we are indebted to God's patience; God has power enough to shake the earth from under that guilty race of mankind, which makes it green under the burthen of sin; yet he spares them, Acts xxvii. 6. [3.] Nothing more constant than the rising sun, it never misses its appointed time; yet God, when he pleases, can suspend it. He that at first commanded it to rise, can countermand it. Once the sun was bid to stand, and another time to retreat, to show that it is still under the check of its great Creator. Thus great is God's power and how great then is his goodness; which causes his sun to shine even upon the evil and unthankful, though he could withhold it! He that made the stars also, can, if he pleases, seal them up, and hide them from our eyes. By earth- quakes, and subterraneous fires, mountains have sometimes been removed, and the earth shaken: in very dark and cloudy days and nights, it seems to us as if the sun were forbidden to rise, and the stars were scaled up, Acts xxvii. 20. It is sufficient to say, that Job here speaks of what God can do; but if we must understand it of what he has done in fact, all these verses may perhaps be applied to Noah's flood, when the mountains of the earth were shaken, and the sun and stars were darkened. The world that now is, we believe to be reserved for that fire which will consume the mountains, and melt the earth with its fervent heat, and which will turn the sun into darkness.

(2.) As long as he pleases, he preserves the settled course and order of nature; and this is a continued creation. He himself alone, by his own power, and without the assistance of any other, [1.] Spreads out the heaven; (v. 8.) not only did spread them out at first, but still spreads them out, that is, keeps them spread out; for otherwise they would of themselves roll together like a scroll of parchment. [2.] He treads upon the waves of the sea; that is, he suppresses them and keeps them under, that they return not upon the earth; (v. 9.) which is given as a reason why we should all fear God, and stand in awe of him, Jer. v. 22. He is mightier than the proud waves, Ps. xciii. 4—lxv. 7. [3.] He makes the constellations; three are named for all the rest, (v. 9.) Arcturus, Orion, and Pleiades, and, in general, the chambers of the south; the stars of which these are composed, he made at first, and put into that order, and he still makes them, preserves them, and guides their motions; and he makes them to be what they are to man, and inclines the hearts of men to observe them, which the beasts are not capable of doing. Not only those stars which we see and give names to, but those also in the other hemisphere, about the antarctic pole, which never come in our sight, called here the chambers of the south, are under the divine direction and dominion. How wise is he then, and how mighty!

2. Evidences are here fetched from the kingdom of Providence, that special Providence, which is conversant about the affairs of the children of men. Consider what God does in the government of the world, and you will say, He is wise in heart, and mighty in strength.

(1.) He does many things and great, many and great to admiration, v. 10. Job here says the same that Eliphaz had said; (ch. v. 9.) and, in the original, in the very same words, not declining to speak after him, though now his antagonist. God is a great and excellentитель, Acts x. 12. His works of wonders are so many that we cannot number them, and so mysterious that we cannot find them out. O the depth of his counsels!

(2.) He acts invisibly and undiscerned, v. 11. He goes by me in his operations, and I see him not, I perceive him not; his way is in the sea, Ps. lxxvii. 19. The operations of second causes are commonly obvious to sense, but God doeth all about us, and we see not his works; Acts xxvi. 22. Our finite understandings cannot fathom his counsels, apprehend his motions, or comprehend the measures he takes. We are therefore incompetent judges of God's proceedings, because we know not what he doeth, or what he designeth. The arcana imperii—secrets of government, are things above us, which therefore we must not pretend to expound, or comment upon.

(3.) He acts with an uncontestable sovereignty, v. 12. He takes away our creature-comforts and confidences, when and as he pleases, takes away health, estate, relations, friends, takes away life itself; whatever goes, it is he that takes it; by what hand seer it is removed, his hand must be acknowledged in it; the Lord takes away, and who can hinder him? Who can turn him away? Marg. Who shall make him restore? So some. Who can dissuade him, or alter his counsels? Who can resist him, or oppose his operations? Who can control him, or call him to an account for it? What action can be brought against him? Or who will say unto him, What dost thou? Or, Why dost thou so? Dn. iv. 35. God is not obliged to give us a reason of what he doeth. The meaning of his proceedings we know not now; it will be time enough to know hereafter, when it will appear that what seemed now to be done by prerogative, was done in infinite wisdom, and for the best.

(4.) He acts with an irresistible power, which no creature can resist, v. 13. If God will not withdraw his anger, (which he can do when he pleases, for he is Lord of his anger, lets it out, or calls it in, according to his will,) the proud helpers do stoop under him; that is, He certainly breaks and crushes those that proudly help one another against him; proud men set themselves against God and his proceedings; in this opposition they join hand in hand. The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together, to throw off his yoke, to run down his truths, and to persecute his people. Men of Israel, help, Acts xxi. 28. Ps. lxiii. 8. If one enemy of God's kingdom fall under his judgment, the rest come proudly to help that, and think to deliver that out of his hand: but in vain; unless he pleases to withdraw his anger, (which he often does, for it is the day of his patience,) the proud helpers stoop under him, and fall with those whom they designed to help. Who knows the power of God's anger? Who is able to contend against him? Who is it that is able against his might? Who resists him, and prevails? He rules the sea, Ps. xlv. 9. He makes peace among the nations, Ps. lxxvi. 8.

14. How much less shall I answer him, and choose out my words to reason with him? 15. Whom, though I were righteous, yet would I not answer, but I would make supplication to my Judge. 16. If I had called, and he had answered me: yet would I not believe that he had hearkened unto my voice. 17. For he breaketh me with a tempest, and multiplieth my wounds without cause. 18. He will not suffer me to take my breath, but filleth me with bitterness. 19. If I speak of strength, lo, he is strong: and if of judgment, who shall set me a time to plead? 20. If I justify myself, mine own mouth shall condemn me: if I say, I am perfect, it shall also prove me perverse. 21. Though I were perfect, yet would I not know my soul: I would despise my life.

What Job had said of man's utter inability to contend with God, he here applies to himself, and, in effect, despair of gaining his favour; which (some think) arises from the hard thoughts he had of God, as one who, having set himself against him, righteously would, would be too hard for him. I rather think it arises from the sense he had of the imperfection of his own righteousness, and the dark and cloudy apprehensions which, at present, he had of God's displeasure against him.

I. He dares not dispute with God; (v. 14.) "If the proud helpers do stoop under him, how much less shall I, a poor weak creature, (so far from being a helper, that I am very helpless,) how shall I answer him? If I go about to reason with him, he will certainly be too hard for me." If the potter make the clay into a vessel of dishonour, or break in pieces the vessel he has made, shall the clay or the broken vessel reason with him? So absurd is the man who replies against God, or thinks to talk it out with him. No, let all flesh be silent before him.

II. He dares not insist upon his own justification before God. Though he vindicates his own integrity, he would not yield that he was a hypocrite and a wicked man, as they suggested, yet he would never plead it as his righteousness before God. I will never venture upon the covenant of innocency, nor think to come off by virtue of that.

Job knew so much of God, and knew so much of himself, that he durst not insist upon his own justification before God.

1. He knew so much of God, that he durst not stand a trial with him, v. 15. 19. He knew how to make his part good with his friends, and thought himself able to deal with them; but, though his cause had been better than it was, he knew it was to no purpose to debate it with God. (1.) God knew him better than he knew himself; and therefore, (v. 15.) "Though I were righteous in my own apprehension, and my own heart did not condemn me, yet God is greater than my heart, and knows those secret faults and errors of mine which I do not, and cannot understand, and is able to charge me with them, and therefore I will not answer." St. Paul speaks to the same purport; I know nothing by myself, am not conscious to myself of any reigning wickedness, and yet I am not hereby justified, 1 Cor. iv. 4. "I dare not put myself upon that issue, lest God charge that upon me which I did not discover in myself." Job will therefore waive that plea, and make supplication to his Judge; that is, will cast himself upon God's mercy, and not think to come off by his own merit.

16. "If I had called, and he had answered, had given the thing I called to him for, yet, so weak and defective are my best prayers, that I would not believe he had therein hearkened to my voice; I could not say that he had saved with his right hand, and answered me," (Ps. ix. 5.) "but that he did it purely for his own name's sake." Bishop Patrick expounds it thus; If I had made supplication, and he had graced my desire, I would not think my prayer had done the business. Not for your sakes be it known to you.

(3.) His present miseries, which God had brought him into, notwithstanding his integrity, gave him too sensible a conviction, that, in the ordering and disposing of men's outward condition in this world, God acts by sovereignty, and though he never doth wrong to any, yet he doth not ever give full light to all; that is, the best do not always fare best, nor the wicked always worst. In every case, it serves the full and exact distribution of rewards and punishments for the future state. Job was not conscious to himself of any extraordinary guilt, and yet fell under extraordinary afflictions, v. 17, 18. Every man must expect the wind to blow upon him, and ruffle him, but Job was broken with a tempest; every man, in the midst of these thorns and briers, must expect to be scratched, but Job was wounded, and his wounds multiplied. Every man must expect a cross daily, and to taste sometimes of the bitter cup; but poor Job's troubles came so thick upon him, that he had no breathing time, he was filled with bitterness; and he presumes to say that all this was without cause, without any great provocation given. We have made the best of what Job said hitherto, though contrary to the judgment of many good interpreters; but here, no doubt, he spoke unadvisedly with his lips; he reflected on God's goodness, in saying that he was not suffered to take his breath, while yet he had such good use of his reason and speech to be able to talk thus; and on his justice, in saying that it was without cause. Yet it is true, that, as, on the one hand, there are many who are chargeable with more sin than the common infirmities of the human nature, and yet feel no more sorrow than that of the common calamities of human life; so, on the other hand, there are many who feel more than the common calamities of human life, and yet are conscious to themselves of no more than the common infirmities of human nature.

(4.) He was in no capacity at all to make his part good with God, v. 19. [1.] Not by force of arms; "I dare not enter the lists of the Almighty; for, if I speak of strength, and think to come off by that, lo, he is strong; stronger than I, and will certainly overpower me. There is no more room for dispute with him, than for commands legions much less with him that his legions of angels at command. Can thine heart endure, (thy courage and presence of mind,) or can thine hands be strong to defend thyself, in the days that I shall deal with thee? Ezek. xxii. 14. [2.] Not by force of arguments: "I dare not try the merits of the cause; if I speak of judgment, and insist upon my right, who will set me a time to plead? Power to plead is not for me, for, if there may appeal, no superior court to appoint a hearing of the cause, for He is supreme, and from Him every man's judgment proceeds, which he must abide by." 2. He knew so much of himself, that he durst not stand a trial, v. 20, 21. "If I go about to justify myself, and to plead righteousness of my own, my Let this reconcile God's children to their troubles; they are but trials, designed for their honour and benefit; and, if God be pleased with them, it will not then be displeased; if he laugh at the trial of the innocent, knowing how glorious the issue of it will be, at destruction and famine let them also laugh, (ch. v. 22.) and triumph over them, saying, O death, where is thy sting!

On the other hand, the wicked are so far from being made the marks of God's judgments, that the earth is given into their hand, v. 24. They enjoy large possessions and great power, have what they will, and do what they will. Into the hand of the wicked one: in the original, it is singular; the Devil, that wicked one, is called the god of this world, and boasts that into his hands it is delivered, Luke iv. 6. Or, into the hand of a wicked man, meaning, (as Bishop Patrick and the Assembly's Annotations conjecture) some noted tyrant then living in those parts, whose great wickedness and great prosperity were well known both to Job and his friends. The wicked have the earth given them, but the righteous have heaven given them; and which is better— without heaven, or earth without heaven? God, in his providence, advances wicked men, while he covers the faces of those who are fit to be judges, who are wise and good, and qualified for government, and buries them alive in obscurity; perhaps suffers them to be run down and condemned, and to have their faces covered as criminals, by those wicked ones into whose hand the earth is given. We daily see this is done; if it be not God that doeth it, where and who is he that doeth it? To whom can it be ascribed but to Him that rules in the kingdoms of men, and gives them to whom he will? Dan. iv. 32.

2. Yet it must be owned that there is too much passion in what Job here says. The manner of expression is peevish; when he meant that God afflicts, he ought not to have said, He destroys both the perfect and the wicked: when he meant that God pleases himself with the trial of the innocent, he ought not to have said, He laughs at it, for he doth not afflict willingly. When the spirit is heated, either with dispute or with discontent, we have need to set a watch before the door of our lips, that we may observe decorum in speaking of divine things.

25. Now my days are swifter than a post: they flee away, they see no good. 26. They are passed away as the swift ships; as the eagle that hasteth to the prey. 27. If I say, I will forget my complaint, I will leave off my heaviness, and comfort myself; 28. I am afraid of all my sorrows, I know that thou wilt not hold me innocent. 29. If I be wicked, why then labour I in vain? 30. If I wash myself with snow-water, and make my hands never so clean; 31. Yet shalt thou plunge me in the ditch, and mine own clothes shall abhor me. 32. For he is not a man, as I am, that I should answer him, and we should come together in judgment. 33. Neither is there any days-man betwixt us, that might lay his hand upon us both. 34. Let him take his rod away from me, and let not his fear terrify me; 35. Then would I speak, and not fear him: but it is not so with me.

Job here grows more and more querulous, and does not conclude this chapter with such awful expressions of God's wisdom and justice as he began with. The thing indulges a complaining humour, kinder to what indecencies, nay to what impurities, it will hurl them. The beginning of that strife with God is as the letting forth of water; therefore leave it off, before it be meddled with. When we are in trouble, we are allowed to complain to God, as the Psalmist, often, but must by no means complain of God, as Job here.

I. His complaint here of the passing away of the days of his prosperity is proper; (v. 23, 26.) "My days, that is, all my days, are ready to be cut off, never to return; gone of a sudden, gone ere I was aware: never did any courier that went express," (like Cush and Ahimaaz, "with good tidings, make such haste as all my comforts did from me; never did ship sail to its port, never did eagle fly upon his prey, with such incredible swiftness; nor does there remain any traces of my prosperity, any more than there does of an eagle in the air, or a shift in the sea," Prov. xxx. 19. See here, 1. How swift the march of time is; it is always upon the wing, hastening to its period; it stays for no man. What little need have we of pastimes, and what great need to redeem time, when time runs out, runs on so fast towards eternity, which comes as time goes! 2. How vain the enjoyments of time are, which we may be quite deprived of while yet time continues! Our day may be longer than the sun-shine of our prosperity; and when that is gone, it is as if it had not been. The remembrance of having done our duty will be pleasing afterward; so will not the remembrance of our having got a great deal of worldly wealth, when it is all lost and gone. They flee away, past recall; they see no good, and leave none behind them.

II. His complaint of his present uneasiness is excusable, v. 27, 28. 1. It should seem he did his endeavour to quiet and compose himself, as his friends advised him. That was the good he would do: he would fain forget his complaints against God, would leave off his heaviness and comfort himself, that he might be fit for converse both with God and man; but, 2. He found he could not do it; "I am afraid of all my sorrow: when I strive most against my trouble, it prevails most over me, and proves too hard for me!" It is easier, in such a case, to know what we should do than to do it; to know what temper we should be in to get into that temper, and keep in that temper, and patience to those that are in trouble, and to tell them they must forget their complaints, and comfort themselves; but it is not so soon done as said. Fear and sorrow are tyrannizing things, not easily brought into the subjection they ought to be kept in to religion and right reason.

III. But his complaint of God, as implacable and inexorable, was by no means to be excused. It was the language of his corruption. He denies nothing, and, at other times, would have been far from harbouring any such hard thoughts of God as now broke in upon his spirit, and broke out in these passionate complaints. Good men do not always speak like themselves; but God considers their frame, and the strength of their temptations; gives them leave afterward to unsay it by repentance, and will not lay it to their charge.

Job seems to speak here as he was afraid of obtaining from God any relief or redress of his grievances, though he should produce ever so good proofs of his integrity; "I know thou wilt not hold me innocent; my afflictions have continued so long upon me, and increased so fast, that I do not expect thou wilt ever clear up my innocency by delivering me out of them, and restoring me to a prosperous condition. Right or wrong, I must be treated as a wicked man; my friends will continue to think so of me, and God will do the same to himself, though I have never occasion to think so; why then do I labour in vain to clear myself, and maintain my own integrity?" v. 29. It is no purpose to speak in a cause that is already pre-judged. With men it is often labour in vain for the most innocent to go about to clear themselves; they must be adjudged guilty, though the evidence be ever so plain for them: but it is not so in our dealings with God, who is the Patron of oppressed innocency, and to whom it was never in vain to commit a righteous cause.

Nay, he not only desairs of relief, but expects that his endeavour to clear himself would render him yet more obnoxious; (v. 30, 31.) "If I wash myself with snow-water, and make my integrity ever so evident, it will be all to no purpose, judgment must go against me, thou shalt flunge me in the ditch," (the pit of destruction, so some, or rather the filthy kennel, or sewer,) "which will make me so offensive in the nostrils of all about me, that my own clothes shall abhor me, and I shall even loathe to touch myself." He saw his afflictions coming from God, those were the things that blackened him in the eye of his friends, and, upon that score, he complained of them, and of the continuance of them, as the ruin, not only of his comfort, but of his reputation. Yet these words are capable of a good construction. If we be ever so industrious to justify ourselves before men, and to preserve our credit with them, if we keep our hands so ever clean from the pollutions of gross sin, which fall under the eye of the world; yet God, who knows our hearts, can charge us with so much secret sin as will for ever take off all our pretensions to purity and innocency, and make us see ourselves odious in the sight of the holy God. Paul, while a Pharisee, made his hands very clean; but when the commandment came, and discovered to him his heart, made him know lust, that flung him in the ditch.

2. As if he despaired to have so much as a fair hearing with God, and that were hard indeed.

(1.) He complains that he was not upon even terms with God; (v. 32.) "He is not a man, as I am. I could venture to dispute with a man like myself, (the potsherds may strive with the potsherds of the earth,) but he is infinitely above me, and therefore I dare not enter the lists with him, I shall certainly be confounded by him; God is not a man as we are. Of the greatest princes we may say, "They are men as we are," but not of the great God. His thoughts and ways are infinitely above ours, and we must not measure him by ourselves. Man is foolish and weak, frail and fickle, but God is not. We are depending, dying, creatures; he the independent and immortal Creator; [2.] The consideration of this should keep us very humble, and cause us to refer the matter.

(2.) That there was no arbitrator or umpire to adjust the differences between him and God, and to determine the controversy; (v. 33.) Neither is there any dayman. This complaint that there was not, is, in effect, a wish that there were, and so the LXX read it; O that there were a mediator between us, an umpire between God and man. But no creature was capable of being a referee, and therefore he must even refer it still to God himself, and resolve to acquiesce in his judgment. Our Lord Jesus is the blessed Dayman, who has mediated between Heaven and earth, has laid his hand upon us both; to him the Father has committed all judgment, and we must: but this matter was not then brought to so clear a light as it is now by the gespel, which leaves no room for such a complaint as this.

(3.) That the terrors of God, which set themselves in array against him, put him into such confusion, that he knew not how to address himself to God with the confidence with which he was formerly wont to approach him; (v. 34, 35.) “Beside the distance which I am kept at by his infinite transcendency, his present dealings with me are very discouraging. Let him take his rod away from me;” he means not so much his outward afflictions, as the lead which lay upon his spirit from the apprehensions of God’s wrath; that was his fear which terrified him; “Let that be removed, let me recover the sight of his mercy, and not be surprised with the sight of nothing but his terrors, and then I would speak, and order my cause before him. But it is not so with me, the cloud does not at all scatter, the wrath of God still fastens upon me, and preys on my spirits, as much as ever; and what to do I know not.”

From all this let us take occasion, [1.] To stand in awe of God, and to fear the power of his wrath. If good men have been put into such consternation by it, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear? [2.] To pity those that are wounded in spirit, and pray earnestly for them, because in that condition they know not how to pray for themselves. [3.] Carefully to keep up good thoughts of God in our minds, for hard thoughts of him are the inlets of much mischief. [4.] To bless God that we are not in such a disconsolate condition as poor Job was here in, but that we walk in the light of the Lord; let us rejoice therein, but rejoice with trembling.

CHAP. X.

Job owns here that he was full of confusion; (v. 15.) and as he was, so was his discourse: he knew not what to say, and perhaps sometimes scarcely knew what he said. In this chapter, I. He complains of the hardships he was under; (v. 1. 7.) and then comforts himself with this, that he was in the hand of the God that made him, and pleads that, v. 8., 13. II. He complains again of the severity of God’s dealings with him, (v. 14., 17.) and then comforts himself with this, that death would put an end to his troubles, v. 18., 22.

1. My soul is weary of my life: I will leave my complaint upon myself; I will speak in the bitterness of my soul. 2. I will say unto God, Do not condemn me; show me wherefore thou contendest with me. 3. Is it good unto thee that thou shouldest oppress, that thou shouldest despise the work of thy hands, and shine upon the counsel of the wicked? 4. Hast thou eyes of flesh? or seest thou as man seeth? 5. Are thy days as the days of man? are thy years as man’s days? 6. That thou inquirest after mine iniquity, and searchest after my sin? 7. Thou knowest that I am not wicked; and there is none that can deliver out of thy hand.

I. A passionate resolution to persist in his complaint, v. 1. Being daunted with the dread of God’s majesty, so that he could not plead his cause with him, he resolves, to give himself some case by giving vent to his sentiments. He begins with vehement language, “My soul is weary of my life, weary of this body, and impatient to get clear of it, fallen out with life, and displeased at it, sick of it, and longing for death.” Through the weakness of grace, he went contrary to the dictates even of nature itself. We should act more like men, did we act more like saints: faith and patience would keep us from being weary of our lives, (and cruel to them, as some read it,) even then when Providence has made the time of our days so short; for that is to be weary of God’s correction. Job, thinking of his life, and having ease no other way, resolves to complain, resolves to speak: he will not give vent to his soul by violent hands, but he will give vent to the bitterness of his soul by violent words. Losers think they may have leave to speak; and unbridled passions, as well as unbridled appetites, are apt to think it an excuse for their excursions, that they cannot know what we have wisdom and grace for, but to keep the mouth shut. Job’s correction speaks here, yet grace puts in a word: 1. He will complain, but he will leave his complaint upon himself: he would not impeach God, nor charge him with unrighteousness or unkindness; but, though he knew not particularly the ground of God’s controversy with him, and the cause of action, yet, in the general, he would suppose it to be in himself, and willingly bear all the blame. 2. He will speak, but he will not, in the character of his soul, that he will express, not his settled judgment. If I speak amiss, it is not I, but sin that dwells in me, not my soul, but its bitterness.

II. A humble petition to God. He will speak, but the first word shall be a prayer, and, as I am willing to understand it, it is a good prayer, v. 2. 1. That he might be delivered from the sting of his afflictions, which is sin; “Do not condemn me, do not separate me for ever from thee. Though I lie under the cross, let me not lie under the curse, though I smart by the rod of a Father, let me not be cut off by the sword of a Judge. Thou dost correct me, I will bear that as well as I can, but O do not condemn me!” It is the comfort of those who are in Christ Jesus, that, though they are in affliction, there is no condemnation to them, Rom. viii. 1. Nay, they are chastened of the Lord, that they may not be condemned with the world, 1 Cor. xi. 32. This, therefore, we should deprecate above all things the, when we are in affliction; “However thou art pleased to deal with me, Lord, do not condemn me; my friends condemn me, but do not thou.” 2. That he might be made acquainted with the true cause of his afflictions, and that is sin too; Lord, show me wherefore thou contendest with me. When God afflicts us, he contends with us; when he contends with us, there is always a reason. He is never angry without a cause, though we are, and it is desirable to know what the reason is, that we may repent of, m. r. ti, and forsake, the sin for which God has a controversy with us: in inquiring it out, let conscience have leave to do its office, and to deal faithfully with us, as Gen. xlii. 21.

III. A peevish expostulation with God concerning his dealings with him. Now he speaks in the bitterness of his soul indeed, not without some ill-natured reflections upon the righteousness of his God. He thinks it unbecoming the goodness of God, and the mercifulness of his nature, to deal so hard with his creature, as to lay upon him more than he can bear; (v. 3.) Is it good unto thee that thou shouldest oppress? No, certainly it is not; what he approves not in men, (Lam. iii. 34-36.) he will not do himself. “Lord, in dealing with me, thou seemest to oppress thy subject, to despise thy workmanship, and to contemn thine enemies. Now, God, what is the meaning of this? Such is the case, that this cannot be a pleasure to thee; and such is thy name, that it cannot be an honour to thee; why then dealst thou thus with me? What is the fit there is in my blood?” Far be it from Job to think that God did him wrong, but he is quite at a loss how to reconcile his providences with his justice, as good men have often been, and must wait until the day shall declare it. Let us, therefore, now harbour no hard thoughts of God, because we shall then see there was no cause for them.

2. He thinks it unbecoming the infinite knowledge of God to put a prisoner thus upon the rack, as it were, by torture, to extort a confession from him, v. 4.-6. (1.) He is sure that God does not discover things, nor judge of them, as men do; he has not eyes of flesh, (v. 4.) for he is a Spirit. Eyes of flesh cannot see in the dark, but darkness hides not from God. Eyes of flesh are but in one place at a time, and can see but a little way; but the eyes of the Lord are in every place, and run to and fro through the whole earth.

(2.) According things are hid from eyes of flesh, the most curious and piercing;
there is a path which even the vulture’s eye hath not seen: but nothing is, or can be, hid from the eye of God, to which all things are naked and open. Eyes of flesh see the outward appearance only, and may be imposed upon, a decepito visus—an illusion of the senses; but God sees every thing truly; his sight cannot be deceived, for he tries the heart, and is a Witness to the thoughts and intents of that. Eyes of flesh discover things gradually, and when we go to God for the heart of the matter, we lose the sight of another, but God sees every thing at one view. Eyes of flesh are soon tired, must be closed every night, that they may be refreshed, and will shortly be darkened by age, and shut up by death, but the Keeper of Israel neither slumbers nor sleeps, nor does his sight ever decay. God sees not as man sees;
that is, he does not judge as man judges, at the best secundum aegre et probata—according to what is alleged and proved, as the thing appears, rather than as it is, and too often according to the bias of the affections, passions, prejudices, and interest;
but we are sure that the judgment of God is ac-ording to truth, and that he knows truth, not by information, but by his own inspection. Men discover secret things by search, and examination of witnesses, comparing evidence and giving conjectures upon it, wheedling or forcing the parties concerned to confess. But God needs not any of these ways of discovery, he sees not as man sees. (2.) He is sure that as God is not short-sighted like man, so he is not short-lived; (v. 5.) “Are thy days as the days of man, few and evil? Do they roll on in succession, or are they subject to change, like the days of man? No, by no means.” Men grow wiser by experience, and more knowing by daily observation; with them, truth is the daughter of time, and therefore they must take time for their searches, and, if one experiment fail, must try another; but it is not so with God, to him nothing is past; there is nothing future, but every thing present.
The days of time, by which the life of man is measured, are nothing to the years of eternity, in which the life of God is wrapped up.

(3.) He therefore thinks it strange that God should thus prolong his torture, and continue him under the confinement of this affliction, and neither bring him to a trial, nor grant him a release: as if he must take time to inquire for his search after his sin, v. 6. Not as if Job thought that God did thus torment him, that he might find occasion against him; but his dealings with him had such an aspect, which was dishonourable to God, and would tempt men to think him a hard master. “Now, Lord, if thou wilt not consult my comfort, consult thine own honour; do something for thy great name, and do not disgrace
the throne of thy glory,” Jer. xiv. 21.

3. He thinks it looked like an abuse of his omni-potence, to keep a poor prisoner in custody, whom he knew to be innocent, only because there was none that could deliver him out of his hand; (v. 7.)

Thou knowest that I am not wicked. He had already owned himself a sinner, and guilty before God, but he here stands to it, that he was not wicked, not devoted to sin, not an enemy to God, not a dissembler in his religion, that he had not wickedly departed from his God, Ps. xlvii. 21.
“But there is none that can deliver out of thy hand, and therefore there is no remedy; I must be content to lie there, waiting thy time, and throwing myself on thy mercy, in submission to thy sovereign will.” Here see, (1.) What ought to quiet us under our troubles; that it is to no purpose to contend with Omnipotence. (2.) What will abundantly comfort us, if we are able to appeal to God, as Job
here, “Lord, thou knowest that I am not wicked.
I cannot say that I am not wanting, or I am not weak; but, through grace, I can say, I am not wicked: thou knowest I am not, for thou knowest I love thee.”

8. Thy hands have made me, and fashioned me together round about; yet thou dost destroy me. 9. Remember, I beseech thee, thou hast made me as the clay; and wilt thou bring me into dust again? 10. Hast thou not poured me out as milk, and curdled me like cheese? 11. Thou hast clothed me with skin and flesh, and hast fenced me with bones and sinews. 12.
Thou hast granted me life and favour, and thy visitation hath preserved my spirit. 13.
And these things hast thou hid in thy heart:
I know that this is with thee.

In these verses, we may observe,
1. How Job eyes God as his Creator and Preserver, and describes his dependence upon him as the Author and Upholder of his being. This is one of the first things we are all concerned to know and consider.

(1.) That God made us: he is not our parents, who are only the instruments of his power and providence in our production. He made us, and not we ourselves. His hands have made and fashioned these bodies of ours, and every part of them; (v. 8.)
and they are fearfully and wonderfully made.
The soul also, which animates the body, is his gift.
He takes notice of both here. [1.] The body is made as the clay, (v. 9.) cast into shape, into this shape, as the clay is formed into a vessel, according to the skill and will of the potter.
We are earthen vessels: mean in our original, and soon broken in pieces, made as the clay: let not, therefore, the thing formed say unto him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus? We must not be proud of our bodies, because the matter is from the earth, yet not dishonour our bodies, because the mould and shape are from the Divine Wisdom.
The formation of human bodies in the womb is described by an elegant similitude, (v. 10.) Thou hast fashioned my body out of clay, which, if it were spread into a dish; and by an induction of some particulars, (v. 11.) Though we come into the world naked, yet the body is itself both clothed and armed; the skin and flesh are its clothing; the bones and sinews are its armour, not offensive, but deservative. The vital parts, the heart and lungs, are thus clothed, not to be seen; thus fenced, not to be put.
The admirable structure of human bodies is an illus trious instance of the wisdom, power, and goodness, of the Creator. What pity it is that these bodies should be instruments of unrighteousness, which are capable of being temples of the Holy Ghost! 2. The soul is the life, the soul is the man, and this is the gift of God; Thou hast granted me life, breathed into me the breath of life, without which the body would be but a worthless carcasse. God is the Father of spirits: he made us living souls, and endowed us with the power, endowment, life and breath of life; and thus we are a favour, a great favour, more than meat, more than raiment; a distinguishing favour, a favour that puts us into a capacity of receiving other favour. Now Job was in a better mind than he was when he quarrelled with life as a burthen, and asked, Why did I not from the womb? Or, by life and favour may be meant life and all the comforts of life, referring to his former prosperity. Time was, when he walked in the light of the divine favour, and thought, as David, that through that favour his mountain stood strong.

2. That God maintains us: having lighted the lamp of life, he does not leave it to burn upon its own stock, but continually supplies it with fresh oil; "Thy visitation has preserved my spirit, kept me alive, protected me from the adversaries of life, the death we are in the midst of, and the dangers we are continually exposed to; and blessed me with all the necessary supplies of life, and the daily supplies it needs and craves."

2. How he pleads this with God, and what use he makes of it. He reminds God of it; (v. 9.) Remember, I beseech thee, that thou hast made me. What then?

(1.) Thou hast made me, and therefore thou hast a perfect knowledge of me, (Ps. xxviii. 11-13.) and needest not to examine me by scourging, nor to put me upon the rack for the discovering of what is within me.

(2.) Thou hast made me, as the clay, by an act of sovereignty; and wilt thou, by a like act of sovereignty, unmake me again? If so, I must submit.

(3.) Wilt thou destroy the work of thine own hands? It is a plea the saints have often used in prayer; We are the clay, and thou our potter, Isa. lxiv. 8. Thys hands have made me and fashioned me, Ps. cxvii. 3. So here, Thou madest me; and wilt thou destroy me? longer wilt thou will not destroy me, Wilt thou bring me into dust again? v. 9. Wilt thou not pity me? Wilt thou make me more ashamed, Wilt thou not spare and help me, and stand by the work of thine own hands? Ps. cxxviii. 8. Thou madest me, and knowest my strength; wilt thou then suffer me to be pressed above measure? Was I made to be made miserable? Was I preserved only to endure these calamities? If we plead this with ourselves as an inducement to duty, "God made me and maintains me, and therefore I will serve him and submit to him," we may plead it with God as an argument for mercy, Thou hast made me, new make me; I am thine, save me. Job knew not how to reconcile God's former favours and his present frowns, but concludes, (v. 13.) These things hast thou hid in thine heart; both are according to the counsel of thine own will, and, therefore, undoubtedly consistent, however they seem. When God thus strangely changes his ways, these are answers for it. They are hard to understand, but believe there are good reasons for it hid in his heart, which will be manifested shortly. It is not with us, or in our reach, to assign the cause, but I know that this is with thee. Known unto God are all his works.

14. If I sin, then thou markest me, and thou wilt not acquit me from mine iniquity. 15. If I be wicked, wo unto me; and if I be righteous, yet will I not lift up my head. Vol. iii.—H

I am full of confusion; therefore see thou mine affliction; 16. For it increaseth. Thou huntest me as a fierce lion; and again thou shewest thyself marvellously upon me. 17. Thou renewest thy witnesses against me, and increasest thine indignation upon me. 18. Wherefore then hast thou brought me forth out of the womb? Oh that I had given up the ghost, and no eye had seen me! 19. I should have been as though I had not been; I should have been carried from the womb to the grave. 20. Are not my days few? cease then, and let me alone, that I may take comfort a little, 21. Before I go whence I shall not return, even to the land of darkness and the shadow of death; 22. A land of darkness, as darkness itself: and of the shadow of death, without any order, and where the light is as darkness.

Here we have,

1. Job's passionate complaints. On that harsh and unpleasant string he harps much, in which, though he cannot be justified, he may be excused. He complained not for nothing, as the mourning Israelites, but had cause to complain. If we think it looks ill in him, let it be a warning to us to keep our temper better.

1. He complains of the strictness of God's judgment, and the rigour of his proceedings against him, and is ready to call it Summum jus—Justice bordering on severity. (1.) That he took all ad vantages against him; "If I sin, then thou markest me;" (v. 14.) If I do but take one false step, misplace a word, or cast a look awry, I shall be sure to hear of it. Conscience, thy deputy, will be sure to upbraid me with it, and to tell me, that this gripe, this twitch of pain, is to punish me for that. If God should thus mark iniquities, we are undone; but he does not thus mark them; though we sin, God does not deal in extremity with us. (2.) That he prosecuted those advantages to the utmost; "I will acquit me from mine iniquity. While his troubles continued, he would never take the comfort of his pardon, nor hear that voice of just and gladness; so hard is it to see love in God's heart, when we see frowns in his face, and a rod in his hand. (3.) That, whatever was his character, his case, at present, was very uncomfortable, v. 15. [1.] If he be wicked, he is certainly undone in the other world; If I be wicked, woe to me. Note, A sinful state is a woeful state. This we should each of us believe, as Job here; and apply it to ourselves; "If I be wicked, though prosperous, living in pleasure, yet woe to me." Some especially have reason to dread double woes if they were wicked; "I that have knowledge, that have made a great profession of religion, that have been so often under strong convictions, and have made so many fair promises; I that was born of such good parents, educated with such good education, that have lived in good families, and long enjoyed the means of grace, If I be wicked, woe, and a thousand woes, to me." [2.] If he be righteous, yet he dares not lift up his head; dares not answer as before, ch. ix. 15. He is so oppressed and overwhelmed with his troubles, that he cannot look up with any comfort or confidence. Without were fightings, within were fears; so that, between both, he was full of confusion: not only confusion of face, for the disgrace he was brought down to, and the censures of his friends, but confusion of spirit; his mind was in a constant trouble, and he was almost distracted, Ps. lxxxviii. 15.

2. He complains of the severity of the execution. God (he thought) did not only punish him for every failure, but punish him in a high degree, v. 16, 17. His affliction was, (1.) Grievous, very grievous, marvellous, exceeding marvellous. God hunted him out, as a fierce lion hunts and runs down his prey. God was not only strange to him, but showed himself marvellous upon him, by bringing him into uncommon troubles, and so making him a prodigy, a wonder unto many. All wondered that God would inflict, and that Job could bear, so much. That which made his afflictions most grievous, was, that he felt God's indignation in them; that was it that made them taste so bitter, and lie so heavy. They were God's witnesses against him, tokens of his displeasure; this made the sores of his body wounds in his spirit. (2.) It was growing, still growing, worse and worse. This he insists much upon; when he hoped the tide would turn, and begin to ebb, still it flowed higher and higher. His affliction increased, and God's indignation in the affliction; he found himself no way better; these witnesses were renewed against him, that, if one did not reach to convict him, another might. Changes and war were against him. If there was and as a fierce lion hunts and runs down his prey; still he was kept in a state of war. As long as we are here in this world, we must expect that the clouds will return after the rain, and perhaps the sorest and sharpest trials may be reserved for the last. God was at war with him, and it was a great change. He did not use to be so, which aggravated the trouble, and made it truly marvellous. God usually shows himself kind to his people; if at any time he shows himself otherwise, it is his strange work, his strange act, and he doth in it show himself marvellous.

3. He complains of his life, and that ever he was born to all this trouble and misery; (v. 18, 19.) "If this was designed for my lot, why was I brought out of the womb, and not smothered there, or stifled in the birth?" This was the language of his passion, and it was a relapse into the sin he fell into before. He had just now called life a favour, (v. 12.) yet now he calls it a burden, and quarrels with God, as if God gave it, or used it, to torment him. Mr. Caryl gives this a good turn in favour of Job. "We may charitably suppose," (says he,) "that that which troubled Job was, that he was in a condition of life which (as he conceived) hindered the main end of life, which was the glorifying God. His harp was hung on the willow-trees, and he was quite out of tune for praising God. Nay, he feared lest his troubles should reflect dishonour upon God, and give occasion to his enemies to blaspheme; and, therefore, he wishes, O that I had given up the ghost! A godly man reckons that he lives to no purpose, if he do not live to the praise and glory of God." But, if that had been his meaning, it was grounded on a mistake, for we may glorify the Lord in the fires. But this use we may make of it, not to be over-fond of life, since the case has been such, sometimes, even with wise and good men, that we may be complained of it. Why should we dread giving up our lives, in love to be set on fire for men, since the time may come, when we may be ready to wish we had given up the ghost, and no eye had seen us? Why should we inordinately lament the death of our children in their infancy, that are as if they had not been, and are carried from the womb to the grave, when perhaps ourselves may sometimes wish it had been our own lot?

II. Job's humble requests. He prays,

1. That God would see his affliction, (v. 15.) take cognizance of his case, and take it into his compassionate consideration. Thus David prays, (Ps. xxv. 18.) "Look upon mine afflictions and my pain. Thus we should, in our troubles, refer ourselves to God, and may comfort ourselves with this, that he knows our souls in adversity.

2. That God would grant him some ease. If he could not prevail for the removal of his troubles, yet might he not have some intermission: "Let me, Lord, have a little time; let me not always be in extremity; O let me alone, that I may take comfort a little!" v. 20. Grant me some respite, some breathing time, some little enjoyment of myself." This he would reckon a great favour. Those that are not duly thankful for constant ease, should think how welcome one hour's ease would be, if they were in constant pain. Two things he pleads;

(1.) That life and its light were very short; "Are many days few?" v. 20. Yes, certainly, they are a very few; Lord, let them not be all miserable, all in the extremity of misery. I have but a little time to live, let me have some comfort of life while it does last." This pleads fastens on the goodness of God's nature, the consideration of which is very comfortable to an afflicted spirit. And if we would use this as a plea with God for mercy, "Are not many days few? Lord, pity me;" we should use it as a plea with ourselves, to quicken us to duty. "Are not many days few?" Do we always keep this in mind, and breathe out with these words, "Let the Almighty save me from the deep of death, and gather me unto his saints," Ps. lxxxv. 10. Let me have a little comfort before I die, that I may take leave of this world calmly, and not in such confusion as I am now in." Thus earnest should we be for grace, and thus should we plead; "Lord, renew me inwardly; Lord, sanctify me before I die, for then it will never be done."

See how he speaks here of the state of the dead.

[1.] It is a fixed state, whence we shall not return, even by praying, (Job xiii. 24.) "If I shall go to the land of the living, the land of the living." ch. vii. 10. At death, we must bid a final farewell, to this world. The body must then be laid where it will lie long, and the soul adjudged to that state in which it must be for ever. That had need be well done, which is to be done but once, and done for eternity.

[2.] It is a very melancholy state; so it appears to us. Holy souls, at death, remove to a land of light, where there is no death; but their bodies are left to the same condition and state of death. He heaps up expressions here of the same import, to show that he has as dreadful apprehensions of death and the grave as other men naturally have, so that it was only the extreme misery he was in, that made him wish for it. Come and let us look a little into the grave, and we shall find, First, That there is no order there; it is without any order; perpetual night, and no successions of day. All there lie on the same level, and there is no distinction between prince and peasant, but the servant is there free from his master, ch. iii. 19. No order is observed in bringing people to the grave, not the oldest first, not the richest, not the poorest, and yet every one in his own order, the order appointed by the God of life. Secondly, That there is no light there. In the grave there is thick darkness, darkness that cannot be felt indeed, yet cannot but be feared by those that enjoy the light of life. In the grave there is no knowledge, no comfort, no joy, no praising God, no working out our salvation, and therefore no light. Job was so much ashamed that others should see his sores, and so much afraid to see them himself, that the darkness of the grave, which would hide them and huddle them up, would, upon that account, be welcome to him. Darkness comes upon us, and therefore let men work while we have the light with us. The grave being a land of darkness, it is well we are carried thither with our eyes closed, and then it is all one. The grave is a land of darkness to man; our friends that are gone thither, we reckon removed into darkness, Ps. lxxxviii. 18. But that it is not so to God, will appear by this, that the dust of the bodies of the saints, though scattered, though mingled with other dust, will none of it be lost, for God’s eye is upon every grain of it; and it shall be forthcoming in the great day.

CHAP. XI.

Poor Job’s wounds were yet bleeding, his sorer still runs and ceases not, but none of his friends bring him any oil, any balm; Zophar, the third, pours into them as much vinegar as the two former had done. 1. He exhibits a very harsh charge against Job, and does in justifying himself, v. 1–4. 2. He appeals to God for his conviction, and begs that God would take him to task, (v. 5.) and that Job might be made sensible, 1. Of God’s无限 wisdom and 2. Of his inexhaustible riches; v. 6–9. 2. Of his unsearchable perfections, v. 7–9. 3. Of his incontestable sovereignty, and uncontrollable power, v. 10. 4. Of the cognizance he takes of the children of men, v. 11, 12. 3. He assures him, that, upon his repentance and reformation, (v. 13, 14.) God would restore him to his former prosperity and safety; (v. 15–19.) but that if he were wicked, it was in vain to expect it, v. 20.

THEN answered Zophar the Naamathite, and said, 2. Should not the multitude of words be answered? and should a man full of talk be justified? 3. Should thy lies make men hold their peace? and when thou mockest, shall no man make thee ashamed? 4. For thou hast said, My doctrine is pure, and I am clean in thine eyes. 5. But oh that God would speak, and open his lips against thee; 6. And that he would show thee the secrets of wisdom, that they are double to that which is! Know, therefore, that God exacteth of thee less than thine iniquity deserveth.

It is sad to see what intemperate passions even wise and good men are sometimes betrayed into by the heat of disputation; of which Zophar here is an instance. Eliphaz began with a very modest preface, ch. iv. 2. Bildad was a little more rough upon Job, ch. viii. 2. But Zophar falls upon him without mercy, and gives him very bad language; Should a man full of talk be justified? And should thy lies make men hold their peace? Is this the way to comfort Job? No, nor to convince him neither. Does this become one that appears as an advocate for God and his justice? Tantane animis celestibus iret? In verba enim can such remittas demell? They that engage not with God will find it very hard to keep their temper. All the wisdom, caution, and resolution, they will have, will be little enough to prevent their breaking out into such indecencies as we here find Zophar guilty of.

1. He represents Job otherwise than what he was; (v. 2, 3.) he would have him think idle and impertinent in his discourse, and one that loved to hear himself talk; he gives him the lie, and calls him a mocker; and all this, that it might be looked upon as a piece of justice to chastise him. Those that have a mind to fall out with their brethren, and to fall foul upon them, it is necessary to put the worst colours they can upon them and their performances, and, right or wrong, to make them odious. We have read and considered Job’s discourses in the foregoing chapters, and have found them full of God’s secrets, to the purpose; that his principles are right, his reasoning sound, the force of his expressions weighty and very considerable, and that what there is in them of heat and passion, a little candour and charity will excuse and overlook; yet Zophar here invidiously represents him,

(1.) As a man that never considered what he said, but uttered what came uppermost, only to make a noise with the multitude of words, hoping by that means to carry his cause, and run down his reprovers. Should not the multitude of words be answered? Truly, sometimes it is no great matter whether it be or no; silence perhaps is the best conclusion of impertinence, and puts the greatest contempt upon it; Answer not a fool according to his folly. But, if it be answered, let reason and grace have the answering of it, not pride and passion. Should a man full of talk, (Marg. a man of lies, that is, all tongue, vox et praeterea nihil—mere voices,) be justified? Should he be justified in his logic, in his reasonings, in his effect, he that has so much to expound it for? No, for in the multitude of words there wanteth no sin. Should he be justified by it? Shall many words pass for valid pleas? Shall he carry the day with the flourishes of language? No, he shall not be accepted with God, or any wise men, for his much speaking, Matth. vi. 7.

(2.) As a man that made no conscience of what he said, a liar, and one that hoped, by the impudence of lies, to silence his adversaries; (Should thy lies make men hold their peace,) a knacker; one that bantered all mankind, and knew how to false colours upon any thing, and was not ashamed to impose upon every one that talked with him. When thou mockest, shall no man make thee ashamed? Is it not time to speak, to stem such a violent tide as this? Job was not mad, but spoke the words of truth and soberness, and yet is thus misrepresented. Eliphaz and Bildad had answered him, and said what they could to make him ashamed; it was, therefore, no instance of Zophar’s generoso, to mock upon a man so violently, who was already thus harassed: here were three matched against one.

2. He charges Job with saying that which he had not said; (v. 4.) Thou hast said, My doctrine is pure, and I am clean in thine eyes. And what if he had said so? It is true that Job was sound in the faith, and orthodox in his judgment, and speak better of God than his friends did. If he had expressed himself unwarly, yet it did not therefore follow but that Job might say true; but he charges him with saying, I am clean in thine eyes. Job had not said so: he had, indeed, said, Thou knowest that I am not wicked; (ch. v. 7.) but he had also said, I have sinned, and never pretended to a spotless perfection. He had, indeed, maintained that he was not a hypocrite, as they charged him; but to infer thence that he would not own himself a sinner, was an unfair insinuation. We ought to put the best construction on the words and actions of our brethren that they will bear; but the true readers are tempted to put the worst.

3. He appeals to God, and wishes him to appear against Job. So very confident is he that Job is in the wrong, that nothing will serve him but that God must immediately appear to silence and condemn him. We are commonly ready with too much assurance to interest God in our quarrels, and to conclude that if he would but speak, he would take our part, and speak for us; as Zophar here,
O that God would speak, for he would certainly open his lips against thee; whereas, when God did speak, he opened his lips for Job against his three friends. We ought indeed to learn all controversies to be determined by the judgment of God, which we are sure is according to truth; but they are not always in the right, who are most forward to appeal to that judgment, and prejudge it against their antagonists.

Zophar despairs to convince Job himself, and therefore desires God would convince him of two things, which it is good for every one of us duly to consider, and under all our afflictions, cheerfully to submit to. (1.) The unsearchable depth of God's counsels. Zophar cannot pretend to do it, but he desires that God himself should show Job so much of the secrets of the divine wisdom, as might convince him that they are, at least, double to that which is, v. 6. Note, [1.] There are secrets in the divine wisdom; arcana imperitī—state secrets. God's way is in the sea; clouds and darkness are round about him; he has reasons of state which we cannot fathom, and must not pray into. [2.] What we know of God, is nothing to what we cannot know. What is hid, is more than double to what appears, Eph. iii. 9. [3.] By employing ourselves in adoring the depth of those divine counsels of which we cannot find the bottom, we shall very much tranquillize our minds under the afflictive hand of God. [4.] God knows a great deal more evil of us than we do of ourselves; so some understand it. When God gave David a sight and sense of sin, he said that he had in the hidden part made him to know wisdom, Ps. li. 6.

7. Canst thou by searching find out God? Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection? 8. It is as high as heaven; what canst thou do? deeper than hell; what canst thou know? 9. The measure thereof is longer than the earth, and broader than the sea. 10. If he cut off, and shut up, or gather together, then who can hinder him? 11. For he knoweth vain men: he seeth wickedness also: will he not then consider it? 12. For vain man would be wise, though man be born like a wild ass's colt.

Zophar here speaks very good things concerning God and his greatness and glory, concerning man and his vanity and folly: these two compared together, and duly considered, will have a powerful influence upon submission to all the dispensations of the Divine Providence.

I. See here what God is, and let him be adored. 1. He is an incomprehensible Being, infinite and immense, whose nature and perfection, our finite understandings cannot possibly form any adequate conceptions of, and whose counsels and actions we cannot therefore, without the greatest presumption, pass a judgment upon. We, that are so little acquainted with the divine nature, are incompetent judges of the Divine Providence; and, when we curse the dispensations of God, talk of things that we do not understand. We cannot find out God; how dare we then find fault with him? Zophar here shows,

(1.) That God's nature infinitely exceeds the capacities of our understandings; "Canst thou find out God? find him out to perfection?" No, What canst thou do? What canst thou know? vs. 7, 8. Thou, a poor, weak, short-sighted creature, a worm of the earth, that art but of yesterday? Thou, though ever so inquisitive after him, ever so desirous and industrious to find him out, yet darrest thou attempt the search, or canst thou hope to speed in it?" We may by searching find God, (Acts xviii. 27.) but we cannot find him out in any thing he is pleased to conceal; we may apprehend him, but cannot comprehend him; we may know that he is, but cannot know what he is; the eye can see the ocean, but not see over it; we may, by a humble, diligent, and believing search, find out, and learn something of God, but cannot find him out to perfection; we may know, but cannot know fully, what God is, or find out his work from the beginning to the end, Excl. iii. 11. Note, God is unsearchable. The ages of his eternity cannot be numbered, nor the spaces of his immensity measured: the depths of his wisdom cannot be fathomed, nor the reaches of his power bounded: the brightness of his glory can never be described, nor an inventory be made of the treasures of his goodness. This is a good reason why we should always speak of God with humility and caution, and never prescribe to him or quarrel with him; why we should be thankful for what he has revealed of himself, and long to be there where we shall see him as he is, 1 Cor. xiii. 9, 10.

(2.) That it infinitely exceeds the limits of the whole creation; "It is higher than heaven, (so some read it,) deeper than hell, the great abyss, longer than the earth, and broader than the sea, many parts of which are, to this day, undiscovered, and more were then. It is quite out of our reach to comprehend God's nature; such knowledge is too wonderful for us, Ps. cxxxix. 6. We cannot fathom God's designs, nor find out the reasons of his proceedings; his judgments are a great deep. St. Paul attributes such immeasurable dimensions to God's wisdom. For we know that God doth not go about like man, to search out; as Zophar here attributes to divine wisdom, and yet recommends it to our acquaintance, (Eph. iii. 18,) That ye may know the breadth, and length, and depth, and height, of the love of Christ.

2. God is a sovereign Lord; (v. 10.) If he cut off by death, (Marg. If he make a change, for death is a change; if he make a change in nations, in families, in the posture of our affairs,) if he shut up in hell, or in the bottom of the sea, or in the mouth of the pit, (Ps. lxxvi. 11.) if he seize any creature as a hunter his prey, he will gather it, (so Bishop Patrick,) and who shall force him to restore? Or, if he gather together, as tares for the fire, or, if he gather to himself man's spirit and breath, (ch. xxxiv. 14.) then who can hinder him? Who can either arrest the sentence, or oppose the execution? Who can control his power, or array his wisdom and justice? He can do all things, and all things he doth; he can give to all and to none, and he can cause all things to be done, and all things to be undone, all to nothing, or to their first chaos again; if he that separated between light and darkness, dry land and sea, at first, please to gather them together again; if he that made, unmake, who can turn him away, alter his mind, stay his hand, impede or impede his proceedings?

3. God is a strict and just overseer of the children of men; (v. 11.) He knoweth vain men. We know little of him, but he knows us perfectly; he sees wickedness also, not to approve it, (Hab. i. 13.) but to animadvert upon it. (1.) He observes vain men; (such all are, every man, at his best estate, is altogether vanity;) and he considers it in his dealings with them. He knows what the projects and hopes of vain men are, and can blast and defeat them, the workings of their foolish fancies; he sits in heaven, and laughs at them. He takes knowledge of the vanity of men, that is, their little sins, so soon as they think and vanities, and unsteadiness in that which is good. (2.) He observes bad men; he sees gross wickedness also, though acted ever so secretly, and ever so artfully palliated and disguised. All the wickedness of the wicked is naked and open before the all-seeing eye of God; will he not then consider it? Yes, certainly he will, and will reckon for it, though for a time he seems to keep silence.

II. See here what man is; and let him be humbled; (v. 12.) God sees this concerning vain man, that he would be wise, would be thought so, though he is born like a wild ass's colt, so sottish and foolish, unteachable and untameable. See what man is: 1. He is a vain creature; empty; so the word is: God made him full, but he emptied himself, impoverished himself, and now he is raca, a creature that has nothing in him. 2. He is a foolish creature, become like the beasts that perish, (Ps. cxix. 22.) an idiot, born like an ass, the most stupid animal, an ass's colt, not yet brought to any service. If ever he come to be good for any thing, it is owing to the grace of Christ, who once, in the day of his triumph, served himself of an ass's colt. 3. He is a wilful ungovernable creature. An ass's colt may be made good for something, but the wild ass's colt will never be reclaimed, nor regards the crying of the driver. See Job xxxix. 5. 7. Man thinks him as his own liberty, and his own master; but the wild ass's colt does what is done to the wilderness, (Jer. ii. 24.) eager to gratify his own appetites and passions. 4. Yet he is a proud creature and self-conceited. He would be wise, would be thought so, values himself upon the honour of wisdom, though he will not submit himself to the laws of wisdom. He would be wise, that is, he reaches after forbidden wisdom, and, like his first parents, aiming to be wise above what is written, loses the tree of life for the tree of knowledge. Now, is such a creature as this fit to contend with God, or call him to an account? Did we but better know God and ourselves, we should better know how to conduct ourselves toward God.

13. If thou prepare thy heart, and stretch out thy hands toward him; 14. If iniquity be in thy hand, put it far away, and let not wickedness dwell in thy tabernacles. 15. For then shalt thou lift up thy face without spot; yea, thou shalt be steadfast, and shalt not fear: 16. Because thou shalt forget thy misery, and remember it as waters that pass away: 17. And thine age shall be clearer than the noon-day; thou shalt shine forth, thou shalt be as the morning. 18. And thou shalt be secure, because there is hope; yea, thou shalt dig about thee, and thou shalt take thy rest in safety. 19. Also thou shalt lie down, and none shall make thee afraid; yea, many shall make suit unto thee. 20. But the eyes of the wicked shall fail, and they shall not escape, and their hope shall be as the giving up of the ghost.

Zophar, as the other two, here encourages Job to hope for better times, if he would but come to a better temper.

1. He gives him good counsel, (v. 13, 14.) as Eliphaz did, (ch. v. 8.) and Bildad, ch. vii. 5. He would have him repent, and return to God. Observe the steps of that return;

1. He must look within, and get his mind changed, and the tree made good. He must prepare his heart: there is no work of conversion and reformation must begin. The heart that wandered from God must be reduced; that was defiled with sin and put into disorder, must be cleansed and put in order again; that was wavering and unfixed, must be settled and established: so the word here signifies. The heart is then prepared to seek God, when it is determined and fully resolved to make a business of it, and to go through with it.

2. He must look up, and stretch out his hand toward God, that is, must set up himself to take hold on God; must pray to him with earnestness and importunity, striving in prayer, and with expectation to receive mercy and grace from him.

To give the hand to the Lord, signifies to yield ourselves to him and to covenant with him. 2 Chron. xxx. 8. This Job must do, and, for the doing of it, must prepare his heart. Job had prayed, but Zophar would have him to pray in a better manner, not as an appellant, but as a petitioner and humble supplicant.

3. He must amend what was amiss in his own conversation, else his prayers would be ineffectual; (v. 14.) If iniquity be in thy hand, that is, "If there be any sin, which thou dost yet live in the practice of, put it far away, forsake it with detestation and a holy indignation, steadily resolving not to return to it, nor ever to have anything more to do with it," Ezek. xxvii. 31. Hos. xiv. 9. Isa. xxx. 22. If any of the gains of iniquity, any wealth gotten by fraud or oppression, be in thine hand, make restitution of it," (as Zachaeus, Luke xix. 8.) "and shake thy hands from holding it." Isa. xxxiii. 15. The guilt of sin is not removed, if the gain of sin be not restored.

4. He must do his utmost to reform his family too; "Let not wickedness dwell in thy tabernacles; let not thy house harbour or shelter any wicked persons, and not suffer any wickedness to be gotten by wickedness." He suspected that Job's great household had been ill governed, and that where there were many, there were many wicked, and the ruin of his family was the punishment of the wickedness of it; and therefore, if he expected God should return to him, he must reform what was amiss there, and, though wickedness might come into his tabernacles, he must not suffer it to dwell there, Ps. cx. 3, &c.}

II. He assures him of comfort if he took this counsel, v. 15, &c. If he would repent and reform, he should, without doubt, be easy and happy, and all would be well. Perhaps Zophar might inculcate, that, unless God did speedily make such a change as this in his condition, he and his friends would be confirmed in their opinion of him as a hypocrite and a dissembler with God; a great truth, however, is conveyed, That the work of righteousness will be in the hands of such and such a person, with the greatest quietness and assurance for ever, Isa. xxxiii. 17.

Those that sincerely turn to God, may expect,

1. A holy confidence toward God; "Then shalt thou lift up thy face toward heaven without spot; thou mayest come boldly to the throne of grace," and not with that terror and amazement expressed, ch. ix. 34. If our hearts condemn us not for hypocrisy and impenitency, then have we confidence in our approaches to God and expectations from him. 1 John iii. 21. If we are looked upon in the face, of the Anointed, our faces, that were dejected, may be lifted up; that were polluted, being washed with the blood of Christ(20) may be lifted up without spot. We may draw near in full assurance of faith, when we are sprinkled from evil conscience, Heb. x. 22. Some understand this of the clearing up of his credit before men, Ps. xxxvii. 6. If we make our peace with God, we may with cheerfulness look our friends in the face.

2. A holy composition in themselves; Thou shalt be steadfast, and shalt not fear, nor be afraid of evil tidings, thy heart being fixed, Ps. cxvii. 7. Job was now full of confusion, (ch. x. 15.) while he looked up to God as his Enemy, and quarrelled with him; but Zophar assures him, that, if he would submit and humble himself, his mind would be stayed, and he would be freed from those frightful apprehensions he had of God, which put him into such an agitation. The less we are frightened, the more we are fixed; and, consequently, the more fit we are for our services and for our sufferings.

3. A comfortable reflection upon their past troubles; (v. 16.) "Thou shalt forget thy misery, as the mother forgets her travelling pains, for joy that the child is born." Job had endeavoured to forget his complaint, (ch. ix. 27.) but found he could not; his soul had still in remembrance the wormwood and the gall; but he submits to God, to the will of God, and makes it a point to forget it: let him by faith and prayer bring his griefs and cares to God, and leave them with him, and then he shall forget them. Where sin sits heavily, affliction sits lightly. If we duly remember our sins, we shall, in comparison with them, forget our misery; much more if we obtain the comfort of a sealed pardon and a sealed peace. He whose iniquity is forgiven shall not say, I am sick, but forget that, Isa. xxxiii. 24. Yet they are sensible of the respect of their future peace. This Zophar here thinks to please Job with, in answer to the many despairing expressions he had used, as if it were no purpose for him to hope ever to see good days again in this world; "*Yea, but thou mayest, *" (says Zophar,) "and good nights too."

A blessed change he here puts him in hopes of. (1.) That though now his light was eclipsed, it should shine out again, and brighter than ever, v. 17. That even his setting sun should out-shine his noon-day sun, and his evening be fair and clear as the morning, in respect both of honour and pleasure; that his light should shine out of obscurity; (Isa. Ixvii. 10.) and the thick and dark cloud, from behind which his sun should break forth, would serve as a foil to its lustre. That it should shine even in old age, and those evil days should be good days for him. Note, They that truly turn to God then begin to shine forth; their path is as the shining light which increases, the period of their day will be the perfection of it, and their evening to this world their morning to a better. (2.) That though now he was in a continual fear and terror, he should live in a holy rest and security, and find himself continually safe and easy; (v. 18.) Thou shalt be secure, because there is hope. Note, Those who have a good hope, through grace, in God, and of heaven, are certainly safe, and have reason to be secure, how difficult soever the times are through which they pass in this world. He that walks uprightly may thus walk surely, because, though there are trouble and danger, yet there is hope that all will be well at last. Hope is an anchor of the soul, Heb. vi. 19. "*Thou shalt dig about thee, *" that is, "Thou shalt be as safe as an army in its intrenchments." They that submit themselves to God's government shall be taken under his protection, and then they are safe both day and night. [1.] By day, when they employ themselves abroad; "Thou shalt dig in safety, thou and thy servants for thee, and not be again set upon by the plunderers, who fell upon thy servants at plough, " ch. i. 14. It is no part of the promised prosperity, that he should live in idleness, but that he should have a calling and follow it, and, when he was about the business of it, should be under the divine protection; Thou shalt dig and be safe, nor rob and be safe; the way of duty is the way of safety. [2.] By night, when they repose themselves at home; Thou shalt take thy rest (and the sleep of the labouring man is sweet) in safety, notwithstanding the dangers of the darkness. The pillar of cloud by day shall be a pillar of fire by night; *"Thou shalt lie down, (v. 19.) not forced to wander where there is no place to lay thy head on, not forced to watch and sit up in expectation of assaults; but thou shalt go to bed at bed-time, and not only shall not canker thee on thee, but shall make thee afraid, or so much as give thee an alarm."

Note, It is a great mercy to have quiet nights and undis turbed sleeps; these say so that are within the hearing of the noise of war. And the way to be quiet, is, to seek unto God, and keep ourselves in his love. Nothing needs make those afraid, who return to God as their rest, and take him for their habitation. (3.) That though now he was slighted, yet he should be courted; "Many shall make suit to thee, and think it their interest and their advantage to do thee good." Suit is made to those that are eminently wise or reputed to be so, that are very rich, or in power. Zophar knew Job so well, that he foresaw, how low soever this present ebb was, if once the tide turned, it would flow as high as ever, and he would be again the darling of his country. They that rightly make suit to God, will probably see the day when others will make suit to them, as the foolish virgins to the wise, Gen. xvi. 8. "Many shall make suit to thee, for their good."

Lastly, Zophar concludes with a brief account of the doom of wicked people; (v. 20.) But the eyes of the wicked shall fail. It should seem, he suspected that Job would not take his counsel, and here tells him what would then come of it, setting death as well as life before him. See what will come of those who persist in their wickedness, and will not be reformed. 1. They shall not reach the goal they flatter themselves with the hopes of, in this world and in the other. Disappointments will be their doom, their shame, their endless torment. Their eyes shall fail with expecting that which will never come. When a wicked man dieth, his expectation perisheth, Prov. vii. 20. Their hope shall be as a puff of breath, (Marg.) vanished and gone, past recall: or their hope will perish and expire as a man does when he gives up the ghost; it will fall them when they have most need of it, and when they expected the accomplishment of it; it will die away, and leave them in utter confusion. 2. They shall not avoid the evil which sometimes they frighten themselves with the apprehension of; they shall not escape the execution of the sentence past upon them; can neither out-brave it, nor out-run it. Those that will not fly to God, will find it in vain to think of flying from him.

CHAP. XII.

In this and the two following chapters, we have Job's answer to Zophar's discourse. In which, as before, he first reasons with his friends, (see ch. 13. 19.) and then turns to his God, and directs his expostulations to him, from thence to the end of his discourse. In this chapter, he addresses himself to his friends, and I. He condemns what they had said of him, and the judgment they had given of his character, v. 1-5. II. He contradicts and confronts what his friends had put in proof or plea, v. 6-11. He exhibits the destruction of wicked men in this world, showing that they often prosper, v. 12-16. III. He consents to what they had said of the wisdom, power, and sovereignty of God, and the dominion of his providence over the children of men and all their affairs; he confirms this, and enlarges upon it, v. 12-25.

1. AND Job answered and said, 2. No doubt but ye are the people; and wisdom shall die with you. 3. But I have understanding as well as you; I am not inferior to you: yea, who knoweth not such things as these? 4. I am as one mocked of his neighbour, who calleth upon God, and he answereth him: the just upright man is laughed to scorn. 5. He that is ready to slip with his feet is as a lamp despised in the thought of him that is at ease.

The reproofs Job here gives to his friends, whether they were just or no, were very sharp, and may serve for a rebuke to all that are proud and scornful, and an exposing of their folly.

1. He upbraids them with their conceit of themselves, and the good opinion they seemed to have of their own wisdom in comparison with them; than which nothing is more weak and unbecoming, nor better deserves to be ridiculed, as it is here.

2. He represents them as claiming the monopoly of wisdom, v. 2. He speaks ironically, "No doubt, you are the people; you think yourselves fit to dictate and give law to all mankind, and your own judgment to be the standard by which every man's opinion must be measured and tried; as if nobody could discern between truth and falsehood, good and evil, but you only; and therefore we must lower to you, and, right or wrong, we must all say as you say, and you three must be the people, the majority, to have the casting vote." Note, It is a very foolish sinful thing for any to think themselves wiser than all mankind besides, or to speak and act confidently and imperiously, as if they thought so. Nay, he goes further; "You not only think there are none, but that there will be none, as wise as you, and therefore that wisdom must die with you, and all the world must be fools when you are gone, and in the dark when your sun is set." Note, It is folly for us to think that there will be any great irreparable loss of us when we are gone, or that we can be ill-spared, since God has the residue of the Spirit, and can raise up others more fit than we are, to do his work. When wise men and good men die, it is a comfort to think that wisdom and goodness shall not die with them. Some think Job here reflects upon the bounds of his own reason, and thereby speaks haughtily of others; to others he speaks to the wise ass's colt, ch. xi. 12. "Yes," says he, "we must be asses, you are the only men."

2. He deems himself the justice to put in his claim as a sharer in the gifts of wisdom; v. (3.) "But I have understanding, a heart, as well as you; nay, I fall not lower than you;" (as it is in the margin;) "I am as well able to judge of the methods and meanings of the Divine Providence, and to construe the hard chapters of it, as you are." He says not this to his friends, but to God, and it was no great applause of himself to say, I have understanding as well as you; no, nor to say, "I understand this matter as well as you," for what reason had either he or they to be proud of understanding that which was obvious and level to the capacity of the meanest; "Yea, who knows not such things as these? What things you have said, that are true, are plain truths, and common themes, which there are many that can talk as excellently as you, or better; it is then to humble them, and check the value they had for themselves as doctors of the chair. Note, (1.) It may justly keep us from being proud of our knowledge, to consider how many there are that know as much as we do, and perhaps much more, and to better purpose. (2.) When we are tempted to be harsh in our censures of those we differ from and dispute with, we ought to consider that they also have their reasons as well as we have, and a capacity of judging, and a right of judging, for themselves, perhaps they are not inferior to us, but superior, and it is possible that they may be in the right, and we in the wrong; and therefore we ought not to judge or despise them, (Rom. xiv. 3.) nor pretend to be masters, (Jam. iii. 1.) while all we are brethren, Mat. xxiii. 8. It is a very reasonable allowance to be made to all we converse with, all we contend with, that they are rational creatures as well as we.

II. He complains of the great contempt with which they had treated him. Those that are haughty and think too well of themselves, are commonly scornful, and ready to trample upon all about them: Job found it so, at least he thought he did; (v. 4.) I am as one mocked. I cannot say there was cause for this charge; we will not think Job's friends designed him any abuse, nor aimed at anything but to convince him, and so, in the right method, to comfort him; yet he cries out, I am as one mocked. Note, We are apt to call reproaches, and to think ourselves mocked when we are but advised and admonished; this peevishness is our folly, and a great wrong to ourselves and to our friends. Yet we cannot but say there was a colour for this charge; they came to comfort him, but they vexed him; gave him counsels and encouragements, but with no great opinion that either the one or the other would take effect; and therefore he thought they mocked him, and he added much to his grief. Nothing is more grievous to those that are fallen from the height of prosperity into the depth of adversity, than to be trodden on, and insulted over, when they are down; and on this head they are too apt to be suspicious. Observe, 1. What aggravated this grievance to him. Two things: (1.) That they were his neighbours, his friends, his companions, so the word signifies; and the scoffs of such are often most spitefully given, and always most indignantly received; (Ps. xii, 13.) It was not an enemy that reproached me; then I could have slighted it, and so borne it; but it was thou, a man mine equal. (2.) That they were professors of religion, such as called upon God, and said that he answered them; for some understand that of the persons mocking; "They are such as have a regard to Heaven, and an interest in Heaven, whose prayers I would therefore be glad of and thankful for; and whose good opinion I cannot but covet, and therefore whose censures are the more grievous. It is as if Job had said, If one should call upon God should mock their brethren; (Jam. iii. 9, 10.) and it cannot but lie heavily on a good man to be thought ill of by those whom he thinks well of; yet this is no new thing.

2. What supported him under it. (1.) That he had a God to go to, with whom he could lodge his appeal; for some understand those words of the person mocked, that he calls upon God, and he exalteth him above the heathen; and it seems, therefore, that God should mock their brethren; (Jam. iii. 9, 10.) and it cannot but lie heavily on a good man to be thought ill of by those whom he thinks well of; yet this is no new thing.

(2.) That his case was not singular, but very common: The just upright man is laughed to scorn; by many he is laughed at even for his justice and his uprightness, his honesty to-ward men, and his piety toward God; these are de-ceived in foolish things, which silly people needlessly hamper themselves with: as if religion were a jest, and therefore to be made a jest of. By most he is laughed at for any little infirmity or weakness, notwithstanding his justice and uprightness, without any consideration had of that which is so much his honour. Note, It was of old the lot of honest good people to be despised and derided; we are not therefore to think it strange, (1 Pet. iv. 12.) no nor to think it bad that the most eminent ones of them not only the prophets, but even the saints of the patriarchal age, Matth. v. 12. And can we expect to fare better than they?

3. What he suspected to be the true cause of it, and that was, in short, this; they were themselves rich and at ease, and therefore they despised him who was fallen into poverty. It is the way of the world, we see instances of it daily; they that prosper are praised, but of them that are going down it is said, "Down with them." He that is ready to sift with his feet, and fall into trouble, though he has formerly shone as a lamp, is then looked upon as a lamp going out, like the snuff of a candle, which we throw to the ground, and tread upon, and is accordingly despised in the thought of him that is at ease, v. 5. Even the just upright man, that is in his generation as a burning and shining light, if he enter into temptation, (Ps. lxxxiii. 2.) or come under a cloud, is looked upon with contempt. See here, (1.) What is the common fault of those that live in prosperity; being full and easy and merry themselves, they look scornfully upon those that are in want, pain, and sorrow; they overlook them, take no no- tice of them, and study to forget them. See Ps. cxviii. 4.) The chief butler drinks wine in bowls, but makes nothing of the afflictions of Joseph. Wealth without grace often makes men thus haughty, thus careless of their poor neighbours. (2.) What is the common fate of those that fall into adversity. Poverty serves to eclipse all their lustre; though they are lamps, yet, if taken out of golden candlesticks, and put, like Gideon's, into earthen pitchers, nobody values them as formerly, but they that live at ease despise them.

6. The tabernacles of robbers prosper, and they that provoke God are secure; into whose hand God bringeth abundantly. 7. But ask now the beasts, and they shall teach thee; and the fowls of the air, and they shall tell thee: or speak to the earth, and it shall teach thee; and the fishes of the sea shall declare unto thee. 9. Who knoweth not in all these, that the hand of the Lord hath wrought this? 10. In whose hand is the soul of every living thing, and the breath of all mankind. 11. Doth not the ear try words? and the mouth taste his meat?

Job's friends, all of them, went upon this principle, that wicked people cannot prosper long in this world, but some remarkable judgment or other will suddenly come upon them; and they concluded with it, that the eyes of the wicked shall fall, ch. xi. 20. This principle Job here opposes, and maintains, that God, in disposing men's outward affairs, acts as a Sovereign, reserving the exact distribution of re- wards and punishments for the future state.

1. He asserts it as an undoubted truth, that wicked people may, and often do, prosper long in this world, v. 6. Even great sinners may enjoy great prosperity. Observe, 1. How he describes the sin- ners; they are robbers, and such as provoke God, the worst kind of sinners, blasphemers and persecu- tors; Prov. xi. 28. All refers to the Sabeans and the- deans, who had robbed him, and had always lived by spoil and rapine, and yet they prospered; all the world saw they did, and there is no disputing against sense; one observation built upon matter of fact is worth twenty notions framed by an hypothesis. Or, more generally, All proud oppressors are robbers and pirates. It is supposed that what is injurious to men, is provoking to God, the Patron of right, and the Protector of mankind. It is not strange, if those that violate the bonds of justice, break through the obligations of all religion, bid defiance even to God himself, and make nothing of provoking him. 2. How he describes their prosperity: it is very great; for, (1.) Even their tabernacles prosper, those that live with them, and those that come after them, and descend from them. It seems as if a blessing were entailed upon their families; and that is preserved sometimes to succeeding generations, which was got by fraud. (2.) They are secure, and not only feel no hurt, but fear none, are under no apprehensions of danger, either from threatening providences, or an awakened conscience. But those that provoke God are never the more safe for their being secure. (3.) Into their hand God brings abundantly. They have more than heart could wish, Ps. lxxxiii. 7. They have, not for necessity only, but for delight; not for themselves only, but for others; not for the present only, but for hereafter; and this from the hand of Providence too. God brings plentifully to them; we cannot therefore judge of men's piety by their plenty, nor of what they have in their heart by what they have in their hand.

11. He appeals even to the inferior creatures for the proof of this—the beasts, and fowls, and trees, and even the earth itself; consult these, and they shall tell thee; (v. 7, 8.) many a good lesson we may learn from them; but what are you here to teach us?

1. We may learn from them that the tabernacles of robbers prosper; some. For, (1.) Even among the brute creatures, the greater devour the lesser, and the stronger prey upon the weaker, and men are as the fishes of the sea, Hab. i. 14. If sin had not entered, we may suppose there had been no such disorder among the creatures, but the wolf and the lamb had lain down together. (2.) These crea-tures, the birds, which wicked men abuse, by making them the food and fuel of their lusts, will witness against them, another day, Jam. v. 3, 4.

2. We may from them learn the wisdom, power, and goodness, of God, and that sovereign dominion of his, into which plain and self-evident truth all these difficult dispensations must be resolved. Zophar had made of these a jest, v. 7. So far, says Job, "that what we were concerned to know, we may learn even from the inferior creatures; for who knows not from all these? Any one may easily gather from the book of the inferior creatures, that the hand of the Lord has wrought this," (v. 9.) that is, "that there is a wise providence which guides and governs all these things by rules which we are neither acquainted with, nor are competent judges of." Note, From God’s sovereign dominion over the inferior creatures, we should learn to acquiesce in all his dispositions of the affairs of the children of men, though contrary to our wishes, and it would be

III. He resolves all into the absolute propriety which God has in all the creatures; (v. 10.) In whose hand is the soul of every living thing. All the creatures, and mankind particularly, derive their being from him, owe their being to him, depend upon him for the support of it, lie at his mercy, are under his direction and dominion, and entirely at his disposal, and at his summons must resign their lives. All souls are his, and may he not do what he will with his own? The name Jehovah is used here, (v. 9.) and it is the only time that we meet with it in all the discourses between Job and his friends; for God was, in that age, more known by the name of Shaddai, the Almighty.

Those words, (v. 11.) Doth not the ear try words, as the mouth tastes meat? may be taken either as the conclusion to the foregoing discourse, or the preface to what follows. The mind of man has as good a faculty of discerning between truth and error, when duly stated, as the palate has of discerning between what is sweet and what is bitter. He therefore demands from his friends a liberty to judge for himself of what they had said; and desires them to use the same liberty in judging of what he had said; nay, he seems to appeal to any man’s impartial judgment in this controversy; let the ear try the words on both sides, and it would be found that he was in the right. Note, The ear must try words before it receives them so as to subscribe to them. As by the taste we judge what food is wholesome to the body, and what not, so by the spirit of discerning we must judge what doctrine is sound, and savoury, and wholesome, and what not, 1 Cor. x. 15.—xi. 13.

12. With the ancient is wisdom; and in length of days understanding. 13. With him is wisdom and strength, he hath counsel and understanding. 14. Behold, he breaketh down, and it cannot be built again; he shutteth up a man, and there can be no opening. 15. Behold, he withholdeth the waters, and they dry up; also he sendeth them out, and they overturn the earth. 16. With him is strength and wisdom: the deceived and the deceiver are his. 17. He leadeth counsellors away spoiled, and maketh the judges fools. 18. He loseth the bond of kings, and girdeth their loins with a girdle. 19. He leadeth princes away spoiled, and overthroweth the mighty. 20. He removeth away the speech of the trusty, and taketh away the understanding of the aged. 21. He poureth contempt upon princes, and weakeneth the strength of the mighty. 22. He discovereth deep things out of darkness, and bringeth out to light the shadow of death. 23. He increaseth the nations, and destroyeth them: he enlargeth the nations, and straiteneth them again. 24. He taketh away the heart of the chief of the people of the earth, and causeth them to wander in a wilderness where there is no way. 25.

They grope in the dark without light, and he maketh them to stagger like a drunken man.

This is a noble discourse of Job’s concerning the wisdom, power, and sovereignty, of God, in ordering and disposing of all the affairs of the children of men, according to the counsel of his own will, which none dares gainsay, or can resist. Take both him and them out of the controversy in which they were so warmly engaged, and they all spake admirably well; but in that, we sometimes scarcely know what to make of them. It were well if wise and good men, that differ in their apprehensions of the less, would hold to the stress of honour and comfort, and the edification of others, to dwell most upon those great things in which they are agreed. On this subject, Job speaks like himself; here are no passionate complaints, no peevish reflections, but every thing masculine and great.

1. He asserts the unsearchable wisdom, and irresistible power, of God. It is allowed that among men there is wisdom and understanding, v. 12. But it is to be found only with some few, with the old and ancient, and those who are blessed with length of days, who get it by long experience and constant experience; and, when they have got the wisdom, they have lost their strength, and are unable to execute the results of their wisdom: but now with God there are both wisdom and strength, wisdom to design the best, and strength to accomplish what is designed; he does not get counsel and understanding, as we do, by observation, but he has it essentially and eternally in himself, v. 13. What is the wisdom of ancient men compared with the wisdom of the Ancient of days! It is but little that we know, and less that we can do; but God can do every thing, and no thought can be withheld from him. Happy they who have this God for their God, for they have infinite wisdom and strength engaged for them! Foolish and fruitless are all the attempts of men against him, v. 14. He breaketh down, and it cannot be built again. Note, There is no contention with the Divine Providence, nor breaking of the counsel of it. As he had said before; (ch. ix. 12.) He taketh away, and who can hinder him? So he says again, What God says, cannot be gainsaid, nor what he does, undone. There is no rebuilding what God will have to lie in ruins; witness the tower of Babel, which the undertakers could not go on with; and the desolations of Sodom and Gomorrah, which could never be repaired. See Isa. xxxv. 2. Ezek. xxvi. 15. Rev. xviii. 21. There is no releasing of those whom God has condemned to a perpetual imprisonment; if he shut up a man by sickness, reduce him to straits, and embarrass him in his affairs, there can be no opening. He shuts up in the grave, and none can break open those sealed doors; shuts up in hell, in chains of darkness, and none can pass that great gulf fixed.

2. He gives an instance, for the proof of it, in nature, v. 15. He has the command of the waters, binds them as in a garment. (Prov. xxxv. 4.) holds them in the hollow of his hand; (Isa. xli. 12.) and he can punish the children of men either by the defect, or by the excess of them: as men break the laws of virtue by extremes on each hand, both defects and excesses, while virtue is in the mean, so God corrects them by extremes, and denies them the mercy which is in the mean. 1. Great droughts are sometimes great judgments; he withholdeth the waters, and they dry up; if the heavens be brass, the earth is as iron; if the rain be denied, fountains dry up, and their streams are wanted, fields are parched, and their fruits are wanted, Amos iv. 7. 2. Great wet is sometimes a great judgment; he raises the waters, and overturns the earth, the productions of it, the buildings upon it. A sweeping rain is said to leave no food, Prov. xxxviii. 3. See how many ways God has of contending with a sinful people, and taking from them abused, forfeited, mercies; and how utterly unable we are to contend with him! If we might invert the order, this verse would fitly refer to Noah's flood, that ever-memorable instance of the divine power. God then, in wrath, saw no waters out, and they overturn ed the earth; but, in mercy, he withheld them, shut the windows of heaven, and the fountains of the great deep, and then, in a little time, they dried up.

III. He gives many instances of it in God's powerful management of the children of men, crossing their purposes, and serving his own by them and upon them, overruling all their counsels, overpowering all their attempts, and overcoming all their oppositions. What change does God make with men, what turns does he give to them; how easily, how surprisingly!

In general, (v. 16.) With him is strength and reason, so some translate it; strength and consistency with himself: it is an elegant word in the original. With him are the very quintessence and extract of wisdom. With him are power and all that is, so some read it. He is what he is himself, and by him, and in him, all things subsist. Having this strength and wisdom, he knows how to make use, not only of those who are wise and good, who willingly and designedly serve him, but even of those who are foolish and bad, who, one would think, could be made no way serviceable to the designs of his providence: the deceived and the deceived are his; the simplest men that are deceived, are not below his notice, the subtest men that deceive, cannot, with all their subtility, be hid from his knowledge. The world is full of deceit, the one half of mankind cheats the other, and God suffers it, and from both will, at last, bring glory to himself. The deceivers make tools of the deceived, but the great God makes tools of them both, wherewith he works, and none can let him. He has wisdom and might enough to manage all the fools and knaves in the world, and knows how to serve his own purposes by them, notwithstanding the weakness of the one, and the wickedness of the other. When Jacob, by a fraud got the blessing, the design of God's grace was served; when Ahab was drawn by a false prophecy into an expedition that was his ruin, the design of God's justice was served; and in both the deceived and the deceived were at his disposal. See Ezek. xiv. 9. God would not suffer the sin of the deceived, nor the misery of the deceived, if he knew not how to set bounds to both, and bring glory to himself out of both. Hallelujah, the Lord God omnipotent reigneth! and it is well he does, for otherwise there is so little wisdom, and so little honesty, in the world, that it had all been in confusion and ruin long ago.

He next descends to the particular instances of the wisdom and power of God in the revolutions of states and kingdoms: for thence he fetches his proofs, rather than from the like operations of Providence concerning private persons and families, because the masses of men, when placed, the more the changes that befall them are taken notice of, and, consequently, the more illustrously does Providence shine forth in them. And it is easy to argue, If God can thus turn and toss the great ones of the earth, like a ball in a large place, (as the prophet speaks, Isa. xxii. 18.) much more the little ones; and with him, to whom states and kingdoms must submit, it is solely the greatest madness for us to contend. Some think that Job here refers to the extraitiog of those powerful nations, the Rephaim, the Zuzim, the Enim, and the Horites, (mentioned Gen. xiv. 5, 6. Deut. ii. 10. 20.) in which, perhaps, it was particularly noticed, how strangely they were infatuated and enfeebled; if so, it is designed to show, that, whenever the like is done in the affairs of nations, it is God that doeth it, and we must therein observe his sovereign dominion, even over those that think themselves most powerful, politic, and absolute. Compare this with that of Eliphaz, ch. xii. 12.

Let us gather up the particular changes here specified, which God makes upon persons, either for the destruction of nations, and the planting of others in their room, or for the turning out of a particular government and ministry, and the elevation of another in its room, which may be a blessing to the kingdom; witness the glorious Revolution in our own land twenty years ago, in which we saw King James, king in glory as ever was given of this discourse of Job's.

1. Those that were wise, are sometimes strangely infatuated; and in that the hand of God must be acknowledged; (v. 17.) He leadeth counsellors away spoiled, as trophies of his victory over them, spoiled of all the honour and wealth they have got by their policy, nay, spoiled of the wisdom itself for which they have been celebrated, and the success which they might have enjoyed in their offices. In his counsels stand, while all their devices are brought to nought, and their designs baffled, and so they are spoiled both of the satisfaction and the reputation of their wisdom. He maketh the judges fools: by a work on their minds he deprives them of their qualifications for business, and so they become really fools; and by his disposal of their affairs he makes the issue and event of their projects to be quite contrary to what they themselves intended, and so they become wise fools. In this sense, we bespeak, of what is called the Abihophel, one in whom this scripture was remarkably fulfilled, became foolishness, and he, according to his name, the brother of a fool. See Isa. xix. 13, The princes of Zaan are become fools, they have seduced Egypt, even they that are the stay of the tribes thereof. Let not the wise man, therefore, glory in his wisdom, nor the ablest counsellors and judges be proud of their station, but humbly depend upon the disposal of their affairs of God. Even the aged, who seem to hold their wisdom by prescription, and think they have got it by their own industry, and therefore have an indefeasible title to it, may yet be deprived of it, and often are, by the infirmities of age, which make them twice children; he taketh away the understanding of the aged, v. 20. The aged, who were most depended on for advice, fall those that depended on them. We read of an old and yet foolish king, Eccl. iv. 13.

2. Those that were high and in authority, are strangely brought down, impoverished, and enslaved; and it is God that humbles them; (v. 18.) He looeth the bond of kings, and taketh from them the power wherewith they ruled their subjects, perhaps enslaved them, and ruled them with rigour; strips them of all the ensigns of their honour and authority, and all the supports of their tyranny; removes their great ministers, and puts such in their stead, that the sword drops from their side, and then no marvel if the crown quickly drops from their heads; on which, immediately follows the girding of their loins with a girdle, a badge of servitude, for servants went with their loins girt. Thus he leads great princes away spoiled of all their power and wealth, and that in which they pleased and prided themselves, v. 19. Note, Kings are not exempt from God's jurisdiction. To us they are gods, but men to him, and subject to more than the common changes of human life.

3. Those that were strong, are strangely weakeneed; and it is God that weakens them, (v. 21.) and overthrows the mighty, v. 19. Strong bodies are weakened by age and sickness, powerful armies moulder and come to nothing, and their strength will not secure them from a fatal overthrow. No force can stand before Omnipotence, no not that of Go. iath.

4. Those that were famed for eloquence, and entrusted with public business, are strangely silenced, and have nothing to say. (v. 20.) He/removeth away the speech of the trusty, so that they cannot speak as they intended, and as they used to do, with freedom and clearness, but blunder and falter, and make nothing of it. Or, they cannot speak what they intended, but the contrary; as Balaam, who blessed those whom he was called to curse. Let not the orator therefore be proud of his rhetoric, nor use it to any bad purposes, lest God take it away, who made man's mouth.

5. Those that were honoured and admired, strangely fall into disgrace; (v. 21.) He poureth contempt upon princes. He leaves them to themselves to do mean things, or alters the opinions of men concerning them. If princes themselves dishonour God, and despise him, if they do indignities to the people of God, and trample upon them, they shall be lightly esteemed, and God will pour contempt upon them. See Ps. civ. 40. Commonly, none more abject in themselves, nor more abused by others, were found to suffer the same disgrace, those who were haughty and insolent when they were in power.

6. That which was secret, and lay hid, is strangely brought to light, and laid open; (v. 22.) He discovers deep things out of darkness. Plots closely laid are discovered and defeated; wickedness closely committed, and artfully concealed, is discovered, and the guilty brought to condign punishment; secret treaties (Eccl. x. 20.) secret murders, secret wrongdoings. The cabinet-councillors of princes are before God's eye, 2 Kings vii. 11.

7. Kingdoms have their ebbings and flowings, their waxings and wanings; and both are from God; (v. 23.) He sometimes increases their numbers, and enlarges their bounds, so that they make a figure among the nations, and become formidable; but, after a while, by some undisclosed cause, perhaps, they are destroyed and straitened, made few and poor, cut short, and many of them cut off, and so they rendible and turnable, and their neighbours, and their enemies; and they that were the head, become the tail, of the nations. See Ps. civ. 38, 39.

8. They that were bold and courageous, and made nothing of dangers, are strangely cowed and dispirited; and this also is the Lord's doing; (v. 24.) He taketh away the heart of the chief of the people, that were their leaders and commanders, and were most famed for their martial fire and great spirit, and that they should serve and attend upon their neighbours; and they that were the head, become the tail of the nations. Ps. lxixvi. 5.

9. That they were driving on their projects with full speed, are strangely bewildered and at a loss; they know not where they are, nor what they do, are unspeedy in their counsels, and uncertain in their motions, off and on, this way and that way, wandering like men in a desert, (v. 24.) groping like men in the dark, and stagging like men in darkness, Ps. civ. 10. Note, God can suddenly raise the deepest politicians, and bring the greatest wits to their wit's end; to show that where in they deal proudly, he is above them.

Thus are the revolutions of kingdoms wonderfully brought about by an overruling Providence. Heaven and earth are shaken, but the Lord sits King for ever, and with him we look for a kingdom that cannot be shaken.

CHAP. XIII.

Job here comes to make application of what he had said in the foregoing chapter; and now we have him not in so good a temper as he was in then; for, 1. He is very bold with his friends, comparing himself with them, notwithstanding the mortifications he was under, v. 1, 2. Condemning them for their falsehood, their forwardness to judge, their partiality and deceitfulness, under colour of pleading God's cause, (v. 4, 8.) and threatening them with the judgments of God for their so doing, (v. 9, 12.) desiring them to be silent, (v. 5, 19,) turning from them to God, v. 2. If. He is very bold with his God. 1. In some expressions, his faith is very bold, yet that is not more bold than welcome, v. 15, 16, 18. But, 2. In other expressions, his passion is rather too bold; in contempt and abhorrence of God concerning the deplorable condition he was in, (v. 14, 19, &c.) complaining of the confusion he was in, (v. 20, 22.) and the loss he was at to find out the sin that provoked God thus to afflict him; and, in short, of the rigour of God's proceedings against him, v. 23, 25.

1. Lo, mine eye hath seen all this, mine ear hath heard and understood it. 2. What ye know, the same do I know also: I am not inferior unto you. 3. Surely I would speak to the Almighty, and I desire to reason with God. 4. But ye are forgers of lies, ye are all physicians of no value. 5. Oh that you would altogether hold your peace! and it should be your wisdom. 6. Hear now my reasoning, and hearken to the pleadings of my lips. 7. Will you speak wickedly for God? and talk deceitfully for him? 8. Will ye accept his person? will ye contend for God? 9. Is it good that he should search you out? or, as one man mocketh another, do ye so mock him? 10. He will surely reprove you, if ye do secretly accept persons. 11. Shall not his excellency make you afraid? and his dread fall upon you? 12. Your remembrances are like unto ashes, your bodies to bodies of clay.

Job here warmly expresses his resentments of the unkindness of his friends.

I. He comes up with them as one that understood the matter in dispute as well as they, and did not need to be taught by them, v. 1, 2. They compelled him, as the Corinthians did Paul, to commend himself and his own knowledge, yet not in a way of self-applause, but of self-justification. All he had said before, his eye had seen confirmed by many instances, and his ear had heard seconded by many authoritative testimonies, and he had not at any time any such thing as he made to of it. Happy they, who do not only see and hear, but understand, the greatness, glory, and sovereignty, of God. This, he thought, would justify what he had said before, (ch. xii. 3.) which he repeats here; (v. 2.) "What ye know, the same do I know also, so that I need not come to you to be taught; I am not inferior unto you in wisdom." Note, Those who enter into disputation, enter into temptation to magnify themselves, and to vilify their brethren, more than is fit, and therefore ought to in earnest in disputation with God concerning the doings of pride.

II. He turns from them to God; (v. 3.) Surely I would speak to the Almighty; as if he had said, "I can promise myself no satisfaction in talking to you: O that I might have liberty to reason with God! He would not be so hard upon me as you are." The prince himself will perhaps give audience to a poor petitioner with more mildness, patience, and condescension, than the servants will. Job would rather argue with God himself than with his friends. See here, 1. What confidence they have toward God, as if he could be cleared up, or if he were a witness against himself, and say, and wanted you to speak for him? Will you, who are so weak and passionate, put in for the honour of pleading God's cause? 2. Good work ought not to be put into bad hands. Will you accept his person? If those who have not right on their side, carry their cause, it is by the partiality of the judge in favour of their persons; but God's cause is so just, that it needs no such methods for the support of it. He would plead for himself; (Judg. vi. 31.) and if you were for ever silent, the heavens would declare his righteousness. 2. That God's cause suffered by such management. Under pretence of justifying God in affecting Job, they magisterially condemn him as a hypocrite and a bad man. "This" (says he) "is speaking wickedly, (for uncharitableness and censoriousness are wickedness, great wickedness; it is an offence to God to wrong our brethren,) it is talking deceitfully, for you conduct, in the frame and deliberation is much worse; yet against this wrong neither innocency, nor excellency will be a fence. 2. They basely deceived him, and that was unkind. They undertook his cure, and pretended to be his physicians, but they were all physicians of no value; "idol-physicians, who can do me no more good than an idol can." They were worthless physicians, who neither understood his case, nor knew how to prescribe to him; mere empirics, who pretended to great wonds, but he confess add nothing to him—he was never the wiser for all they said. Thus, to broken hearts and wounded consciences, all creatures, without Christ, are physicians of no value, on which one may spend all, and be never the better, but rather grow worse, Mark v. 26.

IV. He begs they would be silent, and give him a patient hearing, v. 5, 6. 1. He thinks it would be a credit to themselves, if they would say no more, but sit as much as wise; "Hold your peace, and it shall be your wisdom, for thereby you will conceal your ignorance and ill-nature, which now appear in all you say." They pleaded that they could not forbear speaking; (ch. iv. 2—xi. 2, 3.) but he tells them that they had more consulted their own reputation, if they had enjoined themselves silence. Better say nothing than nothing to the purpose, or that which tends to the dishonour of God, and the grief of our brethren. Even a god, when he holds his peace, is counted wise, because nothing appears to the contrary, Prov. xvii. 28. And as silence is an evidence of wisdom, so it is a means of it, as it gives time to think and hear. 2. He thinks it would be a piece of justice to him, to hear what he had to say; Hear now my reasoning. Perhaps, though they did not interrupt him in his discourse, yet they seemed careless, and did not much heed what he said; he therefore begs them to hear what he had to say, with the more respect. Note, It should be very willing and glad to hear what those have to say for themselves, whom, upon any account, we are tempted to have hard thoughts of. Many a man, if he could but fairly hear, would be fairly acquitted, even in the consciences of those that run him down.

V. He endeavours to convince them of the wrong they did to God's honour, while they pretended to plead for him, v. 7, 8. They valued themselves upon it, that they spake for God, were advocates for him, and had undertaken to justify him and his proceedings against Job. And being (as they thought) of counsel for the Sovereign, they expected not only the ear of the court, and the last word, but judgment on their side. But Job tells them plainly, 1. That God and his cause did not need such advocates; "Will you think to contend for God, as if his justice were clouded, and wanted a vindication? Will you be a court of record, take a note of the speeches, and say, and wanted you to speak for him? Will you, who are so weak and passionate, put in for the honour of pleading God's cause?" Good work ought not to be put into bad hands. Will you accept his person? If those who have not right on their side, carry their cause, it is by the partiality of the judge in favour of their persons; but God's cause is so just, that it needs no such methods for the support of it. He would plead for himself; (Judg. vi. 31.) and if you were for ever silent, the heavens would declare his righteousness.

2. That God's cause suffered by such management. Under pretence of justifying God in affecting Job, they magisterially condemn him as a hypocrite and a bad man. "This" (says he) "is speaking wickedly, (for uncharitableness and censoriousness are wickedness, great wickedness; it is an offence to God to wrong our brethren,) it is talking deceitfully, for you conduct, in the frame and deliberation is much worse; yet against this wrong neither innocency, nor excellency will be a fence. 2. They basely deceived him, and that was unkind. They undertook his cure, and pretended to be his physicians, but they were all physicians of no value; "idol-physicians, who can do me no more good than an idol can." They were worthless physicians, who neither understood his case, nor knew how to prescribe to him; mere empirics, who pretended to great wonds, but he confess add nothing to him—he was never the wiser for all they said. Thus, to broken hearts and wounded consciences, all creatures, without Christ, are physicians of no value, on which one may spend all, and be never the better, but rather grow worse, Mark v. 26.

IV. He begs they would be silent, and give him a patient hearing, v. 5, 6. 1. He thinks it would be a credit to themselves, if they would say no more, but sit as much as wise; "Hold your peace, and it shall be your wisdom, for thereby you will conceal your ignorance and ill-nature, which now appear in all you say." They pleaded that they could not forbear speaking; (ch. iv. 2—xi. 2, 3.) but he tells them that they had more consulted their own reputation, if they had enjoined themselves silence. Better say nothing than nothing to the purpose, or that which tends to the dishonour of God, and the grief of our brethren. Even a god, when he holds his peace, is counted wise, because nothing appears to the contrary, Prov. xvii. 28. And as silence is an evidence of wisdom, so it is a means of it, as it gives time to think and hear. 2. He thinks it would be a piece of justice to him, to hear what he had to say; Hear now my reasoning. Perhaps, though they did not interrupt him in his discourse, yet they seemed careless, and did not much heed what he said; he therefore begs them to hear what he had to say, with the more respect. Note, It should be very willing and glad to hear what those have to say for themselves, whom, upon any account, we are tempted to have hard thoughts of. Many a man, if he could but fairly hear, would be fairly acquitted, even in the consciences of those that run him down.
vindicating him, that he will resent them as a great provocation, as any prince or great man would, if a base action were done under the sanction of his name, and under the colour of advancing his interest. Note, What we do amiss, we shall certainly be reproved for, one way or other, one time or other, though it be done ever so secretly.

(3.) The terror of his majesty, which, if they would duly regard of, they would not do that which would make them obnoxious to his wrath; (v. 11.) "Shall not his excellency make you afraid?" You that have great knowledge of God, and profess religion and a fear of him, how dare you talk at this rate, and give yourselves so great a liberty of speech? Ought ye not to walk and talk in the fear of God? Nell. v. 9. "Should not his dread fall upon you, and give check to your passions?" Methinks, Job speaks this as one that did himself know the terror of the Lord, and lived in a holy fear of him, whatever his friends suggested to the contrary. Note, [1.] There is in God a dreadful excellency. He is the most excellent Being, has all excellencies in himself, and in each infinitely excels any creature. His excellencies in themselves are amiable and lovely. He is the most beautiful Being; but, considering man's distance from God by nature, and his detection and degeneracy by sin, his excellencies are dreadful. His power, holiness, justice, and his good- ness too, are dreadful excellencies. They shall fear the Lord and his goodness. [2.] A holy awe of this dreadful excellency should fall upon us, and make us afraid. This would awaken improvident sinners, and bring them to repentance, and would influence all to be careful to please him, and afraid of offending him.

2. Let them consider themselves, and what an unequal match they were for this great God; (v. 12.) "Your remembrances (all that in you for which you hope to be remembered when you are gone) are like unto ashes, worthless and weak, and easily trampled on and blown away; your bodies are like bodies of clay, mouldering and coming to nothing; your memories, you think, will survive your bodies; but, alas! they are like ashes which will be shovelled up with your dust." Note, The consideration of our own meanness and mortality should make us afraid of offending God, and is a good reason why we should not despise and trample upon our brethren. Bishop Patrick gives another sense of this verse: "Your remonstrances on God's behalf are no better than dust, and the arguments you accumulate, but like so many heaps of dirt."

13. Hold your peace, let me alone, that I may speak, and let come on me what will. 14. Wherefore do I take my flesh in my teeth, and put my life in my hand? 15. Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him: but I will maintain mine own ways before him. 16. He also shall be my salvation: for a hypocrite shall not come before him. 17. Hear diligently my speech and my declaration with your ears. 18. Behold now, I have ordered my cause; I know that I shall be justified. 19. Who is he that will plead with me? for now, if I hold my tongue, I shall give up the ghost. 20. Only do not two things unto me; then will I not hide myself from thee. 21. Withdraw thy hand far from me; and let not thy dread make me afraid: 22. Then call thou, and I will answer; or let me speak, and answer thee.

Job here takes hold, fast hold, of his integrity, as one that was resolved not to let it go, nor suffer it to be wrested from him: his firmness in this matter is commendable, and his words are full of truth. I. He entreats his friends and all the company to let him alone, and not interrupt him in what he was about to say, (v. 13.) but diligently to hearken to it, v. 17. He would have his own protestation to be decisive, for none but God and himself knew his heart; "Be silent, therefore, and let me hear no more of you, but hearken diligently to what I say, and let my own oath for confirmation be an end of the strife."

II. He resolves to adhere to the testimony his own conscience gave of his integrity; and though his friends called it obstinacy, that should not shake his constancy; "I will speak in my own defence, and let come on me what will, v. 13. Let my friends put what construction they please upon it, and think the worse of me for it, I hope God will not make my necessary defence to be my offence, as you do: he will justify me, (v. 18.) and then nothing can come amiss to me." Note, [1.] Those that are upright, and have the assurance of their own uprightness, may cheerfully welcome every event. Come what will, bene praeparaturn pectus— they are ready for it. He resolves (v. 15.) that he will maintain his own ways; he will never part with the satisfaction he had in having walked uprightly with God; but, though he could not justify every word he had spoken, yet, in the general, his ways were good, and he would maintain it; and why should he not, since that was his great support under his present exercises, as it was Hezekiah's, "Now, Lord, remember how I have walked before thee!" Nay, he would not only not betray his own cause, or give it up, but he would openly avow his sin-cerity, for, (v. 19.) "If I hold my tongue, and do not speak for myself, my silence now will for ever silence me, for I shall certainly give up the ghost," v. 19. "If I cannot be cleared, yet let me be eased by what I say," as Elihu, ch. xxxii. 17, 20.

III. He compasses the extremity of pain and misery he was in; (v. 14.) Wherefore do I take my flesh in my teeth? That is, 1. Why do I suffer such agonies? I cannot but wonder that God should lay so much upon me, when he knows I am not a wicked man. He was ready, not only to rend his clothes, but even to tear his flesh, through the greatness of his affliction, and saw himself at the brink of death, and his life in his hand, yet his friends could not charge him with any enormous crime, nor could he himself discover any; no marvel then that he was in such confusion. 2. "Why do I stifle and smother the protestations of my innocency?" When a man with great difficulty keeps in what he would say, he bites his lips: "Now," says he, "why may not I take liberty to speak, since I do but vex myself, add to my torment, and endanger my life, by refraining?" Note, It would vex the most patient man, when he has lost every thing else, that he should be denied to speak; but he desires it of a good conscience and a good name.

IV. He comforts himself in God, and still keeps hold of his confidence in him. Observe here, 1. What he depends upon God for: Justification and Salvation, the two great things we hope for through Christ. (1.) Justification: (v. 18.) I have ordered my cause, and, upon the whole matter, I know that I shall be justified. This he knew, because he knew that his Redeemer lived, ch. xix. 25. Their whose hearts are upright with God, in walking not after the flesh, but after the Spirit, may be sure that through Christ there shall be no condemnation to them, but that, whoever lays any thing to their charge, they shall be justified. (2.) Salvation, (v. 10.) it also shall not come before him. He knew himself not to be a hypocrite, and that his guilty conscience was the purport of God, and therefore concluded he should not be rejected. Sincerity is our evangelical perfection, nothing will ruin us but the want of that.

2. With what constancy he depends upon him; Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him, v. 15. This is a high expression of faith, and what we should all labour to come up to; to trust in God, though he slay us. That is, we must be well pleased with God as a Friend, even then when he seems to come forth against us as an Enemy, ch. xxix. 8-10. We must believe that all shall work for good to us, even then when all seems to make against us, Jer. xxiv. 5. We must proceed and persevere in the way of our duty, though it costs us all that is dear to us in this world, even life itself, Heb. xi. 35. We must depend upon the performance of the promise, when all the ways leading to it are shut up, Rom. iv. 18. We must rejoice in God, when we have nothing else to rejoice in, and cleave to him, yea, though we cannot for the present find comfort in him. In a dying hour, we must derive from him living comforts; and this is to trust in him, though he slay us.

V. He wishes to argue the case even with God himself, if he might but have leave to settle the preliminaries of the treaty, v. 20-22. He had desired (v. 3.) to reason with God, and is still of the same mind; he will not hide himself, that is, he will not decline the trial, nor dread the issue of it, but under two provisos, 1. That his body might not be tortured with this exquisite pain; "Withdraw thine hand far from me;" for, while I am in this extremity, I am fit for nothing. I can make a shift to talk with my friends, but I know not how to address myself to thee." When we are to converse with God, we have need to be composed, and as free from bodily pain as we can possibly be, and very uneasy. 2. That his mind might not be terrified with the tremendous majesty of God; "Let not thy dread make me afraid;" either let the manifestations of thy presence be familiar, or let me be enabled to bear them without disorder and disturbance." Moses himself trembled before God, so did Isaiah and Habakkuk: O God, thou art terrible even in thy holy places. "Lord," says Job, "let me not be as one of them who make up uneasy. See what a folly it is for men to put off their repentance and conversion to a sick-bed, and a death-bed! How can even a good man, much less a bad man, reason with God, so as to be justified before him, when he is upon the rack of pain, and under the terror of the arrests of death? At such a time, how can we have peace of conscience, but very comfortable to have it done, as it was to Job, who, if he might but have a little breathing time, was ready either to hear God speaking to him by his words, and return an answer; Call thou, and I will answer thee, or. (2.) To speak to him by prayer, and expect an answer; Let me speak, and answer thou me, v. 22. Compare this with ch. ix. 34, 35. where he speaks to the same purport. In short, the badness of his case was at present such a damp upon him, as he could not get over; otherwise he was well assured of the goodness of his cause, and doubted not but to have the comfort of it last and long. The present cloud was over. With such holy boldness may the upright come to the throne of grace, not doubting but to find mercy there.

23. How many are nine iniquities and sins! make me to know my transgression and my sin. 24. Wherefore hidest thou thy face, and holdest me for thine enemy? 25. Wilt thou break a leaf driven to and fro and wilt thou pursue the dry stubble? 26. For thou writest bitter things against me, and maketh me to possess the iniquities of my youth. 27. Thou puttest my feet also in the stocks, and lookest narrowly unto all my paths; thou settest a print upon the heels of my feet. 28. And he, as a rotten thing, consumeth, as a garment that is moth-eaten.

Here,

I. Job inquires after his sins, and begs to have them discovered to him: he looks up to God, and tells him what was the number of them; How many are nine iniquities, and what the particulars of them? Make me to know my transgressions, v. 23. His friends were ready enough to tell him how numerous and how heinous they were, ch. xxxii. 5. "But, Lord," says he, "Let me know them from Thee, for thy judgment is according to truth, theirs is not." This may be taken, either, 1. As a passionate complaint of hard usage, that he was punished for his faults, and yet was not told what his faults were. Or, 2. As a prudent appeal to God from the censures of his friends; he desired that all his sins might be brought to light, as knowing they would then appear not so many, nor so mighty, as his friends suspected him to be guilty of. Or, 3. As a pious request, to the same purport with that which Elihu directed him to; ch. xxxiv. 32. That which I see not, teach thou me. Note, A true penitent is willing to know the worst of himself; and we should all desire to know what our transgressions are, that we may be particular in the confession of them, and on our guard against them for the future.

II. He bitterly complains of God's withdrawals from him; (v. 24.) Wherefore hidest thou thy face? This must be meant of something more than his outward afflictions; for the loss of estate, children, health, might well consist with God's love; when that was all, he blessed the name of the Lord; but here we have a case of his own soul's calamity, of which he here laments. 1. That the favours of the Almighty were suspended; God hid his face as one strange to him, displeased with him, shy and regardless of him. 2. That the terrors of the Almighty were inflicted and impressed upon him; God held him for his Enemy; shot his arrows at him, (ch. vi. 4.) and set him as a mark, ch. vii. 20. Note, The holy God sometimes denies his favours, and discovers his terrors, to the best and dearest of his saints and servants in this world. This case occurs, not only in the production, but sometimes in the progress, of the divine life; evidences for heaven are eclipsed, sensible communications interrupted, dread of divine wrath impressed, and the returns of comfort, for the present, despaired of, Ps. lxxxvii. 7-9.—lxxxviii. 7, 15, 16. These are grievous burthens to a gracious soul, that values God's loving-kindness as better than life, Prov. xvii. 14. A wounded spirit...
JOB, XIV.

...what can bear? Job, by asking here, Why hidest thou thy face? teaches us, that when, at any time, we are under the sense of God's withdrawings, we are concerned to inquire into the reason of them; what is the sin for which he corrects us; and what the good he designs us. Job's sufferings were typical of the sufferings of Christ, from whom not only men hid their faces, (Isa. lii. 3,) but God hid his. Witness the darkness which surrounded him as he walked out of God, and ascribe it to him, why hast thou forsaken me? If these were done to these green trees, what shall be done to the dry? They will for ever be forsaken.

III. He humbly pleads with God his own utter inability to stand before him: (v. 25.) "Will thou break a leaf, pursue the dry stubble?" Lord, is it for thine hour to trample upon one that is down already? Or to crush one that neither has, nor pretends to, any power to resist thee?" Note, It is a great apprehension of the goodness and compassion of God, as to believe that he will not break the bruised reed, Matth. xii. 20.

IV. He sadly complains of God's severe dealings with him: he owns it was for his sins that God thus contended with him, but thinks it hard,

1. That his former sins, long since committed, should now be remembered against him, and he should be reckoned with for the old scores; (v. 26.) Thou art against me, to describe the Adversities are bitter things; writing of them denotes deliberation and determination, written as a warrant for execution; it denotes also the continuance of his affliction, for that which is written remains, and, "Herein thou makest me to possess the inequalities of my youth," that is, "thou punishest me for them, and thereby puttest me in mind of them, and obligest me to renew my repentance for them." Note, (1.) God sometimes writes very bitter things against the best and dearest of his saints, and enjoy- vants, both in outward affections and inward dis- quiet; trouble in body and trouble in mind, that he may humble them and prove them, and do them good in their latter end. (2.) That the sins of youth are often the smart of age, both in respect of sorrow within, (Jer. xxxi. 18, 19,) and suffering without, ch. xx. 11. Time does not wear out the guilt of sin. (3.) That when God writes bitter things against them, they must look to possess our iniquities, to bring forgotten sins to mind, and so to bring us to remorse for them, as to break us off from them. This is all the fruit, to take away our sin.

2. That his present mistakes and miscarriages should be so strictly taken notice of, and so severely animadverted upon; (v. 27.) "Thou puttest my feet also in the stocks, not only to afflict me, and expose me to shame, not only to keep me from escaping the strokes of thy wrath, but that thou mayest critically remark all my motions, and look narrowly to all my paths, to correct me for every false step, nay, for but a look away, or a word misapplied; nay, thou settest a print upon the heels of my feet, scorset down every thing I do amiss, to reckon for it; or, no sooner have I trodden wrong, though ever so little, than immediately I smart for it; the punishment treads upon the very heels of the sin." Job, and every other on whom God's hand of fresh date, is put together, to make up the cause of my calamity." Now, (1.) It was not true that God did thus seek advantages against him; he is not thus extreme to mark what we do amiss; if he were, there were no abiding for us, Ps. cxxx. 3. But he is so far from this, that he deals not with us according to the desert, not of our manifest sins which are not found by secret search, Jer. ii. 54. This therefore was the language of Job's melancholy; his sober thoughts never represented God thus as a hard Master. (2.) But we should keep such a strict unforgiving eye as this upon ourselves and our own steps, both for the terror of sin past, and the prevention of it for the future. It is good for us all to ponder the path of our feet.

V. He finds himself wasting away apace under the heavy hand of God, v. 28. He, that is, man, as a rotten thing, the principle of whose putrefaction is in itself, consumes, even like a moth-eaten garment, which becomes continually worse and worse. Or, He, that is, God, like bitterness, and like a moth, consumes the comforts of his iniquities. He shall be unto Ephraim as a moth, and to the house of Judah as rottenness: and see Ps. xxxix. 11. Note, Man, at the best, wears fast; but, under God's rebukes especially, he is soon gone. While there is so little soundness in the soul, no marvel there is so little soundness in the flesh, Ps. xxxviii. 3.

CHAP. XIV.

Job had turned from speaking to his friends, finding it to no purpose to reason with them, and here goes on to speak to God and himself. He had reminded his friends of their frailty and mortality; (ch. xiii. 12,) here he reminds himself of his own, and pleads it with God for some mitigation of his miseries. We have here an account, I. Of man's life, the time, the sort, and one. 1. Sovereign, v. 1. 2. Soufjful, v. 2. 3. Sinful, v. 4. 4. Sinned, v. 5, 14. II. Of man's death, that it puts a final period to our present life, to which we shall not again return, v. 7, 12. That it hides us from the calamities of life; (v. 13.) destroys the hopes of life; (v. 18, 19,) sends us more to the business of life; (v. 20,) and keeps us in the dark concerning our relations in this life, how much soever we formerly have been in company with them, v. 21, 22. III. The use Job makes of all this. 1. He pleads it with God, who, he thought, was too strict and severe with him; (v. 16, 17,) begging that, in consideration of his frailty, he would not contend with him; (v. 5, 3,) but grant him some respect and little mercy. 2. He engages himself to prepare for death, (v. 14,) and encourages himself, and hopes that it would be comfortable to him, v. 15. This chapter is proper for funeral solemnities; and serious meditations on it will help us both to get good by the death of others, and to get ready for our own.

1. Man that is born of a woman is of few days, and full of trouble. 2. He cometh forth like a flower, and is cut down: he fleeth also as a shadow, and continueth not. 3. And dost thou open thine eyes upon such a one, and bringest me into judgment with thee? 4. Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? not one. 5. Seeing his days are determined, the number of his months are with thee; thou hast appointed his bounds that he cannot pass: 6. Turn from him that he may rest, till he shall accomplish, as a hireling, his day.

We are here led to think,

I. Of the original of human life; God is its great Original, for he breathed into man the breath of life, and in him we live; but we date it from our birth, and thence we must date both its frailty and its pollution. I. Its frailty; Man, that is born of a woman, is, v. 1. It may refer to the rest, after a bad birth, that every few days, v. 1. It may refer to the present state, because she was the mother of all living of her, who, being deceived by the serpent, was first in the transgression, we do call born, and consequently derive from her that sin. Her corruption which both shorten our days, and sadden them. It may refer to every man's immediate mother. The woman is the weaker vessel, and we know that Partus se- quitur ventrem.—The child takes after the mother.
Let not the strong man therefore glory in his strength, or in the strength of his father, but remember that he is born of a woman, and that, when God pleases, the mighty men become as women, Jer. iv. 20. In the solution: (v. 4.) Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? If man be born of a woman that is a sinner, how can it be otherwise than that he should be a sinner? See ch. xxxv. 4.

How can he be clean that is born of a woman? Clean children cannot come from unclean parents, any more than pure streams from an impure spring, or grapes from thorns. Our habitual corruption is derived, with our nature, from our parents, and is therefore bred in the bone: our blood is not only tainted with sin, but tainted with an hereditary disease. Our Lord Jesus, being made sin for us, is said to be made of a woman, Gal. iv. 4.

II. Of the nature of human life; it is a flower, it is a shadow, v. 2. The flower is fading, and all its beauty soon withers and is gone. The shadow is fleeting, and its very being will soon be lost and drowned in the shadows of the night: of neither do we make any account, in neither do we put any confidence.

III. Of the shortness and uncertainty of human life; man is of few days. Life is computed, not by months or years, but by days, for we cannot be sure of any day but that it may be our last. These days are few, fewer than we think of; few, at the most, in comparison with the days of the first patriarchs, much more, in comparison with the days of eternity; but much fewer to most, who come short of what we call the age of man. Man sometimes sooner comes forth, than he is cut down, comes forth out of the womb, than he dies in the cradle, comes forth into the world and enters into the business of it, than he is hurried away as soon as he has laid his hand to the plough. If not cut down immediately, yet it is a shadow, as a shadow, and never continues in one stay, in one shape, but the fashion of it passes away: so does this world and our life in it, 1 Cor. VII. 31.

IV. Of the calamitous state of human life; man, as he is short-lived, so he is sad-lived. Though he had but a few days to spend here, yet if he might rejoice in those few, it were well; (a short life and a merry, is the boast of some;) but it is not so; during these few days, he is full of trouble, not only troubled, but full of trouble, either toiling or fretting, grieving or fearing; no day passes without some vexation, some hurry, some disorder or other. They that are void of the world, shall have enough of it. He is natur tremore—full of commotion.

The fewness of his days creates him a continual trouble and uneasiness in expectation of the period of them, and he always hangs in doubt of his life. Yet since man's days are so full of trouble, it is well that they are few, that the soul's imprisonment in the body, and banishment from the Lord, are not perpetual, are not long. When we come to heaven, our days will be many, and perfectly free from trouble, but it will be pure light, hope, and love, and balance the present grievances.

V. Of the sinfulness of human life, arising from the sinfulness of the human nature. So some understand that question; (v. 4.) Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? A clean performance from an unclean prince, who therefore, actual transgressions are the natural product of habitual corruption; which is therefore called original sin, because it is inherent in all, and cannot be so by any job here meant, as all that are sinners do, running up the streams to the fountain, Ps. li. 5.) and some think he intends it as a plea with God for compassion; "Lord, be not extreme to mark my sins of human frailty and infirmity, for thou knowest my weakness; remember that I am flesh." The Chaldee paraphrase has an observable reading of this verse; Who can make a man clean, that is polluted with sin? Cannot one that is, God. Or who but God, who is one, and will share him? God, by his almighty grace, can change the skin of the Ethiopian, that is, of the state of sinners, though clothed with worms.

VI. Of the settled period of human life, v. 5. We are here assured, 1. That our life will come to an end; our days upon earth are not numberless, are not endless, no, they are numbered, and will soon be finished, Dan. v. 26. 2. That it is determined, in the counsel and decree of God, how long we shall live, and when we shall die. The number of our months is with God, at the disposal of his counsel, and under the view of his omnipotence which cannot be deceived. It is certain that God's providence has the ordering of the period of our lives, our times are in his hand, the powers of nature depend upon him, and act under him; in him we live and move, diseases are his servants, he kills and makes alive, nothing comes to pass by chance, no not the execution done by a bow drawn at a venture; it is therefore certain that the presence of God in our life is known unto God; all his works. Whatever he does, he determines, yet with a regard partly to the settled course of nature, (the end and the means are determined together,) and to the settled rules of moral government, punishing evil, and rewarding good, in this life; we are no more governed by the Stoic's blind fate than by the Epicurean's blind fortune. 3. That the bounds God has fixed, we cannot pass, for his counsels are unalterable, his foresight being infallible.

These considerations Job here urges as reasons, (1.) Why God should not be so strict in taking cognizance of him, and of his slips, and failings; (v. 5.) "Since I have such a corrupt nature within, and am liable to so much trouble, which is a constant temptation from without, dost thou open thine eyes and fasten them upon such a one, extremely to mark what I do amiss? ch. xiii. 27. And dost thou bring me, such a worthless worm as I am, into judgment with thee who art so quick-sighted to discover the least failing, so holy to hate it, so just to condemn it, and so mighty to punish it?" The consideration of our own inability to contend with God, of our own sinfulness and weakness, should engage us to pray, Lord, enter not into judgment with thy servant.

(2.) Why he should not be so severe in his dealings with him; "Lord, I have but a little time to live, I must certainly and shortly go hence, and the few days I have to spend here are, at the best, full of trouble. O let me have a little respite, v. 6. Turn from afflicting a poor creature thus, and let him rest a while; allow him some breathing time, until he shall accomplish, as a hireling, his day. It is appointed to me once to die, let that one day suffice me, and let me not thus he continually dying, dying a thousand deaths. Let it suffice that my life, at best, is as the day of a hireling, a day of toil and labour; I am content to accomplish that, and will make the best of the common hardships of human life, the burthen and heat of the day; but let me not feel those uncommon tortures, let not my life be as the day of a malefactor, all execution-day. Thus may we find some relief under great troubles by recommending ourselves to the compassion of that God who knows our frame, will consider it, and our being out of frame.

7. For there is hope of a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again, and that the tender branch thereof will not cease. 8 Though the root thereof wax old in the earth, and the stock thereof die in the ground; 9. Yet through the scent of water it will bud, and bring forth boughs like a plan- 10. But man dieth, and wasteth away; yea, man giveth up the ghost, and where is he? 11. As the waters fail from the sea, and the flood decayeth and dieth up; 12. So man lieth down, and riseth not: till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep. 13. Oh that thou wouldest hide me in the grave, that thou wouldest keep me secret until thy wrath be past, that thou wouldest appoint me a set time, and remember me! 14. If a man die, shall he live again? All the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come. 15. Thou shalt call; and I will answer thee: thou wilt have a desire to the work of thy hands.

We have seen what Job has to say concerning life, let us now see what he has to say concerning death, which his thoughts were very much conversant with, now that he was sick and sore. It is not unseasonable, when we are in health, to think of dying; but it is an inexcusable incogitation, if, when we are already taken into the custody of death's messengers, we look upon it as a thing at a distance. Job had already showed that death will come, and that its hour is already fixed. Now here he shows,

1. That death is a removal for ever out of this world. This he had spoken of before, (ch. vii. 9.) and now he mentions it again: for though it be a truth that needs not be proved, yet it needs to be much considered, that it may be duly improved.

1. A man cut down by death, will not revive again, as a tree cut down will. What hope there is of a tree, he shows very elegantly, v. 7-9. If the body of the tree be cut down, and only the stem or stump left in the ground, though it seem dead and dry, yet it will shoot out young boughs again, as if it were but newly planted. The moisture of the earth and the rain of heaven are, as it were, scented and perceived by the stump of a tree, and they have an influence upon it to revive it: but the dead body of a man would not perceive them, nor be in the least affected by them. In Nebuchadnez- zar’s dream, when his being deprived of the use of his reason was signified by the cutting down of a tree, his return to it again was signified by the leaving of the stump in the earth, with a band of iron and brass, to be wet with the dew of heaven. Dan. iv. 15. But man has no such prospect of a return to life. The vegetable life is a cheap and easy thing, the scent of water will recover it; the animal life, in some insects and frogs, is so, the heat of the sun retrieves it; but the rational soul, once retired, is too great, too noble, a thing to be recalled by any of the powers of nature; it is out of the reach of sun or rain, and cannot be restored but by the immediate operations of Omnipotence itself; for, (v. 10.) Man dieth and wasteth away; yea, man giveth up the ghost, and where is he? Two words are here used for man. Geber, a mighty man, though mighty, dies; As. a man of the earth, is cut off from it. Man is a dying creature; he is here described by what occurs, (1.) Before death; he wastes away, he is continually wasting, dying daily, spending upon the quick stock of life; sickness and old age are wasting things to the flesh, the strength, the beauty. (2.) In death; he gives up the ghost, the soul leaves the body, and returns to God who gave it, the Fa- ther of spirits. (3.) After death; Where is he? He is not where he was, his place knows him no more; but, Is he nowhere? So some read it. Yes, he is some where; a man which he would not make considera- tion to think where they are that have given up the ghost, and where we shall be, when we give it up. It is gone to the world of spirits, gone into eternity, gone to return no more to this world.

2. A man laid down in the grave will not rise up again, v. 11. Every night, we lie down to sleep, and in the morning, we awake and rise again; but, at death, we must lie down in the grave, not to awake or rise again to such a world, such a state, as we are returning to, but to be dumb and no more till the heavens, the faithful measures of time, shall be no more, and, consequently, time itself shall come to an end, and be swallowed up in eternity; so that the life of man may fitly be compared to the waters of a land-flood, which spread far and make a great show, but they are shallow, and, when they are cut off from the sea or river, the swelling and overflow- ing of which was the cause of them, they soon decay and their place knows them not more. The waters of life are soon exhaled, and disappear; the body, like some of those waters, sinks and soaks into the earth, and is buried there; the soul, like others of them, is drawn upward, to mingle with the waters above the firmament. The learned Sir Richard Blackmore makes this also to be a dissimilitude; if the waters decay and be dried up in the summer, yet they will return again in the winter; but it is not so with the life of man. Take part of his paraphrase in like words:

A flowing river, or a standing lake, May their deeps and naked shores forsake; Their waters may exale and upward move, Their channels, rive, have to roll in the above; But the returning winter will restore What in the summer they had lost before: But if O man, thy vital streams decay Their purple channels, and defraud the heart, With fresh recreates they no'er will be supply'd, Nor the loosing life's returning tide.

II. That yet there will be a return of man to life again in another world, at the end of time, when the heavens are no more. Then they shall awake, and be raised out of their sleep. The resurrection of the dead was, doubtless, an article of Job’s creed, as appears, ch. xix. 26. and to that, it should seem, he has an eye here; where, in the belief of that, we have three things:

1. An humble petition for a hiding-place in the grave. v. 13. It was not only in a passionate weak- ness of this life, that he wished to die, but in a pious assurance of a better life, to which, at length, he should arise. O that thou wouldest hide me in the grave! The grave is not only a resting-place, but a hiding-place, to the people of God. God has the key of the grave, to let in now, and to let out at the resurrection. He hides men in the grave, as we hide our treasure in a place of secrecy and safety; and he who hides will find, and nothing shall be lost. “O God, hide thou me not only from the storms and troubles of this life, but for the bliss and glory of a better life; let me lie in the grave, reserved for immortality, in secret from all the world, but not from thee, not from those eyes which saw my substance when first curiously wrought in the lowest part of the earth,” Ps. cxxxix. 15, 16. There let me lie. Until thy wrath be past. As long as the bodies of the saints lie in the earth, they have so long that life of those sins of which they were by nature children of, so long they are under some of the enmity of sin; but when the body is raised, it is wholly past; death, the last en- emy, will then be totally destroyed. (2.) Until the set time comes for my being remembered, as Noah was remembered in the ark, (Gen. viii. 1.) where God not only hid him from the destruction of the old world, but reserved him for the reparation of a new world. The bodies of the saints shall not be forgotten in the grave; there is a time appointed, a time set, for their being inquired after. We must not be sure that they shall look through the darkness of death’s troubles, and see good days after them in this world; but if we can but get well to the grave, we may with an eye of faith look through the darkness of that, as Job here, and see better days on the other side it, in a better world.

2. A holy resolution patiently to attend the will of God both in his death and in his resurrection; (v. 14.) “If a man die, shall he live again?; all days of my appointed time will wait until my change come. Job’s friends proving miserable comforters, he set himself to be the more his own comforter; his case was now bad, but he pleases himself with the expectation of a change. I think it cannot be meant of his return to a prosperous condition in this world. His friends indeed flattered him with the hopes of that, but he himself all along despairs of it. Comforts founded upon uncertainties, at best, must needs be uncertain comforts; and therefore, I doubt, it is something more sure than that which he here sets before himself with the expectation of. The change he waits for must, therefore, be understood, either, (1.) Of the change of the resurrection, when the vile body shall be changed, (Phil. iii. 21.) and a great and glorious change it will be; and then that question, If a man die, shall he live again? must be taken by way of admiration. ’Strange! Shall these dry bones live! If so, all the time appointed for the continuance of the separation between soul and body, my separate soul shall wait until that change comes, when it shall be united again to the body, and my flesh also shall rest in hope,” Ps. xvi. 9. Or, (2.) Of the change at death. “If a man die, shall he live again? No, not such a life as he now lives; and therefore I will patiently wait until that change comes, which will put a period to my calamities, and not impatiently wish for the anticipation of it, as I have done.”

3. A joyful expectation of reward and satisfaction in this; (v. 15.) “Thou shalt call me out of the grave, by the voice of the archangel, and I will answer, and come at the call.” The body is the work of God’s hands, and he will have a desire to that, having prepared a glory for it, Or, (2.) At death, “Thou shalt call me out of the grave, and my soul to thyself, and I will answer, Ready, Lord, ready, coming, coming; here I am.” Gracious souls can cheerfully answer death’s summons, and appear to his writ. Their spirits are not forcibly required from them, (as Luke xii. 20.) but willingly resigned by them, and the earthly tabernacle not violently pulled down, but voluntarily laid down; with this assurance, “Thou wilt have a desire to the work of thy hands; thou hast mercy in store for me, not only as made by thy providence, but new-made by thy grace; otherwise he that made them will not save them.” Note, Grace in the soul is the work of God’s own hands, and therefore he will not forsake it in this world, (Ps. cxxxviii. 8.) but will have a desire to it, to perfect it in the other, and to crown it with endless glory.

16. For now thou numberest my steps, dost thou not watch over my sin? 17. My transgression is sealed up in a bag, and thou seest up mine iniquity. 18. And surely the mountain falling cometh to nought, and the rock is removed out of his place. 19. The waters wear the stones: thou wastest away the things which grow out of the dust of the earth; and thou destroyest the hope of man. 20. Thou prevailest for ever against him; and he passeth: thou changest his countenance, and sendest him away. 21. His sons come to honour, and he knoweth it not; and they are brought low, but he perceiveth it not of them. 22. But his flesh upon him shall have pain, and his soul within him shall mourn.

Job here returns to his complaints; and though he is not without hope of future bliss, he finds it very hard to get over his present grievances.

1. He complains of the particular hardships he apprehended himself under from the strictness of God’s justice, v. 16, 17. Therefore he longed to go hence to that world where God’s wrath will be past, because now he was under the continual tokens of it, as a child, under the severe discipline of the rod, longs to be of age. “When shall my change come? For now thou seest me to number my steps, and watch over my sin, and seal it up in a bag, as bills of indictment are kept safe, to be produced against the prisoner.” See Deut. xxxiii. 34. “Thou takest all advantages against me, old scores are called over, every infirmity is anticipated, and new scores are a false step taken, than I am better for it.” Now, Job has a right to the divine justice, in owning that he smarted for his sins and transgressions, that he had done enough to deserve all that was laid upon him; for there was sin in all his steps, and he was guilty of transgression enough to bring all this ruin upon him, if it were strictly inquired into: he is far from seeing that he perishes being innocent. But, 2. He does wrong to the divine goodness, in suggesting that God was extreme to mark what he did amiss and make the worst of everything: he spake to this purport, ch. xiii. 27. It was unadvisedly said, and therefore we will not dwell too much upon it. God does indeed see all his sins, he sees sin in his own people, but he is not severe in reckoning with us, nor is the law ever stretched against us, but we are punished less than our iniquities deserve. God does indeed seal and sow up, against the day of wrath, the transgression of the impenitent, but the sins of his people he blest out as a cloud.

II. He complains of the wasting condition of mankind in general: we live in a dying world; who knows the power of God's anger, by which we are consumed and troubled, and in which all our days are passed away? See Ps. xci. 7-9. 11. And who can wear up against such a rebuke? The last verse he perceives it not, v. 21. He is going to that world where he will be a perfect stranger to all those things which here filled and affected him. The consideration of this should moderate our cares concerning our children and families. God will know what comes of them when we are gone, to him therefore let us commit them, with him let us leave them, and not burthen ourselves with needless, fruitless, cares concerning them.

Thirdly, How dreadful the agonies of death are; (v. 22.) While his flesh is upon him, (so it may be read,) that is, the body he is so loath to lay down, it shall have pain; and while his soul is within him, that is, the spirit he is so loath to resign, it shall mourn. Note, Dying work is hard work; dying pangs are, commonly, sore pangs. It is folly, therefore, for men to defer their repentance to a death-bed, and to have that to do, which is the one thing needful, when they are really unfit to do any thing: for it is true wisdom, by making our peace with God in Christ, and keeping a good conscience, to treasure up comforts which will support and relieve us against the pains and sorrows of a dying hour.

CHAP. XV.

Perhaps Job was so clear, and so well satisfied, in the goodness of his own cause, that his friends had not convinced, yet he had, at least, silenced, all his thoughts against them; but, it seems, he had not; in this chapter, they begin a second attack upon him, each of them charging him anew, with the same or different arguments. It is natural to us to be fond of our own sentiments, and therefore to be firm to them, and with difficulty to be brought to recede from them. Eliphaz here keeps close to the principles upon which he had condemned Job, and, I. He reproves him for justifying himself, and others of him many evil things which are unfairly inferred from those. v. 2-13. II. He persuades him to humble himself before God, and to take shame to himself, v. 14-18. III. He reads him a long lecture concerning the woful estate of wicked people, who harden their hearts against God and the judgments which are prepared for them, v. 19-35. A good use may be made both of his reproofs, (for they are plain,) and of his doctrine, (for it is sound,) though both the one and the other are misapplied to Job.

I. THEN answered Eliphaz the Temanite, and said, 2. Should a wise man utter vain knowledge, and fill his belly with the east wind? 3. Should he reason with unprofitable talk? or with speeches wherewith he can do no good? 4. Yea, though he were a man of understanding, and there was no spirit in him.

as man, that he should be clean? and he which is born of a woman, that she should be righteous? 15. Behold, he puttest no trust in his saints; yea, the heavens are not clean in his sight: 16. How much more abominable and filthy is man, which drinketh iniquity like water?

Eliphaz here falls very foul upon Job, because he contradicted what he and his colleagues had said, and did not acquiesce in it, and applaud it, as they expected. Proud people are apt thus to take it very much amiss, if they may not have their way to dictate and to be all about them, and to censure those as ignorant and obstinate, and all that is naught, who cannot, in every thing, say as they say.

Several great crimes Eliphaz here charges Job with, only because he would not own himself a hypocrite.

I. He charges him with folly and absurdity; (v. 2, 3.) That whereas he had been reputed a wise man, he had now quite forfeited his reputation; any one would say that his wisdom was despised from him, he talked extravagantly, and so little to the purpose. Bildad began thus, (ch. viii. 2.) and Zophar, ch. xi. 2. 3. It is common for angry disputants thus to represent one another’s reasonings as impertinent and ridiculous, more than there is cause, forgetting the doom of him that calls his brother “Naca,” and Thou Fool. It is true, 1. That there is in the world a great deal of vain knowledge, science falsely so called, that is useless, and therefore worthless. 2. That this is the knowledge that puffs up, with which men swell in a fond conceit of their own accomplishments. 3. That whatever vain knowledge a man may have in his head, if he would be thought a wise man, he must not utter it, but let it die with himself, as it deserves. 4. Unprofitable talk is evil talk: we must give an account, in the great day, not only for wicked words, but for idle words. Speeches, therefore, which do no good, which do no service either to God or our neighbour, or no justice to ourselves, which are no way to the use of edifying, were better unspoken. Those words which are as wind, light and empty, especially which are as the cast wind, hurtful and pernicious, it will be wrong to fill either ourselves or others with, for they will pass very ill in the account. 5. Vain knowledge and unprofitable talk ought to be reproved and checked, especially in a wise man, whom it worst becomes, and who does most hurt by the bad example of it.

II. He charges him with impiety and irreligion; (v. 4.) “Thou castest off fear,” that is, “the fear of God, and that regard to him which thou shouldst have; and then thou restrained prayer.” See what religion is summed up in—fearing God, and praying to him; the former the most needful principle, the latter the most needful practice. Where no fear of God is, no good is to be expected; and those who pray without prayer, certainly live without God in the world. Those who restrain prayer, prove that they cast off fear. Surely those have no reverence of God’s majesty, no dread of his wrath, and are in no care about their souls and eternity, who make no applications to God for his grace. Those who are prayerless, are fearers and graceless. When the fear of God is cast off, all sin is let in, and a door open to all sin. Wherever it is thus, there is condescension to sin, not only in those who have had some fear of God, but have now cast it off, have been frequent in prayer, but now restrain it. How are they fallen? How is their first love lost! It denotes a kind of force put upon themselves. The fear of God would cleave to them; but they throw it off; prayer would be uttered, but they restrain it, and, in both, baffled their convictions. Those who either omit prayer, or straiten and abridge themselves in it, quenching the spirit of adoption, and denying themselves the liberty they might take in the duty, restrain prayer; in the name of aught else, but it is worse to restrain, than to yield up to prayer, to prohibit and discourage prayer, as Darius, Dan. vi. 7.

Now Eliphaz charges this upon Job, either, 1. As that which was his own practice. He thought that Job talked of God with such liberty as if he had been his equal, and that he charged him so vehemently with hard usage of him, and challenged him so often to a fair trial, that he had quite thrown over his reputation. But, 2. He says, that a man may be thus sorely afflicted, without he has been a good man, the faealll of all which are false, farewell prayer and the fear of God. If all things come alike to all, and the best men may have the worst treatment in this world, every one will be ready to say, It is vain to serve God; and what profit is it to keep his ordinances? (Mal. iii. 14.) Verily I have cleansed my hands in vain, (Ps. lixxiii. 13, 14.) Who will be honest, if the tabernacles of robbers prosper? (ch. xii. 6.) If there be no forgiveness with God, (ch. vii. 21.) who will fear him? (Ps. cxxx. 4.) If he laugh at the trial of the innocent, (ch. ix. 23) if he be so difficult of access, (ch. ix. 32.) who will pray to him? Note, It is a piece of injustice, which even wise and good men are too often guilty of, in the heat of dispute, to charge upon their adversaries those consequences of their opinions, which are not fairly drawn from them, and which really they abhor. This is not doing as we would be done by.

Upon this strained imuco Eliphaz grounds that high charge of impiety; (v. 5.) Thy mouth uttereth thine iniquity, teaches it, so the word is. “Then tencheth others to have the same hard thoughts of God and religion that thou thyself hast.” It is bad to break even the least of the commandments, but worse to teach men so, Matth. v. 19. If we ever thought evil, let us lay our hand upon our mouth to suppress the evil thought, (Prov. xxx. 32.) and let us by no means utter it, that is putting an imperium to it, publishing it with allowance, to the dishonour of God, and the damage of others. Observe, When men have cast off fear and prayer, their mouths utter iniquity. They that cease to do good, soon learn to do evil. What can we expect but all manner of iniquity from those that arm themselves with the grace of God against us? But, thou choisest the tongue of iniquity, that is, They that choose the tongue of iniquity, which is the same as choosing the practice of impious, mixing some good words with the bad, as tradesmen do with their wares to help them sell. The mouth of iniquity could not do so much mischief as it does, without the tongue of the craft. The serpent beguiled Eve through his subtil... Rom. vi. 18. The tongue of the crafty speaks with design and deliberation; and therefore they that use it may be said to choose it, as charging with a purpose better than the tongue of the upright: but it will be found, at last, that honesty is the best policy.

Eliphaz, in his first discourse, had proceeded against Job upon mere surmise; (ch. iv. 6, 7.) but now he has got proof against him from his own discourses; (v. 6.) Thine own mouth condemns thee, and not I. But he should have considered that he and his fellows had provoked him to say that which now they took advantage of; and that was not fair. Those are most effectually condemned, that are condemned by themselves, Tit. iii. 11. Luke xix. 22. Many a man needs no more to sink him, than for his own tongue to fall upon him.

III. He charges him with intolerable arrogance and presumption; what he has said was, besides a total and irreverent, and modest, demand that Job had made; (ch. xii. 3.) Allow that I have understanding as well as you: but see how they seek occasion against him; that is misconstrued, as if he pretended to be wiser than any man. Because he will not grant to them, they will have it thought that he claims to himself, the monopoly of wisdom, v. 7.-9. As if he thought he had the advantage of all mankind, 1. In length of acquaintance with the world, which furnishes men with so much the more experience; Art not the first man that was born, and, consequently, senior to us, and better able to give the sense of antiquity, and the judgment of the first and earliest, the wisest and purest, ages? Art thou prior to Adam? (So it may be read.) Did not he suffer for sin, and yet wilt not thou, who art so great a sufferer, own thyself a sinner? Wast thou made before the hills, as Wisdom herself was? (Prov. viii. 21, &c.) Must he not answer, who are as ancient as the meanest? (Ps. lxxxi. 6.) Even in the valley of the former hills, or in the everlasting hills, be subject to thy notions, and bow to them? Dost thou know more of the world than any of us do? No, thou art but of yesterday, even as we are," ch. viii. 9. Or, 2. In intimacy of acquaintance with God; (v. 8.) Hast thou heard the secret of God? Dost thou pretend to be of the cabinet-council of Heaven, that thou canst give better reasons than others can for God's proceedings? There are secret things of God, which belong not to us, and which, therefore, we must not pretend to account for; those are daringly presumptuous who do. He also represents him, (1.) As assuming to himself such knowledge as none else had; Dost thou restrain wisdom to thyself, as if none were wise besides? Job had said, (ch. xiii. 2.) What ye know, the same do I know also, and now they return upon him, according to the usage of eager disputants, who think they have a privilege to commend themselves; What knowest thou that I know not? How natural are such replies as these, in the heat of argument! But how simple do they look afterward, upon the review! (2.) As opposing the stream of antiquity, a venerable name, under the shade of which all contending parties strive to shelter themselves; With us are the gray-headed, and very aged men, v. 10. We have the fathers on our side; all the ancient doctors of the church are of our opinion." A thing soon said, but not so soon proved, and then proven, truth is not so soon discovered and proved by it, as most people imagine. David preferred right scripture-knowledge before that of antiquity; (Ps. cxxix. 100.) I understand more than the ancients, because I keep thy precepts. Or perhaps one or more, if not all three, of these friends of Job, were elder than he, (ch. xxxii. 6.) and therefore they thought he was bound to acknowledge them to be in the right. This also serves contemporaries to make a noise with, to very little purpose, as if these men were the elders of the church; any can say 'twere known a thing before they were born, it will serve to make them arrogant and overbearing; whereas the eldest are not always the wisest, ch. xxxii. 9.

IV. He charges him with a contempt of the counsel and comforts that were given him by his friends; (v. 11.) Are the consolations of God small with thee? 1. Eliaphaz takes it ill that Job did not value the comforts, which he and his friends admin-it makes us acceptable to God, and easy to ourselves, Ps. xviii. 24. 2. Man, in his fallen state, cannot pretend to be clean and righteous before God, either to acquit himself to God's justice, or recommend himself to his favour. 3. He is therefore to be adjudged unclean and unrighteous, because born of a woman, from whom he derives a corrupt nature, which is both his guilt and his portion. All truth is to convince Job, whereas he had just now said the same; (ch. xiv. 4.) Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? But does it therefore follow that Job is a hypocrite, and a wicked man, which is all that he denied? By no means. Though man, as born of a woman, is not clean, yet, as born again of the Spirit, he is.

Further to evince this, he here shows,
(1.) That the brightest beam of perfect and pure light before God, v. 13. God places no confidence in saints and angels; he employs both, but trusts neither with his service, without giving them fresh supplies of strength and wisdom for it, as knowing they are not sufficient of themselves, neither more nor better than his grace makes them. He takes no complacency in the heavens themselves. How puresoever they seem to us, in his eye they have many a speck and many a flaw; The heavens are not clean in his sight. If the (say) man, or (say) woman, has no light, nor light of the sight of the sun, what light has the sun in the sight of God? See Isa. xxiv. 23.

(2.) That man is much more so; (v. 16.) How much more abominable and filthy is man! If saints are not to be trusted, much less sinners. If the heavens are not pure, which are as God made them, much less man, who is degenerated. Nay, he is abominable and filthy in the sight of God, and, if ever he repent, he is so in his own sight, and therefore he abhors himself. Sin is an odious thing, it makes men hateful. The body of sin is so, and is therefore called a dead body, a loathsome thing. Such is the filthiness of man, that he drinks iniquity {that abominable thing which the Lord hates} as greedily, and with as much pleasure, as a man drinks water when he is thirsty. It is his constant drink; it is natural to sinners to commit impiety. It gratifies, but does not satisfy, the appetites of the old man. It is like water to a man in a dropsey.

The more men sin, the more they would sin.

17. I will show thee, hear me; and that which I have seen I will declare; 18. Which wise men have told from their fathers, and have not hid it: 19. Unto whom alone the earth was given, and no stranger passed among them. 20. The wicked man travaileth with pain all his days, and the number of years is hidden to the oppressor. 21. A dreadful sound is in his ears: in prosperity the destroyer shall come upon him. 22. He believeth not that he shall return out of darkness, and he is waited for of the sword. 23. He wandereth abroad for bread, saying, Where is it? he knoweth that the day of darkness is ready at his hand. 24. Trouble and anguish shall make him afraid; they shall prevail against him, as a king ready to the battle. 25. For he stretcheth out his hand against God, and strengtheneth himself against the Almighty. 26. He runneth upon him, even on his neck, upon the thick bosses of his bucklers; 27. Because he covereth his face with his fatness, and maketh collars of fat on his flanks. 28. And he dwelleth in desolate cities, and in houses which no man inhabiteth, which are ready to become heaps. 29. He shall not be rich, neither shall his substance continue, neither shall he prolong the perfection thereof upon the earth. 30. He shall not depart out of darkness: the flame shall dry up his branches, and by the breath of his mouth shall he go away. 31. Let not him that is deceived trust in vanity; for vanity shall be his recompense. 32. It shall be accomplished before his time, and his branch shall not be green. 33. He shall shake off his unripe grape as the vine, and shall cast off his flower as the olive. 34. For the congregation of hypocrites shall be desolate, and fire shall consume the tabernacles of bribery. 35. They conceive mischief, and bring forth vanity, and their belly prepareth deceit.

Eliphaz, having reproved Job for his answers, here comes to maintain his own thesis, upon which he built his censure of Job. His opinion is, That those who are wicked are certainly miserable; whence he would infer, that those who are miserable are certainly wicked, and that therefore Job was so. Observe,

I. His solemn bow to this discourse, in which he bespeaks Job's attention, which he had little reason to expect, he having given so little heed to, and put so little value upon, what Job had said; (v. 17.) “I will show thee that which is worth hearing, and not reason, as thou dost, with unprofitable talk.” Thus apt are men, when they condemn the reasonings of others, to commend their own. He promises to teach him, 1. From his own experience and observation; “That which I have myself seen in divers instances, I will declare.” It is of good use to make noted the evidences of God concerning the children of men, from which many a good lesson may be learned. What good observations we have made, and have found benefit by ourselves, we should be ready to communicate for the benefit of others: and we may then speak boldly, when we declare what we have seen. 2. From the wisdom of the ancients, (v. 18.) which wise men have told from their fathers. Note, The wisdom and learning of the moderns are very much derived from the light of the ancients. Good children will learn a good deal from their good parents: and what we have learned from our ancestors we must transmit to our posterity, and not hide from the generations to come. See Ps. lxxviii. 3-6. If the thread of the knowledge of many ages be cut off by the carelessness of one, and nothing be done to preserve it pure and entire, all that succeed, fare the worse. The authorities Eliphaz vouched, were authorities indeed, men of rank and figure; (v. 19.) unto whom alone the earth was given, and therefore you may suppose them favourites of Heaven, and best capable of making observations concerning the affairs of this earth. The dictates of wisdom come with advantage from those who are in places of dignity and power, as Solomon; yet there is a wisdom which none of the princes of this world knew, 1 Cor. ii. 7, 8.

II. The discourse itself. He here aims to show
1. That those who are wise and good do ordinarily prosper in this world. This he only hints at, v. 19. That those of whose mind he was, were such as had the earth given to them, and to them only; they enjoyed it entirely and peaceably, and no stranger passed among them, either to share with them, or to give disturbance to them. Job had said, The earth is given into the hand of the wicked, or rather, under the hands of the saints, and runs along with the faith committed unto them. And they are not robbed and plundered by strangers and enemies making inroads upon them, as thou art by the Sabaens and Chaldeans. But because many of God’s people have remarkably prospered in this world, as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, it does not therefore follow, that those who are crossed and impoverished, as Job, are not God’s people.

2. The wicked people, and particularly oppressors, and tyrannizing rulers, are subject to continual terrors, live very uncomfortably, and perish very miserably. On this head he enlarges, showing that even they who impiously dare God’s judgments, yet cannot but dread them, and will feel them at last. He speaks in the singular number, the wicked one, meaning, as some think, Nimrod, or perhaps Che-dorlaomer, or some such mighty hunter before the Lord, Gen. x. 10. He speaks to himself, whom he expressly charg’d both with the tyrannies of his breast, and with the timorousness, here described, ch. xxii. 9, 10. Here he thinks the application easy, and that Job might, in this description, as in a glass, see his own face. Now,

(1.) Let us see how he describes the sinner who lives thus miserably. He does not begin with that, but brings it in as a reason of his doom, v. 25-28. It is no ordinary sinner, but one of the first rate, an oppressor (v. 20.) a blasphemer, and a persecutor, one that neither fears God, nor regards man.

[1.] He bids defiance to God, and to his authority and power, v. 25. Tell him of the divine law, and its obligations; he breaks those bonds asunder, and will not have, no not him that made him, to restrain him or rule over him. Tell him of the divine wrath, and its terrors; he bids the Almighty do his worst, he will have his will, he will have his way, in spite of him, and will not be controlled by law, or conscience, or the notices of a judgment to come. He stretches out his hand against God, in defiance of him, and of the power of his wrath. God is indeed out of his reach, but he stretches out his hand against him, to show, that, if it were in his power, he would ungod him.

This applies to the audacious impudence of some sinners, who are really haters of God, (Rom. i. 30.) and whose carnal mind is not only an enemy to him, but enmity itself, Rom. viii. 7. But, alas! the sinner’s malice is so innate, that it is impossible what can he do? He strengthens himself (he would be valiant, so some read it) against the Almighty; he thinks with his exorbitant despotic power to change times and laws, (Dan. vii. 25.) and, in spite of Providence, to carry the day for rapine and wrong, clear of the check of conscience. Note, It is the prodigious madness of presumptuous sinners, that they enter the lists with Omnipotence. Woe unto him that saith against his Maker, that he will not do what he please; that he will not change times and laws. He that saith that he will do what his Maker will not allow him to do, it is a desperate combatant, when he finds himself an unequal match for his adversary, flies in his face, though, at the same time, he fails on his sword’s point, or the sharp spike of his buckler. Sinners, in general, run from God; but the presumptuous sinner, who, with a high hand, runs upon him, fights against him, and bids defiance to him; and it is easy to foretell what will be the issue.

[2.] He wraps himself up in security and sensuality, v. 27. He covers his face with his fleshness. This signifies both the pumpering of his flesh with daily delicious fare, and the hardening of his heart thereby against the judgments of God. Note, The gratifying of the appetites of the body, feeding and feasting them to the full, often often hardens the edge of the soul and its interests. Why is God forgotten and slighted, but because the belly is made a god of, and happiness placed in the delights of sense? They that fill themselves with wine and strong drink, abandon all that is serious, and flatter themselves with hopes that to-morrow shall be as this day, Isa. liv. 12. Woe to them that are thus at ease in Zion, Amos vi. 1, 3, 4. Luke xii. 19. The fat that covers his face, makes him look bold and haughty, and that which covers his flanks, makes him lie easy and soft, and feel little; but this will prove poor shelter against the darts of God’s wrath.

[3.] He enriches himself with the spoils of all about him, v. 28. He dwells in cities which he himself has made desolate by expelling the inhabitants out of them, that he might be placed alone in them, Isa. v. 8. Proud and cruel men take a strange pleasure in ruins, when they are of their own making; in desolation, ch. i. 14, (Ps. ii. 6.) and triumphing in the destruction, so the tyrants do, and with their own, but by making them ready to become heaps, and frightening the inhabitants out of them. Note, Those that aim to engross the world to themselves, and grasp at all, lose the comfort of all, and make themselves miserable in the midst of all. How does this tyrant gain his point, and make himself master of cities that have all the marks of antiquity upon them? We are told, (v. 35.) he does it by deceit and falsehood, (Ps. xiv.) and he that is chief is the last. By the wickedness, who was a liar and a murderer from the beginning; they conceive mischief, and then they effect it by preparing deceit, pretending to protect those whom they design to subdue, and making leagues of peace, the more effectually to carry on the operations of war. From such wicked men God deliver all good men.

(2.) Let us see now what is the miserable condition of this wicked man, both in spiritual and temporal judgments.

[1.] His inward peace is continually disturbed. He seems to those about him to be easy, who, therefore, envy him, and wish themselves in his condition, but he who knows what is in men, tells us that a wicked man has so little comfort and satisfaction in his own breast, that he is rather to be pitied than envied.

First, His own conscience accuses him, and, with the pangs at the thought of that, he travaileth in pain all his days, v. 20. He is continually uneasy at the thought of the cruelties he has been guilty of, and the blood in which he has imbrued his hands; his sins stare him in the face at every turn. Dirí conscia facti mens habet attonitos—Conscious guilt astonisheds and confoundeds.

Secondly, He is vexed at the uncertainty of the continuance of his wealth and power; the number of years is hidden to the oppressor. He knows, however he intends, that it will not last always, and has reason to fear that it will not last long, and this he frets at.

Thirdly, He is under a certain fearful expectation of judgment and fiery indignation, (Heb. x. 27.) which puts him into, and keeps him in, a continual terror and consternation, so that he dwells with Cain in the land of Nod, or commotion, (Gen. iv. 16.) and is made like Bashur, Makor-missabih—A terror round about, Jer. xx. 3, 4. A dreadful sound is in his ears, v. 21. He knows that both Heaven and and earth are incensed against him, that God is angry with him, and that all the world hates him; he has done nothing to make his peace with either, and therefore he thinks that every one who meets him will slay him, Gen. iv. 14. Or, like a man ab-scinding for debt, who thinks every man a bailiff. Fear came in, at first, with sin, (Gen. iii. 10.) and still attends the man in his apprehen-sion, but the destroyer will come upon him, either some destroying angel sent of God to avenge his quarrel, or some of his injured subjects who will be their own avengers. Those who are the terror of the mighty in the land of the living, usually go down slain to the pit, (Ezk. xxxii. 25.) the expectation of which makes them a terror to themselves. This is further set forth, v. 22. that he is, in his own apprehension, waited for of the sword; for he knows that he who kills with the sword, must be killed with the sword, Rev. xiii. 10. A guilty conscience represents to the sinner a flaming sword turning every way, (Gen. iii. 24.) and himself inevitably running on it. Again, (v. 23.) He knows that the day of darkness, (or the night of darkness rather) is ready at his hand, that it is appointed to him, and cannot be put by, that it is hastening on apace, and cannot be put off. This day of darkness is something beyond death; it is that his time of a long dark night, to all wicked people, under which they will be darkness and not light, and in which they will be doomed to utter, endless, darkness. Note, Some wicked people, though they seem secure, have already received the sentence of death, eternal death, within themselves, and plainly see hell gaping for them. No marble that it follows, (v. 24.) Trouble and anguish (that inward tribulation and anguish of soul spoken of, Rom. ii. 8, 9, which is the effect of God’s indignation and wrath fastening upon the consciences of sinners) and darkness. What is the hell before him, if this be the hell within him? And though he would fain shake off his fears, drink them away, and jest them away, it will not do; they shall prevail against him, and overpower him, as a king ready to the battle, with forces too strong to be resisted. He that would keep his peace, let him keep a good conscience.

Fourthly. If at any time he be in trouble, he deprains of getting out; (v. 25.) He believeth not that he shall shake off the darkness, but he gives himself up for gone and lost in an endless night. Good men expect light at evening time, light out of darkness; but what reason have they to expect that they shall return out of the darkness of trouble, who would not return from the darkness of sin, but went on in it? Ps. lxxxii. 5. It is the misery of damned sinners, that they know they shall never return out of that utter darkness, nor pass the gulf there fixed. Fifthly. He perplexes himself with continual care, especially if Providence ever so little draw upon him, v. 23. Such a dread he has of poverty, and such a waste does he discern upon his estate, that he is already, in his own imagination, wandering abroad for bread, going a-begging for a meal’s meat, and saying, Where is it? The rich man, in his abundance, cried out, What shall I do? Luke xii. 17. Perhaps he pretends fear of wanting, as an excuse for his covetous practices; lest he may be brought to poverty at last. We read of course who were full, but have hired out themselves for bread, (1 Sam. ii. 5.) which this sinner will not do; he cannot dig, he is too fat, (v. 27.) but to beg he may well be ashamed. See Ps. cix. 10. David never saw the righteous so far forsook as to beg their bread, for, verily, they shall be fed by the charitable, unasked, Ps. xxxvii. 3, 25. But the wicked want it, and cannot expect it should be readily given them. How should they find mercy, who never showed mercy?

[2.] His outward prosperity will soon come to an end, and all his confidence, and all his comfort, will come to an end with it. How can he prosper, when God runs upon him? Some understand that, v. 26. Whom God runs upon, he will certainly run down; for when he judges, he will overcome. See how the judgments of God cross this wicked man in his cares, desires, and projects, and completely his most cherished prospects.

First. He is in care to get, but he shall not be rich, v. 29. His own covetous mind keeps him from being truly rich. He is not rich, that has not enough; and he has not enough, that does not think he has. It is contentment only that is great gain. Provi-dence remarkably keeps some from being rich, defeating their enterprises, breaking their measures, and keeping them always behind-hand. Many that get much by fraud and injustice, yet do not grow rich; it goes as it comes, it is got by one sin, and spent upon another.

Secondly, He is in care to keep what he has got, but in vain, his substance shall not continue; it will dwindle and come to nothing, God blast it, and what came up in a night, perishes in a night. Wrath, gotten by vanity, will certainly be diminished. Some have themselves lived to see the ruin of those estates which have been raised by oppression; it goes, however, as the Lord roars, and those who succeed. De mortuis viviis gaudet tertius hostes—Ill-gotten property will scarcely be enjoyed by the third generation. He purchases estates to him and his heirs for ever; but to what purpose? He shall not prolong the perfection thereof up on the earth; neither the credit nor the comfort of his riches shall be prolonged; and, when those are gone, where is the perfection of them? How indeed can we expect the perfection of any thing to be prolonged upon the earth, where the perfection of the Lord is transitory, and we soon see the end of all perfection?

Thirdly. He is in care to leave what he has got and kept, to his children after him; but in this he is crossed, the branches of his family shall perish, in whom he hoped to have lived and flourish’d, and to have had the reputation of making them all great men. They shall not be green, v. 32. The flame shall dry them up, v. 36. He shall shake them off and cast them away, the never knowing who forerunners he shall have, or who shall succeed. They die in the beginning of their days, and never come to maturity. Many a man’s family is ruined by his iniquity.

Fourthly. He is in care to enjoy it a great while himself; but in that also he is crossed. 1. He may perhaps be taken from it; (v. 30.) By the breath of God’s mouth—(that is, by his wrath, which, like a stream of brimstone, kindles the fire that devours him, Isa. xxx. 35.) Or, by his word; he speaks, and it is done immediately—(shall he go away, and leave his wealth to others. This night, thy soul shall be required of thee; and so the wicked is driven away in his wickedness, the worldling in his worldliness. 2. It may perhaps be taken from him, and fly away like an eagle toward heaven; It shall be accomplished (or cut off) before his time, (v. 32.) that is, He shall survive his prosperity, and see himself stripped of it.

Fifthly. He is in care, when he is in trouble, how to escape of it; (not how to get good by it;) but in this also he is crossed; (v. 30.) He shall not depart out of darkness; when he begins to fall, like Haman, down with him. It was said of him, (v. 22.) He believeth not that he shall return out of darkness; he frightened himself with the perpetuity of his calamity, and God also shall choose his delusions, and bring his fears upon him, (Isa. lxix. 4.) as he did upon Israel, xiv. 28. God says, Amen, to his distrust and despair.

Sixthly. He is in care to secure his partners, and hopes to secure himself by his partnership with them; but that is in vain too, v. 34, 35. The congregation of them, the whole confederacy, they, and all their tabernacles, shall be desolate, and consumed with fire. Hypocrisy and bribery are here charged upon them; that is, deceitful dealing both with God and man: God afflicted, under colour of religion, man incautiously, and the utmost justice is impossible that these should end well. Though hand join in hand for the support of these pernicious practices, yet shall not the wicked go unpunished. (5.) The use and application of all this. Will the prosperity of presumptuous sinners end thus miserably? Then, (v. 31.) Let not him that is deceived trust in vanity. Let the mischiefs which befal others be our warnings, and let us not rest on that broken reed which always failed those who leaned on it. Those who trust to their sinfull ways of getting wealth, trust in vanity, and vanity will be their recompence, for they shall not get what they expected. Their arts will deceive them, and perhaps ruin them in this world. [2.] Those who trust to their wealth when they have gotten it, especially to the wealth they have gotten dishonestly, trust in vanity, for it will yield them no satisfaction. The guilt that cleaves to it, will ruin the joy of it. They sow the wind, and will reap the whirlwind, and will own, at length, with the utmost confession, that a deceived heart turned them aside, and that they cheated themselves with a lie in their right hand.

CHAP. XVI.

This chapter begins Job's reply to that discourse of Eliphaz which we had in the foregoing chapter; it is but the second part of the same song of lamentation with which he had before bemoaned himself, and set to the same melancholy tune. 1. He upbraids his friends with their unkind usage of him, v. 1. to 5. II. He represents his own case, v. 6. to 11. He still holds fast his integrity, concerning which he appeals to God's righteous judgment, from the unrighteous censures of his friends, v. 12. to 22.

1. THEN Job answered and said, 2. I have heard many such things: miserable comforters are ye all. 3. Shall vain words have an end? or what emboldeneth thee that thou answerest? 4. I also could speak as ye do: if your soul were in my soul's stead, I could heap up words against you, and shake my head at you. 5. But I would strengthen you with my mouth, and the moving of my lips should assuage your grief.

Both Job and his friends took the same way that disputants commonly take, which is, to undervalue one another's sense, and wisdom, and management. The longer the saw of contention is drawn, the hotter it grows; and the beginning of this sort of strife is as the letting forth of water, therefore leave it off before it be meddled with. Eliphaz had represented Job's sufferings as idle and unprofitable, and nothing to the purpose; and Job here gives him the same character. Those who are free in passing such censures, must expect to have them retorted; it is easy, it is endless: but Cui bono?—What good does it do? It will stir up men's passions, but will never convince their judgments, nor set truth in a clear light.

Job here reproves Eliphaz, 1. For his false suppositions; (v. 2.) "I have heard many such things. You tell me nothing but what I knew before; nothing but what you yourselves have before said; you offer nothing new, it is the same thing over and over again;" which Job thinks as great a trial of his patience as almost any of his troubles. The incalculing of the same things thus by an adversary, is indeed provoking and nauseous, but by a teacher it is often necessary, and must not be grievous to the learner, to whom receivest must be upon receivest, and line upon line. Many things have he heard, which it is good for us to hear again, that we may understand and remember them better, and be more affected with them, and influenced by them.

2. For unskilful applications. They came with a design to comfort him, but they went about it very awkwardly, and, when they touched Job's case, quite mistook it; "Miserable comforters are ye all, who, instead of offering any thing to alleviate the situation, add affliction to it, and make it yet more grievous." The patient's case is saved, when his medicines are poisons, and his physicians his worst disease. What Job says here of his friends, is true of all creatures, in comparison with God, and, one time or other, we shall be made to see it and own it, that miserable comforters are they all. When we are under convictions of sin, terrors of conscience, and the arrests of death, it is only the blessed Spirit that can comfort effectually; all others, to him, do it miserably, and sing songs to a heavy heart, to no purpose.

3. For endless impertinence. Job wishes that vain words might have an end, v. 3. If vain, it were well that they were never begun, and the sooner they are ended the better. Those who are so wise as to speak to the purpose, will be so wise as to know when they have said enough of a thing, and when it is time to break off.

4. For causeless obstinacy. What emboldeneth thee, that thou answerest? It is our rash and unjust confidence, with Eliphaz, to charge men with those crimes which we cannot prove upon them, to pass a judgment on men's spiritual state, upon the view of their outward condition, and to re-adverse those objections which have been again and again answered.

5. For the violation of the sacred laws of friendship; doing by his brother as he would not have been done by, and as his brother would not have done by him. This is a cutting reproof, and very affecting, v. 4, 5.

(1.) He desires his friends, in imagination, for a little while, to change conditions with him, to put their souls in his soul's stead; to suppose themselves in misery like him, and him at ease like them. This was no absurd or foreign supposition, but what might quickly become true in fact; so strange, so sudden, frequently, are the vicissitudes of human affairs, and such the turns of the wheel, that the spoken soon change places. Whatever our brethren's sorrows are, we ought by sympathy to make them our own, because we know not how soon they may be so.

(2.) He represents the unkindness of their conduct toward him, by showing what he could do to them, if they were in his condition. I could speak as ye do. It is an easy thing to trample upon those that are down, and to find fault with those that are in extremity of pain and affliction. "I could heap up words against you, as you do against me; and how would you like it? How would you bear it?"

(3.) He shows them what they should do, by telling them what, in that case, he would do; (v. 5.) "I would strengthen you, and say all I could to assuage your grief, but nothing to aggravate it." It is natural to sufferers to think what they would do, if the tables were turned; but perhaps our hearts may deceive us; we know not what we should do. We find it easier to discern the reason ableness and importance of a command, when we have occasion to claim the benefit of it, than when we have occasion to do the duty of it. See what is the duty we owe to our brethren in affliction. [1.] We should say and do all we can to strengthen them, suggesting to them such considerations as are proper to encourage their confidence in God, and to support their sinking spirits. Faith and patience are the strength of the afflicted; what helps these graces, confirms the feeble knees. [2.] To assuage their grief, the causes of their grief, if possible, or, however, their resentment of those causes. Good works cost nothing; but they may be of good service to those that are in sorrow, not only as it is some comfort to them to see their friends concerned for them, but as they may be so reminded of that which, through the prevalence of grief, was forgotten. Though hard words (we say) break no bones, yet kind words may help to make broken bones rejoice; and those have the tongue of the learned, that know how to speak a word in season to the weary.

6. Though I speak, my grief is not assuaged; and though I forbear, what am I cased? 7. But now he hath made me weary: thou hast made desolate all my company. 8. And thou hast filled me with wrinkles, which is a witness against me: and my leanness rising up in me beareth witness to my face. 9. He teareth me in his wrath which hateth me: he gnasheth upon me with his teeth; mine enemy sharpeneth his eyes upon me. 10. They have gaped upon me with their mouth; they have smitten me upon the cheek reproachfully; they have gathered themselves together against me. 11. God hath delivered me to the ungodly, and turned me over into the hands of the wicked. 12. I was at ease, but he hath broken me asunder: he hath also taken me by my neck, and shaken me to pieces, and set me up for his mark. 13. His archers compass me round about; he cleaveth my reins asunder, and doth not spare; he poureth out my gall upon the ground. 14. He breaketh me with breach upon breach; he runneth upon me like a giant. 15. I have sewed sackcloth upon my skin, and defiled my horn in the dust. 16. My face is foul with weeping, and on my eyelids is the shadow of death;

Job's complaint is here as bitter as anywhere in all his discourses, and he is at a stand whether to smother it or to give it vent. Sometimes the one, and sometimes the other, is a relief to the afflicted, according as the temper or the circumstances are; but Job found help by neither, v. 6. (1.) Sometimes giving rein to grief gives ease; but, "Though I speak" (says Job), "my grief is not assuaged, my spirit is never the lighter for the pouring out of my complaint; nay, what I speak is so misconstrued as to be turned to the aggravation of my grief." (2.) At other times, keeping silence makes the trouble the easier and the sooner forgotten; but (says Job) though I forbear, I am never the nearer; what am I cased? If he complained, he was censured as passionate; if not, as sullen. If he main-

1. That his family was scattered; (v. 7.) "He hath made me weary, weary of speaking, weary of forbearing, weary of my friends, weary of life itself; my journey through the whole round world was now all over, and they are gone, and nothing is left, but that I am quite tired with it:" this made it as tiresome as any thing, that all his company was made desolate; his children and servants being killed, and the poor remains of his great household dispersed. The company of good people, that used to meet at his house for religious worship, was now scattered, and he spent his sabbaths in silence and solitude. He had company indeed, but such as he would rather have been without, for they seemed to triumph in his desolation. If lovers and friends are put far from us, we must see and own God's hand in it, making our company desolate.

2. That his body was worn away with diseases and pains, so that he was become a perfect skeleton, nothing but skin and bones, v. 8. His face was furrowed, not with age, but sickness; Thou hast filled me with wrinkles. His flesh was wasted with the running of his sore sores, so that his leanness rose up in him, that is, his bones, that were not seen, stuck out, ch. xxxviii. 21. These are called witnesses against him, witnesses of God's displeasure against him, and such witnesses as his friends produced against him to prove him a wicked man. Or, "They are witnesses for me, that my complaint is not causeless," or, "witnesses to me, that I am a dying man, and must be gone shortly.

3. That his enemy was a torment to him, (threaten him, frightened him, looked upon him, and) was full of knavish and dishonest arts and ways against him; (v. 9.) He tears me in his wrath. But who is this enemy? Either, (1.) Eliphaz, who showed himself very much exasperated against him, and perhaps had expressed himself with such marks of indignation as are here mentioned; at least, what he said; to Job's good name, and thundered nothing but terror to him; his eyes were sharpened to spy out matter of reproach against Job, and very barbarously both he said and did it, and thus did him injury. (2.) Satan, he was his enemy, that hated him, and perhaps, by the divine permission, terrified him with apparitions, as (some think) he terrified our Saviour, which put him into his agonies in the garden; and thus he aimed to make him curse God. It is not improbable that this is the enemy he means. Or, (3.) God himself; if we understand it of him, the expressions are indeed as rash as any he used. God hates none of his creatures; but Job's melancholy discourse of them, (as (some think) he did) could not but give rise to all the terrors of the Almighty: and nothing can be more grievous to a good man, than to apprehend God to be his enemy. If the wrath of a king be as messengers of death, what is the wrath of the King of kings!

4. That all about him were abusive to him; (v. 10.) They came upon him with open mouth to devour him, as if they would swallow him alive, so terrible were their threats, and so scornful was their taunt in the common form of their indignities they could invent, and even smote him on the cheek; and herein many were confederate, they gathered themselves together against him, ever the object, Ps. xxxv. 15. Herein Job was a type of Christ, as many of the ancients make him: these very expressions are used in the predictions of his sufferings; (Ps. xxii. 13.) They gushed upon me with their mouths; and (Mic. v. 1.) They shall smite the Judge of Israel with a rod upon the cheek, and all his comfort, in compliance with the affliction providences that surrounded him. Some can lessen their own troubles by concealing them, holding their heads as high, and putting as good a face upon them, as ever; but Job could not do so; he received the impressions of them, and, as one truly penitent, and truly patient, he humbled himself under the mighty hand of God, v. 15, 16. (1.) He now laid aside all his ornaments and soft clothing, consulted not either his ease or finery in his dress, but sewed the sackcloth upon his skin, that clothing which he thought good enough for such a defiled disfigured body as he had. Silks upon sores, such sores, he thought, would be unsuitable, sackcloth would be more becoming. Those are fond indeed of gay clothing, that will not be weaned from it by sickness and old age, and, as Job was, (v. 8.) by wrinkles and leanness. He not only put on sackcloth, but sewed it on, as one that resolved to continue his affliction as long as the affliction continued. (2.) He insisted not upon any points of honour, but humbled himself under humbling providences; he defiled his horn in the dust, and refused the respect that used to be paid to his dignity, power, and eminency. Note, When God brings down our condition, that should bring down our spirits. Better lay the horn in the dust, than lift it up in contradiction to the designs of Providence, and have it broken at last. Eliphaz had represented Job as high and haughty, and unhumbled under his affliction; (1.) “Note,” says Job, “I know better things; the dust is now the fittest place for me.” (3.) He banished mirth as utterly unreasonable, and set himself to sow in tears; (v. 16.) “My face is foul with weeping so constantly for my sins, for God’s displeasure against me, and for my friends’ uncleanness; this has brought a shadow of death upon my eye-lids.” He had not only wept away all his beauty, but almost wept his eyes out. In this also, he was a type of Christ, who was a man of sorrows, and much in tears, and pronounced those blessed that mourn, for they shall be comforted.

17. Not for any injustice in my hands: also my prayer is pure. 18. O earth, cover not thou my blood, and let my cry have no place. 19. Also now, behold, my witness is in heaven, and my record is on high. 20. My friends scorn me; but mine eye poureth out tears unto God. 21. Oh that one might plead for a man with God, as a man pleadeth for his neighbour! 22. When a few years are come, then I shall go the way whence I shall not return.

Job’s condition was very deplorable; but had he nothing to support him, nothing to comfort him? Yes, and he here tells us what it was.

1. He had the testimony of his conscience for him, that he had walked uprightly, and had never allowed himself in any gross sin. None was ever more ready than he to acknowledge his sins of infirmity; but, upon search, he could not charge himself with any enormous crime, for which he should be made more miserable than other men, v. 17. He had no sin, but a sin, a sin of being tempted. Then—

1. Toward men. “Not for any injustice in my hands, any wealth that I have unjustly got or kept.” Eliphaz had represented him as a tyrant and an oppressor; “No,” says he, “I never did any wrong to any man, but always despised the gain of oppression.” 2. Toward God. Also my prayer is pure; but prayer cannot be pure, as long as there is injustice in our hands, Isa. 1. 15. Eliphaz had charged him with hypocrisy in reli...
JOB, XVII.

In this chapter, Job reflects upon the harsh censures which his friends had passed upon him, and, looking upon himself as a dying man, (v. 1.) he appeals to God, and begs of him speedily to appear for him, and right him, because they had wronged him, and he knew not how to right himself, v. 2. - 7. But he hopes, that, though it should be a surprise, it will be no stumbling-block, to good people, to see him thus abused, v. 8, 9. II. He reflects upon the vain hopes they had fed him with, that he should yet see good days; showing that his days were just at an end, and with his body all his hopes would be buried in the dust, v. 10. - 16. His friends becoming strange to him, which greatly grieved him, he makes death and the grave familiar to him, which yielded him some comfort.

1. MY breath is corrupt, my days are extinct, the graves are ready for me. 2. Are there not mockers with me? and doth not mine eye continue in their provocation? 3. Lay down now, put me in a surety with thee; who is he that will strike hands with me? 4. For thou hast hid their heart from understanding: therefore shalt thou not exalt them. 5. He that speaketh flattery to his friends, even the eyes of his children shall fail. 6. He hath made me also a by-word of the people, and aforesight I was as a tabret. 7. Mine eye also is dim by reason of sorrow, and all my members are as a shadow. 8. Upright men shall be astonished at this, and the innocent shall stir up himself against the hypocrite. 9. The righteous also shall hold on his way, and he that hath clean hands shall be stronger and stronger.

Job's discourse here is somewhat broken and interrupted, and he passes suddenly from one thing to another, as is usual with men in trouble: but we may reduce what is said here to three heads.

1. The deplorable condition which poor Job was in, with which he describes, to aggravate the great unkindness of his friends to him, and to justify his own complaints. Let us see what his case was.

1. He was a dying man, v. 1. He had said, (ch. xiv. 21.) "I am an old age," and as age 18., v. 1. I shall go on that journey." But here he corrects himself, "Why do I talk of years to come? Alas! I am just setting out on that journey, am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand; my breath is already corrupt, or broken off, my spirits are spent, I am a gone man." It is good for every one of us thus to look upon ourselves as dying, and especially to think of it when we are sick. We are dying, that is, (1.) Our life is going, for the breath of life is continually wasting, as it is in "our nostrils," (Isa. ii. 22.) the door at which it entered; (Gen. ii. 7.) there is it upon the threshold, ready to depart. Perhaps, Job's distemper obstructed his breathing, and short breath will, after a while, be no breath. Let the Anointed of the Lord be the breath of our nostrils, and let us get spiritual life breathed into us, and that breath will never be corrupted. (2.) Our time is ending, (My days are extinct.) and put out as a candle, which, from the first lighting, is continually wasting and burning down, and will by degrees burn out of itself, but may by a thousand accidents be extinguished. Such is life. It concerns us, therefore, carefully to redeem the days of time, and to spend them in getting ready for the days of eternity, which will never be extinct. (3.) We are expected in our long home. The graves are ready for me. But would not one grave say? Yes, but he speaks of the\textit{archtères of his fathers, to which he must be gathered.} (v. 4.) graves where they are laid, are ready for me also, graves in consort, the congregation of the dead. Wherever we go, there is but a step between us and the grave. Whatever is unready, that is ready; it is a bed soon made. If the graves be ready for us, it concerns us to be ready for the graves. The graves\textit{for me, so it runs; denoting not only his expectation of death, but his desire of it; "I have done with the world, and have nothing now to wish for but a grave."}

2. He was a despised man; (v. 6.) \textit{"He,"} (that is, Eliphaz, so some, or rather God, whom he all along acknowledges to be the Author of his calamities) \textit{"has made me a by-word of the people, the talk of the country, a laughing-stock to many, a gazing-stock to all; and aforetime, or, to men's faces, publicly, I was as a tabret, that whoever chose might play upon;' they made ballads of him; his name became a proverb; it is so still, \textit{As soon as Job. He has now made me a by-word, a reproach of men, whereas, aforetime, in my prosperity, I was as a tabret, Delicieux humain geniès—The darling of the human race, whom they were all pleased with. It is common for those who were honoured in their wealth, to be despised in their poverty.

3. He was a man of sorrows, v. 7. He wept so much, that he had almost lost his sight; \textit{Mine eye is dim.} ch. xiv. 20. He had no comfort to which row of the world thus works darkness and death. He vexed so much, that he had fretted all the flesh away, and was become a perfect skeleton; nothing but skin and bones; \textit{"All my members are as a shadow. I am grown so poor and thin, that I am not to be called a man, but the shadow of a man."}

II. The ill use which his friends made of his miseries; they trumped upon him, and insulted over him, and condemned him as a hypocrite, because he was thus grievously afflicted. Hard usage! Now observe,

1. How Job describes it, and what construction he puts upon their discourses with him. He looks upon himself as basely abused by them. (1.) They abused him with their foul censures, condemning him as a bad man, justly reduced thus, and exposed to contempt, v. 2. \textit{"They are mockers, who deride my calamities, and insult over me, because I am thus brought low. They are so with me, abusing me to my face, pretending friendship in their visit, but inflicting much misery upon me; they are continually tearing me, and they will not be wrought upon, either by reason or pity, to let fall the prosecution."} (2.) They abused him too with their fair promises, for in them they did but banter him. He recks them (v. 5.) among those that speak flattery to their friends. They all came to morn with him; Eliphaz began with a commendation of him, ch. iv. 3. They had all promised him that he would be in happiness, and Eliphaz will take their advice. Now all this he looked upon as a jest, and as designed to vex him so much the more. All this he calls their \textit{provocation,} v. 2. They did what they could to provoke him, and then condemned him for his resentment of it; but he thinks himself excusable when his eye continued thus in their \textit{provocation;} it never ceased, and he could never look off it. Note, The unkindness of those that trample upon their friends in affliction, that banter and abuse them the more they would try to comfort, if not to tire, the patience even of Job himself.

2. How he condemns it. (1.) It was a sign that \textit{God had hid their heart from understanding,} (v. 4.) and that in this matter they were infatuated, and their wonted wisdom was departed from them. Wisdom is a gift of God, which he grants to some, and withholds from others, grants at some times, and withholds at other times. Those that are void of compasion, are so far void of understanding. Where there is not the tenderness of a man, one may question whether there be the understanding of a man. (2.) It would be a lasting reproach and diminution to them; \textit{Therefore shalt thou not exalt them.} Those are certainly kept back from honour, whose hearts are hid from understanding. When God infatuates men, he will abuse them. Surely they who discover a little acquaintance with the methods of Providence, shall not have the honour of deciding this controversy! That is reserved for a man of better sense, and better temper, such as one as Elihu afterward appeared to be. (3.) It would entail a curse upon their families. He that thus violates the sacred laws of friendship, forfeits the benefit of it, not only for himself, but for his posterity. \textit{"Even the eyes of his children shall fail, and when they look for succour and comfort from their own and their father's friends, they shall look in vain, as I have done, and be as much disappointed as I am in you."} Note, Those that wrong their neighbours, may, in the end, wrong their own children more than they are aware of.

3. How he appeals from them to God; (v. 3.) \textit{Lay down now, put me in a surety with thee,} that is, \textit{"Let me be assured that God will take the hearing and determining of the cause into his own hands, and I desire no more. Let some one engage for God to bring on this matter. Thus they whose hearts concern me now have confidence toward God, and can, with humble boldness, be impudent, beg of him to search and try them. Some make Job here to glance at the mediation of Christ, for he speaks of a Surety with God, without whom he durst not appear before God, nor try his cause at his bar; for though his friends' accusations of him were utterly false, yet he could not justify himself before God but in a Mediator. Our English annotations give the reading of this verse, \textit{"Appoint, I pray thee, my Surety with thee, name me Christ, who is with thee in heaven, and has undertaken to be my Surety: let him plead my cause, and stand up for me; and who is then that will strike upon mine hand?"}'}

if Christ be an advocate for me?” Rom. viii. 32, 33.

Christ is the Surety of the better testament, (Heb. vii. 22,) a Surety of God’s appointing; and if he undertake for us, we need not fear what can be done against us.

III. The good use which the righteous should make of Job’s afflictions from God, from his enemies, and from his friends, v. 8, 9. Observe here,

1. How the saints are described. (1.) They are upright men, honest, and sincere, and that act from a steady principle, with a single eye. This was Job’s own character; (ch. i. 1.) and, probably, he speaks of such upright men especially as had been his intimates and associates. (2.) They are the innocent; not perfectly so, but it is what they aim at, and press toward. Sincerity is evangelical innocence, and they that are upright are said to be innocent, from the great transgression, Ps. xix. 13.

(3.) They are the righteous, who walk in the way of righteousness. (4.) They have clean hands, kept clean from the gross pollutions of sin, and, when spotted with iniquities, washed with innocence, Ps. xxvi. 6.

2. How they should be affected with the account of Job’s troubles. Great inquiry, no doubt, would be made concerning him, and every one would speak of him and his case; and what use will good people make of it?

(1.) It will amaze them; Upright men shall be astonished at this; they will wonder to hear that so good a man as Job should be so grievously afflicted in body, name, and estate; that God should lay his hand so heavy upon him, and that his friends, who ought to have comforted him, should add to his grief; that such a remarkable soul should be such a remarkable sufferer, and so useful a man laid aside in the midst of his usefulness; that shall we say to these things? Upright men, though satisfied, in general, that God is wise and holy in all he does, yet cannot but be astonished at such dispensations of Providence; paradoxes which will not be unfolded till the mystery of God shall be finished.

(2.) It will animate them. Instead of being deterred from, and discouraged in, the service of God, by the hard usage which this faithful servant of God met with, they should see much more in it to proceed, and persevere in it. This, which was St. Paul’s care, (1 Thess. iii. 3.) was Job’s, that no good man should be moved either from his holiness, or his comfort, by these afflictions, that none should, for the sake hereof, think the worse of the ways or work of God. And that which was St. Paul’s comfort, was his too, that the brethren of the Lord would wax confident by his bonds, Philip i. 14. They would hereby be animated.

3. To oppose sin, and to confront the corrupt and pernicious inferences which evil men would draw from Job’s sufferings, as, That God has forsaken the earth, That it is in vain to serve him; and the like; The innocent shall stir up himself against the hypocrite, will not bear to hear this, (Rev. ii. 2.) but will withstand him to his face; will stir up himself to search into the meaning of such provinences, and study these hard chapters, that he may read the book of God, and will set up himself to maintain religion’s just, but injured, cause against all its opposers. Note, The boldness of the attacks which profane people make upon religion, should sharpen the courage and resolution of its friends and advocates. It is time to stir, when proclamation is made in the gate of the camp, Who is on the Lord’s side? When vice is daring, it is no time for virtue, through fear, to hide itself.

[2.] To persevere in religion. The righteous, instead of drawing back, or so much as starting back, at this frightful spectacle, or standing still to deliberate whether he should proceed or no, (allude to 2 Sam. ii. 23.) shall, with so much more constancy and resolution, hold on his way, and press forward. Though, in me, he foresees that bonds and afflictions abide him, yet none of those things shall move him, Acts xx. 24. Those who keep their eye upon heaven as their end, will keep their feet in the paths of religion as their way, whatever difficulties and discouragements they meet with in it.

[3.] In order thereunto, to grow in grace. He will not only hold on his way notwithstanding, but will grow stronger and stronger, and, by the sight of other good men’s trials, and the experience of his own, he will be made more vigorous and lively in his duty, more warm and affectionate, more resolute and undaunted, the more he suffers; that is, the better he will be; that which dismays others, imbolds him. The blistering wind makes the traveller gather his cloak the closer about him, and gird it the faster. They that are truly wise and good, will be continually growing wiser and better. Proficiency in religion is a good sign of sincerity in it.

10. But as for you all, do you return, and come now: for I cannot find one wise man among you. 11. My days are past, my purposes are broken off, even the thoughts of my heart. 12. They change the night into day: the light is short because of darkness. 13. If I wait, the grave is my house: I have made my bed in the darkness. 14. I have said to corruption, Thou art my father: to the worm, Thou art my mother and my sister. 15. And where is now my hope? as for my hope, who shall see it? 16. They shall go down to the bars of the pit, when our rest together is in the dust.
ing the poor, and raising funds, perhaps, for charitable uses; but all these thoughts of his heart were now at an end, and he would never have the satisfaction of hearing to the signs. Note. The period of our days will be the period of all our contrivances and hopes for this world; but if with full purpose of heart we cleave to the Lord, death will not break off that purpose.

Job, being thus put upon new counsels, was under a constant uneasiness; (v. 12.) The thoughts of his heart being broken, they changed the night into day, and shortened the light. Some, in their vanity and vice, turn night into day and day into night, but Job did so, through trouble and anguish of spirit, which was a hindrance, (1.) To the repose of the night; keeping his eyes waking, so that the night was as wearisome to him as the day, and the toils of the night tired him as much as the toils of the day. (2.) To the entertainments of the day. "The light of the morning is welcome, but, by reason of this inward darkness, the comfort of it is soon gone," (xxvi. 7.) Job could not but reflect, we must be thankful for the health and ease which enable us to welcome both the shadows of the evening and the light of the morning.

2. All his expectations from this world would very shortly be buried in the grave with him; so that it was a jest for him to think of such mighty things as they had flattered him with the hopes of; (ch. v. 19.—vii. 21.—xi. 17.) "Alas, you do but make a fool of me."

(1.) He saw himself just dropping into the grave.

A convenient house, an easy bed, and agreeable relations, are some of those things which we take satisfaction in this world: Job expected not any of these above ground; all he felt, and all he had in view, was unpleasing and disagreeable, but under ground he expected them.

[1.] He counted upon no house but the grave; (v. 13.) "If I wait, if there be any place where I shall ever be easy again, it must be in the grave. I should decease myself, if I should count upon any outlet from my trouble but what death will give me. Nothing is so sure as that." Note. In all our prosperity, it is good to keep death in prospect. Whatever we expect, let us be sure to expect that; for that may prevent other things which we expect, but nothing will prevent that. But see how he endeavours not only to reconcile himself to the grave, but to recommend it to himself: "It is my house."

The grave is a house; to the sick it is a prison-house; (ch. xxiv. 19, 20.) to the godly it is Bethabara, a passage-house in their way home. "It is my house, mine by descent, I am born to it; it is my father's house; mine by purchase, I have made myself obnoxious to it." We must every one of us shortly remove to this house, and it is our wisdom to provide accordingly; let us think of removing, and send before to our long home.

[2.] He counted upon no quiet bed but in the darkness of the grave: "I have made my bed. It is made, for it is ready, and I am just going to it." The grave is a bed, for we shall rest in it the evening of our day on earth, and rise from it in the morning of our everlasting day, Isa. lvi. 2. Let this make good people willing to die; it is but going to bed, they are weary and sleepy, and it is time that they were in their beds; why should they not go willingly, when their Father calls? "Nay, I have made my bed, by preparation for it; hence I end. It makes me keep a conscience pure, by seeing Christ lying in this bed, and so turning it into a bed of spices, and by looking beyond it to the resurrection."

[3.] He counted upon no agreeable relations but what he had in the grave; (v. 14.) "I have cried to corruption, that is, to the grave, where the body will corrupt, Thou art my father, for our bodies were formed out of the earth, and to the worms there, Ye are my mother and my sister, to whom I am allied, for a man is a worm, and with whom I must be conversant, for the worms shall cover us," ch. xxxi. 26. Job complained that his kindred were estranged from him, (ch. xix. 13, 14.) therefore here he claims acquaintance with other relations, that would cleave to him, when those disinowed him. Note, First, We are all of us near akin to corruption and the worms. Secondly, It is, therefore, good to make ourselves familiar with them, by conversing much with them in our thoughts and meditations, which would very much help us above the inordinate love of life and fear of death.

(2.) He saw all his hopes from this world dropping into the grave with him; (v. 15, 16.) "Seeing I must shortly leave the world, where is now my hope? How can I expect to prosper, who do not expect to live?" He is not hopeless, but his hope is not there where they would have it be. "If in this world only I had hope, I were of all men most miserable; " No, for I hope for comfort and support myself with, who shall see it? It is something out of sight that I hope for, not things that are seen, that are temporal, but things not seen, that are eternal." What is his hope, he will tell us, ch. xix. 25. Non est mortale quod opto, immortale nescio.—I seek not for that which perishes, but for that which abides for ever. "But as for the hopes you would buoy me up with, they shall go down with me to the bars of the pit; you are dying men, and cannot make good your promises, I am a dying man, and cannot enjoy the good you promise. Since, therefore, our rest will be together in the dust, let us all lay aside the thoughts of this world, and set our hearts upon another." We must shortly be in the dust, for dust we are, dust and ashes in the pit, under the bars of the pit, held fast there, never to loose the bands of death till the general resurrection. But we shall rest there, we shall rest together there. Job and his friends could not agree now, but they will both be dead in the grave; the dust of that will shortly stop their mouths, and put an end to the controversy. Let the foresight of this cool the heat of all contenders, and moderate the disputers of this world.

CHAP. XVIII.

In this chapter, Bildad makes a second assault upon Job. In his first discourse (ch. viii.) he had given him encouragement to hope that all should yet be well with him. But here, there is not a word of that; he is grown more peevish, and is so far from being convinced by Job's reasonings, that he is but more exasperated. 1. He sharply reproves Job, as haughtily and passionately, and obstinately as his opinion, and the doctrine of his own mind, lead him to. He enlarges upon the doctrine he had before maintained, concerning the misery of wicked people, and the ruin that attends them, v. 5, 21. In which he seems, all alone, to have an eye to the complaints of the miserable condition he was in, that he was in the dark, bewildered, enwrapped, terrified, and hastening out of the world. "This," says Bildad, "is the condition of a wicked man; and therefore, thou art one."

1. THEN answered Bildad the Shluhite, and said, 2. How long will it be ere you make an end of words? mark, and afterwards we will speak. 3. Wherefore are we counted as beasts, and reputed vile in your sight? 1. He teareth himself in his anger: shall the earth be forsaken for thee? and shall the rock be removed out of his place?
Bildad here shoot his arrows, even bitter words, against poor Job, little thinking, that, though he was wise and good man, in this instance he was serving Satan's design, in adding to his affliction.

1. He charges him with idle, endless, talk, as Eliphaz had done; (ch. xx. 2, 3) so long shall it be! (v. 2) Here he reflects, not only upon Job himself, but either upon all the managers of the conference, (thinking, perhaps, that Eliphaz and Zophar did not speak so close to the purpose as they might have done,) or upon some that were present, who, possibly, took part with Job, and put in a word now and then in his favour, though it be not recorded. Bildad was weary of hearing others speak, and impatient till it came to his turn. What cannot be observed to any man, that for we ought to be swift to hear, and slow to speak. It is common for contenders to monopolize the reputation of wisdom, and then to insist upon it as their privilege to be dictators. How unbecoming that is in others, every one can see; but few that are guilty of it can see it in themselves. Time was, when Job had the last word in all debates; (ch. xxix. 22.) After my words they spake not again. Then he would not need to charge and punish himself, for he was impoverished and brought low, he could scarcely be allowed to speak at all, and every thing he said was as much viliﬁed as formerly it had been magniﬁed. Wisdom, therefore, (as the world goes) is good with an inheritance; (Eccl. vii. 11.) for the poor man’s wisdom is despised, and, because he is poor, his words are not heard, Eccl. ix. 16.

2. With a regardlessness of what was said to him, intimating that, Mark, and afterwords we speak, and it is to no purpose to speak, though what is said be ever so much to the purpose, if those to whom it is spoken will not mark and observe it. Let the ear be opened to hear as the warned, and then the tongues of the learned will do good service, (Isa. 1.4.) and not otherwise. It is an encouragement to those that speak of the things of God, to see the hearers attentive.

3. With a haughty contempt and disdain of his friends, for which they offered; (v. 3) Wherefore are we counted as beasts? This was invidious: Job had indeed called them mockers, had represented them both as unwise and as unkind, wanting both in the reason and tenderness of men, but he did not count them beasts; yet Bildad so represents it, (1.) Because his high spirit resented what Job had said, as if it had been the greatest affront imaginable. Proud men are apt to think themselves slighted more than really they are. (2.) Because his hot spirit was willing to ﬁnd a pretence to be hard upon Job. Those that incline to be severe upon others, will have it thought that they have: first been so upon them.

4. With outrageous passion; He teareth himself in his anger, v. 4. Herein he seems to reﬂect upon what Job had said, (ch. xiii. 14.) Wherefore do I take my ﬂesh in my teeth? It is thine own fault, says Bildad; or he reﬂects upon what he said, (ch. xvi. 9,) where he seemed to charge it upon God; or, as some think, upon Eliphaz; He teareth me in his wrath. "No," says Bildad, "thou alone shalt bear it." He teareth himself in his anger. Note, Anger is a sin that is its own punishment. Fretful, passionate, people tear and torment themselves. He teareth his soul, so the word is; every sin wounds the soul, tears out, that, wrongs, that, (Prov. viii. 36.) unbridled passions are particularly abhorred. May we, with a proud and arrogant expectation to give law even to Providence itself; Shall the earth be forsoaken for thee? Surely not; there is no reason for that, that the course of nature should be changed, and the settled rules of government violated, to gratify the humour of one man. Job, dost thou think the world cannot stand without thee; but that, if thou art ruined, all the world is ruined and forsaken with thee? Some make it a reproof of Job’s justiﬁcation of himself, falsely insinuating, that either Job was a wicked man, or we must deny Providence, and suppose that God has forsaken the earth, and the Rock of ages is removed. It is rather a just reproof of his passionate complaints; when we quarrel with the events of Providence, we forget, that, whatever befalls us, it is, (1.) According to the eternal purpose and counsel of God. (2.) According to the written word. Thus it is written, that in the world we must have tribulation, that since we sin daily, we must expect to smart for it; and, (3.) According to the usual way and custom, the track of Providence, nothing but what is common to men: and to expect that God’s counsels should change, his method alter, and his word fail, to think that the earth should be forsaken for us, and the rock removed out of its place.

5. Yea, the light of the wicked shall be put out, and the spark of his ﬁre shall not shine. 6. The light shall be dark in his tabernacle, and his candle shall be put out with him. 7. The steps of his strength shall be straitened, and his own counsel shall cast him down. 8. For he is cast into a net by his own feet, and he walketh upon a snare. 9. The gin shall take him by the heel, and the robber shall prevail against him. 10. The snare is laid for him in the ground, and a trap for him in the way.

The rest of Bildad’s discourse is entirely taken up in an elegant description of the miserable condition of a wicked man, in which there is a great deal of certain truth, and which will be of excellent use, if duly considered, that a sinful condition is a sad condition, and that iniquity will be men’s ruin, if they do not repent of it. But, 1. It is not true that all wicked people are visibly and openly made thus miserable in this world; nor, 2. That all who are brought into great distress and trouble in this world, are therefore to be deemed and adjudged wicked men, though no other proof appears against them; and therefore, though Bildad thought the application of it to Job was easy, yet it was not safe nor just. In these verses we have,

(1.) The destruction of the wicked foreseen and foretold, under the similitude of darkness; (v. 5, 6.) Yea, the light of the wicked shall be put out. Even his light, the best and brightest part of him, shall be put out; even that which he rejoiced in, shall fall him. Or, the yea may refer to Job’s complaints against them; and therefore, though Bildad thought the application of it to Job was easy, yet it was not safe nor just. In these verses we have,
it shall remain, with which to kindle another fire. Even while he is in his tabernacle, while he is in the body, while he is preserved, let the tabernacle of the soul, (2 Cor. v. 1.) the light shall be dark, he shall have no true solid comfort, no joy that is satisfying, no hope that is supporting; even the light that is in him is darkness; and how great is that darkness! But, when he is put out of this tabernacle by death, his candle shall be put out with him. The period of his life will be the final period of all his days, and will turn all his hopes into endless despair. When a wicked man dies, his expectation shall perish, Prov. xi. 7. He shall lie down in sorrow. (2.) The preparations for that destruction represented under the similitude of a beast or bird caught in a snare, or a malefactor arrested and taken into custody, in order to his punishment, v. 7•10. [1.] Satan is preparing for his destruction. He is the robber that shall prevail against him; (v. 9.) for as he was a murderer, so he was a robber, from the beginning. He, as the tempter, lays snares for sinners in the way, wherever they go, and he shall prevail. If he make them sinful like himself, he will make them miserable like himself. He hunts for the precious life. [2.] He is himself preparing for his own destruction, by going on in sin, and so treasuring up wrath against the day of wrath. God gives him up, as he deserves and desires, to his own counsels, and then his counsels come down, v. 7. His sinful projects and pursuits bring him into mischief. He is cast into a net by his own feet, (v. 8.) runs upon his own destruction, is snared in the work of his own hands, (Ps. ix. 16.) his own tongue falls upon him, Ps. lxiv. 8. In the transgression of an evil man there is a snare. [3.] God is preparing for his destruction. The sinner by his sin is preparing the fuel, and then God by his wrath is preparing the fire. See here, First, How the sinner is infatuated, to run himself into the snare; whom God will destroy, he infatuates. Secondly, How he is embarrassed; the steps of his strength, his mighty designs and efforts, shall be straitened, so that he shall not compass what he intended; and the more he strives to extricate himself, the more will he be entangled. Evil men wax worse and worse. Thirdly, How he is secured and kept from outrunning the judgments of God that are in pursuit of him; the grace shall take him by the heel. He cannot escape the divine wrath, that is in pursuit of him, than a man, so held, can flee from the pursuer. God knows how to reserve the wicked for the day of judgement, 2 Pet. ii. 9. 11. Terrors shall make him afraid on every side, and shall drive him to his feet. 12. His strength shall be hunger-bitten, and destruction shall be ready at his side. 13. It shall devour the strength of his skin: even the first-born of death shall devour his strength. 14. His confidence shall be rooted out of his tabernacle; and it shall bring him to the king of terrors. 15. It shall dwell in his tabernacle, because it is none of his: brimstone shall be scattered upon his habitation. 16. His roots shall be dried up beneath, and above shall his branch be cut off. 17. His remembrance shall perish from the earth, and he shall have no name in the street. 18. He shall be driven from light into darkness, and chased out of the world. 19. He shall neither have son nor nephew among his people, nor any remaining in his dwellings. 20. They that come after him shall be astonished at his day, as they that went before were affrighted. 21. Surely such are the dwellings of the wicked, and this is the place of him that knoweth not God.

Bildad here describes the destruction itself which wicked people are reserved for in the other world, and which, in that degenerate age, will be the period of their misery; the destruction of his own conscience shall haunt him, so that he shall never be easy; wherever he goes, these shall follow him, which way soever he looks, these shall stare him in the face. It will make him tremble to see himself sought against by the whole creation, to see Heaven frowning on him, hell gaping for him, and earth sick of him. He that carries his own accuser, and his own tormentors, always in his bosom, cannot but be afraid on every side. This will drive him to his feet, like the malefactor, who, being conscious of his guilt, flees when none pursueth, Prov. xxviii. 1. But his feet will do him no service, they are fast in the snare, v. 9. The sinner may as soon overpower the divine omnipotence, as overrun the divine omniscience, Amos ix. 2, 3.

No marvel that the sinner is dispirited, and distracted with fear, for, 1. He sees his ruin approaching; destruction shall be ready at his side, to seize him whenever justice gives the word, so that he is brought into desolation in a moment, Ps. lxixii. 19. 2. He feels himself utterly unable to grapple with it, either to escape it, or to bear up under it. That which he relied upon as his strength, (his wealth, power, pomp, friends, and the hardness of his own spirit,) shall fail him in the time of need, and be hunger-bitten, that is, it shall do him no more service than a famished man, pining away for hunger, would do in war or war. The case being thus with him, no marvel that he is a terror to himself. Note, The way of sin is a way of fear, and leads to everlasting confusion, of which the present terrors of an impure and unpacified conscience are earnest, as they were to Cain and Judas. II. See him devoured and swallowed up by a miserable death; and miserable indeed a wicked man’s death is, how secure and jovial soever his life was.

1. See him dying, arrested by the first born of death, some disease, or some stroke that has in it a more than ordinary resemblance of death itself; old age is called death, as it is called a messenger of death, that has in it an uncommon strength and terror: the harbingers of death devour the strength of his skin, they bring rottenness into his bones, and consume them. His confidence shall then be rooted out of his tabernacle; (v. 14.) that is, all that he trusted to, for his support, shall be taken from him, and he shall have nothing to rely upon, no not his own tabernacle. His own soul was his confidence, but for him shall be rooted out of his tabernacle, as a tree that cumbered the ground. Thy soul shall be required of thee.

2. See him dead, and see his case then with an eye of faith. (1.) He is then brought to the king of terrors. He was surrounded with terrors while he lived, (v. 11.) and death was the king of all those terrors; they fought against the sinner in death’s name, for it is by reason of death that sin-fers are, all their lifetime, subject to bondage, (Heb. ii. 15.) and, at length, they will be brought to that which they so long feared, as a captive to the conqueror. Death is terrible to nature; our Saviour himself prayed, Father, save me from this hour; but to the wicked it is, in a moral manner, the fall of a mountain. Thus the judgments of God follow him, after death, in this world, as an indication of the misery his soul is in after death, and an earnest of that everlasting shame and contempt to which he shall rise in the great day. The memory of the accursed, but the name of the wicked shall rot, Prov. x. 7.

V. See a universal amazement at his fall, v. 20. They that see it are affrighted, so sudden is the change, so dreadful the execution, so threatening to all about him; and they that come after, and hear the report of it, are astonished at it; their cars are made to tingle, and their hearts to tremble, and they cry out, Lord, how terrible art thou in thy judgments! and how shall this be reconciled to the universal declaration that God will make himself known, and man will know himself thereunto? See here what is the beginning, and what is the end, of the wickedness of this wicked world. 1. The beginning of it is ignorance of God, and it is a wilful ignorance, for there is that to be known of him which is sufficient to leave them for ever incusable. They know not God, and then they commit all sin; Pharaoh knows not the Lord, and therefore will not obey his voice. 2. The end of it, and that is utter destruction. Such, so miserable, are the dwellings of the wicked. Vengeance will be then to those that know not God, 2 Thess. i. 8. For those whom he has not honour from, he will get him honour upon. Let us therefore stand in awe and not sin, for it will certainly be bitterness in the latter end.

CHAP. XIX.

This chapter is Job's answer to Bildad's discourse in the foregoing chapter. Though his spirit was grieved and much heated, and Bildad was very peevish, yet he gave him leave to say all he designed to say, and did not break in upon him in the midst of his argument; but, when he had done, he gave him a fair answer; in which, 1. He complains of his unkind usage. And very unkindly he takes it, 1. That his comforters added to his affliction, v. 2.-7. 2. That his God was the Author of his affliction, v. 8.-12. 3. That his relations and friends were strange and unexpected to him, and shy of his complaint, v. 13.-20. 4. That he had no compassion shown him in his affliction, v. 20.-22. II. He comforts himself with the believing hopes of happiness in the other world, though he had so little comfort in this, making a very solemn confession of his faith, with a desire that it might be recorded as an evidence of his sincerity, v. 23.-27. III. He concludes with a caution to his friends not to persist in their hard purposes of him, v. 28, 29. If the remonstrance Job here makes upon his grievances, and on the occasions of justifying our complaints, yet his cheerful views of the future state, at the same time, may shame us Christians, and may serve to silence our complaints, or, at least, to balance them.

1. THEN Job answered and said, 2. How long will ye vex my soul, and break me in pieces with words? 3. These ten times have ye reproached me: you are not ashamed that you make yourselves strange to me. 4. And be it indeed that I have erred, mine error remaineth with myself. 5. If indeed ye will magnify yourselves against me, and plead against me my reproach; 6. Know now that God hath overthrown me, and hath compassed me with his net. 7. Behold, I cry out of wrong, but I am not heard: I cry aloud, but there is no judgment.

Job's friends had passed a very severe censure upon him as a wicked man, because he was so grievously afflicted; now here he tells them how ill he took it to be so censured. Bildad twice began with a How long; (ch. xviii. 2.) and therefore Job, being now to answer him particularly, begins with a How long too, v. 2. What is not liked, is commonly thought long; but Job had more reason to think them long who assaulted him, than they had to think him long, who only vindicated himself. Better has been his manners, if we have right on our side, than for offending our brethren, though we have right on our side. Now observe here,

I. How he describes their unkindness to him, and what account he gives of it. 1. They vexed his soul, and that is more grievous than the vexation of the bones, Ps. vi. 2, 3. They were his friends, they came to comfort him, pretended to comfort him for the best, but with a great deal of gravity, and affectation of wisdom and piety, they set themselves to rob him of the only comfort he had now left him in a good God, a good conscience, and a good name; and this vexed him to the heart. 2. They brake him in pieces with words, and those were surely hard and very cruel words that would break a man to pieces: they grieved him, and so brake him; and therefore there will be a reckoning hereafter for all the hard speeches spoken against Christ and his people, Jude 13. 3. They reproached him, v. 5. They gave him a bad character, and laid to his charge things that he knew not. To an ingenious mind reproach is a cutting thing. 4. They made themselves strange to him, were shy of him, now that he was in his troubles; they did not know him, (ch. ii. 12.) were not free with him, as they used to be when he was in his prosperity. Those are governed by the spirit of the world, and not by any principles of true honour or love, who make themselves strange to their friends, or God's friends, when they are in trouble: a friend loves at all times. 5. They not only estranged themselves from him, but magnified themselves against him; (v. 5.) not only looked shy of him, but looked big upon him, and insulted over him, magnifying themselves, to depress him. It is a mean thing, it is a base thing, thus to trample upon those that are down. 6. They pleaded against him his reproach, that is, they made use of his affliction as an argument against him to prove him a wicked man. They should have pleaded for him his integrity, and helped him to take the comfort of that under his affliction, and so have pleaded that against his reproach, as St. Paul; (2 Cor. i. 12.) but, instead of that, they pleaded his reproach against his integrity, which was not only unkind, but very unjust; for where shall we find an honest man, if reproach may be admitted for a plea against him?

II. How he aggravates their unkindness. 1. They had thus abused him often; (v. 3.) These ten times ye have reproached me, that is, very often, as Gen. xxxii. 7. Numb. xiv. 22. Five times they had spoken, and every speech was a double reproach. He spake as if he had kept a particular account of their reproaches, and could tell just how many they were: it is but a peevish and unkindly thing to do, and looks like a design of retaliation and revenge: we better befriended an enemy than found grievances and injuries and unkindnesses, than by remembering them and scorning them up. 2. They continued still to do it, and seemed resolved to persist in it; How long will ye do it? v. 2, 5. I see you will magnify yourselves against me, notwithstanding all I have said in mine own justification. Those that speak too much, seldom think they have said enough; and, when the mouth is opened in passion, the ear is shut to reason. 3. They were not ashamed of what they did, v. 5. They had reason to be ashamed of their base and malicious wiles, but becoming men, and their uncharitableness, so ill becoming good men, and their deceitfulness, so ill becoming friends; but were they ashamed? No, though they were told of it again and again, yet they could not blush.

III. How he answers their harsh censures, by showing them that what they condemned was capable of excuse, which they ought to have considered. 1. The errors of his judgment were excusable; (v. 4.) He is not regarded as God's fault: if I have erred, that I am in the wrong through ignorance or folly, which may well be supposed concerning men, concerning good men; Humanum est errare—Error cleaves to humanity; and we must be willing to suppose it concerning ourselves. It is folly to think ourselves infallible. But be it so, said Job, mine error remaineth with myself, that is, I speak according to the best of my judgment, with all sincerity, and not from a spirit of contradiction. Or, If I be in an error, I am but a man, and do not impose it upon others as you do. I only do my own self and my own work by it, I meddle not with other people, neither to teach them to judge. Men's errors are the more excusable, if they keep them to themselves, and do not disturb others with them. Hast thou faith? Have it to thyself. Some give this sense of these words; If I be in an error, it is I that must smart for it; and therefore you need not concern yourselves; nay, it is I that do smart, and smart severely, for it; and therefore you need not add to my misery by your reproaches.

2. The breakings out of his passion, though not justifiable, yet were excusable, considering the vastness of his grief, and the extremity of his misery. If you will go on to cavil at every complaining word I speak, will make the worst of it, and improve it against me, yet take the cause of the complaint along with you, and weigh that, before you pass a judgment upon the complaint, and turn it to my reproach: know then that God has overcome me, v. 6. Three things he would have them consider, (1.) That his trouble was very great. He was overthrown, and could not help himself, enclosed as in a net, and could not get out. (2.) That God was the Author of it, and that in it he fought against him: It was his hand that overthrew me, it is in his net that I am enclosed; and therefore you need not appear against me thus; I have enough to do to grapple with God's displeasure, let me not have yours also. Let God's controversy with me be ended, before you begin yours. It is barbarous to persecute him whom God hath smitten, and to talk to the grief of one whom he hath wounded, Ps. lxxix. 26. (3.) That he could not obtain any hope of the redress of his grievances, v. 7. He complained of his pain, but got no ease; begged to know the cause of his afflictions, but could not discover it; appealed to God's tribunal for the clearing of his innocence, but could not obtain a hearing; never less a judgment, upon his appeal; I cry out of wrong, but I am not heard. God, for a time, may seem to turn away his ear from his people, to be angry at their prayers, and overlook their appeals to him, and they must be excused if, in that case, they complain bitterly. Woe unto us if God be against us!

8. He hath fenced up my way that I cannot pass, and he hath set darkness in my paths. 9. He hath stripped me of my glory, and taken the crown from my head. 10. He hath destroyed me on every side, and I am gone: and my hope hath he removed like a tree. 11. He hath also kindled his wrath against me, and he counteth me unto him as one of his enemies. 12. His troops come together, and raise up their way against me, and encamp round about my tabernacle. 13. He hath put my brethren far from me, and mine acquaintance are verily estranged from me. 14. My kinsfolk have failed, and my familiar friends have forgotten me. 15. They that dwell in my house, and my maids, count me for a stranger: I am an alien in their sight. 16. I called my servant, and he gave me no answer: I entreated him with my mouth. 17. My breath is strange to my wife, though I entreated for the children's sake of mine own body. 18. Yea, young children despised me; I arose, and they spake against me. 19. All my inward friends abhorred me: and they whom I loved are turned against me. 20. My bone cleaveth to my skin and to my flesh, and I am escaped with the skin of my teeth. 21. Have pity upon me, have pity upon me, O ye my friends; for the hand of God hath touched me. 22. Why do ye persecute me as God, and are not satisfied with my flesh?

Bildad had very disingenuously perverted Job's complaints, by making them the description of the miserable condition of a wicked man; and yet he repeats them here, to move their pity, and to work upon their good nature, if they had any left in them. 1. He complains of the tokens of God's displeasure which he was under, and which infected the wormwood and gall into the affliction and misery. How doeful were accounts of his complaints; (v. 11.) "He hath kindled his wrath against me, which flames and terrifies me, which burns and pains me." What is the fire of hell but the wrath of God? Scared consciences will feel it hereafter, but do not fear it now. Enlightened consciences fear it now, but shall not feel it hereafter. Job's present apprehension was, that God counted him as one of his enemies; and yet, at the same time, God loved him, and gloried in him, as his faithful friend. It is a gross mistake, but a very common one, to think that whom God afflicts, he treats as his enemies; whereas, on the contrary, as many as he loves, he rebukes and chastens; it is the discipline of his sons. Which way severe Job looked, he thought he saw the tokens of God's displeasure against him. 2. Did he look back upon his former prosperity? He saw God's hand putting an end to that; (v. 9.) "He has stripped me of my glory, my wealth, honour, power, and all the opportunity I had of doing good; my children were my glory, but I have lost them; and whatever was a crown to my head, he has taken it from me, and has laid all mine honour in the dust." See the vanity of worldly glory, it is what we may be soon stripped of; and whatever strips us, we must see and own God's hand in it, and comply with his design. 3. Did he look down upon his present troubles? He saw God giving them their commission, and their orders to attack him. They are his troops, that act by his direction, which encamp against me, v. 12. It did not so much trouble him, that his miseries came upon him in troops, as that they were God's troops, in whom it seemed as if God fought against him, and intended his destruction. God's troops encamped r. and his tabernacle, his soldiers lay siege to a strong city, cutting off all provisions from being brought into it, and battering it continually; thus was Job's tabernacle besieged. These were God's soldiers, my God's army, my body for safety; Hast thou not made a hedge about him? Now, on the contrary, they surrounded him, to his terror, and destroyed him on every side, v. 16. 3. Did he look forward for deliverance? He saw the hand of God cutting off all hopes of that; (v. 8.) "He hath fenced up my way, that I cannot pass; I have now no way left to help myself, either to extricate myself out of my troubles, or to ease myself under my present friends. Would I attempt any steps, toward deliverance? I find my way hedged up; I cannot do what I would; nay, if I would please myself with the prospect of a deliverance hereafter, I cannot do it; it is not only out of my reach, but out of my sight; God hath set darkness in my paths, and there is none to tell me how long," Ps. lxxvi. 9. He concludes; (v. 16.) "I am gone, quite lost and undone for this world; my hope hath he removed like a tree cut down, or pleasant tree by which I will not pass again." Hope in this life is a perishing thing, but the hope of good men, when it is cut off from this world, is but removed like a tree, transplanted from this nursery to the garden of the Lord. We shall have no reason to complain, if God thus remove our hopes from the sand to the rock, from things temporal to things eternal. He complains of the unkindness of his relations, and of all his old acquaintance. In this also he owns the hand of God; (v. 13.) He has put my brethren far from me, that is, "He has laid these afflictions upon me, which frighten them from me, and make them stand aloof from my sores." As it was their sin, God was not the Author of it; it is Satan that alienates men's minds from their brethren in affliction; but as it was Job's trouble, God ordered it for the completing of his trial. As we must eye the hand of God in all the injuries we receive from our enemies, (the Lord be Shiahad curse David,) so also the hand of God in their relationships and communications from our friends, which will help us to bear them the more patiently. Every creature is that to us, (kind or unkind, comfortable or uncomfortable,) which God makes it to be: yet this does not excuse Job's relations and friends from the guilt of horrid ingratitude and injustice to him, which he had reason to complain of; few could have borne it so well as he did. He takes notice of the unkindness, 1. Of his kindred and acquaintance, his neighbors, and such as he had formerly been familiar with, who were bound by all the laws of friendship and civility to concern themselves for him, to visit him, and inquire after him, and to be ready to do him all the good offices that lay in their power; yet these were estranged from him, (v. 13.) they took no more care about him than if he had been a stranger whom they never knew. His kinsfolk, who claimed relation to him by kindred, and yet did not maintain it, they failed them; they came short of their former professions of friendship to him, and his present expectations of kindness from them. Even his familiar friends, whom he was mindful of, had now forgot him, had forgotten both his former friendliness to them and his present miseries: they had heard of his troubles, and designed him a visit; but truly they forgot it, so little affected were they with it. Nay, his neighbors, whom he had shown kindness to, his secret, whom he was most intimate with, and laid in his bosom, not only forgot him, but abhorred him, kept as far off as they could, because he was poor, and could not entertain them as he used to do, and because he was sore, and a loathsome spectre.
Those whom he loved, and who therefore were worse than publicans if they did not love him now that he was in distress, not only turned from him, but were turned against him, and did all they could to make him odious, so to justify themselves in being so strange to him, v. 19. So uncertain is the friendship of men; but, if God be our Friend, he will fail us not, nor forsake us. But let men pretend either to humanity or Christianity, ever use their friends as Job's friends used him: adversity is the proof of friendship.

2. Of his domestics and family-relations. Sometimes, indeed, we find that, beyond our expectation, there is a friend that sticks closer than a brother; but, at least, the master of a family expects to be attended on, and taken care of, by those of his family, even his domestics. Job had lost in the fall of his friends, others, it is true, but he is become despicable to others. But poor Job was misused by his own family, and some of his worst foes were those of his own house. He mentions not his children, they were all dead, and we may suppose that the unkindness of his surviving relations made him lament the death of his children so much the more: "If they had been alive," (would he think,) "I should have had comfort in them." As for those that were now about his house, xii. 1.

He laments also those servants slighted him: his maids did not attend him in his illness, but counted him for a stranger and an alien, v. 15. His other servants never heeded him; if he called to them they would not come at his call, but pretended that they did not hear him. If he asked them a question, they would not vouchsafe to give him an answer, v. 16. Job had been a good master to them, and did not despise their cause when they pleaded with him, (ch. xii. 3.) but they were rude to him now, and despised his cause when he pleaded with them. We must not think it strange if we receive evil at the hand of those from whom we have deserved well. Though he was now sickly, yet he was not cross with his servants, and imperious, as is too common, but he entreated his servants with his mouth, when he had authority to command: and yet they would not be civil to him, neither kind nor just. Note, Those that are sick and in sorrow are apt to take ill of others ill, and to lay heart the least unkindness done to them; when Job was in affliction, even his servants' neglect of him troubled him.

(2.) But, one would think, when forsook him, the wife of his bosom should have been tender of him; no, because he would not curse God and die, as she persuaded him, his breath was strange to her too, she did not care for coming near him, nor took any notice of what he said, v. 17. Though he spake to her, not with the authority, but with the tender-ness, of a husband, did not command, but entreated her by that conjugal love which their children were the pledges of, yet she regarded him not. Some read it, "Though I lamented, or bemoaned myself, for the children," that is, "for the death of the children of my own body;" an affliction in which she was equally concerned with him. Now, it appeared, the Devil spared her to him not only to be his tempter, but to be his tormentor. By what she said to him at first, Curst God and die, it appeared that she had little religion in her; and what can one expect that is kind and good from those that have not the fear of God before their eyes, and are not governed by conscience?

III. He complains of the decay of his body; all the beauty and strength of that were gone. When those about him slighted him, if he had been in health, and at ease, he might have enjoyed himself. But he could take as little pleasure in himself as others took in him; (v. 20.) My bone cleaves now to my skin, as formerly it did to my flesh; this was it that filled him with wrinkles; (ch. xvi. 8.) he was a perfect skeleton, nothing but skin and bones. Nay, his skin too was almost gone, little remained unbroken but the skin of his teeth, his gums, and perhaps his lips, all the rest was fetched off by his sore boils. See what little reason we have to indulge the body, which, after all our care, may be thus consumed by the diseases which it has in itself the seeds of.

Lastly, Upon all these accounts, he recommends himself to the compassion of his friends, and justly blames their harshness with him. From this representation of his deplorable case, it was easy to infer,

1. That they ought to pity him, v. 21. This he begs in the most moving, melting, language that could be, enough (one would think) to break a heart of stone: Have pity upon me, have pity upon me, they're my friends; if ye will do nothing else for me, be sorry for me, and shew some concern for me; have pity upon me, for the hand of God hath touched me; my case is sad indeed, for I am fallen into the hands of the living God, my spirit is touched with the sense of his wrath, a calamity of all other the most pitious. Note, It becomes friends to pity one another when they are in any trouble, and not to shut up the bowels of compassion.

2. That, however, they ought not to persecute him: if they would not ease his affliction by their pity, yet they must not be so barbarous as to add to it by their censures and reproaches; (v. 22.) "Why do ye persecute me as God?" Surely his rebukes are enough for one man to bear, you need not add your wormwood and gall to the cup of affliction he puts into my hand, it is bitter enough without that: God has a sovereign power over me, and may do what he pleaseth with me; but do you think that you may do so too? No, we must aim to be like the Most Holy and the Most Merciful, but not like the Most High and Most Mighty. God gives not account of any of his matters, but we must. If they did delight in his calamity, let them be satisfied with his flesh, which was wasted and gone, but let them not, as if that were too little, wound his spirit, and ruin his good name. Great tenderness is owing to those that are in affliction, especially to those that are troubled in mind.

23. Oh that my words were now written! oh that they were printed in a book! 24. That they were graven with an iron pen and lead in the rock for ever! 25. For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth: 26. And though, after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God: 27. Whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another; though my reins be consumed within me. 28. But ye should say, Why persecute we him? seeing the root of the matter is found in me. 29. Be ye afraid of the sword: for wrath bringeth the punishments of the sword, that ye may know there is a judgment.

In all the conferences between Job and his friends, we do not find any more weighty and considerable lines than these; would one have expected it? Here it is much both of Christ and heaven in these verses: and he that said, 'I am as the most high dwelling plainly from the fenced of the better country; that is, the heavenly: as the patriarchs of that age did, Heb. xi. 14. We have here Job's creed, or confession of faith: his belief in God the Father Almighty, the Maker of heaven and earth, and the principles of natural religion, he had often professed; but here we find him no stranger to revealed religion. Though the revelation of the Promised Seed, and the promised inheritance, was then discerned of the same as implied in the doctrine of God to believe in a living Redeemer, and to look for the resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come, for of these, doubtless, he must be understood to speak: these were the things he comforted himself with the expectation of, and not a deliverance from his trouble, or revival of his happiness, in this world, as some would understand him. For, beside that the expressions he here uses, of the Redeemer's standing at the latter day upon the earth, of his seeing and hearing for himself are wretchedly forced, if they be understood of any temporal deliverance, it is very plain that he had no expectation at all of his return to a prosperous condition in this world. He had just now said, that his way was fenced up, (v. 8.) and his hope removed like a tree, v. 10. Nay, and after this, he expressed his despair of any comfort in this life, ch. xiii. 8.—xxx. 23. So that we must necessarily understand him of the redemption of his soul from the power of the grave, and his reception to glory, which is spoken of, Ps. lxix. 15. We have reason to think that Job was just now under an extraordinary impulse of the blessed Spirit, which raised him above himself, gave him light, and gave him utterance, even to his own surprise. And some observe, that, after this, we do not find in Job's discourses such passionate, peevish, unbecoming, complaints of God and his providence, as we have before met with: this hope quieted his spirit, stilled the storm, and, having here cast anchor within the veil, his mind was kept steady from this time forward. Let us observe,

I. To what intent Job makes this confession of his faith here; never did any thing come in more pertinently, or to better purpose. 1. Job was now accused, and this was his appeal. His friends reproached him as a hypocrite, and contemned him as a wicked man: but he appeals to his creed, to his faith, to his hope, and to his own conscience; which not only acquit him from reigning sin, but comforted him with the expectation of a blessed resurrection: these are not the words of him that has a devil. He appeals to the coming of the Redeemer, from this wrangle at the bar to the judgment of the bench, even to Him to whom all judgment is committed, who, he knew, would right him. The consideration of God's day coming, will make it a very small thing with us to be judged of man's judgment, 1 Cor. iv. 3, 4. How easily may we be caught in the snares of men, while we expect the glorious appearance of our Redeemer, and his redeemed, at the last day; and that there will then be a resurrection of names as well as bodies! 2. Job was now afflicted, and this was his cordial: when he was pressed above measure, this kept him from fainting; he believed that he should see the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living; not in this world, for that is the land of the dying. III. He proceeds to the second proposition he introduces it, v. 23, 24. He breaks off his complaints abruptly, to triumph in his comforts; which he does, not only for his own satisfaction, but for the edification of others. Those now about him, he feared, would fittest regard what he said, and so it proved; he therefore wished it might be recorded for the generation to come. O that my words were now written the words I am now about to say! As if he had said, "I own I have spoken many unadvised words, which I could wish might be forgotten, for they will neither do me credit, nor do others good. But I am now going to speak deliberately, and that which I desire may be published to all the world, and preserved for the generations to come, in perpetuum relic memoriam—for an abiding memorial, and therefore that it may be written plain, drawn out in large and legible characters, so that he that runs may read it; and that it may not be left in loose papers, but put into a book; or, if that should perish, that it may be engraved like an inscription upon a monument, with an iron pen, in lead, or in the stone; let the engraver use all his art to make it a durable appeal to posterity." That which Job here somewhat passionately wished for, God graciously granted him; his words are written, they are printed in God's book; so that wherever that book is read, there shall be held forth and concerning Job, He believed, therefore he spake.

III. What his confession itself is; what are the words which he would have to be written. We have here them written, v. 25.—27. Let us observe them.

1. He believes the glory of the Redeemer, and his own interest in him; (v. 25.) I know that my Redeemer liveth; that he is in being, and is my Life, and that he shall stand at last, or stand the last, or at the latter day, and (or above) the earth. He shall be raised up, or, He shall be (at the latter day, that is, in the fulness of time; the gospel-day is called the last time, because that is the last dispensation) upon the earth: so it points at his incarnation; or, He shall be lifted up from the earth; (so it points at his crucifixion;) or, raised up out of the earth; so it is applicable to his resurrection; or, as we commonly understand it. At the end of time, he shall appear over the earth, for he shall come in the clouds, and every eye shall see him, so close shall he come to this earth. He shall stand upon the dust, so the word is; upon all his enemies, which shall be put as dust under his feet; and he shall tread upon them and triumph over them.

Observe here, (1.) That there is a Redeemer provided for fallen man, and Jesus Christ is that Redeemer. The word is Goel, which is used for the next of kin, to whom, by the law of Moses, the right of redemption was a right of nature. Lev. xxv. 25. Our heavenly inheritance was mortgaged by sin, we are ourselves utterly unable to redeem it, Christ is near of kin to us, the next Kinsman that is able to redeem; he has paid our debt, satisfied God's justice for sin, and so has taken off the mortgage, and made a new settlement of the inheritance! Our persons also want a Redeemer, we are sold for sin, and sold under sin; our Lord Jesus has wrought out a redemption for us, for us, and claims redemption for us, so he is truly the Redeemer. (2.) He is a living Redeemer: as we are made by a living God, so we are saved by a living Redeemer, who is both almighty and eternal, and is therefore able to save to the uttermost. Of him it is witnessed that he liveth; Heb. viii. 18. Rev. i. 18. We are dyeing, but he liveth, and hath assured us that because he lives, we shall live also, John xiv. 19. (3.) There are those that, through grace, have an interest: his Redeemer, who shall be known of God, they see him, they know him, and so none can have a claim to him. When Job had lost all his wealth, and all his friends, yet he was not separated from Christ, nor cut off from his relation to him. "Still he is my Redeemer." That next Kinsman adhered to him when all his other kindred forsook him, and he had the comfort of it. (4.) Our interest in the Redeemer is a thing that may be known, and, where it is known, it may be triumphed in; so sufficient to balance all our griefs; I know. Observe with what an air of assurance he speaks it, as one confident of this very thing; I know that my Redeemer lives. His friends had often charged him with ignorance or vain knowledge; but he knows enough, and knows to good purpose, who knows God for his own Redeemer. (5.) They may not come to-morrow, but the latter day, a last day, a day when time shall be no more, Rev. x. 6. That is a day we are concerned to think of every day. (6.) Our Redeemer will, at that day, stand upon the earth, or over the earth, to summon the dead out of their graves, and determine them to an unchangeable state, for to him all judgment is committed. He shall stand, at the last, on the dust to which this earth will be reduced by the corruption of the flesh. He believes the happiness of the redeemed, and his own title to that happiness, that, at Christ's second coming, believers shall be raised up in glory, and so made perfectly blessed in the vision and fruition of God; and this he believes with application to himself. (1.) He counts upon the corrupting of his body in the grave, and speaks of it with a holy carelessness and unconcernedness; Though, after my skin which is to put on corruption, and the skin of my teeth, v. 20.) they destroy (they that are appointed to destroy it, the grave, and the worms in it, of whom he had spoken, ch. xvii. 14.) this body. The word body is added: "Though they destroy this, this skeleton, this shadow, (ch. xvii. 7.) this that I lay my hand upon," or (pointing perhaps to his weak and withered limbs) "this that you see, call it what you will, I expect that shortly it will be a feast for the fowls of the air." Christ's body saw not corruption, but itours must! And Job mentions this, that the glory of the resurrection he believed and hoped for might shine the more bright. Note, It is good for us often to think, not only of the approaching death of our bodies, but of their destruction and dissolution in the grave; yet let not that discourage our hope of their resurrection, for the same power that made man's body at first, out of common dust, can raise it out of its own dust. This body, which we now take such care about, and make such provision for, will, in a little time, be destroyed; Even my reins (says Job) shall be consumed within me; (v. 27.) the innermost part of the body, which perhaps putrifies first. (2.) He comforts himself with the hopes of happiness on the other side death and the grave; After I shall awake, (so the margin reads it,) though this body be destroyed, yet out of my flesh shall I see God. [1.] Soul and body shall come together again. That body which must be destroyed in the grave, shall be raised again, a glorious body; Yet in my flesh I shall see God. The separate soul has eyes wherewith to see God, eyes of the mind; but Job speaks of seeing him with eyes of flesh, in my flesh, with mine eyes; the same body that died shall rise again, a true body, but a glorified body, fit for the employments and entertainments of that world; and therefore a spiritual body. 1 Cor. xv. 44. Let us therefore glorify God with our bodies, because there is such a glory designed for them. [2.] Job and God shall come together again; In my flesh shall I see God, that is, the glorified Redeemer, who is God. I shall see God in my flesh, so some read it; the Son of God clothed with a body which will be visible even to eyes of flesh. Though the body, in the grave, seem despicable and miserable, yet it shall be dignified and made happy in the glory of God. Job now complained that he could not get a sight of God, (ch. xxviii. 8, 9.) but hopes to see him shortly, never more to lose the sight of him, and that sight of him will be the more welcome after the present darkness and distance. Note, It is the blessedness of the blessed that they shall see God; shall see him as he is, see him face to face, and no longer through a glass darkly. See with what pleasure Job enlarges upon this; (v. 27.) "Whom I shall see for myself," that is, see and enjoy, see to my own unspeakable comfort and satisfaction. I shall see him as mine, as he is, and in his own person. And God himself shall be with them, and be their God, they shall be like him, for they shall see him as he is, that is, seeing for themselves, 1 John iii. 2. Mine eyes shall behold him, and not another. First, He, and not another for him, shall be seen, not a type or figure of him, but he himself. Glorified saints are perfectly sure that they are not imposed upon, it is no deceptive illusion—illusion of the senses. Secondly, I, and not another, shall see him. Though my flesh and body shall be consumed, yet I shall not need a proxy, I shall see him with my own eyes. This was what Job hoped for, and what he earnestly desired; which, some think, is the meaning of the last clause, My reins are spent in my bosom, that is, All my desires are summed up and concluded in this; this will crown and complete them all; let me have this, and I shall have nothing more to desire; it is enough, it is all. With this the prayers of David, the son of Jesse, are ended. IV. The application of this to his friends. His creed spake comfort to himself, but warning and terror to them that set themselves against him. 1. It was a word of caution to them, not to proceed and persist in their unkind usage of him, v. 28. He had reproved them for what they had said, and now tells them what they should say for the reducing of themselves and uplifted this better temper. "Why persecute we him thus? Why do we grieve him and vex him, by censuring and condemning him, seeing the root of the matter, or the root of the word, is found in him?" Let this direct us, (1.) In our care concerning ourselves. We are all concerned to see to it, that the root of the matter be found in us. A living, quickening, commanding, principle of grace in the heart, is the root of the matter, as necessary to our resolution as the root of the tree is to its fruitfulness; love to God and our brethren, faith in Christ, hatred of sin these are the root of the matter, other things are but leaves in comparison with this; serious godliness is the one thing needful. (2.) In our conduct toward our brethren. We are to believe that many have the root of the matter in them, who are not in every thing of our mind, who have their follies, and weaknesses, and mistakes; and, to conclude, it is at our peril if we persecute any such. Woe be to him that offends one of these little ones! God will resent and revenge it. Job and his friends differed in some notions concerning the methods of Providence, but they agreed in the root of the matter, the belief of another world, and therefore should not persecute one another for these differences. 2. It was a word of terror to them. Christ's second coming will be very terrible to those that are found smiting their fellow servants; (Math. xxiv, 49.) and therefore, (v. 29.) "He ye afraid of the sword, the flaming sword of God's justice, which turns every way; fear lest you make yourselves obnoxious to it." Good men need to be frightened from sin by the terrors of the Almighty, particularly from the sin of rashly judging their brethren, Matth. vii. 1. Jam. iii. 1. Those that are peevish with their brethren, or censuring them, or malicious toward them, should know, not only that their wrath, whatever it pretends, works not the righteousness of God, but, (1.) They may expect to smart for it in this world; it brings the punishments of the sword: wrath leads to such crime; and expose men to the sword of the magistrate; however, God often takes vengeance for it, and those that showed no mercy, shall find no mercy. (2.) If they repent not, that will be an earnest of worse. By these you may know there is a judgment, not only a present government, but a future judgment, in which hard speeches must be accounted for.

CHAP. XX.

One would have thought that such an excellent confession of faith as Job's, whose disciples in the following chapters should have satisfied his friends, or, at least, have mollified them; but they do not seem to have taken any notice of it, and therefore Zophar here takes his turn, enters the lists with Job, and attacks him with as much vehemence as before. 1. His preface is short, but hot, v. 2, 3. II. His discourse is long, and all upon one subject, the very same that Bildad was large upon, (ch. xviii.) the certain misery of wicked people, and the ruin that awaits them. 1. He asserts in general, that the prosperity of a wicked person is short, and his ruin sure, v. 4. 2. He proves the misery of his condition by many instances—that he should have a diseased body, a troubled conscience, a wasted estate, a beggered family, an infamous name, and that he himself shall perish under the weight of divine wrath. All this is most curiously described here in lofty expressions and lively similitudes; and it often proves true in this world, and always in another, without repentance, v. 10. But the great mistake was, and (as Bishop Patrick expresses it) all the flaw in his discourse, (which was common to him with the rest,) that he imagined God never varied from this method, and therefore Job was, withal, but doubt a very bad man, though it did not appear he was, any other way than by his infidelity.

1. THEN answered Zophar the Naamathite, and said, 2. Therefore do my thoughts cause me to answer, and for this I make haste. 3. I have heard the check of my reproach, and the spirit of my understanding causeth me to answer. 4. Knowest thou not this of old, since man, was placed upon earth, 5. That the triumphing of the wicked is short, and the joy of the hypocrite but for a moment? 6. Though his excellency mount up to the heavens, and his head reach unto the clouds: 7. Yet he shall perish for ever like his own dung: they which have seen him shall say, Where is he? 8. He shall fly away as a dream, and shall not be found; yea, he shall be chased away as a vision of the night. 9. The eye also which saw him shall see him no more; neither shall his place any more behold him.

Here,

1. Zophar begins very passionately, and seems to be in a great heat at what Job had said. Being resolved to condemn Job for a bad man, he was much displeased that he talked so like a good man, and, as it should seem, like a judge himself. He began abruptly; (v. 2.) Therefore do my thoughts cause me to answer. He takes no notice of what Job had said, to move their pity, or to evidence his own integrity, but fastens upon the reproof he gave them in the close of his discourse, counts that a reproach, and thinks himself therefore obliged to answer, because Job had bidden them be afraid of the sword, that he might not seem to be frightened by his menaces. The best counsel is too often taken from an antagonist, and therefore usually may be well spared. Zophar seemed more in haste to speak than because a wise man; but he excuses it with two things. 1. That Job had given him a strong provocation; (v. 3.) "I have heard the check of my reproach, and cannot bear to hear, it any longer." Job's friends, I doubt, had spirits too high to deal with a man in his low condition; and high spirits are impatient of contradiction, and think themselves affronted, if all about them do not say as they said, and with them. 2. He did not intend it the check of their reproach, and then they are bound in honour to return it, if not to draw upon him that gave it. 2. That his own heart gave him a strong instigation. His thoughts caused him to answer, (v. 2.) for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks; but he fathers it (v. 3.) upon the spirit of his understanding: that indeed should cause us to answer, we should rightly apprehend a thing, and duly consider it, before we speak to it; but whether he thereby mistakes the spirit of our discourses, or often mistake the dictates of their passion for the dictates of their reason, and therefore think they do well to be angry.

II. Zophar proceeds very plainly to show the ruin and destruction of wicked people, insinuating that because Job was destroyed and ruined, he was certainly a wicked man, and a hypocrite.

Observe,

1. How this doctrine is introduced; (v. 4.) where he appeals, (1.) To Job's own knowledge and conviction; "Knowest thou not this? Canst thou be ignorant of a truth so plain? Or canst thou doubt of a truth which has been confirmed by the suffrage of all mankind?" Those know little, who do not know that the wages of sin is death. (2.) To the experience of all ages. It was known of old, since man was placed upon the earth, that is, ever since man was made, he has had this truth written in his heart, that the sin of sinners will be their ruin; and ever since there were instances of wickedness, (which there were soon after man was placed on the earth,) there were instances of the punishments of it, witness the exclusions of Adam and Cain. When sin entered into the world, death entered with it: all the world knows that evil pursues sinners, whom vengeance suffers not to live, (Acts xxviii. 4.) and subscribes to that, (Isa. iii. 11.) Woe to the wicked, it shall be light unto him, when he shall see his end.

2. How it is laid down; (v. 5.) The triumphing of the wicked is short, and the joy of the hypocrite but for a moment. Observe, (1.) He asserts the misery, not only of those who are openly wicked and profane, but of hypocrites, who secretly practise wickedness under a show and profession of religion, because such a wicked man he looked upon Job to be; and it is true that a form of godliness, if it be made use of for a cloak of maliciousness, does make bad worse; disseminated piety is double iniquity, and the ruin that attends it will be accordingly. The hottest place in hell will be the portion of hypocrites, as our Saviour intimates, Math xxiv. 51. (2.) He grants that wicked men may, for a time, prosper, may be secure and easy, and very merry; you may see them in triumph and joy, triumphing and rejoicing in their wealth and power, their grandeur and success, triumphing and rejoicing over the fall of others; but the day of the Lord shall come on them; he vex and oppress: they feel no evil, they fear none. Job's friends were loath to own, at first, that wicked people might prosper at all, (ch. iv. 9.) until Job proved it plainely; (ch. ix. 24.—xii. 6.) and now Zophar yields it: but, (3.) He lays it down for a certain truth, that they will not prosper long. Their joy is but for a moment, and will quickly end in endless sorrow; though he be ever so great, and rich, and jovial, he will be humbled, and mortified, and made miserable.
3. How it is illustrated, v. 6, &c.
(1.) He supposes his prosperity to be very high, so high as you can imagine, v. 6. It is in his wisdom and virtue, but his worldly wealth and greatness, that he accounts his excellency, and values himself upon: we will suppose those to mount up to the heavens, and, since his spirit always rises with his condition, you may suppose that with it his head reaches to the clouds. He is every way advanced, the world has done the utmost it can for him, he looks down upon all about him with disdain, while they look up to him with admiration, envy,
and fear; and he suppose his to bid fair for a universal monarchy. And though he cannot but have made himself many enemies before he arrived to this pitch of prosperity, yet he thinks himself as much out of the reach of their darts as if he were in the clouds.

(2.) He is confident that his ruin will, accordingly, be very great, and his fall the more dreadful for his having risen so high; _he shall perish for ever,
v. 7._ His pride and security were the certain presages of his misery. This will certainly be true of all iniquitous sinners in the other world, they shall be undone, for ever undone; but Zophar means his ruin in this world: and indeed sometimes notorious sinners are remarkably cut off by present judgments, they have reason enough to fear what Zo-phar here threatens even the triumphant sinner with.
[1.] _A shameful destruction._ He shall perish like his own dung or dunghill, so loathsomely is he to God and all good men, and so willing will the world be to part with him, Ps. cxix. 119. Isa. 24.
[2.] _A surprising destruction._ He will be brought into desolation in a moment, (Ps. lxxiii.
19.) so that those about him, that saw him but just now, will ask, "Where is he? Could he that made so great a figure vanish and expire so suddenly?"
[3.] _A swift destruction._ He shall fly away upon the wings of his own terrors, and be chased away by the just imprecations of all about him, who would gladly be rid of him. [4.] _An utter destruction._ It will be total; he shall go away like a dream, or vision of the night, which was a mere phantasm, and, whatever in it pleased the fancy, it is quite gone, and nothing of it remains, but what serves us to laugh at the folly of. It will be final,
v. 9. The eye that saw him, and was ready to adore him, shall see him no more, and the place he filed shall no more behold him, having given him an eternal farewell when he went to his own place, as Judas, Acts i. 25.

10. His children shall seek to please the poor, and his hands shall restore their goods.
11. His bones are full of the sin of his youth, which shall lie down with him in the dust.
12. Though wickedness be sweet in his mouth, though he hide it under his tongue; 13. Though he spare it, and forsake it not, but keep it still within his mouth; 14. Yet his meat in his bowels is turned, it is the gall of asps within him. 15. He hath swallowed down riches, and he shall vomit them up again: God shall cast them out of his belly. 16. He shall suck the poison of asps: the viper's tongue shall slay him. 17.
He shall not see the rivers, the floods, the brooks of honey and butter. 18. That which he laboured for shall he restore, and shall not swallow it down: according to his substance shall the restitution be, and he shall not rejoice thereon. 19. Because he hath oppressed and hath forsaken the poor, because he hath violently taken away a house which he builded not; 20. Surely he shall not feel quietness in his belly, he shall not save of that which he desired. 21.
There shall none of his meat be left: therefore shall no man look for his goods. 22.
In the fulness of his sufficiency he shall be in straits: every hand of the wicked shall come upon him.

The instances here given of the miserable condition of the wicked man in this world, are expressed with a great fulness and fluency of language, and the same thing returned to again, and repeated in other words. Let us therefore reduce the particulars to their proper heads; and observe,
1. What his wickedness is, for which he is punished.

The lusts of the flesh, here called _the sins of his youth;_ (v. 11.) for those are the sins which,
at that age, people are most tempted to. The forbidden pleasures of sense are said to be _sweet in his mouth;_ (v. 12.) he indulges himself in all the gra-tifications of the carnal appetite, and takes an inordinate complacency in them, as yielding the most agreeable delights. That is the satisfaction which he hides under his tongue, and rolls there, as the most dainty delicate thing that can be: he keeps it within his mouth; (v. 13.) let him have that,
and he desires no more; he will never part with that for the spiritual and divine pleasures of reliigion, which he has no relish of, nor affection for.
His keeping it still in his mouth, denotes both his obstinate persisting in his sin, (he spares it when he should kill and mortify it, and forsakes it not, but holds it fast, and goes on frowardly in it,) and also his re-acting of his sin, by revolting it, and remembering it with pleasure, as that adulterous woman, (Exch. xxiii. 19.) who multiplied her whoredoms by being too often guilty to her husband's youringga;
so does this wicked man here. Or, his hiding it and keeping it under his tongue denotes his industrious concealment of his beloved lust: being a hypocrite, that he may save the credit of his profession, he has secret haunts of sin; but he who knows what is in the heart, knows what is under the tongue too, and will discover it shortly.

2. The love of the world and the wealth of it;
that is it in which he places his happiness,
and which therefore he sets his heart upon. See here, (1.) How greedy he is of it, v. 15. He has swallowed down riches, as eagerly as ever a hungry man swallowed down meat; and is still crying,
"Give, give." It is that which he desired; (v. 20.)
it was, in his eye, the best gift, and that which he coveted earnestly. (2.) What pains he takes for it; it is that which he laboured for, (v. 18.) not by honest diligence in a lawful calling, but by an unwearied prosecution of all ways and methods, _her things (Ps. xcviii. 16.) her means—right or wrong, to be rich. We must labour, not to be rich, (Prov. xxxi. 4.) but to be charitable, that we may have to give, (Eph. iv.
28.) not to spend. (3.) What great things he promises himself from it, intimated in the rivers, the floods, the brooks of honey and butter; (v. 17.) his being disappointed of them supposes that he had flattered himself with the hopes of them; he expected rivers of sensual delights.

3. Violence, and oppression, and injustice, to his poor neighbours, v. 19. This was the sin of the giants of the old world, and a sin that, as much as any other, brings God's judgments upon nations and f milies. It is charged upon this wicked man, (1.)
That he has forsaken the poor, taken no care of them, showed no kindness to them, nor made any provision for them. At first, perhaps, for a pretence, he gave alms like the Pharisees, to gain a reputation; but, when he had served his turn with it, he left it off, and forsook the poor, whom before he seemed to be concerned for. Those who do good, but not from a good principle, though they may abound in it, and have others to do it for them, crushed them, taken all advantages against them to do them a mischief:
to enrich himself, he has made the poor poorer. (3.)
That he has violently taken away their houses, which he had no right to, as Ahab took Naboth's vineyard, not by secret fraud, by forgery, perjury, or some trick in law, but avowedly, and by open violence.
11. What his punishment is, for this wickedness.
1. He shall be disappointed of his expectation, and shall not find that satisfaction in his worldly wealth which he vainly promised himself; (v. 17.)
He shall never see the rivers, the floods, the brooks of honey and butter, with which he hoped to glut himself. The world is not that to those who love it, and court it, and admire it, which they fancy it will be. The enjoyment sinks far below the raised expectation.
2. He shall be diseased and distempered in his body, and have no little comfort a man has in riches, if he has not health! Sickness and pain, especially if they be in extremity, imbibit all his enjoyments.
This wicked man has all the delights of sense wound up to the height of pleasurableness; but what real happiness can he enjoy, when his bones are full of the sins of his youth, (v. 11.) that is, of the effects of those sins? By his drunkenness and glutony, his uncleanness and wantonness, when he was young, has he not rendered his body a vessel that is dreadful to him long after, and, perhaps, makes his life very miserable, and, as Solomon speaks, consume his flesh and his body, Prov. v. 11. Perhaps he was given to flight when he was young, and then made nothing of a cut or a bruise in a fray; but he feels it in his bones long after. But can he get no case, no relief? No, he is likely to carry his pains and diseases with him to the grave, or rather, they are likely to carry him to the grave, and with him;
he shall die in them, and with them. Do all those with him in the dust: the very putrifying of his body in the grave is to him the effect of sin; (ch. xxiv. 19.) so that his iniquity is upon his bones there, Ezek. xxxii. 27. The sin of sinners follows them to the other side death.
3. He shall be disquieted and troubled in his mind; Surely he shall not feel quietness in his belly,
v. 20. He has not that ease in his own mind that people think he has, but is in continual agitation.
The ill-gotten wealth which he has swallowed down, makes him sick, and, like undigested meat, is always upbraiding him. Let none expect to enjoy that comfortably which they have gotten unjustly.
The unquietness of his mind arises, (1.) From his conscience looking back, and filling him with the fear of the wrath of God against him, for his wickedness. Even that wickedness which was sweet in the commission, and was rolled under the tongue as a defiled thing, is now, when he looks into the reflexions and, when it is reviewed, fills him with horror and evaction. In his bowels, it is turned, (v. 14.) like John's book; in his mouth as sweet as honey, but, when he had eaten it, his belly was bitter, Rev. x.
10. Such a thing is sin; it is turned into the gall of asps, than which nothing is more bitter, the poison of asps, (v. 16.) than which nothing more fatal, and so it will be to him; what he sucked so sweetly,
and with so much pleasure, will prove to him the poison of asps; so will all unlawful gains be. The swelling tongue will prove the viper's tongue. All the charming graces that are thought to be in sin, when conscience is awakened, will turn into so many raging furies. (2.) From his cares looking forward, v. 22. In the fulness of his sufficiency, when he thinks himself most happy, and most sure of the continuance of his happiness, he shall be in straits, that is, he shall think himself so, through the anxieties and perplexities of his own mind, as that rich man who, when his ground brought forth fruit plentifully, (Luke 12.) that he, having nothing left, said, This generation is wiser than the former one: but the latter are wiser than they? (v. 18.)
4. He shall be dispossessed of his estate; that shall sink and dwindle away to nothing, so that he shall not rejoice therein, v. 18. He shall not only never rejoice truly, but not long rejoice at all.
(1.) What he has unjustly swallowed, he shall be compelled to disgorge; (v. 15.) He swallowed dozen riches, and then thought himself sure of them, and that they were as much his own as the thing he has eaten, but he is deceived, he shall vomit them up again; his own conscience perhaps may make him so uneasy in the keeping of what he has gotten, that, for the quiet of his own mind, he shall make restitution, and that not with the pleasure of a virtue, but the pain of a vomit, and with the utmost reluctancy. Or, if he do not himself refund what he has violently taken away, God shall,
by his providence, force him to it, and bring it about,
one way or other, that ill-gotten goods shall return to the right owner. God never allows one of his belly, while yet the love of the sin is not cast out of his heart. So loud shall the clamours of the poor, whom he has impoverished, be against him, that he shall be forced to send his children to them, to sooth them, and beg their pardon; (v. 10.) His children shall seek to please the poor, while his own hands shall restore them their goods with shame,
v. 18. That which he laboured for, by all the arts of opprobrious deceit, he shall have the most bitter upbraidings: for they shall not so swallow it down as to digest it; it shall not stay with him, according to his shame shall the restitution be; having gotten a great deal unjustly, he shall restore a great deal, so that when every one has his own, he will have but a little left for himself. To be made to restore what was unjustly gotten, by the sanctifying grace of God, as Zacchaeus was, is a great mercy; he voluntarily and cheerfully restored all his ill-gotten gains, (Luke 19.) that may give to the poor, Luke xix. 8. But to be forced to restore, as Judas was, merely by the horrors of a despairing conscience, has none of that benefit and comfort attending it, for he threw down the pieces of silver, and went and hanged himself.
(2.) He shall be stripped of all he has, and be, become a beggar. He that spoiled others, shall himsel be spoiled; (Isa. xxxiii. 1.) for every hand of the wicked shall be upon him. The innocent whom he has wronged, sit down by their loss, saying, as David, Wickedness proceedeth from the wicked, but my hand shall not be upon him, 1 Sam. xxiv. 13.
But though they have forgiven him, though they will make no reprovals, divine justice will, and often makes the wicked to avenge the quarrel of the righteous, and squeezes and crushes one bad man by the hand of another upon him. Thus when he is plucked on all sides, he shall not save of that which he has gotten. He shall be 20. Let not this save it all, but he shall save nothing of it. There shall none of his meat (which he coveted so much, and fed upon with so much pleasure) be left, v. 21.
All his neighbours and relations shall look upon him to be in such bad circumstances, that, when he is dead, no man shall look for his goods, none of his kindred shall expect to be a penny the better for him, nor be willing to take out letters of administration for what he leaves behind him. In all this Zophar reflects upon Job, who had lost all, and was reduced to the last extremity.
23. When he is about to fill his belly, God shall cast the fury of his wrath upon him, and shall rain it upon him while he is eating.

24. He shall flee from the iron weapon, and the bow of steel shall strike him through.

25. It is drawn, and cometh out of the body; yea, the glittering sword cometh out of his gall: terrors are upon him.

26. All darkness shall be hid in his secret places; a fire not blown out shall consume him; it shall go ill with him that is left in his tabernacle.

27. The heaven shall reveal his iniquity; and the earth shall rise up against him.

28. The increase of his house shall depart, and his goods shall flow away in the day of his wrath.

29. This is the portion of a wicked man from God, and the heritage appointed unto him by God.

Zophar, having described the many embarrassments and vexations which commonly attend the wicked practices of oppressors and cruel men, here comes to the other side of the question.

1. Their ruin will take its rise from God's wrath and vengeance, v. 23. The hand of the wicked was upon him; (v. 22.) every hand of the wicked. His hand was against every one, and therefore every man's hand will be against him—yet, in grappling with these, he might go near to make his part good; but his heart cannot endure, nor his hands be strong, when God shall deal with him, (Ezek. xxii. 14.) when God shall cast the fury of his wrath upon him. Even wickedness speaks terror. It is not only the justice of God, that is engaged against him, but his wrath, the deep resentment of provocations given to himself: it is the fury of his wrath, incensed to the highest degree; it is cast upon him with force and fierceness; it is rained upon him in abundance; it comes on his head like the fire and brimstone upon Sodom, to which the psalmist also refers, (Ps. xi. 6.) On the head of the wicked Fire and brimstone. There is no fence against this, but in Christ, up in only Covert from the storm and tempest, Isa. xxxii. 2.

2. This wrath shall be cast upon him, when he is about to fill his belly, just going to glut himself with what he has gotten, and promising himself abundant satisfaction in it. Then, when he is eating, shall this tempest surprise him, when he is secure and easy, and in apprehension of no danger; as the ruin of the old world and Sodom came, when they were in the depth of their security, and the height of their sensuality, as Christ observes, Luke xvii. 26, &c. Perhaps Zophar here reflects on the death of Job's children, when they were eating and drinking.

2. Their ruin will be inevitable, and there will be no possibility of escaping it; (v. 24.) He shall flee from the iron weapon. Flight argues guilt: he will not humble himself under the judgments of God, nor seek means to make his peace with him; all his care is to escape the vengeance that pursues him, but in vain: if he escape the sword, yet the bow of steel shall strike him through. God has weapons of all sorts, he has both what his sword, and bent his bow; (Ps. vii. 12, 13.) he can deal with his enemies comminus or eminus—at hand or afar off. He has a sword for those that think to fight it out with him by their strength, and a bow for those that think to avoid him by their craft. See Isaiah xxxiv. 17, 18. Jer. xlvii. 43, 44. He that is marked for ruin, though he may escape one judgment, will find another ready for him.

3. It will be a total, terrible, ruin. When the dart that has struck him through, (for when God shoots, he is sure to hit his mark, when he strikes, he strikes home,) comes to be drawn out of his body, when the glittering sword, (the lightning, so the word is,) the flaming sword, the sword that is bathed in heaven, (Isa. xxxiv. 5.) when this comes out of his gall, O what terrors are upon him! How strong are the convulsions, how violent are the dyings agonies of this, how terrible are the arrests of death to a wicked man!

4. Sometimes it is a ruin that comes upon him insensibly, v. 26. (1.) The darkness he is wrapped up in, is a hidden darkness: it is all darkness, utter darkness, without the least mixture of light, and it is hid in his secret place, whither he is retreated, and where he hopes to shelter himself; he never retires into his own conscience, but he finds himself among the false friends of the world, and there he is consumed by a fire not blown, kindled without noise, a consumption which every body sees the effect of, but nobody sees the cause of; it is plain that the gourd is withered, but the worm at the root, that causes it to wither, is out of sight. He is wasted by a soft gentle fire; surely, but very slowly. When the fuel is very combustible, the fire needs no blowing, and that is his case; he is ripe for ruin; the Fraud, and they that do wickedly, shall be as chaff, Mal. iv. An unquenchable fire shall consume him, so some read it; and that is certainly true of hell-fire.

5. It is a ruin, not only to himself, but to his family; It shall go ill with him that is left in his tabernacle, for the curse shall reach him, and he shall be cut off perhaps by the same grievous disease; there is an entail of wrath upon the family, which will destroy both his heirs and his inheritance, v. 27. The increase of his house shall depart; shall either be cut off by untimely deaths, or forced to run their country. Numerous and growing families, if wicked and vile, are soon reduced, dispersed, and extinguished, by the judgments of God. (2.) His estate will be sunk. His goods shall flow away from his family as fast as ever they flowed in to it, when the day of God's wrath comes, for which, all the while his estate was in the getting by fraud and oppression, he was making a paste to it.

6. It is a ruin which will manifestly appear to be just and righteous, and what he has brought upon himself by his own wickedness; for, (v. 27.) the heaven shall reveal his iniquity, that is, the God of heaven, who sees all the secret wickedness of the wicked, will, by some means or other, let all the world know what a base man he has been, that they may own the justice of God in all that is brought upon him. The earth also shall rise up against him, both to discover his wickedness, and to avenge it. The earth shall disclose her blood, Isa. xxxvi. 21. The earth rises up against him, (as the stomach rises against that which is loathsome,) and will no longer keep him: the Heaven reveals his iniquity, and therefore will not receive him: whither then must he go but to hell? If the God of heaven and earth be his enemy, neither heaven nor earth will receive him, and the roots of the hosts of both are, and will be, at war with him.

Lastly, Zophar concludes like an orator; (v. 29.) This is the portion of a wicked man from God; it is allotted him, it is designed him as his portion. He will have it at last, as a child has his portion, and he will have it for a perpetuity, it is what he must abide by: this is the heritage of his decree from God; it is the settled rule of his judgment, and fair warning is given of dark. O wicked men, thou shalt perish! Ezech. xxxiii. 8. Though impenitent sinners do not always fall under such temporal judgments is are here described, (therein Zophar was mistaken,) yet the wrath of God abides upon them, and they are made miserable by spiritual judges-ments, which are much worse, their consciences being either, on the one hand, a terror to them, and then they are in continual amazement, or, on the other hand, scared and silenced, and then they are given up to a reprobate sense, and bound over to eternal ruin. Never was any doctrine better explained, or worse applied, than this by Zophar, who intended by all this to prove Job a hypocrite. Let us receive the good explanation, and make a better application, for turning to ourselves, to stand in awe, and not to sin.

CHAP. XXI.

This is Job's reply to Zophar's discourse; in which he cEnsures less of his own miseries than he had done in his former discourses, (finding that his friends were not moved by his complaints, to pity him in the least,) and comes to the general question that was in dispute betwixt him and them. Whether outward prosperity, and the continuance of it, were a mark of the true church, and the true members of it, so that the ruin of a man's prosperity is sufficient to prove him a hypocrite, though no other evidence appear against him: this they asserted, but Job denied. 1. His preface here is designed for the moving of their consciences, that they may gain their attention. 11. His discourse is designed for the convincing of their judgments, and the rectifying of their mistakes. He owns that God does sometimes hang out a wicked man as it were in chains, and sever that terror and hell upon the world, in their case, that is,
but after a long reprieve, a v. 17. 21.
2. He observes a very great variety in the ways of God's providence toward men, even toward bad men, v. 22.
26. 5. He overthrows the ground of their severe censures of him, by showing that destruction is reserved for the other world, and that the wicked often escape to the last in this, v. 37. to the end. In this, Job was clearly in the right.

1. But Job answered and said, 2. Hear diligently my speech; and let this be your consolations. 3. Suffer me that I may speak; and after that I have spoken mock on. 4. As for me, is my complaint to man if and it were so, why should not my spirit be troubled? 5. Mark me, and be astonished, and lay your hand upon your mouth. 6. Even when I remember I am afraid, and trembling taketh hold on my flesh.

Job here recommends himself, both his case and his discourse, both what he suffered, and what he said, to the compassionate consideration of his friends.

1. That which he entreats of them is very fair, that they would suffer him to speak, (v. 3.) and not break in upon him, as Zophar had done, in the midst of his discourse. Losers, of all men, may have leave to speak; and if those that are accused and censured may not speak for themselves, they are wronged without remedy, and have no way to come at their case. He entreats that they would hear diligently his speech, (v. 2.) as those that were willing to understand him, and, if they were under a mistake, to have it rectified; and that they would mark him; (v. 5.) for we may as well not hear as not heed and observe what we hear.

2. That which he urges for this is very reasonable. (l.) They came to comfort him; "Now, "says he, "let this be your consolations; (v. 2.) if you have no other comforts to administer to me, yet deny me not this; be so kind, so just, as to give me a patient hearing, and that shall pass for your consolations." Nay, they could not know how to comfort him, if they would not give him leave to open his case, and tell his own story. Or, "It will be a consolation to yourselves, in the reflection, to have dealt tenderly with your afflicted friend, and not abashedly.

(2.) He would have them speak, when it came to their turn. "After I have spoken, you may go with what you have to say, and I will not hinder you, though you go on to mock me." Those that engage in controversy, must count upon having hard words given them, and resolve to bear it patiently;
for, generally, they that mock, will mock on, what-erver is said to them.

(3.) He hoped to convince them; "If you will but give me a fair hearing, mock on if you can, but I believe I shall say that which will change your note, and make you pity me, rather than mock me." (4.) They were not his judges; (v. 4.) "Is my complaint to man? No, if it were, I see it would be to little purpose to complain. But my complaint is to God, and to him do I appeal. Let him be Judge between you and me. Before him we stand upon even terms, and therefore I have the privilege of being heard. Absurd as your complaint were to men, my spirit would be troubled, for they would not regard me, nor rightly understand me;
but my complaint is to God, who will suffer me to speak, though you will not." It would be said if God should deal as unkindly with us as our friends sometimes do.

(5.) There was that in his case, which was very surprising and astonishing, and therefore both needed and deserved their most serious consideration.
It was not a common case, but a very extraordinary one.

[1.] He himself was amazed at it, at the troubles God had laid upon him, and the censures of his friends concerning him; (v. 6.) "When I remember that terrible day, in which I was on a sudden stripped of all my comforts, that day in which I was stricken with sore boils; when I remember all the hard speeches with which you have grieved me, I confess I am afraid, and trembling takes hold of my flesh, especially when I compare this with the prosperous condition of many wicked people, and the appaluses of their neighbours, with which they pass through the world." Note, The providences of God, in the government of the world, are sometimes very astonishing, even to wise and good men, and bring them to their wit's end.

[2.] He would have them wonder at it; (v. 5.)
"Mark me, and be astonished. Instead of expounding my troubles, you should awfully adore the un-searchable mysteries of Providence in afflicting on thou, of whom you know no evil; you should there fore lay your hand upon your mouth; silently wait the issue, and judge nothing before the time." God's way is in the sea, and his path in the great waters. When we cannot account for what he does, in suffering the wicked to become so, and the truly wicked to be preserved, (finding the depth of those procedings, it becomes us to sit down and admire them.) Uproar men shall be astonished at this, ch.
xvii. 8. Be you so.

7. Wherefore do the wicked live, become old, yea, are mighty in power? 8. Their seed is established in their sight with them, and their offspring before their eyes. 9. Their houses are safe from fear, neither is the rod of God upon them. 10. Their bull gendereth, and faileth not; their cow calveth, and casteth not her calf. 11. They send forth their little ones like a flock, and their children dance. 12. They take the timbrel and harp, and rejoice at the sound of the organ. 13. They spend their days in wealth, and in a moment go down to the grave. 14. Therefore they say unto God, Depart from us; for we desire not the knowledge of thy ways. 15. What is the Almighty, that we should serve him? and what profit should we have, if we pray unto him? 16. Lo, their good is not in their hand: the counsel of the wicked is far from me.

All Job's three friends, in their last discourses, had been very large in describing the miserable condition of a wicked man in this world; "It is true," says Job, "remarkable judgments are sometimes brought upon notorious sinners, but not always; for we have many instances of the great and long prosperity of those that are openly and avowedly wicked; though they are hardened in their wickedness by their prosperity, yet they are still suffered to prosper."

I. He here describes their prosperity, to the height, and breadth, and length, of it. "If this be true, as you say, pray tell me wherefore do the wicked live?" v. 7. The matter of fact is taken for granted, for we see instances of it every day. 1. They live, and are not suddenly cut off by the strokes of divine vengeance. They yet speak, who have set their mouths against the heavens. They yet act, who have stretched their hands against God. Not only they live, that is, they are reprimed, but they live in prosperity. 1 Sam. xxv. 6. Nay, 2. They become old, they have the honour, satisfaction, and advantage, of living long; time enough to raise their families and estates. We read of a sinner a hundred years old, Isa. lxv. 20. But this is not all. 3. They are mighty in power, are preferred to places of authority and trust, and not only make a great figure, but bear a great sway. Vivit imo, et in senatum venit—He not only lives, but walks into the senate-house. Now wherefore is it so? Note, It is worth while to inquire into the reasons of the outward prosperity of wicked people. It is not because God has blessed the earth, because he does not see, or does not hear, or cannot punish, their wickedness; but it is because the measure of their iniquities is not full. This is the day of God's patience, and in some way or other he makes use of them, and their prosperity, to serve his own counsels, while it ripens them for ruin; but the chief reason is, because he will make it to appear there is another world, which is the world of retribution, and not this.

The prosperity of the wicked is here described to be: (1.) Complete and consummate. [1.] They are multiplied, and their family is built up, and they have the satisfaction of seeing it; (v. 8.) Their seed is established in their sight. This is put first, as that which gives both a pleasant enjoyment, and a pleasing prospect. [2.] They are easy and quiet, v. 9. Whereas Zophar had spoken of their continual frights and troubles, Job says, Their houses are safe, but they are afraid from the fear of it; (v. 9.) and so far are they from the killing wounds of God's sword or arrows, that they do not feel the smart of so much as the rod of God upon them. [3.] They are rich, and thrive in their estates; of this he gives only one instance, v. 10. Their cattle increase, and they meet with no disappointment in them; not so much as a cow casts her calf, and then their much must needs grow more. This is promised, Exod. xxvii. 26. Deut. vii. 14. [4.] They are merry, and live a jovial life; (v. 11, 12.) They send forth their little ones abroad among their neighbours, to learn all sorts of arts, and ways; and in a moment go down to the grave. They have their balls and music-meetings, at which their children dance; and dancing is fittest for children, who know not better how to spend their time, and whose innocence guards them against the mischiefs that commonly attend it. Though the parents are not so very youthful and frolicsome as to dance themselves, yet they take the timbrel and harp; they pipe, and their children dance, and the children pipe; and they put their instruments out of tune, or to withhold their hearts from any joy. Some observe that this is an instance of their vanity, as well as of their prosperity. Here is none of that care taken of the children, which Abraham took of his, to teach them the way of the Lord, Gen. xviii. 19. Their children do not pray, or say their catechism, but dance, and sing, and rejoice at the sound of the organ. Sensual pleasures are all the delights of carnal people; and as men are themselves, so they breed their children.

(2.) Continuing and constant; (v. 13.) They spend their days, all their days, in wealth, and never know what it is to want; in mirth, and never know what sadness means; and at last, without any previous alarms to frighten them, without any anguish, or agony, in a moment they go down to the grave, and there are no bands in their death. If there were not another life after this, it was more desirable to die by the quickest, shortest stroke of death. Since we must go down to the grave; if that were the furthest of our journey, we would wish to go down in a moment, to swallow the biter pill, and not chew it.

II. He shows how they abuse their prosperity, and are confirmed and hardened by it in their impiety, v. 14, 15. Their gold and silver serve to steel them, to make them more insolent, and more impudent, to their wickedness. Now he mentions this, either, 1. To increase the difficulty. It is strange that any wicked people should prosper thus, but especially that those should prosper, who are arrived at such a pitch of wickedness as openly to bid defiance to God himself, and tell him to his face that they care not for him; nay, and that their prosperity should be continued, though they bear up themselves upon that, in their opposition to God; with that weapon they fight against him, and yet they are not disarmed. Or, 2. To lessen the difficulty. God suffers them to prosper; but let us not wonder at it, for the prosperity of fools destroys them, by hardening them in sin, Prov. i. 32. Ps. lxxiii. 7-9.

See how light these prospering sinners make of God and religion, as if, because they have so much of this world, they had no need to look after another.

(1.) See how ill affected they are to God and religion; they abandon them, and cast off the thoughts of them. [1.] They dread the presence of God, they say unto him, Depart from us, let us never be troubled with the apprehension of our being under God's eye, nor be restrained by the fear of him. Or, They bid him depart, as one they do not need, nor have any occasion to make use of. The world is the portion they have chosen, and the world is the portion they would, or they suppose that they have that, they can live without God. Justly will God say to them, Depart, (Matth. xxxv. 41.) who have bid him depart; justly does he now take them at their word. [2.] They dread the knowledge of God, and of his will, and of their duty to him; We desire not the knowledge of thy ways. They that are resolved not to walk in God's ways, desire not to know them, because their knowledge will be a continual reproach to their disobedience, John iii. 19.

(2.) See how they argue against God and religious duties. What is the Almighty? Strange, that ever creatures should speak so insolently, that ever reasonable creatures should speak so absurdly and unreasonably. The two great bonds by which we are drawn and held to religion, are those of duty and interest; now they here endeavour to break both these bonds asunder. [1.] They will not believe it is their duty to be religious. What is the Almighty, that we should serve him? (Exod. v. 2.) Who is the Lord, that I should obey his voice? Observe how slightly they speak of God; What is the Almighty? As if he were a mere name, a mere cypher, or one they have nothing to do with, and that has nothing to do with them. How hardly they speak of religion! They call it a service, and mean a hard service. Is it not enough, they think, to keep up a fair correspondence with the Almighty, but they must serve him, which they look upon as a task and drudgery. Observe also how high they speak of themselves: "That we should serve him: we, who are rich and mighty in power, shall we be subject and accountable to him? No, we are Lords," Jer. ii. 31. [2.] They will not believe it is their interest to be religious. What profit shall we have if we pray unto him? All the world are for what they can get, and therefore wisdom's merchandise is neglected, because they think there is nothing to be got by it; It is vain to serve God, Mal. iii. 13, 14. Praying will not pay debts, nor prevent our losing what we have; Godliness may hinder a man's preferment, and expose him to losses; and what then? Is nothing to be called gain but the wealth and honour of this world? If we obtain the favour of God, and spiritual and eternal blessings, we have no reason to complain of losing by our religion. But if we have not profit by prayer, it is our own fault, (Isa. lvi. 3, 4,) it is because we ask amiss, Jam. iv. 3. Religion itself is not a vain thing; if it be so to us, it is because we find ourselves for resting in the outside of it, Jam. i. 26.

III. He shows their folly herein, and utterly disclaims all concurrence with them; (v. 19.) Lo, their good is not in their hand, that is, They did not get it without God, and therefore they are very ungrateful to slight him thus: it was not their might, nor the power of their hand, that got them this wealth, and therefore they ought to remember God who gave it them. Nor can they keep it without God, and therefore they are very unwise to lose their interest in him, and bid him to depart from them. Some give this sense of it; "Their good is in their barns and their bags, hoarded up there; it is not in their hand, to do good to others with it; and then, what good does it do them?" "Therefore," says Job, "the counsel of the wicked is far from me. Far be it from me that I should be of their mind, say as they say, do as they do, and take my measures from them. Their prosperity approved their sayings, though their way be their folly; (Ps. xlix. 13.) but I know better things than to walk in their counsel."

17. How oft is the candle of the wicked put out? and how oft cometh their destruction upon them? God distributeth sorrows in his anger. They are as stubble before the wind, and as chaff that the storm carrieth away. 19. God layeth up his iniquity for his children: heewardeth him, and he shall know it. 20. His eyes shall see his destruction, and he shall drink of the wrath of the Almighty. 21. For what pleasure hath he in his house after him, when the number of his months is cut off in the midst? 22. Shall any teach God knowledge? seeing he judgeth those that are high. 23. One dieth in his full strength, being wholly at ease and quiet: 24. His breasts are full of milk, and his bones are moistened with marrow. 25. And another dieth in the bitterness of his soul, and never eateth with pleasure. 26. They shall lie down alike in the dust, and the worms shall cover them.

Job had largely described the prosperity of wicked people; now, in these verses, I. He opposes this to what his friends had main tained concerning their certain ruin in this life. "Tell me how often do you see the candle of the wicked put out? Do you not as often see it burn down to the socket, until it goes out of itself? v. 17. How often do you see their destruction come upon them, or God distributing sorrows in his anger among them? Do you not as often see their mirth and prosperity continuing to the last?" Perhaps there are as many instances of notorious sinners ending their days in pomp, as ending them in misery; which observation is sufficient to invalidate their arguments against Job, and to show that no certain judgment can be made of men's character by their outward condition.

II. He reconciles this to the holiness and justice of God; though wicked people prosper thus all their days, yet we are not therefore to think that God will let their wickedness always go unpunished. No,

1. Even while they prosper thus, they are as stubble and chaff before the stormy wind, v. 18. They are light and worthless, and do not rest either with God, or with wise and good men. They are fitted to destruction, and continually lie exposed to it; and, in the height of their pomp and power, there is but a step between them and ruin.

2. Though they spend all their days in wealth, God is laying up their iniquity for their children, (v. 19.) and he will visit it upon their posterity when they are gone. The oppressor lays up his goods for his children, to make them gentlemen, but God lays up his iniquity for them, to make them beggars: he keeps an exact account of the fathers' sins; seals them up among his treasures, (Deut. xxxii. 34.) and will justly punish the children, while the riches, to which the curse cleaves, are found as assets in their hands.

3. Though they prosper in this world, yet they shall be reckoned with in another world. God rewards him according to his deeds at last, (v. 19.) though the sentence passed against his evil works be not executed speedily. Perhaps he may not now be made to fear the wrath to come, but he may flatter himself with hopes that he shall have peace, though he go on; but he shall be made to feel it in the day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God. He shall know it; (v. 19.) His eyes shall see his destruction, which he would not be persuaded to believe. They shall not see, but they shall not. Isa. xxvi. 11. The eyes that have been wilfully shut against the grace of God, shall be opened to see his destruction. He shall drink of the wrath of the Almighty; that shall be the portion of his cup. Compare Ps. xi. 6. with Rev. xiv. 10. The misery of damned sinners is here set forth in a few words, but they are very terrible ones, they lie under the wrath of an Almighty God, who, in their destruction, both shows his wrath, and makes known his power.

If this will be his condition in the other world, what good will his prosperity in this world do him? (v. 21.) What pleasure has he in his house after him? Our Saviour has let us know how little pleasure the rich man in hell had in his house after him, when the remembrance of the good things he had received in his lifetime, would add much to his misery, as did also the sorrow he was in, lest his five brethren, whom he left in his house after him, should follow him to that place of torment, Luke xvi. 25-28. So little will the gain of the world profit him that has lost his soul.

III. He resolves this difference, which Providence makes between one wicked man and another, into the wisdom and sovereignty of God; (v. 22.) Shall any pretend to teach God knowledge? Dare we arrange God's proceedings, or blame his conduct? Shall we take upon us to tell God how he should govern the world, what sinner he should spare, and what he should punish? He has both authority and ability to judge those that are high. Angels in heaven, princes and magistrates on earth, are accountable to God, and must receive their doom from him; he manages them, and makes what use he pleases of them: shall he then be accountable to us, or receive advice from us? He is the Judge of all the earth, and therefore, no doubt, he shall do right, (Gen. xviii. 25. Rom. iii. 6.) and those proceedings of his providence which seem to contradict one another, he can make, not only mutually to agree, but jointly to serve his own purposes.

The little difference there is between one wicked man's dying impenitent in peace and pomp, and another wicked man's dying so in pain and misery, when both will, at last, meet in hell, he illustrates by the little difference there is between one man's dying suddenly and another's dying slowly, when they will both meet shortly in the grave. So vast is the disproportion between time and eternity, that, if hell be the lot of every sinner at last, it makes little difference, if one goes singing thither, and another sighing. See,

1. How various the circumstances of people's dying are. There is one way into the world, we say, but many ways out of it. Some are born by easy and quick birth, and others by hard and lingering, so dying is to some much more terrible than to others; and, since the death of the body is the birth of the soul into another world, death-bed agonies may not unfrequently be compared to child-bed throes. Observe the difference.

(1.) One dies suddenly, in his full strength, not weakened by age or sickness, (v. 23.) being wholly at ease and quiet, and nothing apprehended at all of the approach of death, nor in any fear of it; but, on the contrary, because his breasts are full of milk, and his bones moistened with marrow, (v. 24.) that is, he is healthful and vigorous, and of a good constitution, (like a milk-cow that is fat and in good liking,) he counts upon nothing but to live many years in mirth and pleasure. Thus fair does he bid for life, and yet he is cut off in a moment by the stroke of death. Note, It is a common thing for persons to be taken away when they are in the height of their vigour, in the highest degree of health, when they least expect death, and think themselves best armed against it, and are ready not only to set death at a distance, but to set it at defiance. Let us therefore never be secure; for we have known many well and dead in the same week, the same day, the same hour, nay, perhaps, the same minute. Let us therefore be always ready.

(2.) Another dies slowly, and with a great deal of previous pain and misery, (v. 25.) in the bitterness of his soul, such as poor Job was himself now in, and never eats with pleasure, has no appetite to his food, nor any relish of it, through sickness, or age, or sorrow of mind. What great reason have those to be thankful, that are in health, and always eat with pleasure! And what little reason have they to complain, who sometimes do not eat thus, when they hear of many that never do.

2. How inscrutable this difference is in the grave: as rich and poor, so healthful and unhealthy, meet there; (v. 26.) They shall lie down alive in the dust, and the worms shall cover them, and feed sweetly on them. Thus, if one wicked man die in a palace, and another in a dungeon, they will meet in the congregation of the dead and damned, and the worm that dies not, and the fire that is not quenched, will be the same to them, which makes those differences inconsiderable, and not worth perplexing ourselves about.

27. Behold, I know your thoughts, and the devices which ye wrongfully imagine against me. 28. For ye say, Where is the house of the prince? and where are the dwelling-places of the wicked? 29. Have ye not asked them that go by the way? and do ye not know their tokens? 30. That the wicked is reserved to the day of destruction? they shall be brought forth to the day of wrath. 31. Who shall declare his way to his face? and who shall repay him what he hath done? 32. Yet shall he be brought to the grave, and shall remain in the tomb. 33. The clods of the valley shall be sweet unto him, and every man shall draw after him, as there are innumerable before him. 34. How then comfort ye me in vain, seeing in your answers there remaineth falsehood?

In these verses,

I. Job opposes the opinion of his friends, which he says they all adhered to, That the wicked are sure to fall into such visible and remarkable ruin, as Job was now fallen into, and none but the wicked; upon which principle, they condemned Job as a wicked man. "I know your thoughts," says Job, (v. 27.) "I know you will not agree with me; for your judgments are tainted and biased by your prejudices and opinions against me, and the devices which you wrongfully imagine against my peace and honour: and how can such men be convinced?"

Job's friends were, indeed, in answer to his discourse concerning the prosperity of the wicked, "Where is the house of the prince?" (v. 28.) Where is Job's house, or the house of his eldest son, in which his children were feasting; inquire into the circumstances of Job's house and family, and then ask, Where are the dwelling-places of the wicked? and compare them together, and you will soon see that Job's house is in the same predicament with the houses of tyrants and oppressors, and may therefore conclude that doubtless he was such a one."

II. He lays down his own judgment to the contrary, and, for proof of it, appeals to the sentiments and observations of all mankind. So confident is he that he is in the right, that he is willing to refer the cause to the next man that comes by; (v. 29.) "Have ye not asked them that go by the way—any indifferent person, any that will answer you? I say not, as Eliphaz, (ch. v. 1.) To which of the Saints—1 ask, To which of the children of men, will you turn? Turn to which you will, you will find them all of my mind; that the punishment of sinners is deserving more for the other world than this, is according to the prophecy of Enoch, the seventh from Adam, Jude 14. Do you not know the tokens of this truth, which all that have made any observations upon the providences of God concerning mankind in this world, can furnish you with?

Now what is it that Job here asserts? Two things,

1. That impenitent sinners will certainly be punished in the other world, and, usually, their punishment is put off until then.

2. That therefore we are not to think it strange if they prosper greatly in this world, and fall under no visible token of God's wrath. Therefore they are spared now, because they are to be punished then; therefore the workers of iniquity flourish, that they may be destroyed for ever, Ps. xci. 7.

The sinner is here supposed,

1. To live in a great deal of power, so as to be not only the terror of the mighty in the land of the living (Eph. v. 11. 27.) but the terror of the wise and good too, whom he keeps in such awe, that none dares declare his way to his face, v. 31. None will take the liberty to reprove him, to tell him of the wickedness of his way, and what will be in the end thereof; so that he sins securely, and is not made to know either shame or fear. The prosperity of fools destroys them, by setting them (in their own conceit) above reproofs, by which they might be brought to that repentance which alone will prevent their ruin. They are marked for destruction that are let alone in sin, Hos. iv. 17.

And if none dares declare his way to his face, much less dare any repay him what he has done, and make him refund there where he has done wrong. He is one of those great flies which break through the cobwebs of the law, that hold only the little ones: this imboldens sinners in their sinful ways, that they can brow-beat justice, and make it afraid to meddle with them. But there is a day coming when the voice of the Lord of hosts will not be heard of them; shall have their sins set in order before them, and their way declared to their face, to their everlasting confusion, who would not have it done here, to their conviction; when those who would not repay the wrongs they had done, shall have them repaid to them.

2. To die, and be buried in a great deal of pomp and magnificence, v. 32, 33. There is no remedy; he must die; that is the lot of all men: but every thing you can think of shall be done to take off the reproach of death. [1.] He shall have a splendid funeral; a poor thing for any man to be proud of the prospect of; yet with some it passes for a mighty thing; well, he shall be brought unto the grave in state, surrounded with all the honours of the Heralds' office, and all the respect his friends can then pay to his remains: the rich man died, and was buried, but no mention is made of the poor man's burial, Luke xvi. 22. [2.] He shall have stately mourners over him, he shall remain in the tomb with a Hic jacet—Here lies over him, and a large encomium. Perhaps it is meant of the embalming of his body, to preserve it, which was a piece of honour anciently done by the Egyptians to their great men. He shall watch in the tomb, so the word is, shall abide solitary and quiet there, as a watchman in his tower. [3.] The elods of the valley shall be exalted to him; there shall be as much done as can be with rich odours, to take off the noisomeness of the grave, as by lamps to set aside the darkness of it, which perhaps was referred to in the foregoing phrase of watching in the tomb: but it is all a jest; what is the light, or what the perfume, to a man that is dead? [4.] It shall be alleged, for the lessening of the disgrace of death, that it is the common lot; he has only yielded to fate, and every man shall share after him, as there was innumerable before him. Note, Death is the terror of all the earth: when we are to cross that darksome valley, we must consider, First, That there are innumerable before us, it is a tracked road; which may help to take off the terror of it. To die is ire ad flures—to go to the great majority. Secondly, That every man shall draw after us: as there is a plain track before, so there is a long train behind; we are neither the first, nor the last, that pass through this valley: and here the enemys must go in his own order, the order appointed of God.

Lastly, From all this Job infers the impenitency of their discourses, v. 34. 1. Their foundation is rotten, and they went upon a wrong hypothesis; "In your answers there remaineth falsehood; what you have said, stands not only unproved but dis proved, and lies under such an imputation of false hood as you cannot clear it from." 2. Their building was therefore weak and tottering: "You com forth in vain. All you have said, gives me no relief; you tell me that I shall prosper again, if I turn to God, but you go upon this presumption, that pietv shall certainly be crowned with prosperity, which is false; and therefore how can your inference from it yield me any comfort?" Note, Where there is not truth, there is little comfort to be expected.

CHAP. XXII.

Eliphaz here leads on a third attack upon poor Job, in which Bildad followed him, but Zophar drew back, and quitted the field. It was one of the unhappinesses of Job, as it is of many an honest man, to be misunderstood by his friends. He had spoken of the prosperity of wicked men in this world as a mystery of Providence, but they took it for a reflection upon Providence, as countenancing their wickedness; and they reproached him accordingly. In this chapter, 1. Eliphaz checks him for his complaints of God, and of his dealings with him, as if he thought God had done him wrong, v. 2. 4. II. He charges him with many high enmities and misdemnaeors, for which he supposes God was made wroth with him, v. 5. 7—11. 2. Atheism and infidelity, v. 12. 14. III. He compared his case to that of the old world, v. 15. 20. IV. He gives him very good counsel, assuring him that, if he would take it, God would return in mercy to him, and he should return to his former prosperity, v. 21. 30.

1. THEN Eliphaz the Temanite answered and said, 2. Can a man be profitable unto God, as he that is wise may be profitable unto himself? 3. Is it any pleasure to the Almighty that thou art righteous? or is it gain to him that thou makest thy way perfect? 4. Will he re prove thee for fear of thee? will he enter with thee into judgment?

Eliphaz here insinuates that, because Job complained so much of his afflictions, he thought God was unjust in afflicting him; but it was a strained innuendo, Job was far from thinking so. What Eliphaz says here, is therefore unjustly applied to Job, but in itself it is very true and good;

1. That when God does us good, it is not because he is indebted to us; if he were, there might be some colour to say, when he afflict us, "He does not deal fairly with us:" but whoever pretends that he has by any merititious action made God his Debtor, let him prove this debt, and he shall be
5. Is not thy wickedness great? and thine iniquities infinite? 6. For thou hast taken a pledge from thy brother for nought, and stripped the naked of their clothing. 7. Thou hast not given water to the weary or drink, and thou hast withholden bread from the hungry. 8. But as for the mighty man, he had the earth; and the honourable man dwelt in it. 9. Thou hast sent widows away empty; and the arms of the fatherless have been broken: 10. Therefore snares are round about thee, and sudden fear troubleth thee; 11. Or darkness, that thou canst not see; and abundance of waters cover thee. 12. Is not God in the height of heaven? and, behold, the height of the stars, how high they are! 13. And thou sayest, How doth God know? can he judge through the dark cloud? 14. Thick-clouds are a covering to him, that he seeth not; and he walketh in the circuit of heaven.

Eliphaz and his companions had condemned Job, in general, as a wicked man and a hypocrite; but none of them had descended to particulars, nor drawn up any articles of impeachment against him. But Eliphaz did it here, where he positively and expressly charges him with many high crimes and misdemeanors, which if he had really been guilty of, they might well have justified themselves in their harsh censures of him. "Come," says Eliphaz, "we have been too tender of Job, and afraid of grieving him, which has but confirmed him in his self-justification; it is high time to deal plainly with him; we have condemned him by parables, but that does not answer the end; he is not prevail'd with to condemn himself; we must therefore plainly tell him. "Thou shalt be the man, the tyrant, the oppressor, the atheist, we have been too long of this all. Is not thy wickedness great? Certainly it is, or else thy troubles would not be so great. I appeal to thyself, and thy own conscience; are not thine iniquities infinite, both in number and heinousness? Strictly taken, nothing is infinite but God: but he means this, that his sins were more than could be counted; and more heinous than could be conceived. Sin, being committed against Infinite Majesty, has in it a kind of infinite malignity. But when Eliphaz charges Job thus high, and ventures to descend to particulars too, laying to his charge that which he knew not, we may take occasion hence, 1. To be angry at those who unjustly censure and condemn their brethren. For aught I know, Eliphaz, in accusing Job falsely, as he does here, was guilty of as great a sin, and as great a wrong to Job, as the Sabeans and Chaldeans that robbed him; for a man's good name is more precious and valuable than his wealth. It is against all the laws of justice, charity, and friendship, either to raise, or receive, calumnies, jealousies, and evil surmises, concerning others; and it is the more base and disingenuous, if we thus vex those that are in distress, and add to their affliction. Eliphaz could produce no instances of Job's guilt in any of the particulars he follows here, but seems resolved to calumniate boldly, and the more he reproach he could on Job, not doubting but that some would cleave to him. 2. To pity those who are thus censured and condemned. Innocency itself will be no security against a false and foul tongue. Job, whom God himself praised as the best man in the world, is here represented by one of his friends, and him a wise and good man too, as one of the greatest villains in nature. Let us not think it strange, if at any

1. Eliphaz branches out this charge into diverse particulars, with as much assurance as if he had called witnesses to prove upon oath every article of it. He tells him, (1.) That he had been cruel and unmerciful to the poor. As a magistrate, he ought to have protected them, and seen them provided for; but Eliphaz suspects that he never did them any kindness, but all the mischief his power enabled him to do; that, for an inconsiderable debt, he de-

2. He attributes all his present troubles to these supposed sins; (v. 10, 11.) "Those that are guilty of such practices as these, commonly bring them selves into just such a condition as thou art now in; and therefore we conclude thou hast been thus guilty." (1.) "It is the manner of God to cross and embarrass such; and snares are, accordingly, round about thee, so that, way soever thou steapest or lookest, thou findest thyself in distress; and others are as hard upon thee as thou hast been upon the poor." (2.) "Their actions may be expected to terrify and accuse thee; they make a louder cry there than unmercifulness; and, accordingly, sudden fear troubles thee; and, though thou wilt not own it, it is guilt of this kind that creates thee all this terror." Zophar had insinuated this, ch. xx. 19, 20. (3.) "They are brought to their wits’ end, so amazed and bewildered, that they know not what to do, and that also is thy case; for thou art in darkness, that thou cannot see whither God contents with thee, nor what is the best course for thee to take; for abundance of waters cover thee," that is, "thou art in a mist, in the midst of dark waters, in the thick clouds of the sky." Note, Those that have not showed mercy may justly be denied the comfortable hope that they shall find mercy; and then what can they expect but snares, and darkness, and continual fear? II. He charges him with atheism, infidelity, and gross injustice; and, though this was at the bottom of his injustice and oppressiveness: he that did not fear God did not regard man. He would have it thought that Job was an Epicurean, who did indeed own the being of God, but denied his providence, and fancied that he confined himself to the entertainments of the upper world, and never concerned himself in the inhabitants and affairs of this.

1. Eliphaz observes a good truth, which, he thought, if Job would but consider, he would be so preoccupied in his complaints, not so bold in justifying himself; (v. 12.) Is not God in the height of heaven? Yes, no doubt he is: no heaven so high but God is there; and in the highest heavens, the heavens of the blessed, the residence of his glory, he is, in a special manner; there he is pleased to manifest himself in a way peculiar to the upper world, and thence he is pleased to manifest himself in a way suited to this lower world. There is his throne; there is his sattion; there is the majesty of his throne, Dan. iv. 26. Thus Eliphaz proves that a man cannot be profitable to God, (v. 2.) that he ought not to contend with God; (it is his folly if he does) and that we ought always to address ourselves to God with very great reverence; for when we behold the height of the stars, how high they are, we, might, at the same time, also consider the transcendent majesty of God, who is above the stars, and how high he is.

2. He charges it upon Job, that he made a bad use of this doctrine, which he might have made so good a use of; (v. 13.) "This is holding the truth in unrighteousness, fighting against religion with its own weapons, and turning its own artillery upon itself: Thou art willing to own that God is in the height of heaven, but thence thou inferrest, How doth God know?" Bad men expect the fear of God and its influence, as a wall that is come down out of the world; (Ezek. viii. 12.) and care not what they do, if they can but persuade themselves that God does not know. Eliphaz suspects that Job had such a notion of God as this, that, because he is in the height of heaven, (1.) It is therefore impossible for him to see and hear what is done at so great a distance as this earth: especially since there is a dark cloud, (v. 15.) many thick clouds, (v. 14.) that come between him and God, and cover him, so that he cannot see, much less can he judge of the affairs of this lower world; as if God had eyes of flesh, ch. x. 4. The interposing firmament is to him as transparent crystal, Ezek. i. 22. Distance of place creates no difficulty to him who is immense, an more than distance of time to him who is eternal. Or, (2.) That it is therefore below him; and a diminution to his glory, to take cognizance of this inferior part of the creation: he walks in the circuit of heaven, and has enough to do, to enjoy himself and his own perfections and glory, in that bright and quiet world; why should he trouble himself about us? This is gross absurdity, as well as gross impiety, which Eliphaz here fathers upon Job; for it supposes that the administration of government is a burden and disparagement to the Supreme Governor; and the acts of justice and mercy were a toil to a mind infinitely wise, holy, and good. If the sun, a creature, and immifiable, can with light and influence reach this earth, and every part of it, (Ps. xix. 6.) even from that vast height of the visible heavens in which he is, and in the circuit of which he walks, and through many a thick and dark cloud, shall we question it concerning the Creator?

15. Hast thou marked the old way which wicked men have trodden; 16. Which were cut down out of time, whose foundation was overflowed with a flood; 17. Which said unto God, Depart from us: and what can the Almighty do for them? 18. Yet he filled their houses with good things: but the counsel of the wicked is far from me. 19. The righteous see it, and are glad; and the innocent laugh them to scorn. 20. Whereas our substance is not cut down: but the remnant of them the fire consumeth.

Eliphaz, having endeavoured to convict Job, by setting his sins (as he thought) in order before him, here endeavours to awaken him to a sight and sense of his misery and danger, by reason of sin; and this he does, by comparing his case with that of the sinners of the old world; as if he had said, "Thy condition is bad now, but, unless thou repent, it will be worse, as theirs was; theirs who were overflowed with a flood, as the old world, (v. 16.) and theirs the remnant of whom the fire consumed," (v. 20.) namely the Sodomites, who, in comparison of the old world, were but a remnant. And these two instances of the wrath of God against sin and sinners, are more than once put together, for warning to a careless world: as by our Saviour, Luke xvi. 26, &c. and the apostle, 2 Pet. ii. 5, 6. Eliphaz would have Job to mark the old way which wicked men have trodden, (v. 15.) and see what came of it, what the end of their way was. Note, There is an old way which wicked men have trodden. Religion had but newly entered, when sin immediately followed it: but though it is an old way, a broad way, a tracked way, it is a dangerous way, and it leaves the wandererark to it: it is good for us to mark it, that we may not dare to walk in it.

Eliphaz here puts Job in mind of it, perhaps in opposition to what he had said of the prosperity of the wicked; as if he had said, "Thou canst find out here and there a single instance, it may be, of a wicked man ending his days in peace; but what is that to those two great instances of the final perdition of ungodly men—the drowning of the whole world, and the burning of Sodom?" Destructions by wholesale, in which he thinks Job may, as in a glass, see his own face.

Observe, 1. The ruin of those sinners; (v. 16.) They were cut down out of time; that is, they were cut off in the midst of their days, when, as man's time then went, many of them might, in the course of nature, have lived some hundreds of years longer, which made their immature extirpation the more grievous. They were cut down out of time, to be hurried into eternity. And their foundation, the earth on which they built themselves, and all their houses, was overflowed with a flood, the flood which was brought in upon the old world; 2 Pet. ii. 5. Note, Those who build upon the sand, choose a foundation which will be overflowed, when the rains descend, and the floods come. (Matt. vii. 27.) and then their building must needs fall, and they perish in the ruins of it, and repent of their folly when it is too late.

2. The sin of those sinners, which brought that ruin; (v. 17.) They said unto God, Depart from us: Job had the name of some who had prospered and yet perished, ch. xii. 14. But these did not (says Eliphaz;) they found, to their costs, what it was to set God at defiance. Those who were resolved to lay the reins on the neck of their appetites and passions, began with this; they said unto God, Depart; they abandoned all religion, hated the thoughts of it, and desired to lie without God in the world; they shunned his word, and silenced conscience, his deputy! And what can the Almighty do for them? Some made these words, and the devil's his demonstration of their punishment. They said to God, Depart from us; and then what could the Almighty do with them, but cut them off? Those who will not submit to God's golden sceptre, must expect to be broken to pieces with his iron rod. Others make it to denote the injustice of their sin; But, what hath the Almighty done against them? What iniquity have they found in him? or, Wherein has he wearied them? Mic. vi. 3. Jer. ii. 5. Others make it to denote the reason of their sin; They say unto God, Depart, asking what the Almighty can do to them? "What has he done to oblige us? What can he do, in a way of wrath, to make us miserable, or, in a way of favour, to make us happy?" As they argue, (Zeph. i. 12.) The Lord will not do good, neither will he do evil. Eliphaz shows the absurdity of this in one word, and that is, calling God The Almighty: for, if he be so, what cannot he do? But it is not strange if there be ruin off all men, who neither dread God's wrath, nor desire his favour.

3. The aggravation of this sin; Yet he had filled their houses with good things, v. 18. Both those of the old world, and those of Sodom, had great plenty of all the delights of sense; for they ate, they drank, they bought, they sold, &c. (Luke xvii. 27.) so that they had no reason to ask what the Almighty could do for them? for they lived upon his bounty; no reason to bid him depart from them, who had been so kind to them. Many have their houses full of goods, but their hearts' empty of grace, and thereby are marked for ruin.

4. The protestation which Eliphaz makes against the principles and practices of those wicked people; But the counsel of the wicked is far from me. Job had said so, (ch. xxii. 16.) and Eliphaz will not be behind with him. If they cannot agree in their own principles, yet they agree in renouncing the principles of those that live without God in the world. Note, Those that differ from each other in some matters of religion, and are engaged in disputes about them, yet ought unanimously and vigorously to appear against atheism and irreligion, and to take great care that their disputes do not hinder either their vigour or unanimity, in that common cause of God, that righteous cause.

The y and third of the three, which the righteous shall have in this, (1.) In seeing the wicked destroyed, v. 19. They shall see it, that is, observe it, and take notice of it; (Hos. xiv. 9.) and they shall be glad, not to see their fellow-creatures miserable, or any secular turn of their own served, or point gained, but to see God glorified, the word of God fulfilled, the power of oppressors broken, and thereby the oppressed relieved; to see sin shamed, atheists and infidels confounded, and fair warning given to all others to shun such wicked courses. Nay, they shall laugh them to scorn, that are by any means in such a case; they shall do it, as God does it, in a holy manner, Ps. ii. 4. Prov. i. 26. They shall take occasion thence to expose the folly of sinners, and show how ridiculous their principles are, though they call themselves wise. Lo, this is the man that made not God his strength, and see what comes of it, Ps. lii. 7. Some understand this of righteous Noah and his family, who beheld the destruction of the old world, and rejoiced in it, as he had grieved for their impurity. Lot, who saw the ruin of Sodom, had the same reason to rejoice, 2 Pet. ii. 7, 8. (2.) In seeing themselves distinguished; (v. 20.) "Whereas our substance is not cut down, as theirs was, and as thine is, we continue to prosper, which is a sign that we are the favourites of Heaven, and in the right." The same rule that served him to condemn Job by, served him to magnify himself and his companions by. His substance is cut down, therefore he is a wicked man; ours is not, therefore we are righteous. But it is a deceitful rule to judge by; for none knows love or hatred by all that is before him. If others be consumed, if the very remnant of them be consumed, and we be not, instead of cursing them, and lifting up ourselves, as Eliphaz does here, we ought to be thankful to God, and take it for a warning to ourselves to prepare for the like calamities.

21. Acquaint now thyself with him, and be at peace: thereby good shall come unto thee. 22. Receive, I pray thee, the law from his mouth, and lay up his words in thy heart. 23. If thou return to the Almighty, thou shalt be built up, thou shalt put away iniquity far from thy tabernacles. 24. Then shalt thou lay up gold as dust, and the gold of Ophir as the stones of the brooks. 25. Yea, the Almighty shall be thy defence, and thou shalt have plenty of silver. 26. For then shall thou have thy delight in the Almighty, and shalt lift up thy face unto God. 27. Thou shalt make thy prayer unto him, and he shall hear thee, and thou shalt pay thy vows. 28. Thou shalt also decree a thing, and it shall be established unto thee; and the light shall shine upon thy ways. 29. When men are cast down, then thou shalt say, There is lifting up; and he shall save the humble person. 30. He shall deliver the island of the innocent; and it is delivered by the pureness of thy hands.

Methinks I can almost forgive Eliphaz his hard censures of Job, which we had in the beginning of the chapter, though they were very unjust and unkind, for this good counsel and encouragement which he gives him in these verses, with which he fills his discourse, and than which nothing could be better said, or more to the purpose. Though he thought him a bad man, yet he saw reasons to have hope concerning him, that, for all this, he would be both pious and prosperous. But it is strange, that out of the same mouth, and almost in the same breath, both sweet waters and bitter should proceed. Good men, though they may perhaps be put into a heat, yet sometimes will talk themselves into a better temper, and, it may be, sooner than another could talk them into it.

Eliphaz had before Job the miserable condition of a wicked man, that he might frighten him into repentance. Here, on the other hand, he shows him the happiness which those may be sure of, that do repent, that he might allure and encourage him to it. Ministers must try both ways in dealing with people, must speak to them from mount Sinai by the terrors of the law, and from mount Zion by the comforts of the gospel, must set before them both life and death, good and evil, the blessing and the curse. Now here observe, and

I. The good counsel which Eliphaz gives to Job; and good counsel it is to us all, though, as to Job, it was built upon a false supposition that he was a wicked man, and now a stranger and enemy to God.

1. Acquaint now thyself with God. Acquiesce in God; so some. It is our duty, at all times, especially when we are in affliction, to accommodate ourselves to, and quiet ourselves in, all the dispositions of the Divine Providence. Join thyself to him; so some; fall in with his interests, and act no longer in opposition to him. Our translators render it well; "Acquaint thyself with him; be not such a stranger to him as thou hast made thyself by casting off the fear of him, and restraining prayer before him." It is the duty and interest of every one of us, to acquaint ourselves with God. We must get the knowledge of him, fix our affections on him, join ourselves to him in a covenant of friendship, and then set up, and keep up, a constant correspondence with him in the ways he has appointed. It is our honour, that we are made capable of this acquaintance; our misery, that by sin we have lost it; our privilege, that through Christ we are invited to return to it; and it will be our unspeakable happiness to contract and cultivate this acquaintance.

2. "Be at peace; at peace with thyself, not from full uneasiness, and in confusion; let not thy heart be troubled, but be quiet and calm, and well composed. Be at peace with thy God; be reconciled to him. Do not carry on this unholy war. Though complainest that God is thine Enemy; be thou his friend." It is the great concern of every one of us to make our peace with God, and it is necessary in order to our comfortable acquaintance with him; for can two walk together, except they be agreed? Amos iii. 3. This we must do quickly; now, before it be too late. Agree with thyth adversary, while there is an opportunity. Be at peace with thyself and God. This we are earnestly urged to do. Some read it, "Acquaint thyself, I pray thee, with him, and be at peace." God himself beseeches us, ministers in Christ's stead, pray us, to be reconciled. Can we gain such entreaties?

3. Receive the law from his mouth; (v. 22.) "Having made thy peace with God, submit to his government, and receive to be ruled by him, that thou mayest acquiesce in thyself in his presence." We receive our being and maintenance from God. In him we hope to receive our bliss, and from him we must receive law; Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? Acts ix. 6. Which way soever we receive the intimations of his will, we must have our eye to him; whether he speaks by scripture, ministers, conscience, or providence, we must take the word as from his mouth, and bow down before him. Though, in Job's case, we do not know that there was any written word, yet there was a revelation of God's will to be received. Eliphaz looked upon Job as a wicked man; and was pressing him to repent and reform. Herein consists the conversion of a sinner — his receiving the law from God's mouth, and no longer from the world and the flesh. Eliphaz, being now in contest with Job, appeals to the word of God for the ending of the controversy. Receive that, and be determined by it. To the law and to the testament.

4. Lay up his word in thine heart. It is not enough to receive it, but we must retain it, Prov. iii. 18. We must lay it up as a thing of great value, that it may be safe: and we must lay it up in our hearts, as a thing of great use, that it may be ready to us when there is occasion, and we may neither lose it wholly, nor be at a loss for it in a time of need.

5. Return to the Almighty; (v. 23.) "Do not only turn from sin, but turn to God and thy duty. Do not only turn toward the Almighty in some good inclinations and good Beginnings, but return to him; return home to him, quite to him, so as to reach to the Almighty, by a universal reformation, an effectual thorough change of thy heart and life, and a firm resolution to cleave to him;" so My. Poole.

6. Put away iniquity far from thy tabernacle. This was the advice Zophar gave him; (ch. xi. 16.) "Let not wickedness dwell in thy tabernacle. Put iniquity far off, the farther the better, not only from thy heart and hand, but from thy house. Thou must not only not be wicked thyself, but reprove and restrain sin in those that are under thy charge." Note, Family reformation is needful reformation; we and our house must serve the Lord.

This is the advice which Eliphaz gives to Job, that he should be very happy if he would but turn from sin to God. He speaks of the good that is now departed from thee; all the good thy heart can desire, temporal, spiritual, eternal, good shall come to thee. God shall come to thee, into covenant and communion with thee; and he brings all good with him, all good in him. Thou art now ruined and brought down, but if thou return to God, thou shalt be built up again, and thy present ruins shall be rebuilt. Thy family shall be built up in children, thy estate in wealth, and thy soul in holiness and comfort.

The promises which Eliphaz here encourages Job with, are reducible to three heads; 1. That his estate should prosper, and temporal blessings should be bestowed abundantly upon him; for godliness has the promise of the life that now is. It is promised.

2. That he should be very rich, (v. 24.) "Thou shalt lay up gold as dust, in such great abundance, and shalt have plenty of silver; (v. 25.) whereas now thou art poor and stripped of all." Job had been rich; Eliphaz suspected he got his riches by fraud and oppression, and therefore they were taken from him; but if he would return to God and duty, he should have more wealth than ever he had; not only thousands of sheep and oxen, the wealth of farmers, but thousands of gold and silver, the wealth of princes, ch. iii. 15. Abundantly more riches, true riches, are to be got by the service of God than by the service of the world. (2.) He should have it more secure to him; Thou shalt lay it up in good hands, and hold that which is got by thy piety, by a surer tenure than that which thou didst get by thine iniquity. Thou shalt have silver of strength, (for so the word is,) which, being honestly got, will wear well; silver like steel. He should, by the grace of God, be kept from setting his heart too much upon it, as Eliphaz thought he had done. Then wealth is a blessing indeed, when we are not insatiate with the love of it. Thou shalt lay up gold; but how? Not as thy treasure and portion, but as dust, and as the stones of the brooks. So little shalt thou value it or expect from it, that thou shalt lay it at thy feet, (Acts iv. 35.) not in thy bosom.

2. That yet he shall be very safe; whereas men's riches usually expose them to danger, and he had owned that in his prosperity he was not in safe

Note, This is the advice which Eliphaz gives to Job, that he should be very happy if he would but turn from sin to God. He speaks of the good that is now departed from thee; all the good thy heart can desire, temporal, spiritual, eternal, good shall come to thee. God shall come to thee, into covenant and communion with thee; and he brings all good with him, all good in him. Thou art now ruined and brought down, but if thou return to God, thou shalt be built up again, and thy present ruins shall be rebuilt. Thy family shall be built up in children, thy estate in wealth, and thy soul in holiness and comfort.

The promises which Eliphaz here encourages Job with, are reducible to three heads; 1. That his estate should prosper, and temporal blessings should be bestowed abundantly upon him; for godliness has the promise of the life that now is. It is promised.

2. That he should have a humble, holy, confidence toward God; such as they are said to have, whose hearts condemn them not; (ch. iii. 21.) "Then shalt thou lift up thy face to God with boldness, and not be ashamed, if thou return to thy ways near to him. Thy countenance is now fallen, and thou lookest dejected; but when thou hast made thy peace with God, thou shalt blush no more, tremble no more, and hang thy head no more, as thou dost now, but shalt cheerfully, and with a gracious assurance, show thyself to him, pray before him, and expect blessings from him." (3.) That he should maintain a constant communion with God; "The correspondence, once settled, shall be kept up to thine unspakeable satisfaction. Letters shall be both staked and occasionally interchanged between thee and Heaven," (v. 27.) "Thou shalt by prayer send letters to God; Thou shalt make thy prayer" (the word is, Thou shalt multiply thy prayers) "unto him, and he will not think thy letters troublesome, though many and long. The oftener we come to the throne of grace, the more welcome. Under all thy bounties, in all thy wants, cares, and fears, thou shalt see heaven for guidance and strength, wisdom, comfort, and good success." (2.) "He shall, by his providence and grace, answer those letters, and give thee what thou askest of him, either in kind or kindness; he shall hear thee, and make it to appear he does so, by what he does for thee and in thee." (3.) "Then thou shalt by thy praises repay the gracious answers which he sent thee: thou shalt pray thy vows, and that shall be acceptable to him, and fetch in further mercy." Note, When God performs that which in our distress we prayed for, we

(4.) That he should have inward satisfaction in the management of all his outward affairs; (v. 28.) Thou shalt decree a thing, and it shall be established unto thee," that is, "Thou shalt frame all thy projects and purposes with so much wisdom and grace, and resignation to the will of God, that the issue of the shall be to thy heart's content, just as the wearesthould have it to be. Thou shalt commit thy works unto the Lord by faith and prayer, and then thy thoughts shall be established; thou shalt be easy and pleased, whatsoever occurs, Prov. xvi. 3. This the grace of God shall work in thee; nay, sometimes the providence of God shall give thee the very thing thou didst desire and pray for, and give it thee in thine own way, and manner, and time; be it unto thee, even as thou wilt. When, at any time, an affair succeeds just according to the scheme we laid, and our measures are in nothing broken, nor are we put upon new counsels, then we must own the performance of this promise, Thou shalt decree a thing, and it shall be established unto thee.

"Whereas now thou complainest of darkness round about thee, then the light shall shine upon thy ways;" that is, "God shall guide and direct thee, and then it will follow, of course, that he shall prosper and succeed thee in all thine undertakings. God's wisdom shall be thy guide, his favour thy comfort, and thy ways shall be so under both these lights, that thou shalt have a comfortable enjoyment of what is present, and a comfortable prospect of what is future," Ps. xc. 17.

(5.) That, even in times of common calamity and danger, he should have abundance of joy and hope; (v. 29.) "When men are cast down round about thee, cast down in their affairs, cast down in their spirits, sinking, despising, and ready to despair, then shalt thou say, This is lifting up. Thou shalt find that in thyself, which will not only bear thee up under thy troubles, and keep thee from fainting, but lift thee up above thy troubles, and enable thee to rejoice evenmore. When men's hearts fail them for fear, then shall Christ's disciples lift up their heads for joy, Luke xxi. 26-28. Thus are they made to ride upon the high places of the earth; (Isa. lviii. 14.) and that which will lift them up, is, the belief of this, that God will save the humble person. They that humble themselves shall be exalted, not only in honour, but in comfort.

3. That he should be a blessing to his country, and an instrument of good to many; (v. 30.) God shall, in answer to thy prayers, deliver the island of the innocent, and have a regard therein to the pureness of thy hands, which is necessary to the acceptableness of our prayers, 1 Tim. ii. 8. But, because we may suppose the innocent not to need deliverance immediately, (as is wanted for the benefit of Abraham's intercession,) I incline to the marginal reading, The innocent shall deliver the island, by their advice, (Eccl. ix. 14, 15.) and by their prayers, and their interest in heaven, Acts xxi. 24. Or, He shall deliver those that are not innocent, and they are delivered by the pureness of thy hands; so it may be read, and most probably. Note. A good man is a public good. Sinners fare the better for prayers, whether they are aware of it or no. If Eliphaz intended hereby, (as some think he did,) to insinuate that Job's prayers were not prevailing, nor his hands pure, (for then he would have relieved others, much more himself,) he was afterward made to see his error, when it appeared that Job had a better interest in heaven than he had; for he and his three friends, who, in this matter, were not innocent, were delivered by the pure ness of Job's hands, ch. xliii. 8.

CHAP. XXIII.

This chapter begins Job's reply to Eliphaz; in this reply he takes no notice of his friends; either because he saw it to be no purpose, or because he liked the good counsel Eliphaz gave him in the close of his discourse so well, that he would make no answer to the peevish reflections he began with; but he appeals to God; begins to have his cause heard, and doubts not but to make it good, having the testimony of his own conscience concerning his integrity. Here seems to be a struggle between flesh and spirit, fear and faith, throughout this chapter. 1. He complains of his calamitous condition, and establishing God's wisdom, which he feared, he destroyed; that he could not get his appeal heard, (v. 2, 5.) nor discern the meaning of God's dealings with him, (v. 8, 9.) nor gain any hope of relief, v. 13, 14. This made deep impressions of trouble and terror on his mind, and was the cause of the complaints of which he is accused, and by which his friends reproved him. 2. But, in the midst of these complaints, he comforts himself with the assurance of God's clemency, (v. 6, 7.) and his own integrity, which God himself was a Witness to, v. 10, 12. Thus was the light of his day like that spoken of, (Zech. xiv. 6, 7.) neither perfectly clear nor perfectly dark, but at evening time it was light.

I. THEN Job answered and said, 2. Even to-day is my complaint bitter: my stroke is heavier than my groaning. 3. Oh that I knew where I might find him! that I might come even to his seat! 4. I would order my cause before him, and fill my mouth with arguments. 5. I would know the words which he would answer me, and understand what he would say unto me. 6. Will he plead against me with his great power? no; but he would put strength in me. 7. There the righteous might dispute with him; so should I be delivered for ever from my judge.

Job is confident that he has wrong done him by his friends, and therefore, ill as he is, he will not give up the cause, nor let them have the last word. Here, 1. He justifies his own resentments and representations of his trouble; (v. 2.) Even to-day, I own, my complaint is bitter; for the affliction, the cause of the complaint, is so. There are wormwood and gall in the affliction and misery, which has been upon him, v. 13, 17. But, II. in the midst of these complaints, he comforts himself with the assurance of God's clemency, v. 6, 7. and his own integrity, which God himself was a Witness to, v. 10, 12. Thus was the light of his day like that spoken of, Zech. xiv. 6, 7. neither perfectly clear nor perfectly dark, but at evening time it was light.

1. THEN Job answered and said, 2. Even to-day is my complaint bitter: my stroke is heavier than my groaning. 3. Oh that I knew where I might find him! that I might come even to his seat! 4. I would order my cause before him, and fill my mouth with arguments. 5. I would know the words which he would answer me, and understand what he would say unto me. 6. Will he plead against me with his great power? no; but he would put strength in me. 7. There the righteous might dispute with him; so should I be delivered for ever from my judge.

Job is confident that he has wrong done him by his friends, and therefore, ill as he is, he will not give up the cause, nor let them have the last word. Here, 1. He justifies his own resentments and representations of his trouble; (v. 2.) Even to-day, I own, my complaint is bitter; for the affliction, the cause of the complaint, is so. There are wormwood and gall in the affliction and misery, which has been upon him, v. 13, 17. But, II. in the midst of these complaints, he comforts himself with the assurance of God's clemency, v. 6, 7. and his own integrity, which God himself was a Witness to, v. 10, 12. Thus was the light of his day like that spoken of, Zech. xiv. 6, 7.) neither perfectly clear nor perfectly dark, but at evening time it was light.
1. That God would not overpowers him; that he would not deal with him either by absolute sovereignty, or in strict justice; not with a high hand, not with a strong hand: Will he plead against me with his great power? No, Job's friends pleaded against him with all the power they had; but will God do so? No, his power is all just and holy, whatever men's is: against those that are obstinate in their unbelief and impenitency, God will plead with his great power, their destruction will come from the glory of his power; but with his own people, that love him and trust in him, he will deal in tender compassion.

2. That, on the contrary, he would empower him to plead his own cause before God: "He would put strength in me, to support me and bring me up, in maintaining mine integrity." Note, The same grace that is engaged against proud sinners, is engaged for humble saints, who prevail with God by strength derived from him, as Jacob did, Hos. xii. 3. See Ps. Ixviii. 35.

3. That the issue would certainly be comfortable; (v. 7.) There, in the court of heaven, when the final sentence is to be given, the righteous might dispute with him, and come off in his righteousness. Now, even the upright are often, chastened of the Lord, and they cannot dispute against it; integrity itself is no fence either against calamity or calumny; but in that day, they shall not be condemned with the world, though God may afflict by prerogative. Then you shall discern between the righteous and the wicked, Mal. iii. 18. So vast will be the difference between them in their everlasting state; whereas now we can scarcely distinguish them, so little is the difference between the upright and the outward condition, for all things come alike to all. Then, when the final doom is given, "I shall be delivered for ever from my Judge," that is, "I shall be saved from the unjust censures of my friends, and from that divine sentence which is now so much a terror to me." These that are delivered up to God as their Owner and Ruler shall be for ever delivered from him as their Judge and Avenger: and there is no flying from his justice, but by flying to his mercy.

8. Behold, I go forward, but he is not there; and backward, but I cannot perceive him: 9. On the left hand, where he doth work, but I cannot behold him: he hideth himself on the right hand, that I cannot see him: 10. But he knoweth the way that I take: when he hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold. 11. My foot hath held his steps: his way have I kept, and not declined. 12. Neither have I gone back from the commandment of his lips: I have esteemed the words of his mouth more than my necessary food.

Here,

I. Job complains that he cannot understand the meaning of God's providences concerning him, but was quite at a loss about them; (v. 8, 9.) I go forward, but he is not there, &c. Eliphaz had bid him acquaint himself with God; "So I would, with all my heart, when I heard the words of my friend," III. He comforts himself with the hope that God would deal favourably with him in this matter, v. 6, 7. Note, It is of great use to us, in every thing wherein we have to do with God, to keep up good thoughts of him. He believes, things he seems to complain of here. 1. That he could not fix his thoughts, nor form any clear judgment of things in his own mind: his mind was so hurried and discomposed with his troubles, that he was like a man in a fright, or at his wit's end, who runs this way, and that way, but, being in confusion, brings nothing to a head. By reason of the disorder and tumult his spirit was in, he could not fasten upon that which he knew to be in God, and which, if he had merely fixed his mind upon it, and dwelt upon it in his thoughts, would have been a support to him. It is the common complaint of those who are sick or melancholy, that, when they would think of that which is good, they can make nothing of it. 2. That he could not find out the cause of his troubles, nor the sin which provoked God to contend with him: he took a view of his whole conversation, turned to every side of it, and could not perceive wherein he had sinned more than others, for which he should thus be punished more than others; nor could he discern what other end God should aim at in afflicting him thus. 3. That he could not foresee what would be in the end hereof, whether God would deliver him at all, nor, if he did, when, or on which way: he saw not his signs, nor was there any to tell him how long; as the church complains, Ps. lxxiv. 9. He was quite at a loss to know what God designed to do with him; and whatever conjectures or advances, still something or other appeared against it.

II. He satisfies himself with this, that God himself was a Witness to his integrity, and therefore did not doubt but the issue would be good. After Job had almost lost himself in the labyrinth of the divine counsels, how contentedly does he sit down, at length, with this thought, "Though I know not the way that he takes, (for his way is in the sea, and his path in the great waters,) his thoughts and ways are infinitely above ours, and it would be presumption in us to pretend to judge of them,) yet he knows the way that I take," v. 10. That is, 1. He is acquainted with it. His friends judged of that which they did not know, and therefore charged him with that which he was never guilty of; but God, who knows every step he had taken, would not do so, Ps. cxxxix. 3. Note, It is a great comfort to those who mean honestly, that God understands their meaning, though they do not, cannot, or will not. 2. He accepts it of it: "He knows that however I may sometimes have taken a false step, yet I have still taken a good way; have chosen the way of truth, and therefore he knows it," that is, He accepts it, and is well pleased with it, as he is said to know the way of the righteous, Ps. i. 6. This comforts the prophet; Jer. xii. 3. Thou hast tried my heart toward thee. From this Job infers, When he hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold. They that keep the way of the Lord, may comfort themselves, when they are in affliction, with these three things, (1.) That they are but tried; it is not intended for their hurt, but for their honour and benefit; it is the trial of their faith, 1 Pet. i. 7. (2.) That, when they are sufficiently tried, they shall come forth out of the furnace, and not be left to consume in it as dress or reprobathe silver. The trial will have an end; God will not contend for ever. (3.) That, while they are forsook as gold, there is more in the fire, more and precious to the refiner; they shall come forth as gold approved and improved; found to be good, and made to be better. Afflictions are to us, as we are; those that go gold into the furnace, will come out no worse.

Now that which encouraged Job to hope that his present troubles would thus end well, was, the testimony of his conscience for him, that he had lived a good life in the fear of God.

[1.] That God's way was the way he walked in;

(v. 11) "My foot hath held his steps," that is, "held to them, held close to them; the steps he takes. I have endeavoured to conform myself to his example." Good people are followers of God: or, "I have accommodated myself to his providence, and endeavoured to answer all the intentions of that; to follow Providence step by step." Or, "His steps are the steps he has appointed me to take; the way of religion and serious godliness—that way I have kept, and have not declined from it, that I may not err with it by some fallacy, nor turn aside out of it by any wilful transgression." His holding God's steps, and keeping his way, intimate that the tempter had used all his arts by fraud and force to draw him aside; but, with care and resolution, he had, by the grace of God hitherto persevered, and those that will do so, must hold and keep, hold with resolution, and keep with watchfulness.

[2.] What was the word the rule he walked by; (v. 12.) he governed himself by the commandment of God's lips, and would not go back from that, but go forward according to it. Whatever difficulties we may meet with in the way of God's commandments, though they lead us through a wilderness, yet we must never think of going back, but must press on toward the mark; Job kept close to the law of God in his conversation, for both his judgment and his affection led him to it. I have esteemed the words of his mouth more than my necessary food; that is, He looked upon it as his necessary food; he could as well have lived without his daily bread as without the word of God. I have laid it up; so the word is, as those that lay up provision for a siege, or as Joseph laid up corn before the famine. Eliphaz had bid him lay up God's words in his heart, ch. xxvii. 22. "I do," says he, "and always did, that I might not sin against him, and that, like the good householder, I might bring forth food for the want of others." No, The word of God is to our souls as our necessary food is to our bodies; it sustains the spiritual life, and strengthens us for the actions of life; it is that which we cannot subsist without, and which nothing else can make up the want of: and we ought therefore so to esteem it, to take pains for it, hunger after it, feed upon it with delight, and nourish our souls with it; and this will be our rejoicing in the day of evil, as it was Job's here.

13. But he is in one mind, and who can turn him? and what his soul desireth, even that he doeth. 14. For he performeth the thing that is appointed for me: and many such things are with him. 15. Therefore am I troubled at his presence; when I consider, I am afraid of him. 16. For God maketh my heart soft, and the Almighty troubleth me: 17. Because I was not cut off before the darkness, neither hath he covered the darkness from my face.

Some make Job to complain here, that God dealt unjustly and unfairly with him, in proceeding to punish him without the least relenting or relaxation, though he had such incontestable evidences to produce of his innocence. I am loath to think holy Job would charge the holy God with iniquity; but his complaint is indeed bitter and peevish, and he reasons himself into a sort of a patience per force, which he cannot do without reflecting upon God, as dealing hardly with him; but he must bear it, because he cannot help it; the worst he says, is, that God deals unaccountably with him.
1. He lays down good truths, which were capable of a good improvement, v. 13, 14.

(1.) That God's counsels are immutable; He is in one mind, and who can turn him? He is one. So some read it, or in one; he has no counsellors by whose interest he might be prevailed with to alter his purpose: he is one with himself, and never alters his mind, never alters his measures. Prayer has prevailed with God to alter a part of his providence, but never was his will or purpose changed; for known unto God are all his works.

(2.) That his power is irresistible; What his soul desires or designs, even that he does, and nothing can stand in his way, or put him upon new counsels. Men desire many things, which either they may not do, or cannot do, or dare not do; but God has an incontestable sovereignty; his will is so perfectly pure and right, that it is highly fit he should quarantine all its determinations; and he has an uncontrollable power; none can stay his hand. Whatever the Lord pleased, that did he, (Ps. cxxxv. 6.) and always will, for it is always best.

(3.) That all he does, is according to the counsel of his will; (v. 14.) He performs the thing that is appointed for me; whatever happens to us, it is God that performs it; (Ps. lix. 2.) and an admirable power will certainly perform it, when the mystery of God shall be finished. He performs all that, and that only, which was appointed, and in the appointed time and method; this may silence us, for what is appointed cannot be altered. But to consider, that, when God was appointing us to eternal life and glory as our end, he was appointing to this condition, this affliction, whatever it is, in our way, this may do more than silence us, it may satisfy us that it is all for the best; though what he does we shall not know when he will perform it; he has his time and method of doing it.

(4.) That all he does, is according to the custom of his providence; Many such things are with him, that is, He does many things in the course of his providence, which we can give no account of, but must resolve into his absolute sovereignty. Whatever trouble we are in, others have been in the like; our case is not singular, the same afflictions are accomplished in our brethren, 1 Pet. v. 9. Are we sick, we shall know it when his will shall be accomplished. He has a mystery, and will not reveal it to us; we shall see the event, and then we shall see that God has appointed for us, and many such things are with him. Shall the earth be forsaken for us?

2. He makes but a bad use of these good truths; had he duly considered them, he might have said, "Therefore am I easy and pleased, and well reconciled to the way of my God concerning me; therefore will I rejoice, in hope that my troubles will issue well at last." But he said, Therefore am I troubled at his presence, v. 15. Those are indeed of troubled spirits, who are troubled at the presence of God; as the psalmist, who remembered God, and was troubled, Ps. lxviii. 3. See what confusion poor Job was now in, for he contradicted himself: just now, he was troubled for God's absence; (v. 8, 9) now he is troubled at his presence; When I consider, I am afraid of him. What he now felt, made him fear worse; there is indeed that which, if we consider it, will show that we have cause to be afraid of God—his infinite justice and purity, compared with our own sinfulness and vileness; but if, withal, we consider his grace in a Redeemer, and our compliance with that grace, the fears will vanish, and we shall see cause to hope in him. So what impressions were made upon him by the wounds of his spirit. (1.) He was very fearful; (v. 16.) The Almighty troubled him, and so his heart soft, that is, utterly unable to bear any thing, and afraid of every thing that stirred. There is a gracious softness, like that of Josiah, whose heart was tender, and trembled at the word of God; this is meant of a grievous softness, which apprehends every thing that is present to be pressing, and every thing future to be threatening. (2.) He was very fretful, peevish indeed, for he quarrels with God, v. 17. [1.] Because he did not die before his troubles, that he might never have seen them; (Because I was not cut off before the darkness,) and the height of his prosperity he had received a summons to the grave, he would have thought it hard. This may help to reconcile us to death whenever it comes, that we do not know what evil we may be taken away from. But when trouble is come, it is foly to wish we had not lived to see it, and it is better to make the best of it. [2.] Because he was left to live so long in his troubles, and the darkness was not covered from his face by his being hid in the grave. We should bear the darkness better than this if we would but remember, that to the upright there sometimes arises a marvellous light in the darkness; however, there is reserved for them a more marvellous light after it.

CHAP. XXIV.

Job, having, by his complaints in the foregoing chapter, given vent to his passion, and thereby gained some ease, breaks them off abruptly, and now applies himself to a further discussion of the doctrinal controversy between him and his friends, concerning the natural government of wicked people. That many live at ease, who yet are ungodly and profane, and despise all the exercises of devotion, he had showed, ch. 21. Now here he goes further, and shows that there is a power who are to be trusted with the life of open defiance to all the laws of justice and common honesty, yet thrive and succeed in their unrighteous practices; and we do not see them reckoned with in this world. We had read said before, (ch. xii. 6.) The leberacules of robbers prosper, he is gone up; he lays down his general proposition, (v. 1.) That the punishment of wicked people is not so visible and apparent as his friends supposed; and then proves it by an induction of particulars. I. Those that oppress the poor, to their poor neighbours, are not reckoned with, nor the injured righteous, (v. 2.) though the former are very barbarous, v. 21, 22. II. Those that severely practise mischief, often go undiscovered and unpunished, v. 15—17. III. That God punishes such by secret judgments, and reserves them for future judgments, v. 18—20. They are not now seen, v. 23—25. So that, upon the whole matter, we cannot say, that all who are in trouble are wicked; for it is certain, that all who are in prosperity are not righteous.

1. Why, seeing times are not hidden from the Almighty, do they that know him not see his days? 2. Some remove the landmarks; they violently take away flocks, and feed thereof; 3. They drive away the ass of the fatherless; they take the widow's ox for a pledge; 4. They turn the needy out of the way: the poor of the earth hide themselves together. 5. Behold, as wild asses in the desert, go they forth to their work, rising betimes for a prey: the wilderness yieldeth food for them and for their children. 6. They reap every one his corn in the field, and they gather the vintage of the wicked; 7. They cause the naked to lodge without clothing, that they have no covering in the cold; 8. They are wet with the showers of the mountains, and embrace the rock for want of shelter; 9. They pluck the fatherless from the breast, and take a pledge of the poor; 10. They cause him to go naked without clothing, and they... take away the sheaf from the hungry; 11. Which make oil within their walls, and tread their wine-presses, and suffer thirst. 12. Men groan from out of the city, and the soul of the wounded crieth out; yet God layeth not folly to them.

Job's friends had been very positive in it, that they should soon see the fall of wicked people, and they much soverely that mighty prosper for a while. By this, says Job, though times are not hidden from the Almighty, yet they that know him do not presently see his day, v. 1. He takes it for granted, that times are not hid from the Almighty: past times are not hid from his judgment, (Exel. iii. 15.) present times are not hid from his providence, (Matt. x. 29.) future times are not hid from his prescience, Acts xv. 18. God governs the world, and therefore we may be sure he takes cognizance of it: bad times are not hid from him, though the bad men, that make the times bad, say one to another that he has forsaaken the earth, Ps. xcv. 6, 7. Every man's times are in his hand and under his eye, and therefore it is in his power to make the times of wicked men in this world miserable; he foresees the time of every man's death, and therefore, if wicked men die before they are punished for their wickedness, we cannot say, They escaped him and his stripes." They foresaw it may, he ordered it. Before Job will inquire into the reasons of the prosperity of wicked men, he asserts God's omnipresence, as one prophet, in a like case, asserts his righteousness, (Jer. xii. 1.) another his holiness, (Hab. i. 13.) another his goodness to his own people, Ps. lxxiii. 1. General truths must be held fast, though we may find it difficult to reconcile them to particular events. 2. He yet asserts, that they who know him, that is, wise and good people who are acquainted with him, and with whom his secret is, do not see his days, not the day of his judging for them; this was the thing he complained of in his own case, (ch. xxvii. 8.) That he could not see God appearing on his behalf to plead his cause; nor the day of his judging against open and notorious sinners, that is called his day, Ps. xxxvii. 13. We believe that day will come, but we do not see it, because it is future, and its presages secret. 3. Though this is a mystery of his dispensations, yet there is a reason for it, and we shall shortly know why the judgment is deferred; even the wisest, and those who know God best, do not yet see it. God will exercise their faith and patience, and excite their prayers for the coming of his kingdom, for which they are to cry day and night to him, Luke xviii. 7.

For the proof of this, that wicked people prosper, he specifies two sorts of unrighteous ones, whom all the world saw thriving in their iniquity. 1. They that are under pretence of law and authority. It is a melancholy sight, which has often been seen under the sun, wickedness in the place of judgment, Exel. iii. 16. The unregarded tears of the oppressed, while on the side of the oppressors there was power, Exel. iv. 1. The violent perverting of justice and judgment, Exel. v. 8. 1. They disseize their neighbours of their real estates, which came to them by descent from their ancestors. They remove the land-marks, under pretence that they were misplaced; (v. 2.) and so they encroach upon their neighbours' rights, and think they effectually secure that to their posterity, which they have got wrongfully, by making that to be an evidence for them, which should have been an evidence for the rightful owner. This was forbidden by the law of Moses, (Deut. xix. 14.) under
5. It is not only among the poor country people, but in the cities also, that we see the tears of the oppressed, (v. 12.) men groan from out of the city, when they are stripped and deprived of their property, with their poor debtors, as the landlords in the country are with their poor tenants. In cities, such cruel actions as these are more observed than in obscure corners of the country, and the wronged have easier access to justice to right themselves; and yet the oppressors there fear neither the restraints of the law, nor the just censures of their neighbours, but the oppressed groan and cry out for help. They can no more than the wild beasts help themselves, for the oppressors are unmerciful, and deaf to their groans.

II. He speaks of robbers, and those that do wrong by downright force, as the bands of the Sabeans and Chaldeans, which had lately plundered him; he does not mention them particularly, lest he should seem partial to his own cause, and to judge of men (as we are apt to do) by what they are to us; but among the Arians, the children of the heathen, there were persons that lived by spoil and rapine, making incursions upon their neighbours, and robbing travellers. See how they are described here, and what mischief they do, v. 5-8.

1. Their character is, that they are as wild asses in the desert, untamed, untractable, unreasonable, Ishmael's character; (Gen. xvi. 12.) fierce and furious, and under no restraint of law or government, Jer. ii. 25, 24. They choose the deserts for their dwelling, that they may be lawless and unaccountable, and that they may have opportunity of doing the more mischief. The desert is indeed the fittest place for such wild people, ch. xxxix. 6. But no desert can set men out of the reach of God's eye and hand. 2. Their trade is to steal, and to make a prey of all about them. They have chosen it as their trade; it is their work, because there is more to be got by it, and it is got more easily than by an honest calling. They follow it as their trade, they follow it closely; they go forth to it as their work, as man goes forth to his labour, Ps. civ. 22. They are diligent, and take pains at it; they rise betimes for a prey; if a traveller be out early, they will be out as soon to rob him: they live by it as a man lives by his trade; the wilderness (not the ground there, but the roads there) yielded food for them and for their children; they maintain themselves and their families by robbing on the highway, and insinuating themselves in it without any remorse of compassion or conscience, and with as much security as if it were honestly got; as Epherain, Hos. xii. 7, 8. 3. See the mischief they do to the country. They not only rob travellers, but they make incursions upon their neighbours, and reap every one his corn in the field, (v. 6.) that is, They enter upon other people's ground, cut their corn, and carry it away as freely as if it were their own: even the wicked gather the vintage, and it is their wickedness that makes it, and no other; and the vintage of the wicked; and so one wicked man is made a scourge to another. What the wicked got by extortion, (which is their way of stealing,) these robbers get from them in their way of stealing; thus oftentimes are the spoilers spoiled, Isa. xxxiii. 1. 4. The misery of those that fall into their hands; (v. 7, 8.) They cause the naked, whom they have stripped, not leaving them the clothes to their backs, to stand naked and exposed to the weather, so that they are wet with the showers of the mountains, and, for want of a better shelter, embrace the rock, and are glad of a cave or den in it to preserve them from the injuries of the weather. Elipha\(l\) had charged Job with such inhumanity as this, concluding that Providence would not thus have stripped him if he had not first stripped the naked of their clothing, ch. xxii. 6. Job here tells him, there were those that were really guilty of these crimes with which he was unjustly charged, and yet prospered and had success in their villainies; the curse they laid their hands under working invisibly: and Job thinks it need not to argue, as he did, from an open notorious course of wickedness to a secret and future punishment, than to argue, as Elipha\(l\) did, from nothing but present trouble, to a course of past secret iniquity.

The impunity of these oppressors and spoilers is expressed in one word; (v. 12.) Yet God layeth not folly to them, that is, he does not immediately precipitate them with his judgments for these crimes, nor make them examples, and so enervate their folly to all the world. He that gets riches, and onely right, at his end shall be a fool, Jer. xvii. 11. But while he prospers he passes for a wise man, and God lays not folly to him until he saith, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee, Luke xii. 20.

13. They are of those that rebel against the light; they know not the ways thereof, nor abide in the paths thereof. 14. The murderer, rising with the light, killeth the poor and needy, and in the night is as a thief. 15. The eye also of the adulterer waiteth for the twilight, saying, No eye shall see me; and disquises his face. 16. In the dark they dig through houses, which they had marked for themselves in the daytime: they know not the light. 17. For the morning is to them even as the shadow of death; if one know them, they are in the terrors of the shadow of death.

These verses describe another sort of sinners, who therefore go unpunished, because they go undiscovered. They rebel against the light, v. 13. Some understand it figuratively: they sin against the light of nature, the light of God's law, and that of their own consciences; they profess to know God, but they rebel against the knowledge they have of him, and will not be guided and governed, commanded and controlled, by it. Others understand it literally: they have the day-light, and choose the night as the most advantageous season for their wickedness. Sinful works are therefore called works of darkness, because he that does evil, hates the light, (John iii. 20.) knows not the ways thereof, that is, keeps out of the way of it, or, if he happen to be seen, abides not where he thinks he is known. So that he here describes the worst of sinners, 1. That sin wilfully, and against the convictions of their own consciences, whereby they add rebellion to their sin. 2. That sin deliberately, and with a great deal of contrivance, gathering a thousand arts to conceal their villainies, fondly imagining, that, if they can but hide them from the eye of men, they are safe, but forgetting that there is no darkness, or shadow of death, in which the workers of iniquity can hide themselves from God's eye, ch. xxxiv. 22.

He specifies three sorts of sinners, that shun the light.

(1.) Murderers, v. 14. They rise with the light, as soon as ever the day breaks, to kill the poor travellers that are up early, and abroad about their business, going to market with a little money or goods; and though it is so little, that they are really to be called poor and needy, who with much ado get a sorry livelihood by their marketings, yet, to that beareth not, and doeth not good to the widow. 22. He draweth also the mighty with his power: he riseth up, and no man is sure of life. 23. Though it be given him to be in safety, whereas he resteth; yet his eyes are upon their ways. 24. They are exalted for a little while, but are gone and brought low; they are taken out of the way as all other, and cut off as the tops of the ears of corn. 25. And if it be not so now, who will make me a liar, and make my speech nothing but truth?

Job, here, in the conclusion of his discourse, gives some further instances of the wickedness of these cruel bloody men. 1. Some are pirates and robbers at sea. To this many learned interpreters apply those difficult expressions; (v. 18.) He is swift upon the waters. Privateers choose those ships that are the best sallers: in these swift ships, they cruise from one channel to another, to pick up prizes; and this brings them in so much wealth, that they live the better, and are the more feared. Job makes it not the way of the vineyards, that is, as Bishop Patrick explains it, They despise the employment of those who till the ground, and plant vineyards, as poor and unprofitable. But others make this a further description of the conduct of those sinners that are afraid of the light: if they be discovered, they get away as fast as they can, and choose to look, not in the vineyards, for fear of being discovered, but in some cursed portion, a lonely desolate place, in which nobody looks after. 2. Some are abusive to those that are in trouble, and add affliction to the afflicted. Barrenness was looked upon as a great reproach, and those that fall under that affliction they upbraid with it, as Penniniah did Hannah, on purpose to vex them and make them to fret, which is a barbarous thing; this is evil entreating the barren that beareth not, (v. 21.) or those that are childless, and so want the arrows others have in their quiver, which enable them to do what they please in the enemy, in the Ps. cxvii. 5. He takes that advantage against, and is oppressive to, them: as the fatherless, so the childless, are in some degree helpless. For the same reason, it is a cruel thing to hurt the widow, to whom he ought to do good; and not doing good, when it is in our power, is doing hurt. There are those who, by injuring themselves to cruelty, come, at last, to be so exceeding boisterous, that they are the terror of the mighty in the land of the living, v. 22. He draws the mighty into a snare with his power; even the greatest are not able to stand before him when he is in his mad fits: he rises up in his passion, and lays about him with so much fury, that no man is sure of his life; nor can he at the same time be sure of his own, for his hand is against every man, and every man's hand against him, Gen. xvi. 12. One would wonder how any man can take pleasure in making all about him afraid of him, yet there are those that do.

II. He shows that these daring sinners prosper, and are at ease for a while, nay, and often end their days in peace, as Ishmael, who, though he was a man of such a character as is here given, yet both lived and died in the presence of all his brethren, as we are told, Gen. xvi. 12. xxv. 18. Of these sinners here it is said, 1. That it is given them to be in safety, v. 23. They seem to be under the special protection of the Divine Providence, and one would wonder how they escape with life through so many dangers as they run themselves into. 2. That they rest upon this, that is, they rely upon this, as sufficient to warrant all their violations: because sentence against their evil works is not executed speedily, they think that there is a great evil in them; and that God is not displeased with them, nor will ever call them to an account. Their prosperity is their security. 3. That they are exalted for a while; they seem to be the favourites of Heaven, and value themselves as making the best figure on earth. They are set up in honour, set up (as they think) out of the reach of danger, and lifted up in the pride of their own spirits. 4. That, at length, they are carried out of the way, very gently and, without any remarkable disaster to the tree which is broken to shivers. They go down to the grave as easily as snow-water sinks into the dry ground, when it is melted by the sun.

So Bishop Patrick explains, v. 19. To the same purport he paraphrases v. 20, The worm shall forget him, &c. "God sets no such mark of his dis- pleasure upon him, but that his mother may soon forget him: the hand of justice does not hang on him on a gibbet for the birds to feed on; but he is carried to the grave like other men, to be the food of worms: there he lies quietly, and neither he nor his wickedness is any more remembered than a tree which is broken to shivers."

And, v. 24, They are taken out of the way as all other, that is, "They are shut up in their graves like all other men; nay, they die as easily (without those tedious pains which some endure) as an ear of corn is cropped with your hand."

Compare this with Solomon's observations (Eccles. 11.) I saw the wicked buried who had come and gone from the place of the holy, and they were forgotten.

III. He foresees their fall, however, and that their death, though they die in ease and honour, will be their ruin. God's eyes are upon their ways; (v. 23.) Though he keep silence, and seem to con- nive at them, yet he takes notice, and keeps account, of all their wickedness, and will make it to appear shortly, that their most secret sins, which they thought no eye should see, (v. 13.) were under his eye, and will be called over again. Here is no mention of the punishment of these sinners in the other world, but it is intimated in the particular notice taken of the consequences of his death. 1. The consumption of the body in the grave, though common to all, yet to him is in the nature of a punish- ment for his sin. The grave shall consume those that have sinned; that land of darkness will be the lot of those that love darkness, rather than light. 2. That and their iniquities shall be a feast for worms, which shall feed as sweetly on them as ever they fed on the pleasures and gains of their sins. 2. Though they thought to make themselves a great name by their wealth, and power, and mighty achievements, yet their memorial is perished with them, Ps. ix. 6. He that made himself so much talked of, when he is dead, shall be no more remem- bered with honour; his name shall rot, Prov. x. 7. They thought that he should inherit all the world while he lived, shall not spare him when he is dead, so that the womb that bare him, his own mother, shall forget him, that is, shall avoid making mention of him, and shall think that the greatest kindness she can do him, since no good can be said of him. That honour which is got by sin will soon turn into shame. 3. The wickedness they thought to estab- lish in their families, shall be broken as a tree; all their posterity shall go through the same evil. 4. Their wicked hopes dashed and buried with them. 4. Their pride shall be brought down, and laid in the dust; (v. 24.) and, in mercy to the world, they shall be taken out of the way, and all their power and pro- sperity shall be cut off; you may seek him, and he shall not be found. Job owns that wicked people will be miserable at last, miserable on the other side death, but utterly denies what his friends asserted, that they are, usually, miserable in this life.

Lastly, He concludes with a bold challenge to all that were present, to disprove what he had said, if they could; (v. 25.) "If it be not so now, as I have declared, and if it do not thence follow that I am unjustly condemned and censured, let them that can, undertake to prove that my discourse is either, 1. False in itself, and then they prove me a liar; or, 2. Foreign, and to nothing the purpose, and then they prove my speech frivolous and nothing worth."

That, indeed, which is false, is nothing worth; where there is not truth, how can there be goodness? But they that speak the words of truth and soberness, need not fear having what they say brought to the test, but can cheerfully submit it to a fair examination, as Job does here.

CHAP. XXV.

Bilded here makes a very short reply to Job's last discourse, as one that began to be tired of the cause. Hedis the main question concerning the prosperity of wicked men, as being unable to answer the proofs Job had produced in the foregoing chapter: but, because he thought Job had made too bold with the Divine Majesty in his appeal to the divine tribunal, (e. xxii.) he, in a few words, shows the infinite distance there is between God and man, teaching us, I. To think highly and honourably of God, v. 2, 3, 5. II. To think meanly of ourselves; (v. 4, 6.) which, he thinks applicable to Job, are two good lessons for us all to learn.

1. THEN answered Bildad the Shuhite, and said, 2. Dominion and fear are with him; he maketh peace in his high places. 3. Is there any number of his armies? and upon whom doth not his light arise? 4. How then can man be justified with God? or how can he be clean that is born of a woman? 5. Behold, even to the moon, and it shineth not; yea, the stars are not pure in his sight: 6. How much less man, that is a worm, and the son of man, which is a worm?

Bildad is to be commended here for two things: 1. For speaking no more on the subject about which Job and he differed. Perhaps he began to think Job was in the right, and then it was justice to say no more concerning it, as one that contended for truth, not for victory; and therefore, for the finding of truth, would be content to lose the victory: or if he still thought himself in the right, yet he knew when he had said enough, and would not wrangle endlessly for the last word. Perhaps, indeed, one reason why he and the rest of them let fall this de- bate, was because they perceived that Job and they did not differ so much in opinion as they though: they owned that wicked people might prosper a while, and Job owned that they would be destroyed at last; how little then was the difference! If disputants would understand one another better, perhaps they would find themselves nearer one another than they imagined. 2. For speaking so well on the matter about which Job and he were agreed. If we would all get our hearts filled with awful thoughts of God, and humble thoughts of ourselves, we should not be so apt as we are to fall out about matters of doubtful disputation, which are trifling or intricate.

Two ways Bildad takes here to extoll God and abase man.

1. He shows how glorious God is, and thence in- fers how guilty and impure man is before him, v. 2-4. Let us see then,

1. What great things are here said of God, de- signed to possess Job with a reverence of him, and to check his reflections upon him, and upon his dealings with him.
I. JOB, 111. xxv.

(1.) God is the sovereign Lord of all, and with him is terrible majesty. Dominion and fear are with him, v. 2. He that gave being, has an incontestable authority to give laws, and can enforce the laws he gives. He that made all, has a right to dispose of all according to his own will, with an absolute sovereignty. Whatever he will do, he does, and may do; and none can say unto him, What dost thou? or Why dost thou so? Dan. iv. 35. His having dominion (or being God) (it is unnecessary to speak of him as exalted and Ruler of all the creatures they are all his, and they are all under his direction, and at his disposal. Hence it follows that he is to be feared, that is, revered and obeyed, and that he is feared by all that know him; the seraphim cover their faces before him; it follows too, that, first or last, all will be made to fear him. Men's dominion is often despised, often despaired, but God is always terrible.

(2.) The glorious inhabitants of the upper world are all perfectly absent of him, and entirely acquiesce in his will. He maketh peace in his high places. He enjoys himself in a perfect tranquility; the holy angels never quarrel with him, nor with one another, but entirely acquiesce in his will, and unanimously execute it, without murmuring or disputing; thus the will of God is done in heaven; and thus we pray it may be done by us and others on earth. The sun, moon, and stars, keep their courses, and never quarrel with the heaven, and are even in this lower region, which is often disturbed with storms and tempests, yet, when God pleases, he commands peace, by making the storm a calm, Ps. civ. 29. -lxv. 7. Observe, The high places are his high places; for the heavens, even the heavens, are the Lord's in a peculiar manner: peace is God's work; where it is made, it is he that makes it, Isa. lix. 19. In heaven there is perfect peace; for there is perfect holiness, and there is God, who is love.

(3.) He is a God of irresistible power; Is there any number of his armies? v. 3. The greatness and power of princes is judged of by their armies. God is not only himself almighty, but he numbers millions of forces at his beck and disposal; standing armies that are never disbanded; regular troops, and well disciplined, that are never at a loss, that never mutiny; veteran troops, that have been long in his service; victorious troops, that never failed of success, nor were ever defeated. All the creatures angels and especially. He is Lord of all, Lord of hosts. He has numberless armies, and yet makes peace; he could make war upon us, but is willing to be at peace with us; and even the heavenly hosts were sent to prevail peace on earth and good will toward men, Luke ii. 14.

(4.) His providence extends itself to all; Upon whom does not his light arise? The light of the sun is communicated to all parts of the world, and take the year round, till all equally. See Ps. xxi. 6. The sun, in full fulfilment of the universal cognizance and care God takes of the whole creation, Matth. v. 45. All are under the light of his knowledge, and are naken and open before him. All partake of the light of his goodness: it seems especially to be meant of that. He is good to all; the earth is full of his goodness. He is Deus Optimus - God, the best of beings, as well as maximus—the greatest; he has power to destroy; but his pleasure is, to show mercy. All the creatures live upon his bounty.

2. What few things are here said of man, and very truly and justly; (v. 4.) How then can man be justified with God? or how can he be clean? Man is not only mean, but vile, not only earthy, but filthy: he cannot be justified, he cannot be clean. (1.) In comparison with God. Man's righteousness and holiness, at the best, are nothing to God's, Ps. lxxxix. 6. (2.) In debate with God. He that will quarrel with the word and providence of God, must unavoidably go by the worst. God will be justified, and then man will be condemned, Ps. li. 4. Rom. iii. 4. There is no error in God's judgment, and therefore there lies no exception against it, nor appeal from it. (3.) In the sight of God. If God is so great and glorious, how can man, who is guilty and impure, appear before him? Note, [1.] Man, by reason of his actual transgressions, is thencefore guilty, to God's justice, and cannot in himself be justified before him: he can neither plead Not guilty, nor plead any merit of his own to balance or extenuate his guilt. The scripture has concluded all under sin. [2.] Man, by reason of his original corruption, as he is born of a woman, is odious to God's holiness, and cannot be clean in his sight. God sees his impurity, and it is certain that by it he is rendered incapable of his actual transgressions, is thencefore to God's justice, and cannot in himself be justified before him: he can neither plead Not guilty, nor plead any merit of his own to balance or extenuate his guilt. The scripture has concluded all under sin.
I. BEHOLD to them than really it is. (3.) That he had done him no service by it. He pretended to convince, instruct, and comfort, Job; but, alas! what he had said was so little to the purpose, that it would not avail to rectify any mistakes, nor to assist him either in bearing his afflictions, or in getting good by them; (v. 4.) “To whom hast thou uttered words? Was it to me that thou didst direct thy discourse? And dost thou take me for such a child as to need these instructions? Or dost thou think them proper for one of my condition?” Everything that is true and good is not suitable and seasonable. To one that was humbled, and broken, and grieved in spirit, as Job was, he ought to have preached of the grace and mercy of God, rather than of his greatness and majesty, to have laid before him the consolations, rather than the terrors, of the Almighty. Christ knows how to speak what is proper for the hearty; (Isa. I. 4.) and his ministers should learn how to divide the word of truth, and not make those sad, whom God would not have made sad; as Bildad did: and therefore Job asks him, Whose spirit came from thee? that is, “What troubled soul would ever be revived and relieved, and brought to itself, by such discourses as these?” Thus are we often disappointed in our expectations from our friends who should comfort us, but the Comforter, who is the Holy Ghost, never mistakes in his operations, nor misses of his end.

5. Dead things are formed from under the waters, and the inhabitants thereof. 6. Hell is naked before him, and destruction hath no covering. 7. He stretcheth out the north over the empty place, and hangeth the earth upon nothing. 8. He bindeth up the waters in his thick clouds; and the cloud is not rent under them. 9. He holdeth back the face of his throne, and spreadeth his cloud upon it. 10. He hath compassed the waters with bounds, until the day and night come to an end. 11. The pillars of heaven tremble, and are astonished at his reproof. 12. He divideth the sea with his power, and by his understanding he smiteth through the proud. 13. By his Spirit he hath garnished the heavens; his hand hath formed the crooked serpent. 14. Lo, these are parts of his ways; but how little a portion is heard of him? but the thunder of his power who can understand?

The truth received a great deal of light from the dispute between Job and his friends, concerning those points about which they differed; but now they are upon a subject in which they were all agreed, the infinite glory and power of God. How does truth triumph, and how bright does it shine, when there appears no other strife between the contending, than that shall speak most highly and honourably of God, and be most large in showing forth his praise! It were well if all disputes about matters of religion were ended in granting God as Lord of all, and our Lord, with one mind and one mouth; (Rom. xvi. 6.) for to that we have all attained, in that we are all agreed.

I. Many illustrious instances are here given of the wisdom and power of God, in the creation and preservation of the world.

1. If we look about us, to the earth and waters here below, we shall see striking instances of omnipotence, which we may gather out of these verses.

CHAP. XXVI.

This is Job’s short reply to Bildad’s short discourse, in which he is so far from contradicting him, that he confirms what he had said, and outdoes him in magnifying God, and setting forth his power, to show what reason he had still to say as he did; (ch. xvi. 2.) What ye know the same do I know also. 1. He shows that Bildad’s discourse was foreign to the matter he was discourseing of: though very true and good, yet not to the purpose, v. 2, 4. 2. That it was needless to the person he was discourseing with; for he knew it, and believed it, and could speak of it as well as he, and better, and could add to the proofs which he had produced of God’s power and greatness, which he does in the rest of his discourse, (v. 5. 13.) concluding, that, when they had both said what they could, all came short of the merit of the subject, and it was still far from being exhausted, v. 14.

1. But Job answered and said, 2. How hast thou helped him that is without power? how savest thou the arm that hath no strength? 3. How hast thou counselled him that hath no wisdom? and how hast thou plentifully declared the thing as it is? 4. To whom hast thou uttered words? and whose spirit came from thee?

One would not have thought that Job, now that he was in so much pain and misery, could have bantered his friend as he does here, and made himself merry with the impertinency of his discourse. Bildad thought that he had made a fine speech, that the matter was so weighty, and the language so fine, that he had gained the reputation both of an oracle and of an orator; but Job peevishly enough shows that his performance was not so valuable as he thought it, and ridicules him for it. He shows,

1. That there was no great matter to be found in it; (v. 3.) How hast thou plentifully declared the thing as it is? This is spoken ironically, upbraiding Bildad with the good conceit he himself had of what he had said. (1.) He thought he had spoken very clearly, had declared the thing as it is. He was very fond (as we are all apt to be) of his own notions, and thought they only were right, and true, and intelligible, and all other notions of the thing were false, mistaken, and confused; whereas, when we speak of the glory of God, we cannot declare the thing as it is, without a glass darkly, or through a glass, and shall not see him as he is, till we come to heaven. Here we cannot order our speech concerning him, ch. xxxvii. 19. (2.) He thought he had spoken very fully, though in few words, that he had plentifully declared it; and, alas! it was but poorly and scantily that he declared it, in comparison with the vast compass and copiousness of the subject.

2. That there was no great use to be made of it: Cut barks—What good hast thou done by all that thou hast said? (v. 2.) How hast thou, with all this mighty flourish, helped him that is without power? (v. 3.) How hast thou, with thy grave dictates, counselled him that hath no wisdom? Job would convince him, (1.) That he had done God no service, nor made him in the least beholden to him. It is indeed our duty, and will be our honour, to speak on God’s behalf; but Bildad did not think that he needed service, or is indebted to us for it, nor will he accept it, if it come from a spirit of contention and contradiction, and not from a sincere regard to God’s glory. (2.) That he had done his cause no service by it. He thought his friends were mightily beholden to him, for helping them, at a dead lift, to make their part good against Job, when they were quite at a loss, and had no strength, no wisdom. Even weak disputants, when warm, are apt to think truth more

J O B, XXVI.

1. BEHOLD to them than really it is. (3.) That he had done him no service by it. He pretended to convince, instruct, and comfort, Job; but, alas! what he had said was so little to the purpose, that it would not avail to rectify any mistakes, nor to assist him either in bearing his afflictions, or in getting good by them; (v. 4.) “To whom hast thou uttered words? To one that was humbled, and broken, and grieved in spirit, as Job was, he ought to have preached of the grace and mercy of God, rather than of his greatness and majesty, to have laid before him the consolations, rather than the terrors, of the Almighty. Christ knows how to speak what is proper for the hearty; (Isa. I. 4.) and his ministers should learn how to divide the word of truth, and not make those sad, whom God would not have made sad; as Bildad did: and therefore Job asks him, Whose spirit came from thee? that is, “What troubled soul would ever be revived and relieved, and brought to itself, by such discourses as these?” Thus are we often disappointed in our expectations from our friends who should comfort us, but the Comforter, who is the Holy Ghost, never mistakes in his operations, nor misses of his end.

5. Dead things are formed from under the waters, and the inhabitants thereof. 6. Hell is naked before him, and destruction hath no covering. 7. He stretcheth out the north over the empty place, and hangeth the earth upon nothing. 8. He bindeth up the waters in his thick clouds; and the cloud is not rent under them. 9. He holdeth back the face of his throne, and spreadeth his cloud upon it. 10. He hath compassed the waters with bounds, until the day and night come to an end. 11. The pillars of heaven tremble, and are astonished at his reproof. 12. He divideth the sea with his power, and by his understanding he smiteth through the proud. 13. By his Spirit he hath garnished the heavens; his hand hath formed the crooked serpent. 14. Lo, these are parts of his ways; but how little a portion is heard of him? but the thunder of his power who can understand?

The truth received a great deal of light from the dispute between Job and his friends, concerning those points about which they differed; but now they are upon a subject in which they were all agreed, the infinite glory and power of God. How does truth triumph, and how bright does it shine, when there appears no other strife between the contending, than that shall speak most highly and honourably of God, and be most large in showing forth his praise! It were well if all disputes about matters of religion were ended in granting God as Lord of all, and our Lord, with one mind and one mouth; (Rom. xvi. 6.) for to that we have all attained, in that we are all agreed.

I. Many illustrious instances are here given of the wisdom and power of God, in the creation and preservation of the world.

1. If we look about us, to the earth and waters here below, we shall see striking instances of omnipotence, which we may gather out of these verses.
And is there any thing in which the majesty of God appears more dreadful than in the eternal ruin of the ungodly, and the groans of the inhabitants of the land of darkness? Those that dwell not with angels fear and worship, shall for ever with devils fear and tremble, and God therein will be glorified.

3. If we look up to heaven above, we shall see instances of God's sovereignty and power.

(1.) He stretches out the north over the empty place, v. 7. So he did at first, then he stretched out the heavens like a curtain, (Ps. civ. 2.) and still continues to keep them stretched out, and will do so till the general conversion, when they shall be rolled together as a scroll. Ps. vii. 14. He mentions the north, because his country (as ours) lay in the northern hemisphere; and the air is the empty place over which it is stretched out. See Ps. lxxxix. 12. What an empty place is this world, in comparison with the other!

(2.) He keeps the waters that are said to be above the firmament from pouring down upon the earth, as once they did; (v. 8.) He binds up the waters in his thick clouds, as if they were well-tied in a bag till there is occasion to use them; and, notwithstanding the vast weight of water so raised and laid up, yet the cloud is not rent under them, for then they would burst, and pour out as a spout; but they do, as it were, distil through the cloud, and so come drop by drop, in mercy to the earth, in small rain, or great rain, as he pleases.

(3.) He conceals the glory of the upper world, the dazzling lustre of which the poor mortal could not bear; (v. 9.) He holds back the face of his throne, that light in which he dwells, and spreads a cloud upon it, through which he judges, ch. xxii. 13. God will have us to live by faith, not by sense; for this is agreeable to a state of probation. It were not a fair trial, if the face of God's throne were as visible now, as it will be in the great day.

Lost his high throne, above expression bright,
With deadly glory should oppress our sight,
To break the dazzling force, he draws a screen
Of oblique shades, and spreads his clouds between.

Sir R. Blackmore.

(4.) The bright ornaments of heaven are the work of his hands; (v. 13.) By his Spirit, the eternal Spirit that moved upon the face of the waters, the breath of his mouth, (Ps. xxxiii. 6.) he has garnished the heavens, not only made them, but beautified them; has curiously bespangled them with stars by night, and painted them with the light of the sun by day. God, having made man to look upward, (On homini sublimum dedi—to man he gave an erect countenance,) has therefore garnished the heavens, to invite him to look upward, that, by pleasing his eye with the dazzling light of the sun, and the sparkling light of the stars, their number, order, and various magnitudes, which, as so many golden studs, beautify the canopy drawn over our heads, he may be led to admire the great Creator, the Father and Fountain of lights, and to say, "If the pavement be so rich, what will the face be! If the visible heavens be so glorious, what are those that are out of sight!" From the beauteous garniture of the ante-chamber, we may infer the precious furniture of the presence-chamber. If stars be so bright, what are angels! What is meant here by the crooked serpent which his hands have formed is not certain. Some make it part of the garnishing of the heavens, the milky-way, say some; some peculiar constellation, say others. It is the same word that is used for leviathan, (Isa. xxvii. 1.) and, probably, may be meant of the whale or crocodile, in which appears much of the power of the Creator; and why may not Job conclude with that inference, when God himself does so? ch. xli. ---

Sir R. Blackmore.
Job's discourse here is called a parable, (mashal), the title of Solomon's proverbs, because it was grave and weighty, and very instructive; and he spake as one having authority. It comes from a word that signifies to rule, or have dominion; and some think it intimates that Job now triumphed over his opponents, and spake as one that had baffled them. We say of an excellent preacher, that he has the acumen to command his hearers. Job did so here.

A long strife there had been between Job and his friends; they seemed disposed to have the matter compromised; and therefore, since an oath for confirmation is an end of strife, (Heb. vi. 16.) Job here backs all he had said, in maintenance of his own integrity, with a solemn oath, to silence contradiction, and take the blame entirely upon himself, if he prevailed. Observ.

1. The form of his oath; (v. 2.) As God liveth, who hath taken away my judgment. Here, (1.) He speaks highly of God, in calling him the living God, (which means ever-living, the eternal God, that has life in himself,) and in appealing to him as the sole and sovereign Judge. We can swear by no greater, and it is an affront to him to swear by any other. (2.) Yet he speaks hardly of him, and unbecomingly, in saying that God had taken away his judgment, and had ordered him to do him justice in this controversy, and to appear in defence of him, and that, by continuing his troubles, on which his friends ground their censures of him, he had taken from him the opportunity he hoped ere now to have had of clearing himself. Elihu reproved him for this word; (ch. xxxiv. 5.) for God is righteous in all his ways, and takes away no man's judgment. But see how apt we are to despair of favour from God next to his power, and to say, we have no hope of it, and are we, and so soon weary of waiting God's time. He also charges it upon God, that he had vexed his soul; had not only not appeared for him, but had appeared against him, and, by laying such grievous afflictions upon him, had quite embittered his life to him, and all the comforts of it. We, by our impatience, vex our own souls, and then complain of God that he has vexed them. Yet see Job's confidence in the goodness of both his cause and of his God. God was good, God is good, and God will yet appear with him, and to act against him, for the present; yet he could cheerfully commit his cause to him. 2. The matter of his oath, v. 3, 4. (1.) That he would not speak wickedness, nor utter deceit. That, in general, he would never allow himself in the way of lying; that, as in this debate he had all along spoken as he thought, so he would never wrong his conscience by speaking otherwise: he would never maintain any doctrine, nor assert any matter of fact, but what he believed to be true; nor would he deny the truth, how much soever it might make against him: and, whereas his friends charged him with being a hypocrite, he was ready to answer, upon oath, to all their interrogatories, if called to it. On the one hand, he would not, for all the world, deny the charge, if he knew himself guilty, but would declare the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and take to himself the shame of his hypocrisy; on the other hand, since he was conscious to himself of his integrity, and that he was not such a man as his friends represented him, he would never betray his integrity, nor charge himself with that which he was innocent of; he would not be brought, nor by the rack of their unjust censures, falsely to accuse himself. If we must not bear false witness against our neighbour, then not against ourselves. (2.) That he would adhere to this resolution, as long as he lived; (v. 3.) All the while my breath is in me. Our resolutions against sin should be thus constant, resolutions for life: in things doubtful and indigant, it is not safe to be thus peremptory; we know not what reason we may see to change our mind, God may reveal to us that which we have hitherto been unaware of; but in so plain a thing as this, we cannot be too positive, that we will never speak wickedness. Somethings of a reason for his resolution is here implied—that our breath will not be always in us; we must shortly breathe our last, and therefore, while our breath is in us, we must never breathe wickedness and deceit, nor allow ourselves to say or do any thing which will make against us, when our breath shall depart. The breath is v. 14, as well the soul of Job, as the breath of our nostrils. It would fast hold his integrity, and not curse God, as Satan, by his wife, urged him to do, ch. ii. 9. Job here thinks of dying, and of getting ready for death, and therefore resolves never to part with his religion, though he had lost all he had in the world. Note, The best preparative for death, is, perseverance to death in our integrity. "Until I die," that is, "though I die by this affliction, I will not thereby be put out of concord with my God and my religion. Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him." (2.) He would always stand to it, that he was an honest man; he would not remove, he would not part with, the conscience, and comfort, and credit, of his integrity; he was resolved to defend it to the last. "God knows, and my own heart knows, that I always meant well, and did not allow myself in the omission of any known duty, or the commission of any known sin. This is my rejoicing, and no man shall rob me of it; I will never lie against my right." It has often been the lot of upright men to be censured and condemned as hypocrites; but it well becomes them to bear up boldly against such censures, and not to be discouraged by them, or think the worse of themselves for them; as the apostle, (Heb. xiii. 18.) We have a good conscience in all things, willing to live honestly.

Job complained much of the reproaches of his friends; But (says he) my heart shall not reproach me; that is, "I will never give my heart cause to reproach me, but I will keep a true conscience in opposition to every thing I do. I will not give my heart leave to reproach me." "Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifies." To resolve that our hearts shall not reproach us, when we give them cause to do so, is to affirm God, whose deputy conscience is, and to wrong ourselves; for it is a good thing, when a man has sinned, to have a heart within him to smite him for it, 2 Sam. xxiv. 10. But to resolve that our hearts shall not reproach us, while we still hold fast our integrity, is to buffle the designs of the evil spirit, (who tempts good Christians to question their adoption, If thou be the Son of God,) and to concur with the operations of the good Spirit, who witnesses to their adoption.

7. Let mine enemy be as the wicked, and he that riseth up against me as the unrighteous. 8. For what is the hope of the hypocrite, though he hath gained, when God taketh away his soul? 9. Will God hear his cry when trouble cometh upon him? 10. Will he delight himself in the Almighty? will he always call upon God?

Job, having solemnly protested the satisfaction he had in his integrity, for the further clearing of himself, here expresses the dread he had of being found a hypocrite. I. He tells us how he started at the thought of it, for he looked upon the condition of a hypocrite and a wicked man, to be certainly the most miserable condition that any man could be in; (v. 7.) Let mine enemy be as the wicked; a proverbial expression, like that, (Dan. iv. 19.) The dream be to them that hate thee. Job was so far from indulging himself in any wicked way, and flattering himself in it, that, if he might have have to wish the greatest evil he could think of to the worst enemy he had in the world, he would wish him the portion of a wicked man, knowing that worse he could not wish him. Not that we may lawfully wish any man to be wicked, or that any man who is not wicked should be treated as wicked, but we should always choose to be in the condition of a beggar, an outlaw, a galley-slave, any thing, rather than in the condition of the wicked, though in ever so much plagues and outward prosperity.

II. He gives us the reasons of it.

1. Because the hypocrite's hopes will not be crowned; (v. 8.) For what is the hope of the hypocrite? Bildad had condemned it, (ch. viii. 13, 14.) and Zophar, (ch. xi. 20.) Job here concurs with them, and reads the death of the hypocrite's hope with as much assurance as they had done; and this fits in as a reason why he would not remove his integrity, but still hold it fast. Note, The consideration of the miserable condition of wicked people, and especially hypocrites, should engage us to be upright, (for we are undone, for ever undone, if we be not,) and also to get the comfortable evidence of our uprightness; for how can we be easy, if the great concern lie at uncertainties? Job's friends would persuade him that all his hope was but the hope of the hypocrite; (ch. iv. 6.) "Nay," says he, "I would not, for all the world, be so foolish as to build upon such a rotten foundation; for what is the hope of the hypocrite?" See verses. (1.) The hypocrite deceived. He has gained, and he has hope; this is his bright side; it is allowed that he has gained by his hypocrisy, has gained the praise and applause of men, and the wealth of this world. Jeth gained a kingdom by his hypocrisy, and the Pharisees many a widow's house. Upon this gain he builds his hope, such as it is; he hopes he is in good circumstances for another world, because he finds he is so in this world, and thereby he hopes to gain his end. (2.) The hypocrite unprovided; he will at last see himself wretchedly cheated: for, (1.) God shall take away his soul, sorely against his will; (Luk. xii. 20.) Thy soul shall be required of thee. God, as the Judge, takes it away to be tried and determined to its everlasting state. He shall then fall into the hands of the living God, to be dealt with immediately. (2.) What will his hope be then? It will be no avail to him; it will stand him no more in his stead. The wickedness of this world, which he hoped in, he must leave behind him, Ps. xlviii. 17. The happiness of the other world, which he hoped for, he will certainly miss of: he hoped to go to heaven, but he will be shamefully disappointed; he will plead his external profession, privileges, and performances, but all his pleads will be overruled as frivolous; Depart from me, I know you not. So that, upon the whole, it is certain, a formal 123

Get judgment, and profess (Ps.) your company, and union of the reversible, the does, and death will come, and trouble with it, when he must leave the world and all his delights in it. The judgment of the world will come, and fearfulness will surprise the hypocrites, Isa. xxxiii. 14. (2.)
Then he will cry to God; he will pray, and pray earnestly.
Those who in prosperity slighted God, either prayed not at all, or were cold and careless in prayer, when trouble comes, will make their application to him, and cry as men in earnest. But, (3.) Will God hear him then? in the troubles of this life? God has told us that he will not hear the prayers of those who regard iniquity in their hearts, (Ps. iv. 18.) nor of those that turn away their ear from hearing the law, Prov. xxviii. 9. Get you to the gods whom ye have served, Judg. x. 14. In the judgment to come, it is certain, God will not hear the cry of those who lived and died in their hypocrisy. Their doleful lamentations will all be unpitied;
I will laugh at your calamity. Their importunate petitions will all be thrown out, and their pleas rejected.
Inflexible justice cannot be biased, nor the irreverent sentence revoked. See Mat. xvii. 22.

Luke xiii. 26, and the case of the foolish virgins, Matt. xxv. 11.

3. Because the hypocrite's religion is neither con-durable nor constant; (v. 10.) Will he delight himself in the Almighty? No, not at any time, for his delight is in the profits of the world, and the pleasures of the flesh, more than in God, especially not in the time of trouble. Will he always call upon God? No, in prosperity he will not call upon God, but slight him; in adversity, he will not call upon God, but curse him; he is weary of his religion, when he gets nothing by it, or is in danger of losing.

Note, (1.) Those are hypocrites, who, though they profess religion, neither take pleasure in it, nor persevere in it; who reckon their religion a task and a drudgery, a weariness, and snuff at it; who do not believe in God, nor do not believe in God. He who believeth in God, and standeth while he is in fashion, or while the pang of devotion lasts, but leave it off when they fall into other company, or when the hot fit is over. (2.) The reason why hypocrites do not persevere in religion, is, because they have no pleasure in it. They that do not delight themselves in the Almighty, will not always call upon him. The more comfort we find in our religion, the more closely we shall cleave to it.

Those who delight in God, and in a day of trouble, will not let vanity veil the pleasures of sense, and so draw away from their religion; and they are easily run down by the crosses of this life, and so driven away from their religion, and will not always call upon God.

11. I will teach you by the hand of God: that which is with the Almighty will I not conceal. 12. Behold, all ye yourselves have seen it; why then are ye thus altogether vain? 13. This is the portion of a wicked man with God, and the heritage of oppressors, which they shall receive of the Almighty. 14. If his children be multiplied, it is for the sword; and his offspring shall not be satisfied with bread. 15. Those that remain of him shall be buried in death; and his widows shall not weep. 16. Though he heap up silver as the dust, and prepare rainment as the clay; 17. He may prepare it, but the just shall put it on, and the innocent shall divide the silver. 18. He build-hath his house as a moth, and as a booth that the keeper maketh. 19. The rich man shall lie down, but he shall not be gathered.

he openeth his eyes, and he is not. 20.
Terrors take hold on him as waters, a tempest stealeth him away in the night. 21.
The east wind carrieth him away, and he departeth; and, as a storm, hurleth him out of his place. 22. For God shall cast upon him, and not spare: he would fain flee out of his hand. 23. Men shall clap their hands at him, and shall hiss him out of his place.

Job's friends had seen a great deal of the misery and destruction that attend wicked people, especially oppressors; and Job, while the heat of disputation lasted, had said as much, and with as much assurance, of their prosperity; but now, that the heat of the battle was nearly over, he was willing to own how far he agreed with them, and where the difference between his opinion and theirs lay. 1. He agreed with them, that wicked people are miserable people; that God will surely reckon with cruel oppressors, and, one time or other, one way or other, his justice will make reprisals upon them for all the affronts they have put upon God, and all the wrongs they have done to their neighbours. This truth is abundantly confirmed by the entire concurrence of these angry disputants in it. But, 2. In this they differed. They held that these deserved judgments are presently and visibly brought upon wicked oppressors; that they travail with pain all their days; that in prosperity
the destroyer comes upon them; that they shall not be rich, nor their branch green; and that their destruction shall be accomplished before their time;
so Eliphaz; (ch. xv. 20, 21, 29, 32.) that the steps of their strength shall be straitened; that terrors will make them afraid on every side; so Bildad; (ch.
xviii. 7, 11.) that he himself shall vomit up his riches, and that in the fulness of his sufficiency he shall be in straits; so Zophar, ch. xx. 15, 22. Now Job held that, in many cases, judgments do not fall upon them quickly, but are deferred for some time.
That vengeance strikes slowly, he had already shown; (ch. xxi and xxiv.) now he comes to show that it strikes surely and severely, and that re-primances are not without effect.

I. Job here undertakes to set this matter in a true light; (v. 11, 12.) I will teach you. We must not disdain to learn even from those who are sick and poor, yea, and peevish too, if they deliver what is true and good. Observe, 1. What he would teach them; "That which is with the Almighty," that is,
"the counsels and purposes of God concerning wicked people, which are hid with him, and which we cannot see, that judge all the works of his providence concerning them." This, says Job, I will not conceal. What God has not concealed from us, we must not conceal from these we are concerned to teach. Things revealed belong to us and our children. 2. How he would teach them;
By the hand of God, that is, by his strength and assistance. Those who undertake to teach others must look to the hand of God to direct them, to open their ear, (Isa. l. 4.) and to open their lips. To se whom God teaches with a strong hand, are best able to teach others, Isa. viii. 11. 3. What reason they had to learn those things which he was about to teach them; (v. 12.) that it was confirmed by their own observation; You yourselves have seen it; (but what we have heard, and seen, and known, we have need to be taught, that we may be perfect in our do.) He eat that ye have not them to rise in their judgment concerning him: Why then are ye thus altogether vain, to condemn me for a wicked man because I am afflicted? Truth, rightly understood and applied, would cure us of that vanity of mind which arises from our mistakes.

That particularly which he offers now to lay before them, is, the portion of a wicked man with God, particularly of oppressors, v. 13. Compare ch. xx. 29. Their portion in the world may be great, and preferment great, but their portion with God is ruin and misery. They are above the control of any earthly power, it may be, but the Almighty can deal with them.

II. He does it, by showing that wicked people may, in some instances, prosper, but that ruin follows them in those very instances; and that is their portion, that is their heritage, that is it which they must abide by.

1. They may prosper in their children, but ruin attends them. His children perhaps are multiplied, (v. 14.) or magnified, so some; they are very numerous, and are raised to honour and great estates. Worldly people are said to be full of children; (Ps. xvi. 14.) and, as it is in the margin there, their children are full. In them the parents hope to live, and in their preferment to be honoured. But the more children they leave, and the greater prosperity they leave them in, the more and the fairer marks do they leave for the arrows of God's judgments to be levelled at: his three sore judgments, sword, famine, and pestilence, 2 Sam. xxiv. 13. (1.) Some of them shall die by the sword, the sword of war, perhaps; they brought them up to live by their sword, as Esau; (Gen. xxxvi. 40.) and those that do so, commonly die by the sword, first or last: or by the sword of justice for their crimes, or the sword of the murderer for their estates. (2.) Others of them shall die by famine; (v. 14.) offering shall be made of them, satisfied with bread. He thought that he had secured to them large estates, but it may happen that they may be reduced to poverty, so as not to have the necessary supports of life, at least not to live comfortably. They shall be so needy, that they shall not have a competency of necessary food, and so greedy, or so discontented, that what they have they shall not be satisfied with, because not so much, or not so dainty, as what they have been used to eat, and them satisfied with not enough.

(3.) Those that remain shall be buried in death, that is, shall die of the plague, which is called death, (Rev. vi. 8.) and be buried privately and in haste, as soon as they are dead, without any solemnity; buried with the burial of an ass; and even their widows shall not weep; they shall not have wherewithal to put them in mourning. Or it denotes, that these wicked men, as they live undesired, so do they die unlamented, and therefore, (v. 15.) those who lives have been heirs, they think them heirs even that they are got rid of them.

2. They may prosper in their estates, but ruin attends them too, v. 16-18. (1.) We will suppose them to be rich in money and plate, in clothing and furniture; They heap up silver, in abundance as the dust, and prepare raiment as the clay: they have heaps of clothes about them, as plentiful as heaps of clay; or it intimates that they have such abundance of clothes, that they are even a burden to them; they lade themselves with thick clay, Hab. ii. 6. See what is the care and business of worldly people.—To heap up worldly wealth. Much would have more, until the silver is cankered, and the garments moth-eaten, Jan. v. 2, 3. But what comes of it? He shall never be the better for it himself; death will strip him, death will rob him, if he be not robbed and stripped sooner, Luke xii. 20. Nay, God will so order it, that the just shall have his heart's desire, the wicked shall have a testimony against him, and be stripped of his silver. [1.] They shall have it, and divide it among themselves; some way or other, Providence shall so order it, that good men shall come honestly by that wealth which the wicked man came dishonestly by. The wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just, Prov. xiii. 22. God disposes of men's estates as he pleases, and often makes their wills, against their will. The just, whom he hated and persecuted, shall have rule over all his labour, and walk in the way he was glad to take, and it shall be taken from him. The Egyptians' jewels were the Israelites' pay. Solomon observes, (Eccl. ii. 26.) that God makes the sinners drudges to the righteous; for to the sinner he gives travail to gather and heap up, that he may give to him that is good before God. [2.] They shall do good with it; the innocent shall not hoard the silver, as he did that gathered it, but shall divide it to the poor, shall give a portion to seven, and another eight, which is his own. More secure, and so secure, to have a treasure, good for nothing if it be not spread. When God enriches good men, they must remember they are but stewards, and must give an account. What bad men bring a curse upon their families with the ill-getting of, good men bring a blessing upon their families with the well-using of. He that by unjust gain increaseth his substance, shall gather it for him that will pay the poor, Prov. xiii. 8. (2.) We will suppose them to have built their mansions and stately houses; but they are like the house which the north makes for herself in an old garment, out of which she will soon be shaven, v. 18. He is very secure in it, as a moth, and has no apprehension of danger; but it will prove of as short continuance as a booth which the keeper makes, which will quickly be taken down and gone, and his place shall know him no more.

3. Destruction attend their persons, though they lived longer, and suffered less in life, and died at ease; (v. 19.) The rich man shall lie down to sleep, to repose himself in the abundance of his wealth, Soul, take thine ease; shall lie down in it as his strong city, and seem to others to be very happy and very easy; but he shall not be gathered, that is, he shall not have his mind composed, and settled, and gathered in, to enjoy his wealth. He does not sleep so contentedly as people think he does. He lies down, but his abundance will not suffer him to sleep, at least not so sweetly as the labouring man, Eccl. v. 12. He lies down, but he is full of tossings and fro and the dawning of the day, and then he opens his eyes, and he is not; he sees himself, and all he has, hastening away, as it were, in the twinkling of an eye. His cares increase his fears, and both together make him uneasy; so that, when we attend him to his bed, we do not find him happy there. But, in the close, we are called to attend his death, and see how miserable he is in death, and after death.

(1.) He is miserable in death. It is to him the king of terrors, v. 20, 21. When some mortal disease seizes him, what a fright is he in! Terrors take hold on him, as waters, as if he were surrounded by the flowing tides. He trembles to think of leaving this world, and much more of removing to another. This mingles sorrow and wrath with his sickness, as Solomon observes, Eccl. v. 17. These terrors put him either, [1.] Into a silent and bullen JOB, XXVIII.

The strain of this chapter is very unlike the rest of this book. Job forgets his sores, and all his sorrows, and talks like a philosopher, or a virtuous, Here is a great deal both of natural philosophy and moral in this discourse; but the question is, How does it come here? Doubtless, it was not merely for an amusement, or diversion from the controversy; though, if it had been only so, perhaps it had not been much amiss. When disputes grow hot, better lose the question than lose our temper. But this is pertinent, and to the business in hand. Job and his friends had been discoursing about the dispensations of Providence toward the wicked and the righteous. Job had showed that some wicked men live and die older than the righteous; and as he is to be treated, so is it among men, and as he is openly arrested by the judgments of God. But, if any ask the reason why some are punished in this world, and not others, they must be told it is a question that cannot be resolved. The knowledge of the reasons of state, in God's providence, is of the world, and the world, and our cognoscenti must neither pretend to it, nor reach after it. Zophar had wished that God would show Job the secrets of wisdom, ch. xi. 6. No, says Job, secret things belong not to us, but things revealed, Deut. xxix. 29. And here he shows, 1. Concerning worldly wealth, how industriously that is sought for, and pursued, by the children of men, what pains they take, what contrivances they have, and what hazards they run, to get and possess it; ch. xii. 11. Concerning wisdom, v. 12. In general, the price of it is very great; it is of inestimable value, v. 15...19. The place of it is very secret, v. 14, 20, 22. In particular, there is a wisdom which is hid in God, (v. 25...27.) and there is a wisdom which is revealed to the children of men, v. 28. Our inquiries into the former must be checked, into the latter must be quickened, for that is it which is our concern.

1. Surely there is a vein for the silver, and a place for gold where they fine it. 2. Iron is taken out of the earth, and brass is molten out of the stone. 3. He setteth an end to darkness, and searcheth out all perfection: the stones of darkness, and the shadow of death. 4. The flood breaketh out from the inhabitant; even the waters forgotten of the foot: they are dried up, they are gone away from men. 5. As for the earth, out of it cometh bread; and under it is turned up as it were fire. 6. The stones of it are the place of sapphires; and it hath dust of gold. 7. There is a path which no fowl knoweth, and which the vulture's eye hath not seen: 8. The lion's whelps have not trodden it, nor the fierce lion passed by it. 9. He putteth forth his hand upon the rock; he overturneth the mountains by the roots. 10. He cutteth out rivers among the rocks; and his eye seeth every precious thing. 11. He bindeth the floods from overflowing; and the thing that is hid bringeth he forth to light.

Here Job shows, 1. What a great way the wit of man may go, in diving into the depths of nature, and seizing the riches of it; what a great deal of knowledge and wealth men may, by their ingenious and industrious searches, make themselves masters of. But does it therefore follow that men may, by their wit, comprehend the reasons why some wicked people prosper, and others are punished, why some good people prosper, and others are afflicted? No, by no means. The caverns of the earth may be discovered, but not the counsels of heaven. 2. What a great deal of care and pains worldly men take to get riches. He had observed concerning the wicked man, (ch. xxvii. 16.) that he heaped up silver as the dust; now here he shows whence that silver came, and how it was come by, which he is so fond of, to show what little reason wicked rich men have to be proud of their wealth and pomp. Observe here, 1. The wealth of this world is hid in the earth. Thence the silver and the gold, which afterward they refine, are fetched, v. 1. There it lay mixed with a great deal of dirt and dross, like a worthless thing, of no more account than common earth; and abundance of it will so lie neglected, till the earth and all the works therein shall be burned up. Holy Mr. Herbert, in his poem called Amorice, takes notice of this, to shame men out of the love of money.

Money, thou bane of bliss, thou source of woe, Whence com'st thou, that thou art so fresh and fine? I know where came thine established grace, Man found thee poor and dirty in a mine.

Surely thou didst so little contribute To this great kingdom which thou now hast got, That he was fain, when thou wast destitute, To dig thee out of thy dark cave and grot. Man calleth thee his wealth, who made thee rich, And while he diggs out thee, falls in the ditch.
there found in great abundance, which abates their price indeed, but is a great kindness to man, who could much better be without gold than without iron. Nay, out of the earth comes bread, that is, broad-corn, the necessary support of life, v. 5. Thence man's maintenance is fetched, to remind him of his own finitude; he is of the earth, and cometh again to the earth. Under it is turned up as it were fire; precious stones, that sparkle as fire; brimstone, that is apt to take fire; coal, that is proper to feed fire. As we have our food, so we have our fuel, cut out of the earth. There the sapphires and other gems are, and thence gold-dust is dug up, v. 6. The wisdom of the Creator has placed these things, 1. Out of our sight, to teach us not to set our eyes upon them, Prov. xxiii. 5. 2. Under our feet, to teach us not to lay them in our bosoms, nor to set our hearts upon them, but to trample upon them, with a holy contempt. See how full the earth is of God's riches, (Ps. civ. 24.) and infer thence, not only how great a God he is, whose the earth is, and the fulness thereof, (Ps. xxvii. 1.) but how full heaven must needs be of God's riches, which is the city of the great King, in comparison with which this earth is a poor country.

1. And this wealth that is hid in the earth cannot be come at but with a great deal of difficulty. It is hard to be found out; there is but here and there a vein for the silver, v. 1. The precious stones, though bright themselves, yet, because buried in obscurity and out of sight, are called stones of darkness, and the shadow of death. Men may search long before they light on them; when found out, they are hard to be fetched out; men's wits must be set on work to contrive ways and means to get this hid treasure into their hands; they must, with their lances, scorn dross, and win, by dross, to the precious; one method fail, they must try another, till they have searched out all perfection, and turned every stone to effect it, v. 3. They must grapple with subterraneous waters, (v. 4, 10, 11.) and force their way through rocks which are, as it were, the roots of the mountains, v. 9. Now God has made the getting of gold and silver, and precious stones, so difficult, (1.) For the exciting and engaging of industry. Diligent laborious men, v. 6. Let the price of all things geo, gifts, and all things. If valuable things were too easily come by, men would never learn to take pains. But the difficulty of gaining the riches of this earth, may suggest to us what violence the kingdom of heaven suffers. (2.) For the checking and restraining of pomp and luxury. What is for necessity is had with a little labour from the surface of the earth; but what is for ornament must be dug with a great deal of pains out of the bowels of it. To be fed is cheap, but to be fine is chargeable.

3. Thirdly, the subterraneous wealth is thus hard to come by, yet men will have it. He that loves silver, is not satisfied with silver, and yet is not satisfied without it; but they that have much needs must have more. See here, 1. What inventions men have to get this wealth. They search out all perfection, v. 3. They have arts and engines to dry up the waters, and carry them off, when they break in upon them in their mines, and threaten to drown them, having no pumps, pumps, and canals, to clear their way, and, obstacles being removed, they tread the path which no foot knew, (v. 7, 8.) unseen by the vulture's eye, which is piercing and quick-sighted, and untroubled by the lion's whelps, which traverse all the paths of the wilderness. 2. What pains men take, and what vast charge they are at, to get this wealth. They work their way through the rocks, and undermine the mountains, v. 10. 3. What hazards they run. They that dig in the mines have their lives in their hands; for they are obliged to bend the floods from overflowing, (v. 11.) and are continually in danger of being suffocated by damps, or crushed or burned alive by the fall of the earth upon them. See how foolish man adds to his own burtten; he is sentenced to eat bread in the sweat of his face. But as if that were not enough, he will get gold and silver at the peril of his life; though the more is gotten, the less valuable it is; for, in Solomon's time, silver was as stones. But, 4. Observe what it is that carries men through all this toil and peril. Their eye sees every precious thing, v. 10. Silver and gold are precious things with them; and they have them in their eye in all their pursuits; they fancy they see them glittering before their faces, and, in the prospect of laying hold of them, they may be induced to pass over all these difficulties; for they make something of it at last; that which is hid bringeth he forth to light, v. 11. What was hid under ground, is laid upon the bank; the metal that was hid in the ore, is refined from its dross, and brought forth pure out of the furnace; and then he thinks his pains well bestowed. Go to the miners, then, thou sluggard in religion, consider their ways, and be wise. Let their courage, diligence, and constancy in seeking the wealth that perisheth, show us out of slothfulness and faint-heartedness in laboring for the true riches. How much better is it to get wisdom than gold! How much easier and safer! Yet gold is sought for, but grace neglected. Will the hopes of precious things out of the earth, (so they call them, though really they are paltry and perishing,) be such a spur to industry, and shall not the certain prospect of truly precious things in heaven be much more so?

12. But where shall wisdom be found? and where is the place of understanding? 13. Man knoweth not the price thereof; neither is it found in the land of the living. 14. The depth saith, It is not in me: and the sea saith, It is not with me. 15. It cannot be gotten for gold, neither shall silver be weighed for the price thereof. 16. It cannot be valued with the gold of Ophir, with the precious onyx, or the sapphire. 17. The gold and the crystal cannot equal it: and the exchange of it shall not be for jewels of fine gold. 18. No mention shall be made of coral, or of pearls: for the price of wisdom is above rubies. 19. The topaz of Ethiopia shall not equal it, neither shall it be valued with pure gold.

Job, having spoken of the wealth of the world, which men put such a value upon, and take so much pains for, here comes to speak of another more valuable jewel, and that is, wisdom and understanding, the knowing and enjoying of God and ourselves. They that found out all these ways and means to enrich themselves, thought themselves very wise; but Job will not own, that to be wisdom: he supposes them to gain their point, and to bring to light what they sought for, (v. 11.) and yet asks, Where is wisdom? For it is not here; this their way is their folly. We must therefore seek it somewhere else, and it will be found nowhere but in the principles and practices of religion. There is more true knowledge, satisfaction, and happiness, in sound divinity, which shows us the way to the joys of heaven, than in natural philosophy, or mathematics, which help us to find a way into the bowels of the earth.

Two things cannot be found out concerning this wisdom.

1. The price of it, for that is inestimable; its worth is infinitely more than all the riches in this world. Man knows not the price thereof, (v. 13.)

1. Few put a due value upon it. Men know not the worth of it, its innate excellency, their need of it, and of what unspeakable advantage it will be to them; and therefore, though they have many a price in their hand to get this wisdom, yet they have no heart to it, Prov. xvii. 16. The cock in the fable value of the precious jewel he found in the dunghill, and therefore would rather have lighted on a barley-corn. Men know not the worth of grace, and therefore will take no pains to get it.

2. None can possibly give a valuable consideration for it, with all the wealth this world can furnish them with. This Job is large upon, (v. 13, &c.) where he makes an inventory of the Bona notabilia—The most valuable treasures of this world: gold is five times mentioned, silver comes in and takes the place of gold, the onyx and sapphire, pearls and rubies, and the topaz of Ethiopia; these are the things that are highest prized in the world's markets: but if a man would give, not only these, heaps of these, but all the substance of his house, all he is worth in the world, for wisdom, it would utterly be contemned: these may give a man some advantage in seeking wisdom, as they did to Solomon, but there is no purchasing wisdom with these.

It is a gift of the Holy Ghost, which cannot be bought with money, Acts viii. 30. As it does not run in the blood, and thus come to us by descent, so it cannot be got for money, nor does it come to us by purchase. Spiritual gifts are conferred without money and without price, because no money can be a price for them. Wisdom is likewise a more valuable gift to him that has it, makes him richer and happier, than gold or precious stones. It is better to get wisdom than gold. Gold is another, wisdom's, another's: gold is for the body and time, wisdom is for the soul and eternity. Let that which is most precious in God's account, be so in ours. See Prov. iii. 14, &c.

II. The place of it, for that is undiscoverable. Where shall wisdom be found? v. 12. He asks this,

1. As one that truly desired to find it. This is a question we should all put; while the most of men are asking, "Where shall money be found?" we should ask, Where may wisdom be found? that we may make the right choice, not vain policy, but true religion; for that is the only true wisdom, that is it which best improves our faculties, and best secures our spiritual and eternal welfare. This is that which we should cry after, and dig for, Prov. ii. 3, 4.

2. As one that utterly despaired of finding it any where but in God, and any way but by divine revelation. It is not found in this land of the living, v. 13. We cannot attain to a right understanding of God and his will, of ourselves, and our duty, and interest, by reading any books or men, but by reading God's book and the men of God. Such is the degeneracy of human nature, that there is no true wisdom to be found with any but those who are born again, and who, through grace, partake of the divine nature. As for others, even the most ingenuous and industrious, they can tell us no tidings of this lost wisdom. (1.) Ask the miners, and by them the dove will not be found, nor the wisdom dig into the bowels of the earth, to rifle the treasures there, cannot in these dark recesses find this rare jewel, nor with all their art make themselves masters of it. (2.) Ask the mariners, and by them the sea will say, It is not in me. It can never be got either by trading on the waters, or diving into them; can never be sucked from the abundance of the seas, or the treasures hid in the sand. Where there is a vein for the silver, there is no vein for wisdom, none for grace. Men can more easily break through the difficulties they meet with in getting worldly wealth, than through those they meet with in getting heavenly wisdom; and they will take more pains to learn how to live in this world, than how to live forever in a better world. So blind and foolish is man become, that it is in vain to ask him, Where is the place of wisdom, and which is the road that leads to it?

20. Whence then cometh wisdom? and where is the place of understanding? v. 21. Seeing it is hid from the eyes of all living, and kept close from the fowls of the air. 22. Destruction and death say, We have heard the fame thereof with our ears. 23. God understandeth the way thereof, and he knoweth the place thereof. 24. For he looketh to the ends of the earth, and seeth under the whole heaven; 25. To make the weight for the winds; and he weigheth the waters by measure. 26. When he made a decree for the rain, and a way for the lightning of the thunder; 27. Then did he see it, and declare it: he prepared it, ye, and searched it out. 28. And unto man he said, Behold, the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom; and to depart from evil is understanding.

The question which he had asked, (v. 12,) he asks again here; for it is too worthy, too weighty, to be left fall, until we speed in the inquiry. Concerning this, we must seek till we find, till we get some satisfactory account of it. By a diligent prosecution of this inquiry, he brings it, at length, to this issue; there is a twofold wisdom; one hid in God, which is secret, and belongs not to us; the other made known by him, and revealed to man, which belongs to us and to our children.

1. The knowledge of God's secret will, the will of his providence, is out of our reach, and what God has reserved to himself: it belongs to the Lord our God. To know the particulars of what God will do hereafter, and the reasons of what he is doing now, is the knowledge he first speaks of.

2. This knowledge is hid from men; it is high, we cannot attain unto it; (v. 21, 22.) It is hid from the eyes of all living, even of philosophers, politicians, and saints; it is kept close from the fowls of the air; though they fly high and in the open firmament of heaven, though they seem somewhat nearer that upper world where the source of this wisdom is, though their eyes behold afar off, (ch. xxxix. 29,) yet they cannot penetrate into the counsels of God. No; man is more rifer than the fowls of heaven, and yet comes short of this wisdom. Even those who, in their speculations, soar highest, and think themselves, like the fowls of the air, above the heads of other people, yet cannot pretend to this knowledge. Job and his friends had been arguing about the methods and reasons of the dispensations of Providence in the government of the world: "What fools are we" (says Job) "to fight in the dark thus; to dispute about that which we do not understand! The line of the sand, and the plumb line, no common reason can never fathom the abyss of the divine counsels. Who can undertake to give the rationale of Providence, or account for the maxims, measure, and methods, of God's government, these arcana imperii—the cabinet counsels of divine wisdom? Let us then be content not to know the future events of Providence, until time discover them, (Acts i. 7,) and not to know the secret reasons of Providence, until eternity discover them. God is now a God that hideth himself; (Isa. xlv. 13.) clouds and darkness are round about him. Though this wisdom be hid from all living, yet destruction and death say, We have heard the fame of it; though they cannot give an account of it themselves, (for there is no wisdom, nor device, nor knowledge at all in the grave, much less this,) yet there is a world on the other side death and the grave, on which those dark regions border, and to which we must pass through them, and there we shall see clearly what we are now in the dark about. "Have a little patience," says death to the inquisitive soul, "I will fetch thee shortly to a plac[e] where even this dead world shall be found." When the work of God shall be finished, it will be laid open, and we shall know as we are known; when the veil of flesh is rent, and the interposing clouds are scattered, we shall know what God does, though we know not now, John xiii. 7.

2. This knowledge is hid in God, as the apostle speaks, (Eph. iii. 9.) Known unto God are all his works, though they are not known to us, Acts xv. 18. There are good reasons for what he does, though we cannot assign them; (v. 23.) God understands the way thereof. Men sometimes do they know not what, but God never does. Men do what they did not design to do; new occurrences put them upon new counsels, and oblige them to take new measures; but God does all according to the purpose which he purposed in himself, and which he never alters. Men sometimes do that which they cannot give a good reason for, but in every will of God there is a counsel: he knows both what he does, and why he does it; the whole series of events, and the order and place of every occurrence. This knowledge has in perfection, but keeps to himself.

Two reasons are here given why God must needs understand his own way, and he only;

(1.) Because all events are now directed by an all-seeing and almighty Providence, v. 24, 25. He that governs the world, is [1.] Omniscient: for he knows to the ends of the earth, both in place and time, the farthest distant ages, distant regions, are under his view. We do not understand our own way, much less can we understand God’s way, because we are short-sighted; how little do we know of what is doing in the world, much less of what will be done! But the eyes of the Lord are in every place; na(y, they run to and fro through the earth: nothing is, or can be, hid from him; and therefore the reasons why some wicked people prosper, and others are more or less disappointed, are not known to us, are known to him. One day’s events, and one man’s affairs, have such a reference to, and such a dependence upon, another’s, that He only, to whom all events and all affairs are naked and open, and who sees the whole at one entire and certain view, is a competent Judge of every part. [2.] He is omnipotent: he can do every thing, and is very exact in all he does. For proof of this, he mentions the winds and the waves, Acts xxiv. 25. What is lighter than the wind? Yet God hath ways of pleasing it; he knows how to make the weight for the winds, which he brings out of his treasuries, (Ps. cxxxv. 7.) keeping a very particular account of what he draws out, as men do of what they pay out of their treasuries, not at random, as men bring out of their trash. Nothing sensible is to us more unaccountable than the wind; we hear the sound of it, yet cannot tell whence it comes, or whether it goes: but God gives it out by weight, wisely ordering both from what point it shall blow, and with what strength. The waters of the sea, and the rain waters, he both weighs and measures; allotting the proportion of every tide and every shower. A great and constant communication there is between clouds and seas, the waters above the firmament and those under it; vapours go up, rains come down, air is condensed into water, water rafied into air: but the great God keeps an exact account of all the stock with which this brake is carried on for the public benefit, and sees that none of it be lost. Now if, in these things, Providence be so exact, how much more in dispensing frowns and favours, rewards and punishments, to the children of men, according to the rules of equity!

(2.) Because all events were, from eternity, designed and determined by an infallible prescience, and immutable decree, v. 26, 27. When he settled the course of nature, he foreordained all the operations of his almighty [1.] He settled the course of nature; for this, he mentions a decree for the rain, and a way for the thunder and lightning: the general manner and method, and the particular uses and tendencies, of these strange performances, both their causes and their effects, were appointed by the divine purpose; hence he is said to prepare lightnings for the rain, Ps. cxxxv. 7. Jer. x. 13.

[2.] When he had settled that, he laid all the measures of his providence, and drew an exact scheme of the whole work from first to last: then, from eternity, did he see in himself, and declare to himself, the plan of his proceedings; then he prepared it, fixed it, and established it, set every thing in readiness for all his works; so that, when any thing was to be done, nothing was to seek, nor could any thing unforeseen occur, to put it either out of its method, or out of its time, for all was ordered as exactly as if he had studied it, and searched it out; so that, whatever he does, nothing can be put into it, or taken from it, and therefore shall be for ever, Eccl. iii. 14. Some make Job to speak of wisdom here as a person, and translate it, Then he saw her, and showed her, &c. and then it is parallel with that of Solomon, concerning the essential Wisdom of the Father, the eternal Word, Prov. viii. 22, &c. Before the earth was, then was I by him, John i. 1, 2.

II. The knowledge of God’s revealed will, the will of his precept, and this is within our reach; it is level to our capacity, and will do us good; (v. 28.) Unto man he said, Behold, the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom. Let it not be said, that, when God concealed his counsels from man, and forbade him that tree of knowledge, it was because he grudged him any thing that would contribute to his real bliss and satisfaction; no, he let him know as much as he was concerned to know in order to his duty and happiness: he shall be intrusted with as much of his almighty knowledge as his nature can bear; but he must not think himself fit to be a privy-counsellor. He said to Adam, so some, to the first man, in the day in which he was created; he told him plainly, it was not for him to amuse himself with over-curious searches into the mysteries of creation, nor to pretend to solve all the phenomena of nature; he would find it neither possible nor profitable to do so. No less wisdom (says Archbishop Tillotson) than that which made the world, and knows how to understand the philosophy of it. But let him look upon this as his wisdom, To fear the Lord and to depart from evil; let him learn that, and he is learned enough, let this knowledge serve his turn. When God forbade man the tree of knowledge, he allowed him the tree of life, and this is that tree. Prov. iii. 18. We cannot attain true wisdom but by divine revelation; The Lord giveth wisdom, Prov. ii. 6. Now the matter of that, is not the secrets of nature or the world, but the rules of our own practice: unto man he said not, "Go up to heaven, to fetch happiness thence!" or, "Go down to the deep, to draw it up thence." No, the word is nigh thee; (Deut. xxx. 14.) He hath showed thee, O man, not what is greatest, but what is good, not what the Lord thy God designs to do with thee, but what he requires of thee, Mic. vi. 8. Unto you, O men, I call.
Prov. viii. 4. Lord, what is man that he should be thus minded, thus visited! Behold, mark, take notice, of this; he that has ears, let him hear what the God of heaven says to the children of men; The fear of the Lord, that is the wisdom. Here is, 1. The description of true religion, pure religion, and undefiled; it is to fear the Lord, and depart from evil, which agrees with God's character of Job, ch. i. 1. The fear of the Lord is the spring and source of all religion. There is a slavish fear of God, springing from hard thoughts of him, which is contrary to religion, Matth. xxv. 24. There is a selfish fear of God, springing from dreadful thoughts of him, which may be a good step toward religion. Acts ix. 5. But there is a filial fear of God, springing from great and high thoughts of him, which is the life and soul of all religion. And wherever this reigns in the heart, it will appear by a constant care to depart from evil, Prov. xvi. 6. This is to religion; we must first cease to do evil, or we shall never learn to do well. Virtus est vitium fugere—E'en in our flight from vice some virtue lies. 2. The commendation of religion; it is wisdom and understanding: to be truly religious, is to be truly wise: as the wisdom of God appears in the institution of it, so the wisdom of man appears in the practice and observance of it; it is understanding, for it is the best knowledge of truth; it is wisdom, for it is the best conduct of our affairs: nothing more surely guides our way, and gains our end, than being religious.

CHAP. XXIX.

After that excellent discourse concerning wisdom in the foregoing chapter, Job sat down and paused a while, not because he had talked himself out of breath, but because he would not, without the leave of the company, engross the talk to himself, but would give room for his friends, if they pleased, to make their remarks on what he had said; but they had nothing to say, and therefore, after he had recollected himself a little, he went on with his discourse concerning his own affairs, in this and the two following chapters; in which, I. He describes the height of the prosperity from which he was fallen. And, II. The depth of the adversity into which he was fallen; and this he does, to move the pity of his friends, and to justify, or, at least, excuse, his own complaints. But then, III. To obviate his friends' complaints of his very weak and pale and particular protestation of his own integrity notwithstanding. In this chapter, he looks back to the days of his prosperity, and shows, 1. What comfort and satisfaction he had in his house and family. 2. What a great deal of honour and power he had in his country, and what respect was paid him by all sorts of people. v. 7.—10. 3. What abundance of good he did in his place, as a magistrate, v. 11.—17. Then, he just prospect he had of the continuance of his comfort at home, (v. 18—20.) and of his interest abroad, v. 21—25. All this he enlarges upon, to aggravate his present calamities; like Naomi, I went out full, but am brought home again empty.

MOREOVER, Job continued his parable, and said, 2. Oh that I were as in months past, as in the days when God preserved me; 3. When his candle shined upon my head, and when by his light I walked through darkness; 4. As I was in the days of my youth, when the secret of God was upon my tabernacle; 5. When the Almighty was yet with me, when my children were about me; 6. When I washed my steps with butter, and the rock poured me out rivers of oil; 7. Losers may have leave to speak, and there is nothing they speak of more feelingly than of the comforts they are stripped of. Their former prosperity is one of the most pleasing subjects of their thoughts and talk. It was so to Job here, who begins with a wish, (v. 2.) Oh that I were as in months past! So he brings in this account of his prosperity. His wish is, 1. "Oh that I were in as good a state as I was then; that I had as much wealth, honour, and pleasure, as I had then." This is a common wish to many for his ease, as for his reputation, and the glory of his God, which, he thought, was eclipsed by his present sufferings. "Oh that I might be restored to my prosperity, and then the censures and reproaches of my friends would be effectually silenced, even upon their own principles, and for ever rolled away!" If this be our end in desiring life, health, and prosperity, that God may be glorified, and the credit of our holy profession rescued, preserved, and at that, the desire is not only natural, but spiritual. 2. "Oh that I were in as good a frame of spirit, as I was then!" That which Job complained most of now, was a load upon his spirits, through God's withdrawing from him; and therefore he wishes he had now his spirit as much enlarged and encouraged in the service of God, as he had then, and that he had as much freedom and fellowship with him, as he then thought himself happy in. This was in the days of his prosperity, v. 4. When he was in the prime of his time for the enjoyment of those things, and could relish them with the highest gust. Note, Those that prosper in the days of their youth, know not what black and cloudy days they are yet reserved for.

Two things made the months pass pleasant to Job; 1. That he had comfort in his God. This was the chief thing he rejoiced in, in his prosperity, as well as in the springing of it, and the springing in it; that he had the favour of God, and the tokens of his favour. He did not attribute his prosperity to a happy turn of fortune, or to his own might, or to the power of his own hand, but makes the same acknowledgment that David does; (Ps. xxx. 7.) Thou, by thy favour, hast made my mountain stand strong. A gracious soul delights in God's smiles, not in the smiles of this world.

For things were then very pleasant to holy Job; 1. The confidence he had in the divine protection. They were the days when God preserved me, v. 2. Even then he saw himself exposed, and did not make his wealth his strong city, nor trusted in the abundance of his riches, but the name of the Lord was his strong tower, and in that only he thought himself safe, and to that he ascribed it that he was then safe, and his comforts were preserved to him. The Devil saw a hedge about him of God's making, (ch. 1. 10.) and Job saw it himself, and owned it. It was God's visiting the fruit, from a spirit, ch. x. 12. Those only whom God protects are safe, and may be secure; and therefore those who have ever so much of this world, must not think themselves safe, unless God preserve them. 2. The complacency he had in the divine favour; (v. 3.) God's candle shined upon his head, that is, God lifted up the light of his countenance upon him, gave him the assurances and sweet relishes of his love. The best of the communication of the divine favour to the saints in this world, is but a candle-light, compared with what is reserved for them in the future state. But such abundant satisfaction did Job take in the divine favour, that, by the light of that, he walked through darkness; that guided him in his doubts, comforted him in his griefs, bare him up under his burthens, and helped him through all his difficulties. Those that have the brightest sun-shine of outward prosperity, must yet expect some moments of darkness: they are... sometimes crossed, sometimes at a loss, sometimes melancholy; but those that are interested in the favour of God, and know how to value it, can, by the light of that, walk cheerfully and comfortably through all the darkness of this vale of tears. That puts gladness into the heart, enough to balance all the grievances of this present time.

3. The communion he had with the divine word; (v. 4.) The secret of God was upon my tabernacle, that is, When God conversed freely with him, as one bosom friend with another. He knew God's mind, and was not in the dark about it, as, of late, he had been. The secret of the Lord is said to be with them that fear him, for he shows them that in his covenant, which others see not, Ps. xxv. 14. God communicates his favour and grace to people, and receives the returns of their devotion in a way secret to the world. Some read it, When the society of God was in my tabernacle; which Rabbi Solomon understands of an assembly of God's people, that used to meet at Job's house for religious worship, in which he presided; this he took a great deal of pleasure in, and the scattering of it was a trouble to him. Or, it may be understood of the angels of God pitching their tents about his habitations.

4. The assurance he had of the divine presence; (v. 5.) The Almighty was yet with me. Now, he thought God was departed from him, but, in those days, he was with him, and that was all in all to him. God's presence with a man in his house, though it be but a cottage, makes it both a castle and a palace.

II. That he had comfort in his family, every thing was agreeable there; he had both months for his meat, and meat for his mouths; the want of either is a great affliction. 1. He had a multitude of offspring to crown his estate. My children were about me. He had many children, enough to compass him round, and they were observant of him, and obsequious to him; they were about him, to know what he would have, and wherein they might serve him. It is a comfort to tender parents to see their children about them; Job speaks very feelingly of this comfort, now that he was deprived of it. He thought it an instance of God's being with him, that his children were about him; and yet we reason wrong, if when we have lost our children, we cannot comfort ourselves with this, that we have not lost our God. 2. He had a plentiful estate for the support of this numerous family, v. 6. His dairy abounded to that degree, that he might, if he pleased, wash his steps with butter; and his olive-yards were so fruitful, beyond expectation, that it seemed as if the rock poured him out rivers of oil. He reckons his wealth, not by his silver and gold, which were for hoarding, but by his butter and oil, which were for use; for what is an estate good for, unless we take the good of it ourselves, and do good with it to others?

7. When I went out to the gate, through the city, when I prepared my seat in the street: 8. The young men saw me, and hid themselves: and the aged arose, and stood up. 9. The princes refrained talking, and laid their hand on their mouth. 10. The nobles held their peace, and their tongue cleaved to the roof of their mouth. 11. When the ear heard me, then it blessed me; and when the eye saw me, it was a witness to me: 12. Because I delivered the poor that cried, and the fatherless, and him that had none to help him. 13. The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me: and I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy. 14. I put on righteousness, and it clothed me: my judgment was as a robe and a diadem. 15. I was eyes to the blind, and feet was I to the lame. 16. I was a father to the poor: and the cause which I knew not I searched out. 17. And I brake the jaws of the wicked, and plucked the spoil out of his teeth.

We have here Job in a post of honour and power; though he had comfort enough in his own house, yet he did not confine himself to that; we are not born for ourselves, but for the public. When an attorney was to be done in the town, the place of judgment, Job went out to it through the city, (v. 7.) not in an affectation of pomp, but in an affection to justice. Observe, Judgment was administered in the gate, in the street, in the places of concourse, to which every man might have a free access; that every one who might be a witness to all that was said and done; and that, when judgment was given against the guilty, others might hear and fear. Job being a prince, a judge, a magistrate, a man in authority, among the children of the east, we are here told,

I. What respect was paid him by all sorts of people, not only for the dignity of his place, but for his personal merit, his eminent prudence, integrity, and good management. 1. The people honoured him, and stood in awe of him, v. 8. The gravity and majesty of his books and mien, and his known strictness in animadverting upon every thing that was evil and indecent, commanded all about him into an attitude of reverence. When any one, for example, were to expose their countenances, or, it may be, were conscious to themselves of something amiss, hid themselves, and got out of his way; and the aged, though they kept their ground, yet would not keep their seats, they arose and stood up to do obeisance to him; they who expected honour from others, gave honour to him. Virtue and piety challenge respect from all, and usually have it; but they that not only are good, but do good, are worthy of double honour. Modesty becomes those that are young and in subjection, as much as majesty becomes those that are aged and in power. Honour and fear are due to magistrates, and must be rendered to them, Rom. xiii. 7. But if a great and good man was thus reverenced, how is the great and good God to be feared! 2. The princes and nobles paid great deference to him, v. 9, 10. Some think that these were inferior magistrates under him, and that the respect they paid him was due to his place, as their sovereign and supreme; it should rather seem that they were his equals in place, and joined in commission with him, and that the peculiar honour they gave him was gained by his extraordinary abilities and services. It was agreed, that he excelled them all in quickness of apprehension, soundness of judgment, closeness of application, clearness and copiousness of expression; and therefore he was, among his felons, an oracle of law, and counsel, and justice, and that he said as he thought, and acquiesced in. When he came into court, especially when he stood up to speak to any business, the princes refrained talking, the nobles held their peace, that they might the more diligently hearken to what he said, and might be sure to take his meaning. They that had been forward to speak their own thoughts, loved to hear themselves talk, and cared not much what any body else said, when it came to Job's turn to speak, were as desirous to know his thoughts, as ever they had been to vent their own. They that suspected their own judgment were satisfied in his, and admired with what dexterity he spilt the hair, and untied the knots which puzzled them, and which they knew not what to make of. When the princes and nobles wrangled among themselves, all agreed to refer the matters in dispute to Job, and to abide by his judgment. Happy the man who are blessed with such eminent gifts as these; they have great opportunities of honouring God, and doing good, but have great need to watch against pride: happy the people that are blessed with such eminent men; it is a token for good to them.

II. What good he did in his place. He was very serviceable to his country with the power he had; and here we shall see what it was which Job valued himself by in the day of his prosperity. It is natural to men to have some value for the body of the people, and we may judge something of our own character, by observing what is upon which we value ourselves. Job valued himself, not by the honour of his family, the great estate he had, his large income, his full table, the many servants he had at his command, the ensigns of his dignity, his equipage and retinue, the splendid entertainments he gave, and the court that was made to him, but by his usefulness. Goodness is God's glory, and it will be ours, if we be men of such a character as are serviceable for the public.

1. He valued himself by the interest he had in the esteem, affections, and prayers, of sober people; not by the studied panegyrics of the wits and poets, but the natural praises of all about him. All that heard what he said, and saw what he did, how he laid out himself for the public good with all the authority and tender affection of a father to his country, blessed him, and gave witness to him, v. 11. Many a good word they said of him, and many a good prayer they made on his behalf. It is to be our honour to make every body fear him, (Oderint dum metuant:—Let them hate, provided they also fear,) nor to be arbitrary, and to have his own will and way, not caring what people said of him; but, like Mowlecai, to be accedted of the multitude of his brethren, Est. x. 3. He did not so much value the applause of those at a distance, as the attestations of those that were the witnesses of his conduct, that closely attended him, saw him, and heard him, and could know the state of his heart, and what was the true situation of those who had themselves been the better for him, and could speak by their own experience; such was the blessing of him who was ready to perish, (v. 13.) and who by Job's means was rescued from perishing.

Let great men, and men of estates, thus do good, and they shall have praise of the same; and let those who have good done them, look upon it as a just debt they owe to their protectors and benefactors, to bless them and give witness to them; to use their interest on earth for their honour, and in heaven for their comfort, to praise them, and pray for them. Those are ungrateful indeed, who grudge these small returns.

2. He valued himself by the care he took of those that were least able to help themselves, the poor and the needy, the widows and the fatherless, the blind and lame, who could not be supposed either to merit his favour, or ever to be in a capacity to recommend it. (1.) If the poor were injured or oppressed, they might cry to Job; and, if he found the allegations of their petitions true, they had not only his ear and his bowels, but his hand too; he delivered the poor that cried, (v. 12.) and would not suffer them to be trampled upon and run down. Nay, (v. 16.) he was a father to the poor, not only a judge to protect them, and to see that they were not wronged, but a father to provide for them, and to see that they did not want, to counsel and direct them, and to appear and act for them upon all occasions. It is no disparagement to the son of a prince to be a father to the poor. (2.) The fatherless, that had none to help them, found Job ready to help them, and, if they were in straits, to deliver them. He helped them to make the best of what little they had, helped them to pay what they owed, and to get in what was owing to them, helped them out into the world, helped them into business, helped them to help themselves; it should be the fatherless be helped. (3.) Those that are ready to perish he saved from perishing, relieving them that were hungry and ready to perish for want, taking care of them that were sick, that were outcasts, that were falsely accused, or in danger of being turned out of their estates unjustly, or, upon any other account, were ready to perish: the extremity of the peril, as it quickened Job to appear the more vigorously for them, so it made his seasonable kindness the more affecting, and the more obliging, and brought their blessings the more abundantly upon him. (4.) The widows that were sighing for grief, and trembling for fear, he made to sing for joy; so carefully did he protect them, and provide for them, and so heartily did he espouse their interest; it is a pleasure to a good man, and should be so to a great man, to give those occasion to rejoice, that are most acquainted with grief. (5.) Those that were upon any account at a loss, Job provided for them. He reminded them of the dexters and mitures to the blind, counselling and advising those for the best, that knew not what to do; and, to see the lame: assisting those with money and friends, that knew what they should do, but knew not how to compass it. Those we best help, whom we help out in that very thing wherein they are defective, and most need help. We may come to be blind or lame ourselves, and therefore should pity and succour those that are so, Isa. xxxv. 3, 4. Heb. xii. 13.

3. He valued himself by the exercise of his gifts in the service of justice and equity in all his proceedings: his friends had unjustly censured him as an oppressor; "So far from that," (says he,) "that I always made it my business to maintain and support right." (1.) He devoted himself to the administration of justice; (v. 14.) I put on righteousness, and it clothed me, that is, He had an habitual disposition to execute justice, and put on a fixed resolution to do it. It was the girdle of his loin, Isa. xi. 5. It kept him upright and straight, and all his motions were according to it, as in his clothing, and never without it. Righteousness will clothe them that put it on; it will keep them warm, and be comfortable to them; it will keep them safe, and fence them against the injuries of the season; it will adorn them, and recommend them to the favour both of God and man. (2.) He took pleasure in it, and, as I may say, a holy * pride: he looked upon it as his greatest glory to do justice to all, and injury to none. My judgment was a robe and a diadem. Perhaps he did not himself wear a robe and a diadem, he was very indifferent to those ensigns of honour; they were most fond of them who had least intrinsic worth to recommend them; but the settled principles of justice, by which he was governed and did govern, were to him instead of all those ornaments. If a magistrate do the duty of his place, that is an honour to him far beyond his gold or purple, and should be, accordingly, his delight; and trusted men do not make conscience of his duty, and, in some measure, swallow the end of his elevation, his robe and diadem, his gown and cap, his sword and mace, are but a reproach, like the purple robe and crown of thorns with which the Jews studied to ridicule our Saviour: for as clothes on a dead man will never make him warm, so robes on a bad man will never make him honourable. (3.) He took pains in the business of his place; (v. 16.) The cause which I knew not I searched out. He diligently inquired into the matters of fact, patiently and impartially heard both sides, set every thing in its true light, and cleared it from false colours; he laid all circumstances together, that he might find out the truth, and the merits of every cause, and then, and, not till then, gave judgment upon it; he never answered a matter before he heard it, nor did he judge a man to be righteous, however he seemed, for his being first in his own cause, Prov. xviii. 17.

4. He valued himself by the check he gave to the violence of proud and evil men; (v. 17.) I brake the jaws of the wicked; he does not say that he brake their necks; he did not take away their lives, but he brake their jaws; he took away their power of doing mischief, he humbled them, mortified them, and curbed their insolence, and so plucked the spoil out of their teeth; delivered the persons and estates of honest men from being made a prey of by them; when they had got the spoil between their teeth, and were greedily swallowing it down, he bravely rescued it, as David did the lamb out of the mouth of the lion, not fearing, though they roared and raged like a lion disappointed of his prey. Good might must thus be a firm and fixed restraint to evil-doers, and a protection to the innocent, and, in order to this, they have need to arm themselves with zeal and resolution, and an undaunted courage: a judge upon the bench has as much need to be bold and brave, as a commander in the field.

18. Then I said, I shall die in my nest, and I shall multiply my days as the sand. 19. My root was spread out by the waters, and the dew lay all night upon my branch. 20. My glory was fresh in me, and my bow was renewed in my hand. 21. Unto me men gave ear, and waited, and kept silence at my counsel. 22. After my words they spake not again; and my speech dropped upon them. 23. And they waited for me as for the rain; and they opened their mouth wide as for the latter rain. 24. If I laughed on them, they believed it not; and the light of my countenance they cast not down. 25. I chose out their way, and sat chief, and dwelt as a king in the army, as one that comforteth the mourners.

That which crowned Job's prosperity, was, the pleasing prospect he had of the continuance of it; though he knew, in general, that he was liable to trouble, and therefore was not secure; (ch. iii. 26.) I was not in safety, neither had I rest, yet he had no particular occasion for fear, but as much reason as ever any man had to count upon the lengthening out of his tranquillity. I See here what his thoughts were in his prosperity; (v. 18.) Then I said, I shall die in my nest. Having made himself a warm and easy nest, he hoped nothing would disturb him in it, nor move him out of it, till death removed him. He knew he had never stolen any coal from the altar, which might fire his nest: he saw no storm arising to shake down his nest, and therefore concluded, To-morrow shall he as this day; as David; (Ps. xxx. 6.) My mountain stands strong, and shall not be moved. Observe, 1. In the midst of his prosperity, he thought of dying, and the thought was not unpleasing to him. He knew that though his nest was high, it did not set him out of the reach of the darts of death. 2. Yet he flattered himself with vain hopes, (1.) That he should live long, should multiply his days as the sand. He means as the sand on the sea-shore; whereas we should rather reckon our days by the sand in the hour-glass, which will be run out in a little time. Seeing how apt even good people are to think of death as a thing at a distance, and, to put far from them that evil day, which will really be to them a good day. (2.) That he should die in the same prosperous state in which he had lived. If such an expectation as this arise from a lively faith in the providence and promise of God, it is well, but if from a conceit of our own wisdom, and the stabil ty of these earthly things, it is ill-grounded, and turns to dishonour and to shame, like David's; (Ps. xxvii. 1.) Whom shall I fear? not like the rich fool's, (Luke xii. 19.) Soul, take thin ease.

II. See what was the ground of these thoughts. 1. If he looked at home, he found he had a good foundation. His stock was all his own, and none of all his neighbours had a demand upon him. He found no bodily disturber growing upon him, his estate did not lie under any incumbrance, nor was he harassed with debts, nor with worrisome and worrisome encroachment of others to bring him in; nothing going forward in his affairs, and not going behind-hand; he lost no reputation, but gained rather; he knew no rival that threatened either to eclipse his honour, or abridge his power: see how he describes this, v. 19, 20. He was like a tree whose root is not only spread out, whichfixes it and keeps it firm, so that it is in no danger of being overturned, but spread out by the waters, which feed it, and make it fruitful and flourishing, so that it is in no danger of withering. And as he thought himself blessed with the fruitfulness of the earth, so also with the kind influences of Heaven too; for the dew lay all night upon his branch. Providence favoured him, and made all his enjoyments comfortable, and all his enterprises successful. Let none think to support their prosperity with what they draw from this earth, without that blessing which is derived from above. God's favour being continued to Job, in the virtue of that, his glory was still fresh in him: those about him had still the same kind of approbation from him, and needed not to repeat the old stories: and it is only by constant goodness that men's glory is thus preserved fresh, and kept from withering and growing stale. His bow also was renewed in his hand, that is, his power to protect himself, and annoy those that assailed him, still increased, so that he thought he had as little reason as any man to fear the insults of the Sabeans and Chaldeans.

2. If he looked abroad, he found he had a good interest, and well confirmed. As he had no reason to dread the power of his enemies, so neither had he any reason to distrust the fidelity of his friends: to the last moment of his prosperity they continued their respects to him, and their dependence on him. What had he to fear, who so gave counsel, as, in effect, to give law to all his neighbours? Nothing surely could be done against him, when really nothing was done without him.

(1.) He was the oracle of his country. He was consulted as an oracle, and his dictates were acquainted in as oracles, v. 21. When others could not be heard, all men gave ear to him, and kept silence at his counsel, knowing that, as nothing could be said against it, so nothing needed to be added to it. And therefore, after his words they spake not again, v. 22. Why should men meddle with a subject that has already been exhausted?

(2.) He was the darling of his country. All about him were well-pleased with everything he said and did, as David's people were with him, 2 Sam. iii. 36. He had the hearts and affections of all his neighbours, all his servants, tenants, subjects; never was man so much admired, nor so well beloved. [1.] They were thought happy to whom he spake, and they thought themselves so: never were the dews of heaven so acceptable to the parched ground, as his wise discourses were to them that attended on them, especially to whom they were particularly accommodated and directed. His speech dropped upon them, and they waited for it as for the rain; (v. 22, 23.) wondering at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth, catching at them, laying hold on them, and treasuring them up as apophthegms. His servants, that stood continually before him to hear his wisdom, would not have envied Solomon's. Those are wise, or are likely to be so, that know how to value wise discourse, that wish for it, and wait for it, and drink it in as the earth does the rain that comes often upon it, Heb. vi. 7. And those who have such an interest as Job had in the esteem of others, whose thesauri—bare assertion goes so far, as they have a great opportunity of doing good, so they must take great care lest they do hurt to a standard out of their mouths is infectious. [2.] Much more happy were they thought on whom he smiled, and they thought themselves so, v. 24. "If I laughed on them, designing thereby to show myself pleased in them, or pleasant with them, it was such a favour, that they believed it not for joy, because it was so rare a thing to see this grave man smile. Many seek the ruler's favour: Job was a ruler whose favour was courted, and very little was the desire wherewith those to whom he once gave a kiss, was envied by another to whom he only gave a golden cup. Familiarity often breeds contempt, but if Job at any time saw fit, for his own diversion, to make himself free with those about him, yet it did not in the least diminish the veneration they had for him: the light of his countenance they cast not down. So wisely did he dispense his favours, as not to make them cheap, and so wisely did they receive them, as not to make themselves unworthy of them another time."

(3.) He was the sov'ereign of his country, v. 25. He chose out their way, sat at the helm, and steered for them, all referring themselves to his conduct, and submitting themselves to his command. To this perhaps, in many countries, monarchy owed its rise: such a man as Job, that so far excelled all his neighbours in wisdom and integrity, could not but sit chief, and the fool will, of course, be servant to him. It was the spirit of the wise, in which the wisdom did but for a while run in the blood, the honour and power would certainly attend it, and so by degrees become hereditary. Two things recommended Job to the sovereignty. [1.] That he had the authority of a commander, or general; he dwelt as a king in the army, giving orders which were not to be disputed. Every one that has the spirit of wisdom, has not the spirit of government, but Job had both, and, when there was occasion, could assume state, as the king in the army does, and say, Go, Come, and, Do this, Matt. viii. 9. [2.] That yet he had the tenderness of a confidante. He was as ready to succour those in distress, as if it had been his office to comfort the mourners. Eliphaz himself owned he had been very good in that respect; (ch. iv. 3.) Thou hast strengthened the weak hands. And this he now reflected upon with pleasure, when he was himself a mourner. He had found it easy to do good to his neighbours with the comfort of them, that we ourselves have been formerly comforted, than to comfort ourselves with those comforts whereby we have formerly comforted others.

I know not but we may look upon Job as a type and figure of Christ, in his power and prosperity: our Lord Jesus is such a King as Job was; the poor man's King, who loves righteousness and hates iniquity, and upon whom the blessing of a world ready to perish comes; see Ps. lxii. 2, 6, 8; To him therefore let us give ear, and let him sit chief in our hearts.

CHAP. XXX.

It is a melancholy But now, which this chapter begins with. Adversity is here described as much to the life as prosperity was here, and the height of that did but increase the depth of this. God sets the one over-against the other, and so did Job, that his afflictions might appear the more grievous, and, consequently, his case the more pitiable. I. Had he lived in great honour, but now he had fallen into disgrace, and was as much vilified, even by the meanest, as erer he had been magnified by the greatest; this he insists much on, v. 1. 14. II. He had had much inwrought comfort and delight, but now he was a terror and burden to himself, (v. 15, 16.) and overwhelmed with sorrow, v. 28. 31. III. He had long enjoyed a good state of health, but now he was sick and in pain, v. 17, 19, 20, 30. IV. Time was, when the secret of God was with him, but now his communication with Heaven was cut off, v. 20, 22. V. He had promised himself a long life, but now he saw death at the door, v. 23. One thing he mentions which aggravated his affliction, that it surprised him when he looked for peace. But two things gave him some relief: 1. That his troubles would not follow him to the grave, v. 24. 2. That his conscience witnessed for him, that, in his prosperity, he had sympathized with those that were in misery, v. 25.

1. BUT now they that are younger than I have me in derision, whose fathers I would have disdained to have set with the dogs of my flock. 2. Yea, where treight the strength of their hands profit me, in whom old age was perished? 3. For want and famine they were solitary; fleeing into the wilderness in former time desolate and waste: 4. Who cut up mallows by the bushes, and juniper-roots for their meat. 5. They were driven forth from among men (they cried after them as after a thief,) 6. To dwell in the cliffs of the valleys, in caves of the earth, and in the rocks. 7. Among the bushes they brayed; under the nettles they were gathered together. 8. They were children of fools, yea, children of base men; they were viler than the earth. And now am I their song, yea, I am their by-word. 10. They abhor me, they flee far from me, and spare not to spit in my face. 11. Because he hath loosed my cord, and afflicted me, they have also let loose the bridle before me. 12. Upon my right hand rise the youth; they push away my feet, and they raise up against me the ways of their destruction. 13. They mar my path, they set forward my calamity, they have no helper. 14. They came upon me as a wide breaking-in of waters: in the desolation they rolled themselves upon me.

Here Job makes a very large and sad complaint of the great disgrace he was fallen into, from the height of his prosperity, which was exceedingly grievous and cutting to such an ingenuous spirit as Job's was. Two things he insists upon as very aggravating.

I. The meanness of the persons that afflicted him, as it added much to his honour, in the day of his prosperity, that princes and nobles showed him respect, and paid a deference to him, so it added no less to his disgrace in his adversity, that he was spurned by the footmen, and trampled upon by those that were not only every way his inferiors, but were the meanest and most contemptible of all mankind.

1. They were young, younger than he; (v. 12) who ought to have behaved themselves respectfully toward him, for his age and gravity. Even the children, in their play, played upon him, as the children of Beth-el upon the prophet, Go up, thou bald-head. Children soon learn to be scornful, when they see their parents so.

2. They were brought up by their fathers with such a desperate ease, that such a man as Job would have disdained to take them into the lowest service about his house, as that of tending his sheep, and attending the shepherds with the dogs of his flock, v. 1. They were so shabby, that they were not fit to be seen among his servants, so filthy, that they were not fit to be employed, and so base, that they were not fit to be trusted in the meanest post. Job here speaks of what he might have done, not of what he did; he was not of such a spirit as to set any of the children of men with the dogs of his flock; he knew the dignity of human nature better than to do so.

3. They and their families were the unprofitable burthens of the earth, and good for nothing; Job himself, with all his prudence and patience, could make nothing of them, v. 2. The young were not fit for labour, they were so lazy, and went about their work so awkwardly; Wherein might the strength of the aged profit me? The old were not to be advised with in the smallest matters; for in them was old age indeed, but their old age was perished, they were twice children.

4. They were extremely poor; (v. 3) they were ready to starve, for they would not dig, and to beg they were ashamed. Had they been brought to necessity by the providence of God, their neighbours would have sought them out as proper objects of charity, and would have relieved them; but, being brought into distress by their own slothfulness and wastefulness, nobody was forward to relieve them; hence they were forced to flee into the deserts both for shelter and sustenance, and were put to sorry shifts indeed, when they cut up mallows by the bushes, and were glad to eat them, for want of food that was fit for them, v. 4. See what hunger will bring men to: one half of the world does not know how the other half lives; yet those that have abundance ought to think sometimes of those whose fare is very coarse, and who are brought to a short allowance of that too; but we must own the righteousness of God, and not think it strange, if slothfulness clothe men with rags, and the idle soul be made to suffer hunger. This beggarly world is full of the Devil's poor.

5. They were very scandalous wicked people, not only the burthens, but the plagues, of the places where they lived, the scum of the country; they were driven forth from among men, v. 5. They were such lying, thieving, liars, that all Israel had heard of them, that they were the mischiefs that the magistrates could do, was, to visit the country of them, while the very mob cursed after them, as after a thief, Away with such fellows from the earth, it is not fit they should live. They were lazy and would not work, and therefore they were exacained against as thieves, and unjust, for they that do not earn their own bread by honest labour, do, in effect, steal the bread out of other people's mouths; an idle fellow is a public nuisance; he does not but relieves the wereld-house, he is as here, into a wilderness, which will punish them indeed, but never reform them. They were forced to dwell in caves of the earth, and they braved like asses among the bushes, v. 6, 7. See what is the lot of those that have the cry of the country, the cry of their own conscience, against them; they cannot but be in a continual terror and confusion; they groan among the thorns, (so Broughton,) and smart among the nettles; they are stung and scalded there, where they hoped to be sheltered and protected. See what miseries wicked people bring themselves to in this world; yet this is nothing to what is in reserve for them in the other world.

6. They were all that is base, v. 8. They had nothing at all in them to recommend them to any man's esteem: they were a vile kind; yea, a kind without fame; people that nobody could give a good word for, nor wish for; they were banished from the earth, as being viler than the earth. One would not think it possible that ever the human nature should sink so low, and degenerate so far, as it did in these people. When we thank God that we are men, we have reason to thank him that we are not such men. But such as these were abusive to Job, (1.) In revenge; because, when he was in prosperity and power, like a good magistrate, he put the laws in execution, which were in force against vagabonds, and rogues, and sturdy beggars, which these base people now remembered against him. (2.) In triumph over him, because they thought he was now become like one of them, Isa. xiv. 10, 11. The abjects, men of mean spirits, insult over the miserable, Ps. xxxv. 15.

II. The greatness of the affronts that were given him: it cannot be imagined how abusive they were.

1. They made ballads on him, with which they made themselves and their companions merry; (v. 9.) I am their song, and their by-nymph. These have a very base spirit, that turn the calamities of their honest neighbours into a jest, and can sport themselves with their griefs.

2. They shunned him as a loathsome spectacle, abhorred him, fled far from him, (v. 10.) as an ugly monster, or as one infected; they that were themselves driven out from among men, would have driven him out. For,

3. They expressed the greatest scorn and indignation against him. They spit in his face, or were ready to do so; they tripped up his heels, pushed away his feet, (v. 12.) kicked him, either in wrath, because they hated him, or in sport, to make themselves merry with him, as they did with their companions at foot-ball. The best of saints have sometimes received the worst of injuries and indignities, from a spiteful, scornful, wicked, world, and must not think it strange; our Master himself was thus abused.

4. They were very malicious against him, and not only made a jest of him, but made a prey of him; not only affronted him, but set themselves to do him all the real mischief they could devise. They raise up against me the ways of their destruction; or, as some read it, They cast upon me the cause of their woe; that is, “They lay the blame of their being driven out, upon me;” and it is common for criminals to hate the judges and laws by which they are punished. But, under this present, (1.) They accused him falsely, and misrepresented his former conversation, which is here called marring his path. They reflected upon him as a tyrant and an oppressor, because he had done justice upon them; and perhaps Job's friends grounded their uncharitable censures of him (ch. xxii. 6, 8c.) upon the unjust and unreasonable clamours of these sorry people; and it was an instance of their great wickedness and insolence, when, for who can be innocent, if the accusations of a whole people are heeded? (2.) They not only triumphed in his calamity, but set it forward, and did all they could to add to his miseries, and make them more grievous to him. It is a great sin to forward the calamity of any, especially of good people: in this they have no helper, nobody to set them on, or to countenance season; and my sinews take no rest. 18. By the great force of my disease is my garment changed: it bindeth me about as the collar of my coat. 19. He hath cast me into the mine, and I am become like dust and ashes. 20. I cry unto thee, and thou dost not hear me: I stand up, and thou regardest me not. 21. Thou art become cruel to me: with thy strong hand thou opposest thyself against me. 22. Thou liestest up to the wind; thou causest me to ride upon it, and dissolvest my substance. 23. For I know that thou wilt bring me to death, and to the house appointed for all living. 24. Howbeit he will not stretch out his hand to the grave, though they cry in his destruction. 25. Did not I weep for him that was in trouble? was not my soul grieved for the poor? 26. When I looked for good, then evil came unto me; and when I waited for light, there came darkness. 27. My bowels were boiled, and rested not; the days of affliction prevented me. 28. I went mourning without the sun: I stood up, and I cried in the congregation. 29. I am a brother to dragons, and a companion to owls. 30. My skin is black upon me, and my bones are burnt with heat. 31. My harp also is turned to mourning, and my organ into the voice of them that weep.

In this second part of Job's complaint, which is very bitter, and has a great many sorrowful accents in it, we may observe a great deal that he complains of, and some little that he comforts himself with. 1. Here is much that he complains of.

1. In general, it was a day of great affliction and sorrow. (1.) Affliction seized him, and surprised him. It seized him; (v. 16.) The days of affliction have taken him by the tresses in the night; they have arrested me, as the bailiff arrests the debtor, and by violence secures him. When trouble comes with commission, it will take fast hold, and not lose its hold. It surprised him; (v. 27.) "The days of affliction prevented me," that is, "they came upon me without giving me any previous warning: I did not expect them, nor made any provision for such an evil day." Observe, He reckons his affliction by days, which will soon be numbered and finished, and are nothing to the ages of eternity, 2 Cor. iv. 17. (2.) He was in great sorrow by reason of it. His bowels boiled with grief, and rested not, v. 27. The sense of his calamities was continually preying upon his spirits, without any intermission: he went mourning from day to day, always sighing, always weeping; and such a cloud was constantly upon his mind, that he went, in effect, without the sun, v. 28. He had nothing else which he could take upon himself; he disdained himself to perpetual sorrow, as one that, like Jacob, resolved to go to the grave mourning: he walked out of the sun, (so some,) in dark shady places, as melancholy people use to do. If he went into the congregation, to join with them in solemn worship; instead of standing up calmly to desire their prayers, he stood up and cried aloud, through pain of body, or anguish of mind, like one half distracted. If he appeared in public, to receive visitors, when the fit came upon him, he could not contain

35. Thus did he all this mischief, were numerous, unanimous, and violent; (v. 14.) They came upon me as a wide breaking in of waters, when the dam is broken; or, "They came as soldiers into a broad breach which they have made in the wall of a besieged city, pouring in upon me with the utmost fury;" and in this they took a pride and a pleasure; they rolled themselves in the devotion, as a man rolls himself in a soft and easy bed; and they rolled themselves upon him with all the weight of their malice.

Lastly, All this contempt put upon him, was caused by the troubles he was in; (v. 11.) "Because he has loosed my cord; has taken away the honour and power with which I was girded, (ch. xii. 18.) has scattered what I had got together, and untwisted all my affairs, because he has afflicted me, therefore they have let loose the bridle before me," that is, "have given themselves a liberty to say and do what they please against me." They that by Providence were stripped of their honor, may always be loaded with contempt by inconsiderate ill-natured people. "Because he hath loosed his cord," (the original has that reading also,) that is, "because he has taken off his bridle of restraint from off their malice, they cast away the bridle from me," that is, "they make no account of my authority, nor stand in any awe of me." It is owing to the hold God has of the consciences even of bad men, and the restraints it lays upon them, that we are not continually thus insulted and abused; and if at any time we meet with such ill treatment, we must acknowledge the hand of God in taking off those restraints; as David did, when Shimei cursed him; So let him curse, for the Lord hath hidden him.

Now in all this, (1.) We may see the uncertainty of worldly honour, and particularly of popular applause; how suddenly a man may fall from the height of dignity into the depth of disgrace. What little cause therefore have men to be ambitious or proud of that which may be so easily lost, and what little confidence is to be put in it? They that, to-day, cry, Hosannah, may, to-morrow, cry, Crucify. But there is an honour which comes from God, which, if we secure, we shall find it not thus changeable and loseable. (2.) We may see that it has often been the lot of very wise and good men, to be tampered upon and abused. And, (3.) That those who look only at the things that are seen, despise those whom the world frowns upon, though they are ever so much the favourites of Heaven. Nothing is more grievous in poverty than that it renders men contemptible: Turba Remi sequitur fortunam, ut semper edit damnatos—The Roman footsoldiers, faithful to the turns of fortune, still persecute the fallen. (4.) We may see in Job a type of Christ, who was thus made a reproach of men, and despised of the people, (Ps. xxii. 6. Isa. liii. 3.) and who hid not his face from shame, and spitting, but bore it better than Job did.

15. Terrors are turned upon me: they pursue my soul as the wind; and my welfare passeth away as a cloud. 16. And now my soul is poured out upon me: the days of affliction have taken hold upon me. 17. My bones are pierced in me in the night.
himself, nor preserve due decorum, but stood up, and shrieked aloud. Thus he was a brother to dragons, and owls, (v. 29.) both in choosing solitude and retirement, as they do, (Isa. xxxiv. 13.) and in making a fearful hideous noise, as they do; his inconsiderable complaints were fitly compared to their inarticulate ones.

2. The terror and trouble that seized his soul, were the sorest part of his calamity, v. 15, 16. (1.) If he looked forward, he saw every thing frightful before him: if he endeavoured to shake off his terror, they turned furiously upon him: if he endeavoured to escape from them, they pursued his soul as swiftly and violently as the wind. He complained, at first, of the terror of his soul and the bed he slept upon, Eze. vi. 4. and still, which way soever he looked, they turned upon him; which way soever he fled, they pursued him. My soul.—Heb. My principal one. My princess; for the soul is the principal part of the man; it is our glory; it is every way more excellent than the body, and therefore that which pursues the soul, and threatens that, should be most dreaded. (2.) If he looked back, he saw all the good he had formerly enjoyed reversed; he found the paradise he had not no bittter remembrance of it; My welfare passeth away, as suddenly, swiftly, and irrecoverably, as a cloud. (3.) If he looked within, he found his spirit quite sunk, and unable to bear his infirmity, not only wounded, but poured out upon him, v. 16. He was not only weak as water, but, in his own apprehension, lost as water split upon the ground. Compare Ps. xxii. 14. My heart is melted like wax.

2. His bodily diseases were very grievous for him. (1.) He was first put into a fever, and in that went to the bone, to all his bones, v. 17. It was a sword in his bones, which pierced him in the night season, when he should have been refreshed with sleep; his nerves were affected with strong convulsions, his sinews took no rest. By reason of his pain, he could take no rest, but sleep departed from his eyes. His bones were burnt with heat; (v. 30.) He was in a constant fever, which dried up the natural moisture, and even consumed the marrow in his bones. See how frail our bodies are, which carry in themselves the seeds of our own disease and death. (2.) He was full of sores. Some, that are pained in their bones, yet sleep in a whole skin, but Satan’s commission against Job extending both to his bone and to his flesh, he spared neither. His skin was black upon him, v. 30. The blood settled, and the sores suppurred, which made his skin look black. Even his garment had its colour changed with the continual running of his blood, and the soft clothing he used to wear was now grown so stiff, that all his garments were like his collar, v. 18. It would be noisome to describe what a condition poor Job was in, for want of clean linen and good attendance, and what filthy rags all his clothes were. Some think, that, among other diseases, Job was ill of a quinsy, or swelling in his throat, and that was it which bound him about like a stiff collar.

4. That which afflicted him most of all, was, that God seemed to be his Enemy, and to fight against him. It was he that cast him into the mire, (v. 19.) and seemed to trample on him when he had him upon the earth, He put him to the lowest thing else. (1.) That God did not appear for him. He addressed himself to him, but gained no grant; appealed to him, but gained no sentence; he was very important in his applications, but in vain; (v. 20.) “I cry unto thee, as one in earnest, I stand up and cry, as one waiting for an answer, but thou hearest not, thou regardest not, for any thing I can perceive.” If our most fervent prayers bring not in speedy and sensible returns, we must not think it.

The same disease, which, (v. 19.) compassed to mine, so some; his body looked more like a heap of dirt than any thing else, in yet, they have often thought that they did, and that God has not only been deaf, but angry, at the prayers of his people, Ps. lxxx. 4. (2.) That God did appear against him, We have here one of the worst words that ever Job spake; (v. 21.) Thou art become cruel to me; far be it from the God of mercy and grace, that he should be cruel to any; his passions fall not; but especially that he would be cruel to his own children, so ungrateful, when he said so of him, but harbouring hard thoughts of God was the sin which did, at this time, most easily beset him. Here, [1.] He thought God fought against him, and stirred up his whole strength to ruin him; With thy strong hand thou opposest thyself, or art an Adversary against me. He had better thoughts of God, (ch. xxiii. 6.) when he concluded he would not plead against him with his great power. God has an absolute sovereignty, and an irresistible strength, but he never uses either the one or the other for the crushing or oppressing of any. [2.] He thought he insulted over him; (v. 22.) Thou liest me up to the wind, as a feather or the chaff which the wind plays with; so unequal a match did Job think himself for Omnipotence, and so unable was he to help himself, when he was made to ride, not in triumph, but in terror, upon the wings of the wind, and the judgments of God did even dissolve his substance, is a cloud distinguished and dispersed by the wind, and his substance, take him in his best estate, is nothing before the power of God, it is soon dissolved. 5. He expected no other now, than that God, by these troubles, would shortly make an end of him. "If I be made to ride upon the wind, I can count upon nother than to break my neck shortly; and he speaks as if God had no other design upon him than that, in all his dealings with him; “I know that thou wilt bring me, with so much more the terror, to death, though I might have been brought thither without all this ado, for it is the house appointed for all living," v. 23. The grave is a house, a narrow, dark, cold, ill-furnished, house, but it will be our residence, where we shall rest and be safe; it is our long home, our own home, for it is our mother’s lap, and in it we are gathered to our fathers. It is a house appointed for us, by him that has appointed us the times of our visits. It is appointed for all living. It is the common receptacle, where rich and poor meet, it is appointed for the general rendezvous; we must all be brought thither shortly; it is God that brings us, for the keys of death and the grave are in his hand, and we may all know that, sooner or later, he will bring us thither; it would be well for us, if we would duly consider it. The living know that they shall die, let us weep and sigh for the dead. There were two things that aggrieved his trouble, and made it the less tolerable. (1.) That it was a very great disappointment to his expectation; (v. 26.) “When I looked for good, for more good, or, at least, for the continuance of what I had, then evil came!” such uncertain things are all our worldly enjoyments, and such a folly is it to feed ourselves with great expectations from them. They that wait for light from the sparks of their creature-comforts, will be wretchedly disappointed, and will make their bed in the darkness. (2.) That it was a very great change in his condition; (v. 31.) “My heart is not only laid by, and hung upon the willow-trees, but it is turned to mourning, and my organ into the voice of them that weep.” Job, in his prosperity, had taken the timbrel and harp, and rejoiced at the sound of the organ, ch. xxi. 12. Notwithstanding he had not deserted them, now he would not enjoy them; but now his tune was altered. Let those, therefore, that rejoice, be as though they rejoiced not, for they know not how soon their laughter will be turned into mourning, and their joy into heaviness. Thus we see how much Job complains of: but,

II. Here is something, in the midst of all, with which he comforts himself, and it is but a little. 1. He foreseees, with comfort, that death will be the period of his calamities; (v. 24.) Though God now with a strong hand, opposed himself against him, yet, says he, he will not stretch out his hand to the grave. The hand of God’s wrath would bring him to death, but would not follow him beyond death; his soul would be safe and happy in the world of spirits, his body safe and easy in the dust. Though men cry in his destruction; though, when they are dying, there is a great deal of agony and outcry, many a sigh, and groan, and complaint, yet in the grave they feel nothing, they fear nothing, but all is quiet there. “Though in hell, which is called destruction, they cry, yet not in the grave; and I being delivered from the second death, the first to me will be an effectual relief.” Therefore he wished he might be hid in the grave, ch. xiv. 13. 2. He reflects with comfort upon the concern he always had for the calamities of others, when he was himself at ease; (v. 25.) Did not I weep for him that was in trouble? Sometimes he himself complained of God, thinking it very hard, that he, who had showed mercy to others, should not himself find mercy. I would rather take it as a quieting consideration to himself; his conscience witnessed for him, that he had always sympathized with persons in misery, and done what he could to help them, and therefore had reason to expect that, at length, both God and his friends would pity him. They who mourn with them, they are shortly after delivered; and they shall know better, when it comes to their turn to drink of the bitter cup. Did not my soul burn for the poor? So some read it, comparing it with that of St. Paul, (2 Cor. xi. 29.) Who is offended, and I burn not? As they who have been unmerciful and hard-hearted to others, may expect to hear of it from their own consciences, when they are themselves in trouble, so they who have considered the poor and succourcd them, shall have the remembrance of that to make their bed easy in their sickness, Ps. xli. 1, 3.

CHAP XXXI.

Job had often protested his integrity in general, here he does it in particular instances; not in a way of commendation, (for he does not here proclaim his good deeds,) but in his own way; whereby to do himself clear from those crimes with which his friends had falsely charged him, which is a debt every man owes to his own reputation. Job’s friends had been particular in their articles of impeachment against him, and therefore he bears his protestation, which consists to refer especially to what Eliphaz had accused him of, ch. xxii. 6, k.c. They had produced no witnesses against him, either could they prove the things whereof they accused him, and therefore he may well be admitted to purge himself upon oath, which he does very solemnly, and with many awful imprecatious of God’s wrath, if he were guilty of those crimes; this protestation confirms God’s character of him, that there was none like him in the earth; perhaps some of his accusers durst not have joined with him; for he not only acquits himself from those gross sins which lie open to the eye of the world, but from many secret sins, which, though he had been guilty of them, nobody could have charged him with, because he will prove himself no hypocrite. Nor does he only maintain the cleanness of his practices, but shows also that in them he went upon good principles; that the reason of his eschewing evil was, but that he feared God, and his piety was at the bottom of his justice and charity; and this crowns the proof of his sincerity. The sins from which he here acquits himself, are, 1. Wantonness and uncleanness of heart, v. 1, 4. 2. Fraud and injustice in commerce, ch. xxxi. 12. 3. Harlotry and severity toward his servants, v. 13, 15. 4. Unmercifulness to the poor, the widows, and the fatherless, v. 16, 25. 6. Confidence in his worldly wealth, v. 24, 25. 4. Deceit and hypocrisy in concealing his own sins, and cowardice in contriving at the sins of others, v. 33, 34. 11. Oppression, and the violent invasion of other people’s rights, v. 38, 40. And, above all, the close 4. deals to God’s judgment concerning his integrity, v. 35, 37. Now, in all this, we may see, (1.) The sense of the patriarchal age concerning good and evil, and what was so long ago condemned as sinful, that is, both hateful and hurtful. (2.) A noble pattern of piety and virtue proposed to us for our imitation, which, if our consciences can witness for us that we conform to it, will be our rejoicing, as it was Job’s, in the day of evil.

1. I MADE a covenant with mine eyes; why then should I think upon a maid?
2. For what portion of God is there from above? and what inheritance of the Almighty from on high? 3. Is not destruction to the wicked? and a strange punishment to the workers of iniquity? 4. Doth not he see my ways, and count all my steps? 5. If I have walked with vanity, or if my foot hath hasted to deceit; 6. Let me be weighed in an even balance, that God may know mine integrity. 7. If my step hath turned out of the way, and my heart walked after mine eyes, and if any blot hath cleaved to my hands; 8. Then let me sow, and let another eat; yea, let my off spring be rooted out.

The lusts of the flesh, and the love of the world, are the two fatal rocks on which multitudes split; against these Job protests he was always careful to stand upon his guard.

I. Against the lusts of the flesh. He not only kept himself clear from adultery, from defiling his neighbours’ wives, (v. 9.) but from all lewdness with any women whatsoever. He kept no concubine, but was inviolably faithful to the marriage-bed, though his wife was none of the wisest, best, or handsomest. This duty he also showed that a man should have but one wife, and cleave to her only; and Job kept close to that institution, and abhorred the thought of transgressing it; for, though his greatness might tempt him to it, his goodness kept him from it. Job was now in pain and sickness of body, and under that affliction it is in a particular manner comfortable, if our conscience can witness for us, that we have been careful to preserve our body in chaste conversation, and to possess those vessels in sanctification and honour, part from the lusts of uncleanness. Now observe here,

I. What the resolutions were, which, in this matter, he kept to; (v. 1.) I made a covenant with mine eyes, that is, “I watched against the occasions of the sin; why then should I think upon a maid?” that is, “By that means, through the grace of God, I kept myself from the very first step towards it." So far was he from wanton dalliances, or any act of lasciviousness, that, (1.) He would not so much as admit a wanton look. He made a covenant with his eyes, made this bargain with them, that they would allow him the pleasure of beholding the light of the sun, and the glory of God shining in the visible creation, provided they would never fasten upon any object that might occasion any impure imaginings, much less any impure desires, in his mind; and, under this penalty, that if they did, they must smart for it in pestilential tears. Note, Those that would keep their hearts pure, must guard their eyes, which are both the outlets and inlets of uncleanness. Hence we read of wanton eyes, Job i. 15. His eye was on hidden things. The first sin began in the eye, Gen. iii. 6. What we must not meddle with, we must not lust after; and what we must not lust after, we must not look at; not the forbidden wealth, (Prov. xxiv. 5.) not the forbidden wine, (Prov. xxiii. 11.) not the forbidden woman, Matth. v. 28. (2.) He would not so much as allow a wanton thought; "Why then should I think upon a maid, with any unchaste fancy or desire toward her?" Shame and sense of honour might persuade him, He did not desire or think of a beautiful virgin, but only grace and the fear of God would restrain him from so much as thinking of it. Those are not chaste, that are not so in spirit as well as body, 1 Cor. vii. 34. See how Christ's exposition of the seventh commandment agrees with the ancient sense of it, and how much better Job understood it than the Pharisees, though they sat in Moses's chair.

2. What the reasons were, which, in this matter, he was governed by. It was not for fear of reproach among men, though that is to be considered, (Prov. vi. 33.) but for fear of the wrath and curse of God. He knew very well.

(1.) That uncleanness is a sin that forfeits all good, and shuts us out from the hope of it; (v. 2.) What portion of God is there from above? What blessing can such impure sinners expect from the pure and holy God, or what token of his favour? What inheritance of the Almighty can they look for, when there is no portion, no influence, no true happiness, for a soul, but what is in God, in the Almighty, and what comes from above, from on high. Those that wallow in uncleanness, render themselves utterly unfit for communion with God, either in grace here, or in glory hereafter, and become allied to unclean spirits, which are for ever separated from him; and then what portion, what inheritance, can they have with God? No unclean thing shall enter into the New Jerusalem, that holy city.

(2.) It is a sin that incurs divine vengeance, v. 3. It will certainly be the sinner's ruin, if it be not repented of in time. Is not destruction a swift and sure destruction to those wicked people, and a strange punishment to the workers of this iniquity? Fools make a mock at this sin, make a jest of it, it is with them a peccadillo, a trick of youth; but they deceive themselves with vain words, for, because of these things, how light soever they make of them, the wrath of God, the insupportable wrath of the eternal God, comes upon the children of disobedience, Eph. v. 6. There are some sinners whom God sometimes goes out of the common road of providence to meet with; such are these. The destruction of Sodom is a strange punishment. Is there not alienation (so some read it) to the workers of iniquity? This is the sinfulness of the sin, that it alienates the mind from God; (Eph. iv. 18, 19.) and this is the punishment of the sinners, that they shall be eternally set at a distance from him, Rev. xxii. 15.

(3.) It cannot be hid from the all-seeing God. A wanton thought cannot be so close, nor a wanton look so quick, as to escape his cognizance, much less any act of uncleanness so secretly done, as to be out of his sight. If Job was at any time tempted to this sin, he restrained himself from it, and all approaches to it, with this pertinent thought, (v. 4.) Doth not he see my secrets, Joseph, did, Gen. xxxix. 9. How can I do it, and sin against God? Two things Job had an eye to. [1.] God's omniscience. It is a great truth, that God's eyes are upon all the ways of men; (Prov. v. 20, 21.) but Job here mentions it with application to himself and his own actions; Doth not he see my ways? O God, thou hast searched me and known me. God sees what rule we walk by, what company we walk with, what end we walk to, and what course we follow. (2.) His observance. "He not only sees, but takes notice; he counts all my steps, all my false steps in the way of duty, all my by-steps into the way of sin." He not only sees our ways in general, but takes cognizance of our particular steps in these ways, every action, every motion. He keeps count of all, because he will call us to account, will bring every work into judgment. God takes a more exact notice of us than we do of ourselves; for who ever counted, or numbered, or watched every step? Job ii. 3. Let us therefore walk circumspectly.
1. How he ratifies his protestation. So confident is he of his own honesty, that, (1.) He is willing to have his goods searched; (v. 6.) Let me be weighed in an even balance, that is, “Let what I have got be inquired into, and it will be found to weigh well;” a sign that it was not gotten by vanity, for then Tekeel had been written on it—weighed in the balance, and found too light. An honest man is so far from dreading a trial, that he desires it rather, being well assured that God knows his integrity, and will approve it, and that the trial of it will be to his praise and honour. (2.) He is willing to forfeit the whole cargo, if there were found any prohibited, contraband, goods, any thing but what he came honestly by; (v. 8.) “Let me sow, and let another eat,” which was already agreed to be the doom of oppressors; (ch. v. 5.) “and let my offspring, all the trees that I have planted, be rooted out.” This intimates, that he believed the sin did deserve this punishment, that, usually, it is thus punished; but that, though now his estate was ruined, (and at such a time, if ever, his conscience would have brought his sin to his mind,) yet he knew himself innocent, and would venture all the poor remains of his estate upon the issue of the trial.

9. If my heart have been deceived by a woman; or if I have laid wait at my neigh-bour’s door; 10. Then let my wife grind unto another, and let others bow down upon her. 11. For this is a heinous crime; yea, it is an iniquity to be punished by the judges. 12. For it is a fire that consumeth to destruction, and would root out all mine increase. 13. If I did despise the cause of my man-servant, or of my maid-servant, when they contended with me; 14. What then shall I do when God riseth up? and, when he visiteth, what shall I answer him? 15. Did not he that made me in the womb make him? and did not one fashion us in the womb?

Two more instances we have here of Job’s integrrity.

1. That he had a very great abhorrence of the sin of adultery. As he did not wrong his own marriage-bed, by keeping a concubine, (he did not so much as think upon a maid, v. 1.) so he was careful not to offer any injury to his neighbour’s marriag-edge.

Let us see here,

1. How clear he was from this sin, v. 9. (1.) He did not so much as covet his neighbour’s wife, for even his heart was not deceived by a woman. The beauty of another man’s wife did not kindle in him any unchaste desires, nor was he ever moved by the allurements of an adulterous woman, such as is described, Prov. vii. 6, &c. See the original of all the fell designs of this life. They come from a deceived heart. Every sin is deceitful, and none more so than the sin of uncleanness. (2.) He never compassed or imagined any unchaste design. He never laid wait at his neighbour’s door, to get an opportunity to debauch his wife in his absence, when the good man was not at home, Prov. vii. 19. See ch. xxiv. 15.

2. What a dread he had of this sin, and what frightful apprehensions he had concerning the malignity of it—that it was a heinous crime. (v. 11.) one of the greatest viles sins a man can be guilty of, highly provoking to God, and destructive to the prosperity of the soul. With respect to the mischievousness of it, and the punishment it deserved, he owns that, if he were guilty of that heinous crime, (1.) His family might justly be made infamous in the highest degree; (v. 10.) Let my wife grind to another. Let her be a slave, so some; a harlot, so others. God often punishes the sins of one with the sin of another, the adultery of the husband with the adultery of the wife, as in David’s case, (2 Sam. xii. 11.) which did not altogether excuse the treacherous adulterous wife; but, how unrighteous soever she is, God is righteous. See Hos. iv. 13, Your spouses shall commit adultery. Note, Those who are not just and faithful to their relations, must not think it strange, if their relations be unjust and unfaithful to them. (2.) He himself might justly be made a public example; For it is an iniquity to be punished by the judges; yea, though they who are guilty of it are themselves judges, says God. Note, Adultery is a crime which the civil magistrate ought to take cognizance of, and punish: so it was adjudged even in the patriarchal age, before the law of Moses made it capital. It is an evil work, to which the sword of justice ought to be a terror. (3.) It might justly become the ruin of his estate; nay, he knew it would be so; (v. 12.) It is a fire. Lust is a fire in the soul: they that indulge it, are said to burn. It consumes all that is good there, (the convictions, the comforts of conscience;) it endures the application of every reedy that drowns the fire of God’s wrath, which, if not extinguished by the blood of Christ, will burn to the lowest hell. It will consume even to that eternal destruction. It consumes the body, (Prov. v. 11.) it consumes the substance, it roots out all the increase. Burning lusts bring burning judgments.

Perhaps it alludes to the burning of Sodom, which was intended for an example to those who should afterward, in like manner, live ungodly.

II. That he had a very great tenderness for his servants, and ruled them with a gentle hand. He had a great household, and he managed it well. By this he evidenced his sincerity, that he had grace to govern his passion as well as his appetite; and he that in these two things has the rule of his own spirit, is better than the mighty, Prov. xvi. 32. Here observe,

1. What were Job’s condensations to his servrrants; (v. 15.) He did not despise the cause of his man-servant, no, nor of his maid-servant, when they contended with him; that is, if they contradicted him in any thing, he was willing to hear their reasons. If they did offended him, or were accused to him, he would patiently hear what they had to say for themselves, in their own vindication or excuse. Nay, if they complained of any hardship he put upon them, he did not bow-beat them, and bid them hold their tongues, but gave them leave to tell their story, and redressed their grievances as far as it appeared they had right on their side. He was tender of them, not only when they served him and pleased him, but even when they contended with him. Herein, he was a great example to masters, to give unto their servants that which is just and equa-list, to do the same things to them, that they expect from them, (Col. iv. 1. Eph. vi. 9.) and not to rule them with the rigour of despised, and high hand. Many of Job’s servants were slain in his service, (ch. i. 15. 17.) the rest were unkind and undutiful to him, and despised his cause, though he never despised theirs; (ch. xix. 15, 16.) but he had this comfort, that in his prosperity he had behaved well toward them. Note, When relations are either removed from us, or embittered to us, the testimony of our consciences, that we have done our duty to them, will be a great support to us when we are in trouble.
to treat his servants thus kindly; he had, herein, an eye to God, both as his Judge, and their Maker.

(1.) As his Judge; he considered, "If I should be imperious and severe with my servants, what then shall I do when God riseth up?" He considered that he had a Master in heaven, to whom he was accountable, who will rise up, and will visit; and we are concerned to consider what we shall do in the day of his visitation, (Isa. x. 3.) and, considering that we are undone, if God should then be strait and severe with us, we ought to be very mild and gentle towards all with whom we have to do. Consider what would become of us, if God should be extreme to mark what we do amiss, should take all advantages against us, and insist upon all his just demands from us; if he should visit every offence, and take every forfeiture; if he should always chide, and keep his anger for ever. And let not us be rigorous with our inferiors. Consider what will become of us, if we be cruel and unmerciful to our brethren. The cries of the injured will be heard, the sins of the injurious will be punished, they that showed no mercy, shall find none; and what shall we do then?

(2.) As his and his servants' Creator; (v. 15.) where he had not permitted to be harsh with his servants, to deny them right, and turn a deaf ear to their reasons, this thought came very seasonably into his mind, "Did not he that made me in the womb, make him? I am a creature as well as he, and my being is derived and depending as well as his. He partakes of the same nature that I do, and is the work of the same hand; have we not all one Father?"

Note, Whatever difference there is among men in their outward condition, in their capacity of mind, or strength of body, or place in the world, he that made the one, made the other also; which is a good reason why we should not mock at men's natural infirmities, nor trample upon those that are any way worse than the greater part of us. Is not the same power, for the same end, not withstanding the disparity of our outward condition, we are bound so far to set ourselves upon the level with those we deal with, as to do to them, in all respects, as we would they should do to us.

1. If I have withheld the poor from their desire, or have caused the eyes of the widow to fail; 17. Or have eaten my morsel myself alone, and the fatherless hath not eaten thereof; 18. (For from my youth he was brought up with me, as with a father, and I have guided her from my mother's womb;) 19. If I have seen any perish for want of clothing, or any poor without covering; 20. If his loins have not blessed me, and if he were not warned with the fleece of my sheep; 21. If I have lifted up my hand against the fatherless, when I saw my help in the gate; 22. Then let mine arm fall from my shoulder-blade, and mine arm be broken from the bone. 23. For destruction from God was a terror to me, and by reason of his highness I could not endure.

Eliphaz had particularly charged Job with unmercifulness to the poor; (ch. xxi. 6, &c.) Thou most withholden bread from the hungry, stripped the naked of their clothing, and sent widows away empty. One would think he could not have been so very piteous and express in his charge, unless there had been some truth in it, some ground for it; and yet it appears, by Job's protestation, that it was utterly false and calumnious; he was never guilty of any such thing. See here,

1. The testimony which Job's conscience gave in, concerning his constant behaviour towards the poor. He is most large upon this head, because in this matter he was most particularly accused. He solemnly protests,

1. That he had never been wanting to do good to them, as there was occasion, to the utmost of his ability. He did not neglect to be attentive to the poor, and careful of them, especially the widows and fatherless, that were destitute of help. (1.) He was always ready to grant their desires, and answer their expectations, v. 16. If a poor person begged a kindness of him, he was ready to gratify him; if he could but perceive, by the widow's mournful craving look, that she expected an alms from him, though she had not confidence enough to ask it, he had compassion enough to give it, and never caused her to wait; but went and did it. (2.) He was ready to do good upon the poor, and did them honour; for he took the fatherless children to eat with him at his own table, they should fare as he fared, and be familiar with him, and he would show himself pleased with their company, as if they had been his own, v. 17.

As it is one of the greatest grievances of poverty, that it exposes to contempt, so it is none of the least supports to the poor, to be respected. (3.) He was very tender of them, and had a fatherly concern for their comfort, v. 18. He was a father to the fatherless, took care of orphans, brought them up with him under his own eye, and gave them, not only maintenance, but education. He was a guide to the widow, who had lost the guide of her youth; he advised her in her affairs, took cognizance of them, and undertook the management of them.

Those that need not our alms, may yet have occasion for our counsel, and it may be a real kindness to them. This Job doth not do from his youth, from his mother's womb, that is, he had something of tenderness and compassion woven in his nature; he began betimes to do good, ever since he could remember; he had always some poor widow or fatherless child under his care. His parents taught him betimes to pity and relieve the poor, and brought up orphans with him.

(4.) He provided food convenient for them; they ate of the same morsels that he did, (v. 17.) not after him, of the crumbs that fell from his table, but with him, of the best dish upon his table. They that have abundance, must not eat their morsels alone, as if they had none but themselves to take care of, nor indulge their appetite with a dainty bit by themselves, but take others to share with them, as David took Mephibosheth. (5.) He took particular care to clothe them that were without covering, which would be more expensive to him than feeding them, (v. 19.) Poor people may perish for want of clothing, or any poor without covering; as well as for want of clothing to lie in by night, or to go abroad by day. If Job knew of any that were in this distress, he was forward to relieve them, and, instead of giving rich and gaudy liveries to his servants, while the poor were turned off with rags that were ready to be thrown to the dunghill, he had good, warm, strong clothes, made on purpose for them, of the fleece of his sheep, (v. 20.) so that their loins, whenever they girt those garments about them, were blessed him; they commended his charity, blessed God for him, and prayed God to bless him. Job's sheep were burned with fire from heaven, but this was his comfort, that, when he had them, he came honestly by them, and used them charitably fed the poor with their flesh, and clothed them with their wool.

2. That he had never been accessory to the wrongdoing of any that were poor. It might be said, perhaps, that he was kind here and there to a poor orphan that was a favourite, but to others he was oppressive. No, he was tender of all, and injurious to none. He never so much as lifted up his hand against the fatherless, and gave no occasion to those who threatened or frightened them, or offered to strike them; never used his power to crush them that stood in his way, or squeeze what he could out of them; though he saw his help in the gate, that is, though he had interest enough both in the people and in the judges, both to enable him to do it, and to bear him out when he had done it. Those that have it in their power to do a wrong thing, and go through with it, and a prospect of getting by it, and yet do justly, and love mercy, and are firm to both, may afterward reflect upon it with much comfort, as Job does here.

II. The imprecation wherewith he confirms this protestation; (v. 22.) "If I have been oppressive to the poor, let mine arm fall from my shoulder-blade, and mine arm be broken from the bone," that is, "Let the flesh rot off from the bone, and one bone be disjointed and broken off from another." Had he not been perfectly clear in this matter, he durst not have challenged the judge concerning it. And he intimates, that it is a righteous thing with God to break the arm that is lifted up against the fatherless, as he withered Jeroam's arm that was stretched out against a prophet.

III. The principles by which Job was restrained from all uncharitableness and unmercifulness. He durst not abuse the poor; for though, with his help in the gate, he could overpower them, yet he could not make his part good against that God who is the Father of orphans, and poor men, and will not let oppressors go unpunished; v. 23. " Destruction from God was a terror to me, whenever I was tempted to this sin, and by reason of his highness I could not endure the thought of making him my Enemy." He stood in awe. 1. Of the majesty of God, as a God above him. He thought of his highness, the infinite distance between him and God, which possessed him with such a reverence of him, as made him more circumspect in his conduct than he otherwise would have been. They who oppress the poor, and pervert judgment and justice, forget that he who is higher than the highest regardeth, and there be a higher than they, who is able to deal with them; (Eccl. v. 8.) but Job considered this. 2. Of the wrath of God, as a God that would certainly be against him, if he should wrong the poor. Destruction from God, because it would be a certain and an utter ruin to him, if he were guilty of this sin, was a constant terror to him, to restrain him from it. Note, Good men, even the best, have need to restrain themselves from sin with the fear of destruction from God, and all little enough. This should especially restrain us from all acts of injustice and oppression—that God himself is the Avenger thereof. Even then when salvation from God is a comfort to us, yet destruction from God should be a terror to us. Adam, in innocency, was awed with a threatening.

24. If I have made gold my hope, or have said to the fine gold, Thou art my confidence; 25. If I rejoiced because my wealth was great, and because my hand had gotten much; 26. If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness, 27. And my heart hath been secretly enuced, or my mouth hath kissed my hand: 28. This also were an iniquity to be punished ed by the judge: for I should have denied the God that is above. 29. If I rejoiced at the destruction of him that hated me, or lifted up myself when evil found him; 30. (Neither have I suffered my mouth to sin, by wishing a curse to his soul;) 31. If the men of my tabernacle said not, Oh that we had of his flesh! we cannot be satisfied. 32. (The stranger did not lodge in the street; but I opened my doors to the traveller.)

Four articles more of Job's protestation we have in these verses, which, as all the rest, not only assure us what he was and did, but teach us what we should be and do.

1. He protests that he never set his heart upon the wealth of this world, nor took the things of it for his portion and happiness. He had gold, he had fine gold, his wealth was great, and he had gotten much. Our wealth is either advantageous or pernicious to us, according as we stand affected to it. If we make it our rest and our ruler, it will be our ruin; if we make it our servant and an instrument of righteousness, it will be a blessing to us. Job here tells how he stood affected to his worldly wealth, 1. He put no great confidence in it; he did not make wealth his god; v. 2. He did not depend upon that righteousness that do, and enemies to themselves, who depend upon it as sufficient to make them happy, who think themselves safe and honourable, and sure of comfort, in having abundance of this world's goods. Some make it their hope and confidence for another world, as if it were a certain token of God's favour and those who have so much sense as not to think so, yet promise themselves that it will be a portion with them in this life, whereas the things themselves are uncertain, and our satisfaction in them much more so. It is hard to have riches, and not to trust in riches; and that is it which makes it so difficult for as a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God, Matth. xix. 23. Mark x. 24. 2. He took no great complacency in it; (v. 25.) If I rejoiced because my wealth was great, and boasted that my hand had gotten much. He took no pride in his wealth, as if it added any thing to his real excellency, nor did he think any riches his merit, and in giving his hand got it, Deut. vii. 17. He took no pleasure in it, in comparison with the spiritual things which were the delight of his soul. His joy did not terminate in the gift, but passed through it to the Giver. When he was in the midst of his abundance, he never said, Soul, take thine ease in these things, eat, drink, and be merry, nor blessed himself in his riches. He did not inordinately rejoice in his wealth; and that helped him to bear the loss of it so patiently as he did. The way to weep as though we were not, is, to rejoice as though we rejoiced not. The less pleasure the enjoyment is, the less pain the disappointment will be.

2. He protests that he never gave the worship and glory to the creature, which are due to God only; he was never guilty of idolatry, v. 26.-28. We do not find that Job's friends charged him with the practice of idolatry; but there were those in the time of Job that so set themselves to worship the sun and moon, and stars, and that else Job would not have mentioned it. Idolatry is one of the old ways which wicked men have trodden, and the most ancient idolatry was, the worshipping of the sun and moon, to which the temptation was most strong, as appears, (Deut. iv. 19.) where Moses speaks of the danger which the people were in of being driven to worship them. But, as yet, it was practised secretly, and durst not appear in open view, as, afterward, the most abominable idolatry did. Observe,
1. How far Job kept from this sin. He not only never bowed the knee to Baal, (which, some think, was designed to represent the sun,) never fell down, and worshipped the sun, but he kept his eye, his heart, and his whole soul, from this sin.

2. How ill Job thought of this sin, v. 28. (1.) He looked upon it as an affront to the civil magistrate; It were an iniquity to be punished by the judge, as a public nuisance, and hurtful to kings and provinces. Idolatry debouches men’s minds, corrupts their manners, takes off the true sense of religion, which is the great bond of societies, and provokes God to give men up to a gorg probate, so, and to send judgments upon a nation; and therefore the conservators of the public peace are concerned to restrain it by punishing it. (2.) He looked upon it as a much greater affront to the God of heaven, and no less than high treason against his crown and dignity; For I should have denied the God that is above, denied his being as God, and his sovereignty as God above. Idolatry is, in effect, atheism; hence the Gentiles are said to be without God (athetists) in the world. Note, We should be afraid of every thing that does but implicitly deny the God above, his providence, or any of his perfections.

III. He protests that he was so far from doing or designing mischief to any, that he neither desired nor delighted in the hurt of the worst enemy he had. The forgiving of those that do us evil, it seems, was not only a sin, but a crime; and the Pharisees, at the feast of unleavened bread, were concerning it of no effect, by teaching, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemy, Matth. v. 43.

Observe here,

1. Job was far from revenge. He did not only not return the injuries that were done him, not only not destroy those who hated him; but, (1.) He did not so much as rejoice when any mischief betel them, v. 29. Many who would not wilfully hurt their neighbours in their right, or have done them a dishappiness, yet are secretly pleased, and laugh in their sleeve, (as we say,) when hurt is done them: but Job was not of that spirit. Though Job was a very good man, yet, it seems, there were those that hated him, but evil found them. He saw their destruction, and was far from rejoicing in it, for that would justly have brought the destruction upon him, as it is intimated, Prov. xxiv. 17, 18. (2.) He did not so much as wish in his own mind that evil might befall them, v. 30. He never wished a curse to his soul (causes to the soul are the worst of curses,) never desired his death; he knew that, if he did, it would turn into sin to him. He was careful not to offend with his tongue, (Ps. xxxix. 1.) he would not suffer his mouth to sin, and therefore durst not impute any evil, no not to his worst enemy. If others bear malice to us, that will not justify us in bearing malice to them.

2. He was violently urged to revenge, and yet he kept himself that clear from it. (v. 31.) The men of his tabernacle, his domestics, his servants, and those about him, were so enraged at Job’s enemy, that they could have eaten him, if Job would but have set them on, or given them leave. “O that we had of his flesh!” Our master is satisfied to forgive him, but we cannot be so satisfied.” See how much beloved Job was by his family, how heartily they espoused his cause, and what enemies they were to his enemies; but see what a strict hand Job kept upon his passions, that he would not act upon himself, though he had those about him that blew the coals of his resentment. Note, (1.) A good man commonly does not himself lay to heart the affronts that are done him so much as his friends do for him. (2.) Great men have commonly those about them that stir them up to revenge. David had so, 1 Sam. xxiv. 4.—xxvi. 8. 2 Sam. xvi. 9. But if they keep their temper, notwithstanding the spiteful insinuations of those about them, afterward it shall be no grief of heart to them, but shall turn very much to their praise.

IV. He protests that he had never been unkind or inhospitable to strangers; (v. 32.) The stranger lodged not in the street, as angels might lately have done in the streets of Sodom, if Lot alone had not entertained them. Perhaps, by that instance, Job was taught (as we are, Heb. xiii. 2.) not to be forgetful to entertain strangers. He that is at home, must consider those that are from home, and put his soul into their soul’s stead, and then do as he would be done by. Hospitality is a Christian duty, 1 Pet. iv. 9. Job, in his prosperity, was noted for good house-keeping; He opened his door to the road; so it may be read; he kept the street door open, that he might see who passed by, and he invited them in, as Abraham, Gen. xviii. 1.

33. If I covered my transgressions as Adam, by hiding mine iniquity in my bosom; 34. (Did I fear a great multitude, or did the contempt of families terrify me, that I kept silence, and went not out of the door?) Oh that one would hear me! behold, my desire is that the Almighty would answer me, and that mine adversary had written a book: 36. Surely I would take it upon my shoulder, and bind it as a crown to me. 37. I would declare unto him the number of my steps; as a prince would I go near unto him.) 38. If my land cry against me, or that the furrows likewise thereof complain; 39. If I have eaten the fruits thereof without money, or have caused the owners thereof to lose their life; 40. Let thistles grow instead of wheat, and cockle instead of barley. The words of Job are ended.
We have here Job's protestation against three more sins, together with his general appeal to God's bar, and his petition for a hearing there, which, it is likely, was intended to conclude his discourse, (and therefore we will consider it last,) but that another particular sin occurred, from which he thought it requisite to acquit himself. He clears himself from the charge.

I. Of dissimulation and hypocrisy, which was the general crime his friends accused him of.—That, under the cloak of a profession of religion, he has kept up secret haunts of sin, and that really he was as bad as other people, but had the art of concealing it. Zophar insinuated (ch. xx. 12.) that he hid his iniquity under his tongue. "No," says Job, "I never did, (v. 33.) I never covered my transgression as Adam, never palliated a sin with frivolous excuses, nor made fig-leaves the shelter of my shame, nor ever hid my iniquity in my bosom, as a fondling, a darling, that I could by no means part with, as was stolen goods which I dreaded the discovery of." It is natural to us to cover our sins; we have it from our first parents; we are loath to confess our faults, willing to extenuate them, and make the best of ourselves, to devolve the blame upon others, as Adam on his wife, not without a tacit refection upon God himself. But he that thus covers his sins shall not prosper, Prov. xxviii. 13. Job, in this protestation, intimates two things, which were certain evidences of his integrity: 1. That he was not guilty of any great transgression or iniquity, inconsistent with sincerity, which he had now industriously concealed. In this protestation, he had dealt fairly, and, while he denies some sins, was not conscious to himself that he allowed himself any. 2. That what transgression and iniquity he had been guilty of, (Who is there that lives, and sins not?) he had always been ready to own it, and, as soon as ever he perceived he had said or done amiss, he was ready to unsay it, and undo it, as far as he could, by repentance, confessing it both to God and man, and forsaking it: this is doing honestly.

II. From the charge of cowardice and base fear. His courage in that which is good, he produces as an evidence of his sincerity in it; (v. 34.) Did I fear a great multitude, that I kept silence? No, all that knew Job, knew him to be a man of undaunted resolution, not easily daunted by the expectation of reproach, and spake, and acted, in defence of religion and justice, and did not fear the face of man, nor was ever threatened or brow-beaten out of his duty, but set his face as a flint. Observe, 1. What great conscience Job had made of his duty as a magistrate, or a man of reputation, in the place where he lived. He did not, he durst not, keep silence, when he had a call to speak in an honest cause, or keep within doors, when he had a call to go abroad to do good. The case may be such, that it may be our sin to be silent and retired; as when we are called to reproe sin, and bear our testimony against it, to vindicate the truths and ways of God, to do right to those who are injured or oppressed, or any way to serve the public, or do honour to our religion. 2. What little account Job made of the discouragements he met with in the way of his duty. He valued not the charge that was made against him, nor did he value the menaces of the mighty, nor did he value the contempt of families that never terrified him. He was not deterred by the number or quality, the scars or insults, of the injurious, from doing justice to the injured; no, he scorned to be swayed and biased by any such considerations, nor ever suffered a righteous cause to be run down by a high hand. He feared the great God, not the great multitude, and, of course, not the contempt of families.

III. From the charge of oppression and violence, and doing wrong to his poor neighbours. And here observe,

1. What his protestation is—that the estate he had, he both got and used honestly, so that his land could not cry out against him, nor the furrows thereof complain, (v. 38.) as they do against those who get the possession of them by fraud and extortion, Hab. ii. 9-11. The whole creation is said to groan under the sin of man; but that which is unjustly gained and held cries out against a man, and accuses him, condemns him, and demands justice against him for the injury. Rather than his oppression shall go unpunished, the very ground and the furrows of it shall witness against him, and be his prosecutors. Two things he could say safely concerning his estate, (1.) That he never ate the fruits of it without money, v. 39. What he purchased, he paid for, as Abraham for the land he bought, (Gen. xxiii. 16.) and David, 2 Sam. xxiv. 24. The labourers that he employed had their wages duly with them, and if he made use of the fruits of those lands that he let out, he paid his tenants for them, or allowed it in their rent. (2.) That he never caused the owners thereof to lose their life, never got an estate, as Ahab got Naboth's vineyard, killing the heir and seizing the inheritance; never starved those that held lands of him, nor killed them with hard bargains and hard usage. No tenant, no workman, no servant, he had, could complain of him.

2. How he confirms his protestation; he does it, as often before, with a suitable imprecation; (v. 40.) "If I have got my estate unjustly, let thistles grow instead of wheat; the worst of weeds instead of the best of grains." When men get estates unjustly, they are justly deprived of the comfort of them, and disappointed in their expectations from them. They sow their land, but they sow not that body that shall be; God will give it a body; it was sown wheat, but shall come up thistles. What men do not come honestly by, will never do them any good.

Job, toward the close of his protestation, appeals to the judgment-seat of God concerning the truth of it; (v. 35-37.) Oh that he would hear me, even, that the Almighty would answer me! This was what he often desired, and often complained that he could not obtain; and now, that he had drawn up his own defence so particularly, he leaves it upon record, in order to a final hearing, files it, as it were, till his cause he called.

(1.) A trial is moved for, and the motion earnestly pressed; "Oh that one, any one, would hear me; my cause is so good, and my evidence so clear, that I am willing to refer it to any indifferent person whatsoever; but my desire is, that the Almighty himself would determine it." An upright heart does not dread a scrutiny: he that means honestly, is sure that he has a clear conscience; and, as he has a window in his breast, that all men might see the light of the heart. But an upright heart does particularly desire to be determined in every thing by the judgment of God, which are, we sure, is according to truth. It was holy David's prayer, Search me, O God, and know my heart; and it was blessed Paul's comfort, He that judgeth me, is the Lord.

(2.) The prosecutor is called, the plaintiff summoned, and ordered to bring in his information, to the purpose of showing what he was charged against. The prisoner, for he stands upon his deliverance; (v. 41.) The prisoner had written a book—That my friends, who charge me with hypocrisy, would draw up their charge in writing, that it might be reduced to a certainty, and that we might the better join issue upon it." Job would be very glad to see the libel, to have a copy of his indictment; he would not hide it under his arm, but take it upon his shoulders, to be seen and read of all men, nay, he would bind it:
as a crown to him, would be pleased with it, and look upon it as his ornament; for, [1.] If it discovered to him any sin he had been guilty of, which he did not yet see, he should be glad to know it, that he might repent of it, and get it pardoned. A good man is willing to know the worst of himself, and will be thankful to those that will faithfully tell him of his faults. [2.] If it charged him with what was false, he doubted not but to disprove the allegations, that his innocence would be cleared up as the light, and he should come off with so much more honour. But, [3.] He did believe that, when his adversaries came to consider this most closely as they must do, if they put the charge in writing, the accusations would be trivial and minute, and every one that saw them would say, "If this was all they had to say against him, it was a shame they had given him so much trouble."

(3.) The defendant is ready to make his appearance, and to give his accusers all the fair play they can desire.

He will declare unto them the number of his steps, v. [22.] He will let them into the history of his own life, will show them all the stages and scenes of it; he will give them a narrative of his conversation, what would make against him as well as what would make for him, and let them make what use they pleased of it: and so confident is he of his integrity, that, as a prince to be crowned, rather than as a prisoner to be tried, he would go near to him, both to his accuser to hear his charge, and to his judge to hear his doom. Thus the testimony of his conscience was his rejoicing.

Those that have kept their hands without spot from the world, as Job did, may lift up their faces without spot unto God, and may comfort themselves with the prospect of his judgment, when they lie under the unjust censures of men. If our hearts condemn us not, then have we confidence toward God.

Thus the words of Job are ended; that is, he has now said all he would say, in answer to his friends: he afterward said something in a way of self-reproach and condemnation; (ch. xl. 4, 5, xlii. 2, &c.) but here ends what he had to say in a way of self-defence and vindication. If this suffice not, he will add more: more, he knows; for he has still enough, and must put himself to the judgment of the bench. Some think the manner of expression intimates that he concluded with an air of assurance and triumph. He now keeps the field, and doubts not but to win the field. Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifies.

CHAP. XXXII.

The stage is clear, for Job and his three friends are set down, and neither he nor they have any thing more to say; it is therefore very seasonable for a moderator to interpose, and Elihu is the man. In this chapter, we have, I. Some account of him, his parentage, his presence at the dispute, and his sentiments concerning v. 1. II. The apology he made for his bold undertaking to speak to a question which had been so largely and learnedly argued by his seniors. He pleads, 1. That though he had not the experience of an elder man, he had the experience of a man, v. 8. 10. 2. That he had patiently heard all they had to say, v. 11. 13. 3. That he had something new to offer, v. 14. 17. 4. That his mind was full of this matter, and it would be a refreshment to him to give it vent, v. 18. 20. 5. That he was resolved to speak impartially, v. 21, 22. And he did speak so well to this matter, that Job made no reply to him, and God gave him no rebuke, when he checked both Job himself and his other three friends.

1. So these three men ceased to answer Job, because he was righteous in his own eyes. 2. Then was kindled the wrath of Elihu, the son of Barachel the Buzite, of the kindred of Ram; against Job was his wrath kindled, because he justified himself rather than God. 3. Also against his three friends was his wrath kindled, because they had found no answer, and yet had condemned Job. 4. Now Elihu had waited till Job had spoken, because they were elder than he. 5. When Elihu saw that there was no answer in the mouth of these three men, then his wrath was kindled.

Usually young men are the disputants, and old men the moderators; but here, when old men were the disputants, as a rebuke to them for their unbecoming heat, a young man is raised up to be the moderator. Divers of Job's friends were present, that came to visit him, and to receive instruction. Now here we have,

I. The reason why his three friends were now silent; they ceased to answer him, and let him have his saying, because he was righteous in his own eyes, and because thus he argued, it was not to purpose to argue with a man that was so opinionative, v. 1. Those that are self-conceited are indeed hard to be wrought upon; there is more hope of a fool (a fool of God's making) than of them who are fools of their own making, Prov. xxi. 12. But they did not judge fairly concerning Job; he was really righteous before God, and not righteous only in his own eyes; so that it was only to save their own credit, that they made this the reason of their silence, as parents in dispute commonly do, when they find themselves run a-ground, and are not willing to own themselves unable to make their part good.

II. The reasons why Elihu, the fourth, now spake. His name Elihu signifies My God is he: they had all tried in vain to convince Job, but My God is he that can and will do it, and did it at last: he only can open the understanding. He is said to be a Buzite, Nahor's son, Nahor was Jacob's eldest son (Gen. xxii. 21.) and of the kindred of Ram, that is, Abram; so some; (Gen. xxii. 21.) whence the Syrians or Aramites descended and were denominated. Of the kindred of Abram; so the Chaldee paraphrase; supposing him to be the first called Ram, High, then Abram, a high father, and lastly, Abraham, The high father of a multitude. Elihu was not so well known as the rest, and therefore is more particularly described thus.

1. Elihu spake because he was angry, and thought he had good cause to be so. When he had made his remarks upon the dispute, he did not go away and calumniate the disputants, striking them secretly with a malicious censorious tongue, but what he had to say, he would say before their faces, that they might vindicate themselves, if they could. (1.) He was angry at Job, because he thought he did not speak so reverently of God as he ought to have done; and that was too true, v. 2. (2.) He justly felt his body far less than God, that is, took more care and pains to clear himself from the imputation of unrighteousness in being thus afflicted, than to clear God from the imputation of unrighteousness in afflicting him, as if he were more concerned for his own honour than for God's; whereas he should, in the first place, have justified God, and cleared his glory, and then he might well enough have left his own reputation to shift for itself. Note, A gracious heart is jealous for the honour of God, and cannot but be angry, when that is neglected or postponed, or any injury done it. Nor is it any breach of the
We have found out wisdom: God thrusteth him down, not man. 14. Now, he hath not directed his words against me; neither will I answer him with your speeches.

Elihu here appears to be,
1. A man of great modesty and humility: though a young man, and a man of abilities, yet not pert, and confident, and assuming; his face shone, and, like Moses, he did not know it, which made it shine much the brighter. Let it be observed also, especially by young people, as worthy their imitation.

1 What a difference he had of himself, and of his own judgment; (v. 6.) "I am young, and therefore I was afraid, and durst not show you mine opinion, for fear I should either prove mistaken, or do that which was unbecoming me." He was so observant of all that passed, and applied his mind so closely to what he heard, that he had formed in himself a judgment of it; he neither neglected it as foreign, nor declined it as intricate: but, how clear soever the matter was to himself, he was afraid to deliver himself upon it, because he differed in his sentiments from those that were elder than he. Note, It becomes us to be suspicious of our own judgment in matters of doubtful dispute, to be swift to hear the sentiments of others, and slow to speak our own, especially when we go contrary to the judgment of those whom, upon the score of their learning and piety, we justly have a veneration for.

2. What a deference he paid to his seniors, and what great expectations he had from them; (v. 7.) I said, Days should speak. Note, Age and experience give a man great advantage in judging of things, both as they furnish a man with so much the more matter for his thoughts to work upon, and as they ripen and improve the faculties he is to work with; which is a good reason why old people should take pains both to learn themselves, and to teach others, (else the advantages of their age are a reproach to them,) and why young people should attend on their instructions: it is good lodging with an old disciple, Acts xxii. 16. Tit. ii. 4.

Elihu's modesty appeared in the patient attention he gave to what his seniors said, v. 11, 12. He waited for their words, as one that expected much from them, agreeably to the opinion he had of these grave men. He gave ear to their reasons, that he might take them in, and fully understand what was the drift of their discourse, and what the force of their arguments; he attended to them with diligence and care; and this, (1.) Though they were slow, and took up a deal of time in searching out what to say; though they were often to seek for matter and words, paused and hesitated, and were unready at their work, yet he overlooked that, and gave ear to their reasons, which, if really convincing, he thought would not be less attended to by the listeners, and the success of the delivery of them. (2.) Though they trilled and made nothing of it, though none of them answered Job's words, nor said what was proper to convince him, yet he attended to them, in hopes they would bring it to some head at last. We must often be willing to hear what we do not like, else we cannot prove all things. His patient attendance on their discourses he pleads, [1.] As that which entitled him to credit in his turn, and empowered him to require their attention. [2.] As that which enabled him to pass a judgment upon what they had said: he had observed what they aimed at, and therefore knew what to say to it. Let us be thoroughly apprized of the sentiments of our brethren, before we censure them; for he that answers a matter before he hears it, or when he has heard it only by halves, it is folly and shame to him, and bespeaks him both impertinent and imperious.

11. He appears to have been a man of great sense and courage, and one that knew as well what and how to refute as well as to keep silence. Though he had so much respect to his friends, as not to interrupt them with his speaking, yet he had so much regard to truth and justice, (his better friends,) as not to betray them by his silence. He boldly pleads,

1. That man is a rational creature, and therefore that every man has for himself a judgment of discretion, and ought to be allowed a liberty of speech in his own cause. (Job i. xii. 3.) But I have understanding as well as you, when he says, (v. 8.) But there is a spirit in man; only he expresses it a little more modestly, that one man has understanding as well as another, and no man can pretend to have the monopoly of reason, or to engross all the trade of it. Had he meant, I have revelation as well as you, (as some understand it,) he must have proved it; but if he meant only, I have reason as well as you, they cannot deny it, for this is every man's honour, and it is no presumption to claim it, nor could they gainsay his inference from it; (v. 10.) Therefore hearken to me. Learn here, (1.) That the soul is a spirit, neither material itself, nor dependant upon matter, but capable of conversing with things spiritual, which are not the objects of sense. (2.) It is an understanding spirit. It is able to discover and receive truth, to discourse and reason upon it, and to direct and rule accordingly. (3.) This understanding spirit is in every man. (v. 11.) Even the most learned, John i. 9. (4.) It is the inspiration of the Almighty, that gives us this understanding spirit; for he is the Father of spirits, and Fountain of understanding. See Gen. ii. 7. 1 En. xii. 7. Zech. xii. 1.

2. That those who are advanced above others in grandeur and gravity, do not always proportionably go beyond them in knowledge and wisdom; (v. 9.) Great men are not always wise: it is pity but they were, for if they would never be content with their greatness, and would do so much the more good with their wisdom. Men should be preferred for their wisdom, and those that are in honour and power, have most need of wisdom, and have the greatest opportunity of improving in it; and yet it does not follow that great men are always wise, and therefore it is folly to subscribe to the dictates of any with an implicit faith. The aged do not always understand judgment, even they may be mistaken, and therefore must not expect to bring every thought into obedience to them; nay, therefore they must not take it as an affront to be contradicted, but rather take it as a kindness to be instructed, by their juniors: Therefore I said, Hearken to me, v. 10. We must be willing to hear reason from those that are very way inferior to us, and to yield to it. He that has a good eye can see further upon upper ground, than he that is purblind can from the top of the highest mountain. Better is a poor and wise child than an old and foolish king. Eccl. iv. 13.

3. That it was requisite for something to be said, for the setting of this controversy in a true light, which, by all that had hitherto been said, was but rendered more intricate and perplexed; (v. 13.) "I must speak, lest you should say, We have found out wisdom, lest you should think your argument against Job conclusive and irrefragable, and that Job cannot be convinced and humbled by any other argument than this of yours, that God casteth him down, and not man, that it appears by his extraordinary afflictions, that God is his Enemy, and therefore he is certainly a wicked man; I must show you that this is a false hypothesis, and that Job may be convinced without maintaining it." Or, "Lest you should think you have found out the wisest way, to reason no more with him, but leave it to God to thrust him down." It is time to speak, when we hear errors advanced and disputed for, especially under pretence of supporting the cause of God with them. It is time to speak, when God's judgments are vouched for the patronizing of men's pride and passion, and their unjust, uncharitable, censures of their brethren; then we must speak on God's behalf.

4. That he had something new to offer, and would endeavour to manage the dispute in a better manner than it had hitherto been managed, v. 14. He thinks he may expect a favourable hearing; for, (1.) He will not reply to Job's protestations of his integrity, but allude to the truth of it, to obtain the approbation of the impartial. He hath not directed his words against me; I have nothing to say against the main of his discourse, nor do I differ from his principles. I have only a gentle reproof to give him for his passionate expressions. (2.) He will not repeat their arguments, nor go upon their principles; Neither will I answer him with your speeches: not with the same matter; should I only say what has been said, I might justly be silenced as impertinent; nor in the same manner; I will not be guilty of that peevishness toward him myself, which I dislike in you. The controversy that has already been fully handled, a wise man will let alone, unless he can amend and improve what has been done; why should he actum agere—do that which has been done already?

15. They were amazed; they answered no more; they left off speaking. 16. When I had waited, (for they spake not, but stood still, and answered no more,) v. 15. I said, I will answer also my part; I also will show mine opinion. 18. For I am full of matter; the spirit within me constraineth me. 19. Behold, my belly is as wine which hath no vent; it is ready to burst like new bottles. 20. I will speak, that I may be refreshed: I will open my lips, and answer. 21. Let me not, I pray you, accept any man's person; neither let me give flattering titles unto man. 22. For I know not to give flattering titles; in so doing my Maker would soon take me away.

Three things here apologize for Elihu's interposing as he does in this controversy, which had already been canvassed by such acute and learned disputants.

1. That the stage was clear, and he did not break in upon any of the managers on either side; (v. 15.) They were amazed, v. 16. They stood still, and answered no more. They not only left off speaking themselves, but they stood still, to hear if any of the company would speak their minds, so that (as we say,) he had room and fair play given him. They seemed not fully satisfied them selves with what they had said, else they would have adjourned the court, and not have stood still, expecting what might further be offered. And therefore I said, (v. 17.) I will answer also my part. I cannot pretend to give a definitive sentence; no, the judgment is the Lord's, and by him it must be determined who is in the right, and who is in the wrong; but, since you have each of you shown your opinion, I also will show mine, and let it take its fate with the rest. When what is offered, even by the meanest, is offered thus modestly, it is pity but it should be fairly heard and considered.
I see no inconvenience in supposing that Elihu here himself to be the penman of this book; and that he is to be regarded as an historian, relating the fact, that, after he had bespoken the attention in the foregoing verses, they were amazed, they left off whispering among themselves, did not gainsay the liberty of speech he desired, but stood still to hear what he would say, being much surprized at the admirable mixture of boldness and modesty that appeared in his preface.

2. That he was uneasy, and even in pain, to be delivered of his thoughts upon this matter. They must give him leave to speak, for he cannot forego, while he is musing, the fire burns, (Ps. xxxix. 2.) shut up in his bones, as the prophet speaks, Jer. xx. 9. He longed to deliver his mind concerning Job’s case, v. 18-20. If any of the disputants would have hit that which he thought the right joint, he would contentedly have been silent; but, when he thought they all missed it, he was eager to try his hand at it. He pleads, (1.) That he had a great deal to say; "I am full of matter; having made my remarks upon all that has hitherto been said." When aged men are drawn dry, and have spent their stock, in discerning of the Divine Providence, God can raise up others, even young men, and fill them with matter, for the edifying of his church, for it is a subject that can never be exhausted, though they that speak to it may. (2.) That he was under a necessity of saying it, "The Spirit within me not only instructs me what to say, but puts me on to say it; so that I have not vent, (Such a ferment are my thoughts in,) I shall burst like bottles of new wine, when it is working," v. 19. See what a great grief it is to a good minister to be silenced, and thrust into a corner; he is full of matter, full of Christ, full of heaven, and would speak of these things for the good of others, but he may not. (3.) That it would be an ease and satisfaction to himself, to deliver his mind; (v. 20.) I will speak, that I may be relieved; not only that I may be eased of the pain of stifling it, but that I may have the pleasure of endeavouring, according to my place and capacity, to do good. It is a great refreshment to a good man, to have liberty to speak for the glory of God and the edification of others.

3. That he was resolved to speak, with all possible freedom and sincerity, what he thought was true, not what he thought would please; (v. 21, 22.) "Let me not accept any man’s person, as partial judgements do their masters; nor do I need to be justified; I am resolved to flatter no man." He would not speak otherwise than he thought, either, (1.) In compassion to Job, because he was poor and in affliction; would not make his case better than he really took it to be, for fear of increasing his grief; "But, let him bear it as he can, he shall be told the truth." Those that are in affliction must not be flattered, but dealt faithfully with; when trouble is upon any, it is foolish pity to suffer sin upon them. (2.) In the name of God, who is that, and that can be to their trouble. Thou shalt not countenance, any more than discountenance, a poor man in his case, (Exod. xxiii. 3.) nor regard a sad look any more than a big look, as, for the sake of it, to pervert justice, for that is accepting persons. Or,(2.) In compliment to Job’s friends, because they were in prosperity and reputation. "Let him not expect that I shall say as they have said, any further than I was taught; but as I have said, and have explained their dictates for the sake of their dignities." No, though Elihu is a young man, and upon his prefixment, he will not disseem his thought, to count the favour of great men: it is a good resolution he has taken up, "I know not to give flattering titles to men; I never used myself to that language;" and it is a good reason he gives for that resolution; "In so doing my Maker would soon take me away." It is good to keep ourselves in awe with a holy fear of God’s judgments: he that made us will take us away in his wrath, if we do not conduct ourselves as we should. He has all things in his hand and disposal, and will soon put lying lips to silence, and cut off flattering lips, Ps. xii. 3. The more closely we eye the majesty of God, as our Maker, and the more we dread his wrath and justice, the less danger shall we be in of a sinful flattering, or flattering of men.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Pompous prefaces, like the teeming mountain, often introduce poor performances: but Elihu’s discourse here does not disappoint the expectations which his preface had raised: it is pithy, both spiritual, and lively, and very much to the purpose. He had, in the foregoing chapter, said what he had to say to Job’s three friends; and now he comes up close to Job himself, and directs his speech to him. I. He bespeaks Job’s favourable acceptance of what he should say, and desires he would take him for that person whom he had so often wished for, that would plead with him, and receive his plea on God’s behalf, v. 1-7. II. He does, in God’s name, bring an action against him, for words, which have been spoken of Job, of violent reflecting upon God as dealing hardly with him, v. 8-11. III. He endeavours to convince him of his fault and folly herein, by showing him, 1. God’s sovereign dominion over man, v. 12-15. 2. The care God takes of man, and all the various ways and means he uses to do his soul good, which we have reason to think he designs, when he lays bodily afflictions upon him, v. 14. (1.) Job had sometimes complained of unquiet dreams, ch. xii. 14. "God," says Elihu, "sometimes speaks conversion and instruction to men by such dreams," v. 15-18. (2.) Job had especially complained of his sicknesses and pains; and as to these, he shows largely, that they were far from being tokens of God’s wrath, as Job took them, or evidences of Job’s hypocrisy, as his friends took them, that they were really wise and gracious methods, which divine grace took for the increase of his acquaintance with God, to work patience, experience, and hope, v. 19-30. And, lastly, he concludes with a request to Job, either to answer him, or give him leave to go on, v. 31-38.

1. Wherefore, Job, I pray thee, hear my speeches, and hearken to all my words. 2. Behold, now I have opened my mouth, my tongue hath spoken in my mouth. 3. My words shall be of the uprightness of my heart; and my lips shall utter knowledge clearly. 4. The Spirit of God hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath given me life. 5. If thou canst answer me, set thy words in order before me, stand up; 6. Behold, I am according to thy wish in God’s stead; I also am formed out of the clay. 7. Behold, my terror shall not make thee afraid, neither shall my hand be heavy upon thee. Several arguments Elihu here uses, to persuade Job to give him a patient hearing, to believe that he designed him a good office, and to take it kindly, and be willing to receive the instructions he was now about to give him. Let Job consider, 1. That Elihu does not join with his three friends against him: he has, in the foregoing chapter, declared his dislike of their proceedings, disclaimed their hypothesis, and quite set aside the method they took, or the form in which they handled the case, he thee, hear my speech, v. 1. They all spake in the same strain; but I am trying a new way, therefore hearken to all my words, and not to some of them only; for we cannot judge of a discourse unless we take it entire, and hearken to it all. 2. That he intended to make a solemn busines:} of it, not to put in a word by the by, or give a short repartee, to show his wit; after a long silence, he opened speech, (v. 2.) with a declaration and design; upon mature consideration, he had already begun to speak, and was prepared to go on, if Job would encourage him by his attention.
3. That he was resolved to speak as he thought, and not otherwise; (v. 3.) "My words shall be of the uprightness of my heart, the genuine product of my convictions and sentiments." There was reason to suspect that Job's three friends did not think, in the same consciousness, that Job had done what he had; in their discourses, merely for the support of their hypothesis, represented him to be; and that was not fair. It is a base thing to condemn those with our tongues, to serve a turn, whom, at the same time, we cannot but in our consciences think well of: Elihu is an honest man, and scorns to do so.
4. That what he said should be easy, and not dark and hard to be understood; My lips shall utter knowledge clearly. Job shall readily take his meaning, and perceive what he aims at. Those that speak of the things of God, should carefully avoid all obscurity and perplexedness, both of notion and expression, and speak as plainly and clearly as they can; for by that it will appear that they do themsehls understand what they speak of, that they mean honestly, and design the edification of those they speak to.
5. That he would, in his discourse, make the best use he could of the reason and understanding God had given him, that life, that rational soul which he received from the Spirit of God and the breath of the Almighty, v. 4. He owns himself unfit to enter into the lists with his seniors, yet he desires they will not spite his youth, for that he is God's workmanship as well as they, made by the same hand, endowed with the same noble powers and faculties, and designed for the same great end; and therefore why may not the God that made him, make use of him as an instrument of good to Job? With this consideration also we should quicken ourselves (and perhaps Elihu made that use of it) to do good in our places, according to our capacity; God has made us, and given us life, and therefore we should study to use our life to some good purpose, to spend it in glorifying God, and serving our generation according to his will,
that we may answer the end of our creation, and it may not be said that we were made in vain.
6. That he would be very willing to hear what Job should say against what he had to say; (v. 5.)
"If thou causest, answer me. If thou hast so much spirit and spirit left thee, and art not quite spent with the distemper, set thy words in order, and they shall have their due consideration." Those that can speak reason, will hear reason.
7. That he had often wished for one that would appear for God, with whom he might freely exposu-ete, and to whom, as arbitrator, he might refer that matter, and such a one Elihu would be; (v. 6.)
I am, or will, in God's stead. How pathetically had Job wished, (ch. xvi. 21.) Oh that one might plead for a man with God! and (ch. xxiii. 3.) Oh that I knew where I might find him! Only he would make it his bargain, that his dreads should not maketheafraid, ch. xiii. 21. "Now," says Elihu,
"look upon me, this once, as in God's stead; I will undertake to plead his cause with thee, and to show thee therein thou hast afflicted him, and what he hath done is not what he had to say; thou hast to make to God, make them to me."
8. That he was not an unequal match for him;
"I also am formed out of the clay. I also, as well as the first man, (Gen. ii. 7.) I also as well as thou.
Job had urged this with God, as a reason why he should not hear hard upon him; (ch. x. 9.) Remember that thou hast made me as the clay; "I," says Elihu, "am formed out of the clay, as well as they," formed of the same clay, so some read it. It is good for all to consider that we are formed out of the clay; and well for us it is, that those who are to us in God's stead, are so; that he speaks to us by men like ourselves, according to Israel's wish, upon a full trial, Deut. v. 24. God has wisely deposited the treasure in earthen vessels like ourselves, 2 Cor. iv. 7.
Lastly, That he would have no reason to be frightened at the assault he made upon him; (v. 7.)
"My words shall not make thee afraid," (1.) "As thy friends have done with their arguments, I will not proach thee as they have done, nor draw up such a heavy charge against thee. Nor," (2.) "As God would do, if he should appear to reason with thee. I stand upon the same level with thee, and am made of the same mould, and therefore cannot impress that terror upon thee, which thou mayest justly dread from the appearance of the Divine Majesty." If we would rightly convince men, it must be by reason, not by terror; by fair arguing, not by a heavy hand.

3. Surely thou hast spoken in my hearing, and I have heard the voice of thy words, saying, 9. I am clean without transgression, I am innocent; neither is there iniquity in me. 10. Behold, he findeth occasions against me, he counteth me for his enemy; 11. He putteth my feet in the stocks, he marketh all my paths. 12. Behold, in this thou art not just: I will answer thee, that God is greater than man. 13. Why dost thou strive against him? for he giveth not account of any of his matters.

In these verses,
I. Elihu particularly charges Job with some indecent expressions that had dropped from him, reflecting upon the justice and goodness of God in his dealings with him. He does not ground the charge upon report, but was himself an ear-witness of what he here reproves him for; (v. 8.) "Thou hast skown it in my hearing, and in the hearing of all this company." He had it not at second-hand; if so, he would have hoped it had not been so bad as it was reported. He did not hear it from Job in private conversation, then he would not have been so ill-breasted as to repeat it thus publicly;
but Job had said it openly, and therefore it was fit he should be openly reproved for it. Them that sin before all, rebuke before all. When we hear any thing said, that tends to God's dishonour, we ought publicly to bear our testimony against it. What is said amiss in our hearing, we are concerned to reprove; for ye are our witnesses, saith the Lord, to confront the unrighteous with their hinderer.
1. Job had represented himself as innocent; (v.
9.) Thou hast said, I am clean without transgression; Job had not said this totidem verbis—in so many words; nay, he had owned himself to have sinned, and to be impure before God; but he had indeed said, Thou knowest that I am not wicked:
My righteousness I hold fast, and the like, on which Elihu might ground this charge. It was true, that Job was not so bad as he said, the like and another, to have as a mark the same as his friends had represented him; but he ought not to have insisted so much upon it, if God had therefore done him wrong in afflicting him.
Yet, it should seem, Elihu did not deal fairly in charging Job with saying that he was clean and inocent from all transgression, when he only plead ed, that he was upright and innocent from the great transgression. But those that speak passionately and unwarily, must thank themselves if they be misunderstood; they should have taken more care.

2. He had represented God as severe in marking what he did amiss, and taking all advantages against him, (v. 10, 11,) as if he sought opportunity to pick quarrels with him. He findeth occasions against me; which supposes seeking them; to this purport Job adds, He findeth no fault watch over my sin? He counteth me for his enemy. So he had expressly said, (ch. xiii. 24.—xix. 11,) "He putteth my feet in the stocks; that, as I cannot contend with him, so I may not be able to flee from him." This he had said, ch. xiii. 27.; where also we meet with these words, Thou lookest narrowly unto all my ways.

II. He endeavours to convince him that he had spoken amiss in speaking thus, and that he ought to humble himself before God for it, and by repentance to unsay it; (v. 12.) Behold, in this thou art not just. Here thou art not in the right, so some read it. See the difference between the charge which Elihu exhibited against Job, and that which was preferred against him by his other friends; they would not own that he was just at all, but Elihu only says, "In this, in saying this, thou art not just." 1. Thou dost not deal justly with God." To this Job, it is true, replies, Thou dost not render God his due, nor are we just to him, if we do not acknowledge his equity and kindness in all the dispensations of his providence towards us; that he is righteous in all his ways, and that, however it be, yet he is good. 2. "Thou dost not speak the language of a righteous man; I do not deny but thou art such a one, but in this thou dost not make it to appear." Many that are just, yet, in some particulars, instances, do not speak and act like themselves; and as, on the one hand, we must not fail to tell even a good man wherein he mistakes and does amiss, nor flatter him in his errors and passions, for in that we are not kind; so, on the other hand, we must not draw men's characters, nor pass a judgment on them, from one instance, or some few misplaced words, for in that we are not just. In many things we all offend, and therefore must be candid in our censures.

Thus far Elihu proposes to Job's consideration, to convince him that he had said amiss.

(1.) That God is infinitely above us, and therefore it is madness to contend with him; for if he plead against us with his great power, we cannot stand before him. I will answer thee, says Elihu, in one word, which carries its own evidence along with it, That God is greater than man; no doubt he is infinitely greater. Between God and man there is no proportion. Job had himself said a great deal, and admirably well, concerning the greatness of God, his irresistible power and incontestable sovereignty, his terrible majesty and unsearchable immensity. "Now," said Elihu, "do but consider what thou thyself hast said concerning the greatness of God, and apply it to thyself; if he is greater than man, he is greater than thou, and thou wilt see reason enough to repent of these ill-natured, ill-favoured, reflections upon him, and to blush at thy folly, and the utter folly of thy presumption." Note, There is enough in this one passage, which is most plain and intelligible, That God is greater than man, if duly improved, for ever to put to silence and to shame all our complaints of his providence, and our exceptions against his dealings with us. He is not only more wise and powerful than we are, and therefore it is to no purpose to contend with him, who will be too hard for us, but more holy, just, and good, for these are the transcendent glories and excellencies of the divine nature; in these, God is greater than man, and therefore it is absurd and unreasonable to find fault with him, for he is certainly in the right.

(2.) That God is not accountable to us; (v. 13.) Why dost thou strive against him? Those that complain of God, strive against him, implead him, impeach him, bring an action against him. And why do they do so? For what cause? To what purpose? Note, It is an unreasonable thing for us, weak, foolish, and frail creatures, to strive with a God of infinite wisdom, power, and goodness. Woe to the clay that strives with the Potter; for he gives not account of any of his matters. He is under no obligation to show us a reason for what he does; neither to tell us what he designs to do, in what method, at what time, by what instruments; nor to tell us why he deals thus with us. He is not bound either to justify his own proceedings, or to satisfy our demands and inquiries; his judgments will certainly justify themselves, if we do not satisfy ourselves in them, it is our own fault. This is therefore daring insanity for us to arraign God at our bar, or challenge him to show cause for what he doeth, to say unto him, What dost thou? or, Why dost thou so? He gives not account of all his matters; so some read it. He reveals as much as it is fit for us to know, as follows here, v. 14. But still there are secret things, which belong not to us, which it is not for us to pry into.

14. For God speaketh once, yea, twice yet man perceiveth it not. 15. In a dream, in a vision of the night, when deep sleep falleth upon men, in slumberings upon the bed, 16. Then he openeth the ears of men, and sealeth their instruction, 17. That he may withdraw man from his purpose, and hide pride from man. 18. He keepest back his soul from the pit, and his life from perishing by the sword.

Job had complained, that God kept him wholly in the dark concerning the meaning of his dealings with him; and therefore concluded he dealt with him as his enemy. "No," says Elihu, "he speaks to you, but you do not perceive him; so that the fault is yours, not his; he is designing your real good, even in those proceedings which you put this harsh construction upon. Observe in general, v. 15.

1. What a friend God is to our welfare: He speaketh to us once, yea, twice. It is a token of his favour, that, notwithstanding the distance and quarrel between us and him, yet he is pleased to speak to us. It is an evidence of his gracious design, that he is pleased to speak to us of our own concerns, to show us what is our duty, what our interest, what he requires of us, and what we may expect from him; to tell us of our faults, and warn us of our danger; to show us the way, and to lead us in it. This he does once, yea, twice, that is, again and again; when one warning is neglected, he gives another, not willing that any should perish. Precept must be upon precept, and line upon line; it is so, that sinners may be left inexcusable.

2. What enemies we are to our own welfare; Man perceiveth it not, that is, he does not heed it or regard it; he does not understand it; it is not aware that it is the voice of God, nor does he receive the things revealed, for they are foolishness to him; he stops his ear, stands in his own light, rejects the counsel of God against himself, and so is never the wiser, no not for the dictates of wisdom itself.

God speaks to us by conscience, by providences, and by ministers; of all which Elihu here discourses at large, to show Job that God was both telling him his mind, and doing him a kindness, even now that he seemed to keep him in the dark, and so treat him as a stranger, and to keep him in distress, and so treat him as an enemy. There was not then, that we know of, any divine revelation in writing, and therefore that is not here mentioned among the ways by which God speaks to men, though now it is the principal way. In these verses, he shows how God teaches and admonishes the children of men by their own consciences.

1. The proper season and opportunity for these admonitions; (v. 15.) In a dream, in slumberings upon the bed, when men are retired from the world, and the business and conversation of it; it is a good time for them to retire into their own hearts, and commence with them, when they are upon their beds, solitary and still, Ps. iv. 4. It is the time God takes for dealing personally with men. 1. When he sent angels, extraordinary messengers, on his errands, he commonly gave them the delivery of them; when, by deep sleep falling on men, the bodily senses were all locked up, and the mind more free to receive the immediate communications of divine light. Thus he made his mind known to the prophets by visions and dreams; (Num. xii. 6.) thus he warned Abimelech, (Gen. xx. 3.) Laban, (Gen. xxxi. 24.) Joseph, Matth. i. 20. Thus he made known to Pharaoh, and Nebuchadnezzar, things that should come to pass hereafter. When he stirred up conscience, that ordinary deputy of his, in the soul, to do its office, he took that opportunity, either when deep sleep fell on men, for though dreams mostly come from fancy, some may come from conscience: or, in slumberings, when men are between sleeping and waking, reflecting at night upon the business of the foregoing day, or projecting in the morning the business of the ensuing day, then is a proper time for their hearts to proach them for what they have done ill, and to admonish them what they should do. See Isa. xxv. 20.

II. The power and force with which those admonitions come, v. 16. When God designs men’s good, by the convictions and dictates of their own consciences, 1. He gives them admission, and makes them to be heeded; Then he opens the ears of men, which were before shut against the voice of this charmer, Ps. lvi. 5. He opens the heart, as he opened Lydia’s, and so opens the ears. He takes away that which stopped the ear, so that the conviction finds, or forces, its way; nay, he works in the soul a submission to the regimen of conscience, and a compliance with its rules, for that follows upon God’s opening the ear; (Isa. l. 5.) God has opened mine ear, and I was not rebellious. 2. He gives them a settlement, and makes them to abide; He sealèth their instruction, that is, the instruction that is designed for them, and is suited to them; this he makes their souls to receive the deep and lasting impressions of, as the wax of the seal. When the heart is delivered into divine instructions, as into a mould, then the work is done.

III. The end and design of these admonitions that are sent.

1. To keep men from sin, and particularly the sin of pride; (v. 17.) That he may withdraw man from his purpose, that is, from his evil purposes, may change the temper of his mind, and the course of his life, hinder his inclinaion and inclination, or prevent some particular sin he is in danger of falling into: that he may withdraw man from his work, may make him leave off man’s work, which is working for the world and the flesh, and may set him to work the work of God. Many a man has been stopped in the full career of a sinful pursuit by the sensable checks of his own conscience, saying Do not this abominable thing which the Lord hates. Particularly, God does, by this means, hide pride from man, that is, hide those things from him which are the matter of his pride, and take his mind off from dwelling upon them, by setting before him what reason he has to be humble. That he may take away pride from man, so some read it; that he may pluck up that root of bitterness which is the cause of so much sin. All those whom God has never shown a store for he will humble, and hide pride from. Pride makes people eager to extend their labors in the prosecution of their purposes; they will have their way, therefore God withdraws them from their purposes, by mortifying their pride.

2. To keep men from ruin, v. 18. While sinners are pursuing their evil purposes and indulging their pride, their souls are hastening apace to the pit, to the sword, to destruction, both in this world and that to come: but when God, by the admonitions of conscience, withdraws them from sin, he also keeps back their souls from the pit, from the bottomless pit, and saves them from perishing by the sword of divine vengeance, so iniquity shall not be their ruin. That which turns men from sin, saves them from hell, saves a soul from death, James v. 20. See what a mercy it is to be under the restraints of an awakened conscience; faithful are the wounds, and kind are the bonds, of that friend, for the soul is kept from perishing eternally.

19. He is chastened also with pain upon his bed, and the multitude of his bones with strong pain: 20. So that his life abhorreth bread, and his soul dainty meat. 21. His flesh is consumed away, that it cannot be seen; and his bones that were not seen stick out. 22. His soul draweth near unto the grave, and his life to the destroyers. 23. If there be a messenger with him, an interpreter, one among a thousand, to shew unto man his uprightness; 24. Then he is gracious unto him, and saith, Deliver him from going down to the pit; I have found a ransom. 25. His flesh shall be fresher than a child’s: he shall return to the days of his youth: 26. He shall pray unto God, and he will be favourable unto him; and he shall see his face with joy: for he will render unto man his righteousness.

27. He looketh upon men; and if any say, I have sinned, and perverted that which was right, and it profited me not; 28. He will deliver his soul from going into the pit, and his life shall see the light.

God has spoken once to sinners by their own consciences, to keep them from the paths of the destroyer, but they perceive it not; they are not aware that the checks their own hearts give them, in a sinful way, are from God, but they are imputed to melancholy, or the preciosity of their education; and therefore God purpures twice; he speaks a second time, and tries another way to convince and reclaim sinners, that is, by providences, anfliative and merciful, (in which he speaks twice;) and by the sensible instructions of good ministers setting in with them. Job complained much of his diseases, and judged by them that God was angry with him; his friends did so too; but Elihu shows they were all mistaken, for God often afflicts the body in love, and while he has gracious designs of good to the soul, as appears in the issue which here: is brought to. This part of Elihu’s discourse will be of great use to us for the due improvement of sickness, in and by which God speaks to men. Here is,

1. The patient described in his extremity. See what work sickness makes, (v. 19, &c.) when God sends it with commission. Do this, and it doeth it. He has pity upon him, p. 39. (v. 19.) He is chastened with pain upon his bed, such pain as confines him to his bed; or, so extreme the pain is, that he can get no ease, no, not on his bed where he would repose himself. Pain and sickness will turn a bed of down into a bed of thorns, on which he that used to sleep now tosses to and fro till the dawning of the day. The case, as here put, is very bad; pain is more hardly borne than sickness, and with that the patient here is chastened; not a dull heart, but a strong, and a strong and acute; and, frequently the stronger the patient, the stronger the pain, for the more sanguine the complexion is, the more violent, commonly, the disease is. It is not thesmarting of the flesh that is complained of, but the aching of the bones. It is an inward rooted pain; and not only the bones of one limb, but the multitude of the bones, are thus chastened. See what frail, what vile, bodies we have, which, though receiving near to a sacrament, the use of which is banished from them within themselves: see what work sin makes, what mischief it does. Pain is the fruit of sin; yet, by the grace of God, the pain of the body is often made a means of good to the soul.

2. He has quite lost his appetite, the common effect of sickness; (v. 20.) His life abhorreth bread, the most necessary food, and dainty meat, which he most delighted in, and formerly relished with a great deal of pleasure. This is a good reason why we should not be desirous of dainties, because they are deceitful meat, Prov. xxiii. 3. We may be soon made sad as sick of them as we are now fond of them; and those who live in luxury when they are well, if everthey come, by reason of sickness, to loathe dainty meat, may, with grief and shame, read their sin in their punishment. Let us not inordinately love the taste of meat, for the time may come when we may even loathe the sight of meat, Ps. cvi. 18.

3. He becomes a perfect skeleton, nothing but skin and bones, v. 21. By sickness, perhaps a few days’ sickness, his flesh, which was fat, and fair, is consumed away, that it cannot be seen: it is strangely wasted and gone, and his bones, which were buried in flesh, now stick out; you may count his ribs, may tell all his bones. The soul that is well-nourished with the bread of life, sickness will not make lean, but it soon makes a change in the body.

He who, before, had such a beneficent air, And, powder’d with his case, seemed plump and fair, Both all his friends (amazing change!) surprise, With pale lean cheeks, and ghastly hollow eyes; So thin a bone, a hooded vulture, is this, Which lay before, in flesh and fat, unseen.

—Sir R. Blackmore.

4. He is given up for gone, and his life despaired of; (v. 22.) His soul draws near to the grave, that is, he has all the symptoms of death upon him, and, in the apprehension of all about him, as well as in his own, he is a dying man. The pangs of death, here called the death-vision, are the death-vision ready to seize him; they compass him about, Ps. cxvi. 3. Perhaps it intimates the very dreadful apprehensions which those have of death as a destroying thing, when it stares them in the face, who, when it was at a distance, made light of it. All agree, when it comes to the point, whatever they thought of it before, that it is a serious thing to die.

II. The provision made for his instruction, in order to the use of his affliction, that, when God in that way speaks to man, he may be heard and understood, and not speak in vain, v. 23. He is happy, if there be a messenger with him to attend him in his sickness, to convince, counsel and comfort, him, an interpreter to expound the providence, and give him to understand the meaning of it, a man of wisdom that knows the voice of the rod and its interpretation; for, when God speaks by afflictions, we are, frequently, so immersed in the language, that we have need of an interpreter; and it is well if we have advice and help of a good minister who are as needful and incomparable, and should be as acceptable, in sickness, as of a good physician, especially if he be well-skilled in the art of explaining and improving providences; he is then one of a thousand, and to be valued accordingly: his business, at such a time, is, to show unto man his uprightness, that is, God’s uprightness, that in faithfulness he afflicts him, and does him no wrong; which it is necessary to be convinced of, in order to our making a due improvement of the affliction: or rather, it may mean man’s uprightness, or rectitude: 1. The uprightness that is. If it appear that the sick person is truly pious, the interpreter will not do as Job’s friends had done, make it his business to prove him a hypocrite, because he is afflicted; but, on the contrary, will show him his uprightness, notwithstanding his afflictions, that he may take the comfort of it, and be justified, which is far better. This is the reformation, that should be, in order to life and peace. When men are made to see the way of uprightness to be the only way, and a sure way, to salvation, and to choose it, and walk in it accordingly, the work is done.

III. God’s gracious acceptance of him, upon his repentance, v. 24. When he sees that the sick person is indeed convinced that sincere repentance, and that uplifted perfection, which is in its im-looking as well as duty, then He that is to be gracious, and shows mercy, upon the first indication of true repentance, is gracious unto him, and takes him into his favour and thoughts for good. Wherever God finds a gracious heart, he will be found a gracious God; and, 1. He will give a gracious order for his discharge. He says, Deliver him, that is, Let him be delivered from going down to the pit, from that death which is the wages of sin. When afflictions have done their worst, they shall be removed. When we return to God in a way of duty, he will return to us in a way of mercy. These shall be delivered from going down to the pit, who receive God’s messengers, and rightly understand his interpreters, so as to subscribe to his uprightness. 2. He will give a gracious reason for this order, I have found a ransom, or propitiation; Jesus Christ is that Ransom, so Edith calls him, as Job had called him his Redeemer, for he is both the Purchaser and the Price, the Priest and the Sacrifice; so high was the value put upon souls, that nothing less would redeem them, and so great the injury done by sin, that nothing less would atone for it, than the blood of the Son of God, who gave his life a ransom for many. This is a ransom of God’s finding, a contrivance of Infinite Wisdom; we could never have found it ourselves, and the angels themselves knew not, which is gospel; it is the wisdom of God in a mystery, the hidden wisdom; and such an invention as is, and will be, the ever lasting wonder of those principalities and powers that desire to look into it. Observe how God glories in the invention here, ὅλος, ὅλος— I have found, I have found, the Ransom, I, even I, am he that has done it.

IV. The recovery of the sick man, hereupon. The away the cause and the effect will cease. When the sickness becomes a pestilent, see what blessed change follows.

1. His body recovers its health, v. 25. This is not always the consequence of a sick man’s repentance and return to God, but sometimes it is; and recovery from sickness is then a mercy indeed, when it arises from the remission of sin; then it is in love to the soul, that the body is delivered from the pitt of corruption, when God casteth our sins behind his back, Isa. xxxviii. 17. That is the method of a blessed recovery; Son, be of good cheer, thy sins be forgiven thee; and then, Rise, take up thy bed, and walk, Matthew xii. 14. So when they were hid in the Ransomed, and then his flesh shall be furrther than a child's, and there shall be no remains of his distemper, but he shall return to the days of his youth, to the beauty and strength which he had then; when the distemper that oppressed nature is removed, how strangely does nature help itself, in which the power and goodness of the God of nature must be thankfully acknowledged! By such merciful providences as these, which afflictions give occasion for, God speaketh once, yes twice, to the children of men, letting them know (if they would but perceive it) their dependence upon him, and his tender compassion of them.

2. His soul recovers in peace, v. 26. (1.) The patient, being a penitent, is a suppliant, and has learned to pray; he knows God will be sought unto for his favours, and therefore he shall pray unto God, pray for pardon, pray for health. Is any afflicted, any sick? Let him pray. His prayers are acceptable, God will be favourable to him, and be well-pleased with him, his anger shall be turned away from him, and the light of God's countenance shall shine upon his soul; and then it follows, (3.) That he has the comfort of communication with God; he shall now see the face of God, and may have fellowship with him, and shall see it with joy, for what sight can be more reviving? See Gen. xxxiii. 10, As though I had seen the face of God. All true penitents rejoice more in the returns of God's favour, than in any instance whatsoever of prosperity or pleasure, Ps. iv. 6, 7. (4.) He has a blessed tranquillity of mind, arising from the sense of his justification before God, who will render unto this man his righteousness. He shall receive the atonement, that is, the reconciliation, shall be imputed to him, and peace, thereupon, spoken, the joy and gladness of which he shall then be made to hear, though he could not hear it in the day of his affliction. God will now deal with him as a righteous man, with whom it shall be well. He shall receive the blessing from the Lord, even righteousness, Ps. xxiv. 5. God shall give him grace to go and sin no more. Perhaps this may be the reformation of his life after his recovery. As he shall pray to God, whom before he had slighted, so he shall render to man his righteousness, whom before he had wronged, shall make restitution, and for the future do justly.

V. The general rule which God will go by in dealing with the children of men, inferred from this instance, v. 27, 28. As sick people, upon their subscription, are recovered, so all others that truly repent of their sins, shall find mercy with God. Shall a dead man rise? He shall rise out of death, shall be imputed to him; and, that is, he shall be in a state of life; he shall not be so to sin. Would we know the nature of sin, and the malignity of it? It is the perversion of that which is right; it is a most unjust, unreasonable, thing, it is the rebellion of the creature against the Creator, the usurped dominion of the flesh over the spirit, and a contradiction to the eternal rules and reasons of good and evil. It is perverting the right ways of the Lord; (Acts xiii. 10.) and therefore the ways of sin are called crooked ways, Ps. cxix. 5. Would we know what is to be got by sin? It is profaneth us not. The works of darkness are unfruitful works; when profit and loss come to be balanced, all the gains of sin, put them all together, will come far short of countervailing the damage. All true penitents are ready to own this; and it is a mortifying consideration, (Rom. vi. 21.) What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed? and why do we need to repent? Would we approve ourselves true penitents? We must then, with a broken and contrite heart, confess our sins to God, 1 John i. 9. We must confess the fact of sin, (I have sinned,) and not deny the charge, or stand upon our own justification: we must confess the fault of sin, the iniquity, the dishonesty of it; I have perverted that which was right: we must confess the folly of sin; So foolish have I been and ignorant, for I was not; and therefore what have I to do any more with it? Is there not good reason why we should make such a penitent confession as this? For, (1.) God expects it. He looks upon men, when they have sinned, to see what they will do next, whether they will go on in it, or whether they will bethink themselves, and return. He hearkens and hears whether any say, What have I done? Jer. viii. 6. He looks upon sinners with an eye of compassion, desiring to see their return for their own sakes; for God will destroy them in the rain. He looks upon them, and, as soon as he perceives these workings of repentance in them, he encourages them, and is ready to accept them, (Ps. xxxii. 5, 6.) as the father went forth to meet the returning prodigal. (2.) It will turn to our unspeakable advantage. The promise is general; If any humble themselves thus, whoever they are, [1.] They shall not come into condemnation, but be saved from the wrath to come; He shall deliver his soul from going into the pit, the pit of hell; insinuity shall not be his ruin. [2.] They shall be happy in everlasting life and joy; his life shall see the light, that is, all good, in the vision and fruition of God. To obtain this bliss, if the prophet had bid us do some great thing, would we not have done it? How much more, when he only says unto us, Wash and be clean; Confess and be pardoned, Repent and be saved?

29. Lo, all these things worketh God oftentimes with man, 30. To bring back his soul from the pit, to be enlightened with the light of the living. 31. Mark well; O Job, hearken unto me: hold thy peace, and I will speak. 32. If thou hast any thing to say, answer me: speak; for I desire to justify thee. 33. If not, hearken unto me: hold thy peace, and I shall teach thee wisdom.

We have here the conclusion of this first part of Elishu's discourse, in which:

1. He briefly sums up what he had said, showing that God's great and gracious design, in all the dispensations of his providence toward the children of men, is, to save them from being for ever miserable, and bring them to be for ever happy; v. 29, 30. All these things God is working with the children of men; he deals with them by conscience, by providences, by ministers, by mercies, by afflictions; he makes them sick, and makes them well again; all these are his operations; he has set the one over against the other. (Eccl. vii. 14.) but his hand is in all; it is he that performs all things for us. All providences are to be looked upon as God's workings with man, his dealings with him. He uses a variety of methods to do men good; if one affliction do not the work, he will try another; if neither do, he will try a mercy; and he will send a messenger to interpret both. He often works such things as these, twice, thrice; so it is in the original, referring to
r. 14. He speaks once, yeat twice; if that prevail not, he works twice, yea thrice; he changes his method, (Hee have piped, we have mourned,) returns again to the same method, repeats the same applications. Why does he take all this pains with man? It is to bring back his soul from the flit, v. 30. If God did not take much upon the care of this poor sinner, and himself, we were miserable; we would destroy ourselves, but he would have us saved, and devises means, by his grace, to undo that by which we were undoing ourselves. The former method, by dream and vision, was, to keep back the soul from the flit, (v. 18.) that is, to prevent sin, that we might not fall into it. This, by sickness and the word, is, to bring back the soul, to recover those that have fallen into sin, that they may not lie still and perish on it. What need is to all that holy repentance are brought back from the pit, it is, that they may be enlightened with the light of the living, that they may have present comfort and everlasting happiness. Whom God saves from sin and hell, which are darkness, he will bring to heaven, the inheritance of the saints in light; and this he aims at, in all his institutions, and all his dispensations. Lord, what is man, that thou shouldst thus visit him! This should enable us to comply with God's designs, to work with him for our own good, and not to counter-work him. This will render those that perish for ever inexcusable, that so much was done to save them, and they would not be healed.

2. He bespeaks Job's acceptance of what he had offered, and begs of him to mark it well, v. 51. What is intended for our good, challenges our regard. If Job will observe what is said, (1.) He is welcome to make what objections he can against it, (v. 32.) "If he must say any thing to myself, in thine own vindication, answer me; though I am fresh, and thou art spent, I will not run thee down with words; Speak, for I desire to justify thee, and am not as thy other friends, that desired to condemn thee." Elihu contends for truth, not, as they did, for victory. Note, those who reprove, we should desire to justify, and be glad to see them clear themselves from the imputations they lie under, and therefore give them all possible advantage and encouragement to do it. (2.) If he has nothing to say against what is said, Elihu lets him know that he has something more to say, which he desires him patiently to attend to, (v. 53.) Hold thy peace, and I will teach thee wisdom. Those that would both show wisdom and learn wisdom, must hearken and keep silence, be swift to hear and slow to speak. Job was wise and good; but those that are so, may yet be wiser and better, and must therefore set themselves to improve by the means of wisdom and grace.

CHAP. XXXIV.

Elihu, it is likely, paused a while, to see if Job had any thing to say against his discourse in the foregoing chapter; but he sitting silent, and, it is likely, intimating his desire that he would go on, he here proceeds. As He bespeaks not only the audience, but the assistance, of the company, v. 2.-4. II. He charges Job with some more indelict expressions that he had dropped from him, v. 5-8. He underlines to his readers the truth of what he had spoken amiss, by showing very fully, 1. God's incontestable justice, v. 10, 12, 17, 19, 23. 2. His sovereign dominion, v. 13, 15. 3. His almighty power, v. 4. His omniscience, v. 21, 22, 25. 5. His severity against sinners, v. 28. 6. His pardoning providence, v. 29, 50. IV. He teaches him what he should say, v. 31, 32. And then, lastly, he leaves the matter to Job's own conscience, and concludes with a sharp reproof of him, for his perverseness and discontent, v. 33, 37. All this Job not only bore patiently, but took kindly, because he saw that Elihu meant well; and whereas his other friends had accused him of that from which his own conscience acquitted him, Elihu charged him with that only for which, it is probable, his own heart, now upon the reflection, began to smite him.

1. FURTHERMORE, Elihu answered and said, 2. Hear my words, O ye wise men; and give ear unto me, ye that have knowledge: 3. For the ear trieth words, as the mouth tasteth meat. 4. Let us choose to us judgment: let us know among ourselves what is good. 5. For Job hath said, I am righteous: and God hath taken away my judgment. 6. Should I lie against my right? my wound is incurable without transgression. 7. What is like Job, who drinketh up scorning like water? 8. Which goeth in company with the workers of iniquity, and walketh with wicked men? 9. For he hath said, It profiteth a man nothing that he should delight himself with God.

Here,

I. Elihu humbly addresses himself to the auditors, and endeavours, like an orator, to gain their good will, and their favourable attention. 1. He calls them wise men, and men that had knowledge, v. 2. It is comfortable dealing with such as understand sense; I speak as to wise men, who can judge what I say, 1 Cor. x. 15. Elihu differed in opinion from them, and yet he calls them wise and knowing men. Peevish disputants think all fools that are not of their mind; but it is justice to those who are wise to acknowledge it, though our sentiments do not agree with theirs. 2. He appeals to their judgment, and therefore submits to their trial, v. 3. Then car of the judicious tries words, whatever is said be true or false, right or wrong, and he that speaks must stand the test of the intelligent. As we must prove all things we hear, so we must be willing that what we speak should be proved. 3. He takes them into partnership with him in the examination and discussion of this matter, v. 4. He does not pretend to be sole dictator, nor undertake to say what is just and good, and what is not, but he is willing to join with them in searching it out, and clarifies a consultation; "Let us agree to lay aside all animosities and feuds, all prejudices and affection of contradiction, and all stiffness in adhering to the opinion we have once espoused, and let us choose to ourselves judgment; let us fix right principles on which to proceed, and then take right methods for finding out truth; and let us know among ourselves, by comparing notes, and communicating our reasons, what is good and what is otherwise." Note, We are then likely to discern what is right, when we agree to assist one another in searching it out.

II. He warmly accuses Job for some passionate words which he had spoken, that reflected on the divine government, appealing to the house, whether he ought not to be called to the bar, and checked for them.

1. He recites the words which Job had spoken, as near as he can remember. (1.) He had insisted upon his own innocency: Job hath charged God with injustice, (v. 5.) and, when urged to confess his guilt, has stiffly maintained his plea of Not guilty. Should I lie against my right? v. 6. Job had spoken to this purport; (ch. xxvii. 6.) My righteousness I hold fast. (2.) He had charged God with injustice in his dealings with him, that he had wronged him in afflicting him, and had not righted him; God had taken away my judgment; so Job had said, ch.
JOB, XXXIV.

xxvii. 2. (3.) He had despaired of relief, and concluded that God could not, or would not, help him; My wound is incurable, and likely to be mortal, and yet without transgression; not for any injustice in my hand, ch. xvi. 16, 17. (4.) He had, in effect, said, that there is nothing to be got in the service of God, and that no man will be the better, at last, for his religion; (v. 9.) He hath said that which gives occasion to suspect that he thinks, in effect, a man nothing, that he shall delight himself with God. It is granted that there is a present pleasure in religion; for what is it but to delight ourselves with God, in communion with him, in concurrence with him, in walking with him as Enoch did; this is a true notion of religion, and bespeaks its ways to be pleasantness. Yet the advantage of it is denied, as if it were vain to serve God, Mal. iii. 14. This Elihu gathers and "Opinion, by an enumerating from what he said; (ch. ix. 22.) He destroys the perfect and the wicked, which has a truth in it, (for all things come alike to all,) but it was ill-expressed, and gave too much occasion for this imputation, and therefore Job sat down silent under it, and attempted not his own vindication; whence Mr. Carol well observes, That good men sometimes speak worse than they mean; and that a good man will rather bear more blame than he deserves, than stand to excuse himself when he has deserved any blame.

2. He charges Job very high upon it. In general, What man is like Job? (v. 7.) "Did you ever know such a man as Job, or ever hear a man talk at such an extravagant rate?" He represents him, (1.) As sitting in the seat of the scornful. He drinketh up scorn like water, that is, he takes a great deal of liberty to reproach both God and his friends, takes a pleasure in it, and is very liberal in his reflections of their faults. (2.) He is in receiving and hearkening to the scorns and contempt which others cast upon their brethren, is well pleased with them, and extols them. Or, as some explain it, "By these foolish expressions of his he makes himself the object of scorn, lays himself very open to reproach, and gives occasion to others to laugh at him; while his religion suffers by it, and the reputation of that is wounded through his speech. You need not pry that God affliction, we shall never leave us to ourselves, to say or do anything which may make us a reproach to the foolish, Ps. xxxix. 8. (2.) As walking in the course of the ungodly, and standing in the way of sinners; He goes in company with the workers of iniquity; (v. 8.) not that in his conversation he did associate with them, but, in his opinion he did favour and countenance them, and strengthen their hands. If (as I follow, v. 9, for the proof of this) it profits a man nothing to delight himself in God, why should he not lay the reins on the neck of his lusts, and herd himself with the workers of iniquity? He that says, I have cleansed my hands in vain, does not only offend against the generation of God's children, (Ps. lxiii. 13, 14.) but gratifies his enemies, and says as they say.

10. Therefore hearken unto me, ye men of understanding: Far be it from God, that he should do wickedness; and from the Almighty, that he should commit iniquity. For the work of a man shall he render unto him, and cause every man to find according to his ways. Yea, surely God will not do wickedly, neither will the Almighty pervert judgment. Who hath given him a charge over the earth? or who hath disposed the whole world? 14. If he set his heart upon man, if he gather unto himself his spirit and his breath; 13. All flesh shall perish together, and man shall turn again unto dust.

The scope of Elihu's discourse is to reconcile Job to his afflictions, and to pacify his spirit under them. In order to this, he had showed, in the foregoing chapter, that God is inconsistent with the perfect innocence of his character, but intended it for his spiritual benefit. In this chapter, he shows that he did him no wrong in afflicting him, nor punished him more than he deserved. If the former could not prevail to satisfy him, yet this ought to silence him. In these verses, he directs his discourse to all the company; "Hearken to me, ye men of understanding, (v. 10.) and show yourselves to be intelligent, by assenting to this which I say." And this is that which he says. That the righteousness God never did, nor never will, do any wrong to any of his creatures, but his ways are equal, ours are unequal.

The truth here maintained respects the justice and equity of all God's proceedings. Now observe in these verses,

1. How plainly this truth is laid down, both negatively and positively. 1. He does wrong to none; God cannot do wickedness, nor the Almighty commit iniquity. (v. 10.) It is inconsistent with the perfection of his nature, and so it is also with the purity of his will; (v. 12.) God will not do wickedly, neither will the Almighty pervert judgment. He neither can, nor will, do a wrong thing, nor deal hardly with any man. He will never inflict the evil of punishment, but where he finds the evil of sin, nor in any undue proportion, for that would be to commit iniquity and do wickedly. If appeals be made to him, or he be to give a definitive sentence, he will have a eye to the merits of the cause, and not respect the person, for that were to pervert judgment. He will never either do any man wrong, or deny any man right, but the heavens will shortly declare his righteousness. Because he is God, and therefore is infinitely perfect and holy, he can neither do wrong himself, nor countenance it in others, any more than he can either die, or lie, or deny himself. Though he be Almighty, yet he never uses his power, as mighty men often do, for the support of injustice. He is obras God, all-sufficient, and therefore he cannot be tempted with evil, (James i. 13.) to do an unrighteous thing. 2. He ministers justice to all; (v. 11.) The work of a man shall he render unto him. Good works shall be rewarded, and evil works either punished or satisfied for; so that, sooner or later, in this world or in that to come, he will cause every man to find according to his ways. This is the standing rule of divine justice, to give to every man according to his work: Say to the righteous, it shall be well with them; Woe to the wicked, it shall be ill with him. If services persevered in now go unrewarded, and sins persisted in now go unpunished, yet there is a day coming, when God will fully render to every man according to his works, with interest for the delay.

II. How warmly it is asserted; 1. With an assurance of the truth of it: Yea, surely, v. 12. It is a truth which none can deny or call in question, it is what we may take for granted, and are all agreed in, That God will not do wickedly. 2. With an abhorrence of the very thought of the contrary; (v. 10.) Far be it from God, that he should do wickedness, and from us, that we should imagine such a thing, that we should entertain the least suspicion of it, or say any thing that looks like charging him with it.
III. How evidently it is proved by two arguments. 1. His independent absolute sovereignty and dominion; (v. 13.) *Who has given him a charge over the earth, and deputed him to manage the affairs of men upon the earth? Or, Who besides has disposed the whole world of mankind? He has the sole administration of the kingdoms of men, and has it of himself, nor is he intrusted with it by, or for, any other. (1.) It is certain that the government is his, and he does according to his will in all the honour done to us. Without the grant, he has not to be charged with injustice; for shall not *the Judge of all the earth do right? *Gen. xvii. 25. How shall God either rule or judge the world, if there be, or could be, any *unrighteousness with him? *Rom. iii. 5. 6. He that is entitled to such unlimited power must certainly have in himself unspotted purity. This is also a good reason why we should acquiesce in all God's dealings with us. Shall not he, that disposeth of the whole world, dispose of us and our concerns? (2.) It is as certain that he does not derive his power from any; nor is it a dispensation that is committed to him, but his power is original, and, like his being, of himself; and therefore, if he were not perfectly just, all the world and the affairs of it would soon be in the utmost confusion. The highest powers on earth have a God above them, to whom they are accountable, because it is not far from them to do iniquity. But therefore God has none above him, because it is not possible that he should do anything that (such is the perfection of his nature) that should need to be controlled. And if he be an absolute Sovereign, we are bound to submit to him, for there is no higher power to which we may appeal, so that the virtue is a necessity.

2. His irresistible power: (v. 14.) *If he set his heart upon man, to contend with him, much more if (as some read it) he set his heart against man, to ruin him, if he should deal with man either by *summa fatalest—mere sovereignty, or by *summa jus—strict justice, there were no standing before him; man's spirit and breath would soon be gone, and all flesh would perish together, v. 15. Many men's honesty is owing purely to their impotency; they do not do wrong, because they cannot support it when it is done, or it is not in their power to do it. But God is able to crush any man easily and suddenly, and yet does not by arbitrary power crush any man, which therefore must be attributed to the infinite perfection of his nature, and that is immovable. See here, (1.) What God can do with us; he can soon bring us to dust; there needs not any positive act of his omnipotence to do it, if he do but withdraw that concurrence of his providence, by which we live, if he gather unto himself that breath which was from his hand at first, and is still in his hand, we expire immediately, like an animal in an air-pump, when the air is exhausted. (2.) What he may do about us; the very thought of it may recall the being he gave, of which we are but tenants at will, and which also we have forfeited; and therefore, as long as that is continued of his mere favour, we have no reason to cry out of wrong, whatever other comforts are removed.

16. If now *thou hast understanding, hear this; hearken to the voice of my words: 17. Shall even he that hateth right govern? and wilt thou condemn him that is most just? 18. *Is it fit to say to a king, *Thou art wicked? and to princes, *Ye are ungodly? 19. *How much less to him that accepteth not the persons of princes, nor regardeth the rich more than the poor? for they all are the work of his hands. 20. In a moment shall they die, and the people shall be troubled at midnight, and pass away: and the mighty shall be taken away without hand. 21. For his eyes are upon the ways of man, and he seeth all his goings. 22. *There is no darkness, nor shadow of death, where the workers of iniquity may hide themselves. 23. For he will not lay upon man more than right, that he should enter into judgment with God. 24. He shall break in pieces mighty men without number, and set others in their stead. 25. Therefore he knoweth their works, and he overturneth them in the night, so that they are destroyed. 26. He striketh them as wicked men in the open sight of others; 27. Because they turned back from him, and would not consider any of his ways: 28. So that they cause the cry of the poor to come unto him, and he heareth the cry of the afflicted. 29. When he giveth quietness, who then can make trouble? and when he hideth his face, who then can behold him? whether it be done against a nation, or against a man only: 30. That the hypocrite reign not, lest the people be ensnared.

Elijah here applies himself more directly to Job. He had spoken to the rest, (v. 10.) as *men of understanding; now, speaking to Job, he puts an *if upon his understanding; *If thou hast understanding, hear this, and observe it, v. 16.

1. *Hear this, That God is not to be quarrelled with for any thing that he does. It is daring presumption to arraign and condemn God's proceedings, as Job had done by his discontents. It was, 1. As absurd as it would be to advance one to power, that is a professed enemy to justice; *Shall even he that hateth right govern? 17. The righteous Lord so loves righteousness, that, in comparison with him, even Job himself, though a perfect and upright man, might be said to *hate right; and shall he govern? Shall he pretend to direct God, or correct what he does? Shall such unrighteous creatures as we are, give law to the righteous God? Or, must he take his measures from us? When we consider the corruption of our nature, and the contrariety there is in us to the eternal rule of equity, we cannot but see it an impious, insipid, thing for us to prescribe to God. 2. It was as absurd as it would be to call a most righteous innocent person to the bar, and to give judgment against him, though it appeared ever so plain, upon the trial, that he was most just. *Wilt thou condemn him that is righteous in all his ways, and cannot but be so? 3. It is more absurd and unbecoming than it would be to say to a sovereign prince, *Thou art wicked, and to judges upon the bench, *Ye are ungodly. 18. This would be looked upon as an insufferable affront to majesty and to magnificence; no king, no prince, would hear it. In favour of government, we presume it is a right sentence that is passed, unless the contrary be very evident; but, whatever we think, it is not fit to tell a king to his face that he is wicked. Nathan reproved David by a parable. But, whatever a high priest or a prophet might do, it is not for an ordinary subject to make so bold with the powers that are. How absurd is it then to say so to God! To impute iniquity to him, who, having no respect of persons, is in no temptation to do an unjust thing?

v. 19. He regardeth not the rich more than the poor, and therefore it is fit he should rule, and it is not fit we should find fault with him. Note, Rich and poor stand upon the same level before God. A poor man may have as much in the way of favour, for his wealth and greatness; nor shall a poor man fare ever worse for his poverty, nor in honest cause be starved. Job, now that he was poor, should have as much favour with God, and be as much regarded by him, as when he was rich; for they all are the work of his hands. Their persons are so; the poor are made by the same hand, and of the same mould, as the rich. Their conditions are so; the poor were made poor by the Divine Providence, as well as the rich made rich, and therefore the poor shall fare never the worse for that which is their lot, not their fault.

II. Hear this, That God is to be acknowledged and submitted to in all that he does. Divers considerations Elihu here suggests to Job, to beget in him great and high thoughts of God, and so to persuade him to submit, and proceed no further in his quarrel with him.

1. He is mighty, and able to deal with the strongest of men when he enters into judgment with them; (v. 20.) even the people, the body of a nation, though ever so numerous, shall be troubled, unhinged, and put into disorder, when God pleases; even the mighty man, the prince, though ever so honourable, ever so formidable among men, shall, if God speak the word, be taken away out of his throne, nay, out of the land of the living; they shall die, they shall pass away. What cannot He do, that is able to destroy the hosts of Hell, and bring in judgment? Observe the suddenness of this destruction; In a moment shall they die. It is not a work of time, with God, to bring down his proud enemies, but, when he pleases, it is soon done; nor is he bound to give them warning, no, not an hour's warning; This might thy soul shall be required. Observe the season of it; They shall be troubled at midnight, when they are secure and careless, and unable to help themselves; as the Egyptians, when their firstborn was smitten, when they did not consume, nor offer a sacrifice to the Lord, or either of his sons: God: they are taken away, without hand, insensibly, by secret judgments. God can himself humble the greatest tyrant, without the assistance or agency of any man. Whatever hand he sometimes uses in the accomplishing of his purposes, he needs none, but can do it without hand. Nor is it one single mighty man only that he can thus overpower, but even hosts of them; (v. 24.) He shall break in pieces mighty men without number: for no combined power can stand it out against Omnipotence. Yet, when God destroys tyranny, he does not design anarchy; if those are brought down that ruled ill, it does not therefore follow that people must have no rulers; for, when he breaks mighty men, he sets others in their stead, that will rule better; or, if they do not, he overturns them also in the night, or in a night, so that they are destroyed, v. 25. Witness Belshazzar. Or, if he designs them to pass away, that none may continue in their place, but he strikes them as wicked men, v. 26. Some humbling, mortifying, judgments are brought upon them; these wicked rulers are stricken as other wicked men; as surely, as sorely, stricken in their bodies, estates, or families, and this, for warning to their neighbours; the stroke is given in terrorem—as an alarm to others, and therefore is given in the open sight of others, that they also may see, and fear, and tremble, before the justice of God. If kings stand not before him, how shall we stand!

God is omniscient, and can discover that which is most secret. As the strongest cannot oppose his arm, so the most subtle cannot escape his eye; and therefore, if some are punished, either more or less than we think they should be, instead of quarrelling with God, it becomes us to ascribe it to some secret cause known to God, only. For, (1.) Every thing is open before him; (v. 21.) His eyes are upon the ways of men: not on the ways of the reach of his eye, but on the ways of them, but his eye is upon them, so that he actually observes and inspects them; he sees us all, and sees all our goings; go whither we will, we are under his eye; all our actions, good and evil, are regarded and recorded, and reserved to be brought into judgment when the books shall be opened. (2.) Nothing is or can be concealed from him; (v. 22.) There is no darkness nor shadow of death, so close, so thick, so solitary, so remote from light or sight, as that it is the workers of iniquity may hide themselves from the discovering eye, and avenging hand, of the righteous God. Observe here, [1.] The workers of iniquity would hide themselves, if they could, from the eye of the world for shame, and from the eye of God for fear, as Adam among the trees of the garden; the day is coming when mighty men, and chief captains, will call to the rocks and mountains to hide them. [2.] They would gladly be hid even in the shadow of death, be it to grave, and die for ever there, rather than appear before the judgment-seat of Christ. (3.) It is in vain to think of flying from God's justice, or abscinding, when his wrath is in pursuit of us. The workers of iniquity may find ways and means to hide themselves from men, but not from God; He knows their works, (v. 25.) both what they do, and what they design.

2. God is righteous, and, in all his proceedings, goeth according to the rules of equity. Even then when he is overturning mighty men, and breaking them in pieces, yet he will not lay upon man more than right, v. 23. As he will not punish the innocent, so he will not exact of those that are guilty more than their iniquities deserve; of the proportion between the sin and the punishment Infinite Wisdom shall be the Judge. He will not give any man cause to complain that he deals hardly with him, nor shall he ever be the judge of God, or bring an action against him. If he do, God will be justified when he speaks, and clear when he judges. Therefore Job was very much to be blamed for his complaints of God, and is here well advised to let fall his action, for he would certainly be cast, or non-suited. It is not for man ever to purpose to enter into judgment with the Omnipotent; so some read the whole verse. Job had often wished to plead his cause before God. Elihu asks, "To what purpose? The judgment already given concerning thee will certainly be affirmed; no errors can be found in it, nor any exceptions taken to it, but, after all, it must rest as it is." All is well that God does, and will be found so.

To prove, that, when God destroys the mighty men, and strikes them as wicked men, he does not lay upon them more than right, he shows what their wickedness was; (v. 27, 28.) and let any consider, whether they did not deserve it. In short, these unjust judges, whom God will justly judge, neither feared God, nor regarded man, Luke xviii. 2. (1.) They were rebels to God; they turned back from him, cast off the fear of him, and abandoned the very thoughts of him, for they would not consider any of his ways, took no heed either to his precepts or to his providences, but lived without God in the world. This is at the bottom of all the wickedness of the wicked, they turn back from God; and it is because they do not consider, not because they cannot; they will not. From inconsideration comes impiety, and thence all immorality. (2.) They were tyrants to all mankind, v. 28. They will not call upon God for themselves; but they cause the cry of the poor to come to him, and that cry is against them. They are injurious and oppressive to the poor, wrong them, crush them, impoverish them yet more, and add affliction to the afflicted, who cry unto God, make to be known him, and he resolves to help them, and pleads their cause. Their case is bad who have the prayers and tears of the poor against them; for the cry of the oppressed will, sooner or later, draw down vengeance on the heads of the oppressors, and no one can say that this is more than right, Exod. xxxii. 23.

4. God has an uncontrollable dominion in all the affairs of the children of men, and so guides and governs whatever concerns both communities and particular persons, that, as what he designs cannot be defeated, so what he does cannot be changed, v. 29. Observe, (1.) The frowns of all the world cannot trouble those whom God quiets with his smiles. When he gives quietness, who can then make trouble? This is a challenge to all the powers of hell and earth, to disquiet those to whom God speaks peace, and for whom he creates it. If God give outward peace to a nation, he can secure what he gives, and disquiet his enemies, and to give it any disquietence. If God give inward peace to a soul, he can set only, the quietness and everlasting assurance which are the effect of righteousness, neither the accusations of Satan, nor the afflictions of this present time, no, nor the arrests of death itself, can give trouble. What can make them uneasy, whose souls dwell at ease in God? See Phil. iv. 7. (2.) The smiles of all the world cannot quiet those whom God troubles with his frowns: for if he, in displeasure, hide his face, and withhold the comfort of his favour, who then can behold him? Who can behold a displeased God, so as to bear up under his wrath, or turn it away? Who can make him show his face when he resolves to hide it, or see through the clouds and darkness which are round about him? Or, Who can behold a disquieted sinner, so as to give him effectual relief? Who can stand a friend to him to whom God is an Enemy? None can relieve the distresses of the outward condition, without God; if the soul do not have it, 2 Ki. vii. 27. Nor can any relieve the distresses of the mind against God and his terrors. If he impress the sense of his wrath upon a guilty conscience, all the comforts the creature can administer are ineffectual: As vinegar upon nitre, so are songs to a heavy heart. The irresistibleness of God's operations must be acknowledged in his dealings, both with communities and with particular persons: what he does cannot be controlled, whether it be done in their condemnation or their praise. The same Providence that governs mighty kingdoms, presides in the concerns of the meanest individual. And neither the strength of a whole nation can resist his power, nor the smallness of a single person evade his cognizance; but what he does shall be done effectually and Victoriously.

5. God is wise, and careful of the public welfare, and therefore provides that the hypocrite reign not, lest the people be embroiled. (1.) The pride of hypocrites: they aim to reign; the praise of men, and power in the world, are their reward, what they aim at. (2.) The policy of tyrants; when they aim set up themselves, they sometimes make use of religion as a cloak and cover for their ambition, and by their hypocrisy come to the throne. (3.) The danger the people are in, when hypocrites reign; they are likely to be ensnared in sin, or trouble, or both. Power in the hands of dissemblers, is often destructive to the rights and liberties of a people, which they are more easily wheedled out of, than forced out of. Much mischief has been done likewise to the power of godliness, under the pretence of a form of godliness. (4.) The care which Divine Providence takes of the people, to prevent this danger, that the hypocrite reign not; either that he do not reign at all, or that he do not reign long. If God has mercy in store for a people, he will either prevent the rise, or hasten the ruin, of hypocritical rulers.

31. Surely it is meet to be said unto God, I have borne chastisement, I will not offend any more: 32. That which I see not, teach thou me: if I have done iniquity, I will do no more. 33. Should it be according to thy mind? he will recompense it, whether thou refuse, or whether thou choose; and not I: therefore speak what thou knowest. 34. Let men of understanding tell me, and let a wise man hearken unto me. 35. Job hath spoken without knowledge, and his words were without wisdom. 36. My desire is, that Job may be tried unto the end, because of his answers for wicked men. 37. For he addeth rebellion unto his sin; he clappeth his hands among us, and multiplieth his words against God.

In these verses,

1. Elihu instructs Job what he should say under his affliction, v. 31, 32. Having reproved him for his peevish passionate words, here he puts better matter into his mouth. When we reprove for what is amiss, we must direct to what is good; to the reproofs of instruction, Prov. vi. 23. He does not impose it upon Job to use these words, but recommends it to him, as that which was meet to be said. In general, he would have him repent of his misconduct, and indecent expressions, under his affliction. Job's other friends would have had him own himself a wicked man, and by overdoing they would have made God more displeased; but Elihu told him truly that he had, in the management of this controversy, spoken unadvisedly with his lips. Let us remember this, in giving reproofs, and not make the matter worse than it is; for the stretching of the crime may defeat the prosecution. Elihu drives the right nail, and speeds accordingly. He directs Job,

1. To humble himself before God for his sins, and to accept the punishment of them; "I have borne chastisement. What I suffer comes justly upon me. If I be the cause of it, I will not refuse to justify God in it, but acknowledge his goodness." Many are chastised, that do not bear chastisement, do not bear it well, and so, in effect, do not bear it at all. Penitents, if sincere, will take all well that God does, and will bear chastisement as a medicinal operation intended for good.

2. To pray to God to discover his sins to him; (v. 32.) "That which I see not, teach thou me. Lord, upon the review, I find much smiss in me, and much done amiss by me, but I have reason to fear there is much more that I am not aware of; greater abominations, which, through ignorance, mistake, and partiality to myself, I do not yet see; Lord, give me to see it, awaken my conscience to do its office faithfully." A good man is willing to know the worst of himself, and particularly, under affliction, desires to be told wherefore God contends with him, and what God designs in correcting him.
3. To promise reformation; (v. 31.) I will not offend any more. "If I have done iniquity, (or, See I have,) I will do so no more; whatever thou shalt discover to me to have been amiss, by thy grace I will amend it for the future." This implies a confession that we have offended, true remorse and great desire after the offender and a humble compliance with God's design in afflicting us, which is to part between us and our sins. The penitent here completes his repentance; for it is not enough to be sorry for our sins, but we must go and sin no more, and, as here, bind ourselves with the bond of a fixed resolution never more to return to folly. This is meet to be said in a steadfast purpose, and meet to be said to God in a solemn promise and with fear of God.

II. He reasons with him concerning his discontent and unseasonableness under his affliction, v. 33. We are ready to think every thing that concerns us should be just as we would have it; but Elihu here shows, 1. That it is absurd and unreasonable to expect it; "Should it be according to thy mind? No, what reason for that?" Elihu here speaks with a great deference to the divine will and wisdom, and a satisfaction therein. It is highly fit that every thing should be according to God's mind, and Elihu speaks also with just a disdain of the pretensions of those who are proud, and would be their own carvers; Should it be according to thy mind? Should we always have the good we have a mind to enjoy? We should then wrongfully encroach upon others, and foolishly ensnare ourselves. Must we never be afflicted, because we have no mind to it? Is it fit that sinners should feel so smart, that scholars should be under no discipline? Or, if they must be afflicted, is it fit that we should choose what rod we will be beaten with? No, it is fit that every thing should be according to God's mind, and not ours, for he is the Creator, and we are creatures; he is infinitely wise and knowing, we are foolish and short-sighted; he is in one mind, we are in many. 2. That it is in vain, and to no purpose, to expect it; "He will recompense it, whether thou refuse, or whether thou choose. God will take his own way, fulfill his own counsel, and redress according to the sentence of his own justice, whether thou art pleased or displeased; he will neither ask thy leave, nor ask thy advice, but, what he pleases, that will he do; it is therefore thy wisdom to be easy, and make a virtue of necessity; make the best of that which is, because it is out of thy power to make it otherwise. If thou pretend to choose and refuse," that is, "to prescribe to God, and except against what he does, so will not I, I will acquiesce in all he does; and therefore speak what thou knowest, say what thou wilt do, whether thou wilt oppose or submit. The matter lies plain before thee; be at a point; thou art in God's hand, not in mine."

III. He appeals to all intelligent, indifferent, persons, whether there was not a great deal of sin and folly in that which Job said. 1. He would have the matter thoroughly examined, and brought to an issue; "Inquire is that Job may be tried unto the end. If any will undertake to justly what he has said, let them do it; if not, let us all agree to hear our testimony against it." Many understand it of his trial by afflictions; "Let his troubles continued till he be thoroughly humbled, and his proud spirit brought down till he be made to see his error, and to retract what he has so presumptuously said against God and his providence. Let that be the case till he be obliged to retract it. He appeals both to God and man, and desires the judgment of both upon it. (1.) Some read v. 36, as an appeal to God, O my Father, let Job be tried. So the margin of our Bibles, for the same word signifies my desire, and my father, and some suppose that he lifted up his eyes, when he said this, meaning, "O my Father which art in heaven, let Job be tried till he be subdued." When we are praying for the benefit of afflictions either to ourselves or others, we must eye God as a Father, because they are fatherly corrections, and a part of our filial education, and which, if properly received, will work in us a repentance and turning again. (2.) He appeals to the bystanders; (v. 34.) "Let the end of this be, whether they will, can, or will, or will not, to cry Peccavi—I have done wrong." In what Job had said, he thought it appeared, [1.] That he did not rightly understand himself, but had talked foolishly, v. 33. He cannot say that Job is without knowledge and wisdom; but, in this matter, he has spoken without knowledge, and, whatever his heart is, his words are without prudence. What he said to his wife, may be retorted upon himself, (He speaks as one of the foolish men speak,) and for the same reason, Shall we not receive evil as well as good, at God's hand? ch. ii. 10. Sometimes we need and deserve those reproofs ourselves, which we have given to others. Those that reproach God's wisdom, really reproach their own. [2.] That he has not a due regard to God's law, and has talked wickedly. If what he has said be tried to the end, that is, if one put it to the utmost stretch, and make the worst of it, it will be found, First, That he has taken part with God's enemies. His answers have been for wicked men, that is, what he had said, tends to strengthen the hands, and harden the hearts, of wicked people in their wickedness, he having carried the matter of their prosperity much further than he needed. Let wicked men, like Baal, plead for themselves, if they will, but far be it from us that we should answer for them, or say any thing in favour of them. Secondly, That he has insulted God's friends, and hectored over them; "He clappeth his hands among us; and if he be not thoroughly tried and humbled, will grow yet more insolent and impetuous, as if he had gotten the day, and silenced us all." To speak ill is bad enough, but to clap our hands, and triumph in it when we have done, as if error and passion had won the victory, is much worse. Thirdly, That he has spoken against God himself, and, by standing to what he had said, added rebellion to his sin. To speak, though but one word, against God, whom we speak, and for whom we ought to speak, is a great sin; what is it then to multiply words against him, as we would out-talk him? What is it to repeat them, instead of unsaying them? Those that have sinned, and, when they are called to repent, thus go on forwardly, add rebellion to their sin, and make it exceeding sinful. Errare humanum est, hereticus esse nolo—I may fall into error, but I will not plunge into heresy.

CHAP. XXXV.

Job being still silent, Elihu follows his blow, and here, a third time, undertakes to show him that he had spoken amiss, and ought to retract. Three improper sayings heere changes him with, and returns answer to them dismally. 1. He had represented religion as an indifferent, unpredictable thing, which God enjoins for his own sake, not for ours; Elihu evinces the contrary, v. 1. 8. 11. He had complained of God as deaf to the cries of the oppressed, against which he is strongly contradicted, v. 9. 10. 11. 12. 13. He had despised of the return of God's favour to him, because it was so long deferred, but Elihu shows him the true cause of the delay, v. 14. 16.

1. ELIHU spake moreover, and said, 2. Thinkest thou this to be right, that thou saidst, My righteousness is more than God's? 3. Fortho saidst, What advantage will it be unto thee? and, What profit shall I have, if I be cleansed from my sin? 4. I will answer thee, and thy companions with thee. 5. Look unto the heavens, and see; and behold the clouds, which are higher than thou. 6. If thou sinnest, what doest thou against him? or if thy transgressions be multiplied, what doest thou unto him? 7. If thou be righteous, what givest thou him? or what receiveth he of thine hand? 8. Thy wickedness may hurt a man as thou art, and thy righteousness may profit the son of man.

We have here,

1. The bad words which Elihu charges upon Job, v. 2, 3. To evince the badness of them, he appeals to himself, and his own sober thoughts, in the reflection, Thinkest thou this to be right? This intimates, 1. Elihu's confidence that the reproach he now gave was just, for he could refer the judgment of it even to Job himself. They that have truth and equity on their side, will not fear others, but every man's conscience on their side. 2. His good opinion of Job, that he thought better than he spake, and that, yet, though he had spoken amiss, when he perceived his mistake, he would not stand to it. When we have said, in our haste, that which was not right, it becomes us to own that our second thoughts convince us that it was wrong.

Two things Elihu here reproves Job for;

(1.) For justifying himself more than God, which was the thing that first provoked him; (ch. xxxii. 2.) "Thou hast, in effect, said, My righteousness is more than God's," that is, "I have done more for God than he ever did for me; so that, when the accounts are balanced, he will be brought in Debtor to me. As if Job thought his services had been paid less than they deserved, and his sins punished more than they deserved; which is a most unjust and wicked thought for any man to harbour, and especially for Job, who instanced so much upon his own integrity, and the severity of God's dealing with him, he did, in effect, say, My righteousness is more than God's; whereas, though we be ever so good, and our afflictions ever so great, we are chargeable with unrighteousness, and God is not.

(2.) For disowning the benefits and advantages of religion, because he suffers these things; What profit shall I have if I be cleansed from my sin? v. 3. This is gathered from ch. ix. 30, 31, Though I make my hands white ever so clean, what the nearer am I? Thou shalt plunge me in the ditch. And ch. x. 15, If I be wicked, woe to me; but if I be righteous, it is all one. The psalmist, when he compared his own afflictions with the prosperity of the wicked, was tempted to say, Verily I have cleansed my heart in vain, Ps. lxxiii. 13. And if Job said so, he did, in effect, say, My righteousness is more than God's; (v. 2.) for if he got nothing by his religion, God was more beholden to him than he was to God. But though there might be some colour for it, yet, he was not fair to charge these words upon Job, when he himself had made them the wicked words of prospering sinners, (ch. xxi. 15.) What profit shall we have, if we pray to him? and had immediately exclaimed them, (v. 16.) The counsel of the wicked is far from me. It is not a fair way of disputing, to charge men with those consequences of their opinions, which they expressly renounce.

II. The good answer which Elihu gives to this; (v. 4.) "I will undertake to answer thee, and thy companions with thee," that is, "all those that suppose thy savings, and are ready to justify thee in them; and all others that say as thou sayest: I have that to offer which will silence them all." To do this, he has recourse to his old maxim; (ch. xxxiii. 12.) That God is greater than man. That is a truth, which, if duly improved, will serve many good purposes, and this particularly, to prove that God is Deiotor to no man. The greatest of men may be a debtor to the meanest, but such is the infinite disproportion between God and man, that the great God cannot possibly receive any benefit from any man, and therefore cannot be supposed to lie under any obligation to man; for if he be obliged by his purpose and promise, it is only to himself. That is a challenge which no man can take up, (Rom. xi. 35.) Who hath first given to God, let him prove it, and it shall be recompensed to him again. Why should we demand it, as a just debt, to gain by our religion, (if Job seem to do,) when the God we serve does not gain by it?

1. Elihu needs not prove that God is above man; it is agreed by all; but he endeavours to affect Job and as with it, by an ocular demonstration of the height of the heavens and the clouds, v. 5. They are far above us, and God is far above them; how much then is he set out of the reach either of our sins or of our services! Look unto the heavens, and hold the clouds. God made man erect, Cælumque tueri justissimi, and made him look up to heaven. Idolaters looked up, and worshiped the works of heaven, the sun, moon, and stars; but we must look up to heaven, and worship the Lord of those hosts. They are higher than we, but God is infinitely above them. His glory is above the heavens, (Ps. viii. 1.) and the knowledge of him higher than heaven, ch. xi. 8.

2. But hence he infers that God is not affected, either by one way or other, by any thing that we do. (1.) He says that men may be either bettered or damaged by what we do; (v. 8.) The wickedness, perhaps, may hurt a man as thou art, may occasion him trouble in his outward concerns. A wicked man may wound, or rob, or slander, his neighbour, or may draw him into sin, and so prejudice his soul. Thy righteousness, thy justice, thy charity, thy wisdom, thy piety, may, perhaps, profit the son of man; our goodness extends to the saints that are in the world, Ps. xvi. 3. To men like ourselves, we are in a capacity to suffer of doing injury, or of showing kindness. And in both these things, the Judge of all will interest himself, will reward those that do good, and punish those that do hurt, to their fellow-creatures and fellow-subjects; but,

(2.) He utterly denies that God can really be either prejudiced, or advantaged, by what any, even the greatest of all the men of the East, do, or can do.

[1.] The sins of the worst sinners are no damage to him; (v. 6.) "If thou sinnest wilfully, and of malice prepense, against him, with a high and mighty mind, if thy transgressions be multiplied, and the acts of sin be ever so often repeated, yet what doest thou against him?" This is a challenge to the carnal mind, and defies the most daring sinner to do his worst. It speaks much for the greatness and glory of God, that it is not in the power of his worst enemies to do him any real prejudice. Sin is said to be against God, because so the sinner intends it, and so he takes it, and it is an injury to his honour; yet it cannot do any thing against him. The worst sinners are impotent malice; it cannot destroy his being or perfection, it cannot dethrone him from his power and dominion, cannot diminish his wealth and possessions, cannot disturb his peace and repose, cannot defeat his counsels and designs, nor can it derogate from his essential glory. Job therefore ends in saying, What profit is it that I am cleansed from any sin? God was no Gainer by his reformation; who then would gain, if he himself did not.
The services of the best saints are no profit to him; (v. 7.) If thou be righteous, what givest thou him? He needs not our service; or, if he did want to have the work done, he has better hands than ours at command. Our religion brings no accession at all to his felicity. He is so far from being beholden to us, that we are beholden to him for making us righteous, and accepting our righteousness; and therefore we can demand nothing from him, nor have any reason to complain if we have not what we expect, but to be thankful that we have better than we deserve.

By reason of the multitude of oppressions they make the oppressed to cry; they cry out by reason of the arm of the mighty: 10. But none saith, Where is God my Maker, who giveth songs in the night; 11. Who teacheth us more than the beasts of the earth, and maketh us wiser than the fowls of heaven? 12. There they cry, but none giveth answer, because of the pride of evil men. 13. Surely God will not hear vanity, neither will the Almighty regard it.

Elihu here returns answer to another word that Job had said, which, he thought, reflected much upon the justice and goodness of God, and therefore ought not to pass without a remark. Observe, I. What it was that Job complained of; it was this, That God did not regard the cries of the oppressed against their oppressors; (v. 9.) By reason of the multitude of oppressions, the many hardships which proud tyrants put upon poor people, and the barbarous usage they give them, they make the oppressed to cry; but it is to no purpose, God does not appear to right them. They cry out, they cry out by reason of the arm of the mighty, which lies heavy upon them. This seems to refer to those words of Job, (ch. xxiv. 12.) Men groan from out of the city, and the soul of the wounded crieth out against the oppressors, yet God lays not folly to them, does not reckon with them for it. This is a thing that Job knows not what to make of, nor how to reconcile to the justice of God and his government. Is there a righteous God, and can it be that he should so slowly hear, so slowly see?

II. How Elihu solves the difficulty: If the cries of the oppressed be not heard, the fault is not in God, he is ready to hear and help them, but the fault is in themselves; they ask and have not, but it is because they ask amiss, James iv. 3. They cry out, by reason of the arm of the mighty, but it is a complaining cry, a wailing cry, not a penitent praying cry, the cry of nature and passion, not of grace. See Hos. vi. 3. They have not cried unto me with their heart, when they bowed upon their beds. How then can we expect that they should be answered and relieved?

1. They do not inquire after God, nor seek to acquaint themselves with him, under their affliction; (v. 10.) But none saith, Where is God my Maker? Afflictions are sent to direct and quicken us to inquire early after God, Ps. lxxxviii. 34. But many, that grew under great oppressions, never mind God, because they take the pleasure of his hand in their troubles; if they did, they would bear their troubles more patiently, and be more benefited by them. Of the many that are afflicted and oppressed, few get the good they might get by their affliction. It should drive them to God, but how seldom is this the case! It is lamentable to see so little religion among the poor and miserable part of mankind. Every one complains of his troubles; but none saith, Where is God my Maker? that is, None repent of their sins, none return to him that smites them, none seek the face and favour of God, and that comfort in him which would balance their outward afflictions. They are wholly taken up with the wretchedness of their condition, as if that would excuse them in living without God in the world, which should engage them to cleave the more closely to him. Observe, (1.) God is our Maker, the Author of our being, and, under that notion, it concerns us to regard and acknowledge him, as God our Maker, in the plural number; which some think is, if not an indication, yet an intimation, of the Trinity of persons in the unity of the Godhead; Let us make man. (2.) It is our duty therefore to inquire after him. Where is he, that we may pay our homage to him, may own our dependence upon him, and obligations to him? Where is he, that we may apply ourselves to him for maintenance and protection, may receive law from him, and may seek our happiness in his favour, from whose power we received our being? (3.) It is to be lamented, that he is so little inquired after by the children of men. All are asking, Where is mirth? Where is wealth? Where is a good bargain? But none ask, Where is God my Maker?

2. They do not take notice of the mercies they enjoy in and under their afflictions, nor are thankful for them, and therefore cannot expect that God should deliver them out of their troubles. He provides for our inward comfort and joy under our outward troubles, and we ought to make use of that, and wait his time for the removal of our troubles. He gives songs in the night, that is, when our condition is ever so dark, and sad, and melancholy, there is that in God, in his providence and promise, which is sufficient, not only to support us, but to fill us with joy and consolation, and enable us, in every thing, to give thanks, and even to rejoc1 as in tribulation. When we only pore upon the afflictions we are under, and neglect the consolations of God which are treasured up for us, it is just with God to reject our prayers. (2.) He preserves to us the use of our reason and understanding; (v. 11.) who teaches us more than the beasts of the earth, that is, who has endued us with more noble powers and faculties than they are endued with, and has made us capable of more excellent pleasures and employments, and has so ordered the affairs of nature and the world, that we may have ease and peace in them, as we have in all things, (1.) As that which furnishes us with matter for thanksgiving, even under the heaviest burden of affliction. Whatever we are deprived of, we have our immortal souls, those jewels, more than all the world, continued to us; even those that kill the body, cannot hurt them. And if our affliction prevail not to disturb the exercise of their faculties, but we enjoy the use of our reason, and the peace of our consciences, we have much more reason to be thankful, how pressing weever our calamities otherwise are. (2.) As a reason why we should, under our afflictions, inquire after God our Maker, and seek unto him. This is the greatest excellency of reason, that it makes us capable of religion, and it is in that especially that we are taught more than the beasts and the fowls. They have wonderful instincts and sagacities in seeking out their food, their physic, their shelter; but none can have a more capable of inquiring, Where is God my Maker? Something like logic, and philosophy, and politics, has been observed among the brute-creatures, but never any thing of divinity or religion; these are peculiar to man. If, therefore, the oppressed only cry by reason of the arm of the mighty, and do not look up to God, they do no more than the brutes, (who complain when they are hurt,) and they forget that instruction and wisdom by which they are advanced so far above them.
relieves the brute-creatures, because they cry to him according to the best of their capacity, Ps. civ. 21. ch. xxxviii. 41. But what reason have men to expect relief, who are capable of inquiring after God as their Maker, and yet cry to him no other with these insinuations do they put into the mouth of Job? 3. They are proud and unhumbled under their afflictions, which were sent to mortify them, and to hide pride from them; (v. 12.) There they cry, there they lie exclaiming against their oppressors, and filling the ears of all about them with their complaints, not sparing to reflect upon God himself and his providence; but none give answer. God does not work deliverance for them, and perhaps men do not much regard them; and why so? It is because they regard iniquity in their hearts, and therefore God will not hear their prayers, Ps. lxvi. 18. Isa. i. 15. God hears not such sinners. They have, it may be, brought themselves into trouble by their own wickedness, they are the Devil's poor; and then who can pity them? Yet this is not all; they are proud still, therefore they do not seek unto God, (Ps. x. 4.) or if they do cry unto him, therefore he does not answer; for he hears only the cry of the humble, (Ps. x. 17.) and delivers those by his providence, whom he has first, by his grace, prepared and made fit for deliverance; and that we are not, if, under humbling afflictions, our hearts remain unhumbled, and pride unmortified. The case is plain then, if we cry to God for the removal of the oppression and affliction we are under, and it is not removed, the reason is, not because the Lord's hand is shortened, or his ear heavy, but because the affliction has not done its work; we are not sufficiently humbled, and therefore must thank ourselves that it is continued.

4. They are not sincere and upright, and inward with God, in their supplications to him, and therefore he does not hear and answer them; (v. 13.) God will not hear vanity, that is, the hypocritical prayer, which is a vain prayer, coming out of feigned lips. It is a vanity to think that God should hear it, who searches the heart, and requires truth in the inward part.

14. Although thou sayest thou shalt not see him, yet judgment is before him; therefore trust thou in him. 15. But now, because it is not so, he hath visited in his anger; yet he knoweth it not in great extremity.

16. Therefore doth Job open his mouth in vain: he multiplieth words without knowledge.

Here is,

I. Another improper word, for which Elihu reproves Job; (v. 14.) Thou sayest thou shalt not see him; that is, (1.) Thou complainest that thou dost not understand the meaning of his severe dealings with the wicked, or discern the drift and design of them, "ch. xxviii. 8, 9. And, (2.) Thou despairest of seeing his gracious returns to thee, of seeing better days again, and art ready to give up all for gone;" as Hezekiah, (Isa. xxxviii. 11.) I shall not see the Lord. As, when we are in prosperity, we are ready to think our mountain will never be brought low; so, when we are in adversity, we are ready to think our valley will never be filled, but, in both cases, "they are in vain, even more so this day, which is as absurd as to think that the weather, when it is either fair or foul, will be always so, that the flowing tide will always flow, or the ebbing tide will always ebb.

II. The answer which Elihu gives to this despairing word that Job had said, which is this, (1.) That, when he looked up to God, he had no just reason to speak thus despairingly; Judgment is before him, that is, "He knows what he has to do, and will do all in infinite wisdom and justice; he has the entire plan and model of providence before him, and knows what he will do, which we do not, and therefore we understand not what he does. There is a day of judgment before him, when all the seeming disorders of Providence will be set to rights, and the dark chapters of it will be expounded. Then thou shalt see the full meaning of these dark events, and the final period of these dismal events; then thou shalt see his face with joy; therefore trust in him, depend upon him, wait for him, and believe that the issue will be good at last."

When we see the Lord, we shall see him, wise, righteous, and faithful, and that he is a God of judgment." (Isa. xxx. 18.) We shall see no reason to despair of relief from him, but all the reason in the world to hope in him, that it will come in due time, in the best time.

(2.) That, if he had not yet seen an end of his troubles, the reason was, Because he did not thus trust in God, and wait for him; (v. 15.) "Because it is not so; because thou dost not thus trust in him, therefore the affliction, which came at first from love, has now displeasure mixed with it. Now God has visited thee in his anger, taking it very ill that thou canst not find in thy heart to trust him, but harrowest such hard misgiving thoughts of him." If there be any mixtures of divine wrath in our afflictions, we may thank ourselves, it is because we do not behave aright under them; we quarrel with God, are fretful and impatient, and distrustful of his Divine Providence. There is a deal of the foolishness of man perverts his way, and then his heart frets against the Lord; (Prov. xix. 3.) yet Elihu thinks that Job, being in great extremity, did not know and consider that as he should, that it was his own fault that he was not yet delivered.

He concludes, therefore, that Job opened his mouth in vain, (v. 16.) in complaining of his grievances, and crying for redress, or in justifying himself, and clearing up his own innocence; it is all in vain, because he does not trust in God and wait for him, and had not a due regard to him in his afflictions. He had said a great deal, had multiplied words, but all without knowledge; all to no purpose, because he did not encourage himself in God, and humble himself before him. It is in vain for us either to appeal to God, or to acquit ourselves, if we do not study to answer the end for which affliction is sent; and in vain to pray for relief, if we do not trust in God, let him do what he pleaseth, and think that he shall receive any thing from him. James 1. 7. Or this may refer to all that Job had said. Having showed the absurdity of some passages in his discourse, he concludes that there were many other passages which were, in like manner, the fruits of his ignorance and mistake. He did not, as his other friends, condemn him for a hypocrite, but charges him only with Moses's sin, speaking unadvisedly with his lips, when his spirit was provoked. When at any time we do so, (and who is there that speaks not in this way?) it is a mercy to be told of it, and we must take it patiently and kindly, as Job did; not repeating, but recounting, what we have said amiss.

CHAP. XXXVI.

Elihu, having largely reproved Job for some of his unadvised speeches, which Job had nothing to say in the vindication of, here comes more generally to set him rights in his notions of God's dealings with him. His other friends had stood to it, that, because he was a wicked man, therefore his afflictions were so great and so long. But Elihu only maintained that the affliction was sent for his trial, and that, therefore, it was length enned out, because Job was not, as yet, thoroughly humbled under it, nor had duly accommodated himself to it. He urges many reasons, taken from the wisdom and righteousness of God, his care of his people, and especially his greatness and almighty power, with which, in this and the following chapter, he persuades him to submissively accept of his sentence. I. His presence, v. 2-4. II. The account he gives of the method of God's providences toward the children of men, according as they conduct themselves, v. 5-15. III. The fair warning and great demonstration of God's sovereignty and omnipotence, which he gives instances of, in the operations of common providence, and which is a reason why we should all submit to him in his dealings with us, v. 16-21. IV. His demonstration of God's sovereignty and omnipotence, which he gives instances of, in the operations of common providence, and which is a reason why we should all submit to him in his dealings with us, v. 16-21.

I. EILIHU also proceeded, and said, 2. Suffer me a little, and I will show thee that I have yet to speak on God's behalf. 3. I will fetch my knowledge from afar, and will ascribe righteousness to my Maker. 4. For truly my words shall not be false: he that is perfect in knowledge is with thee.

Once more Elihu begs the patience of the auditory, and Job's particularly, for he has not said all that was in his heart, but he will now unfold them. Stand about me a little; some read it, v. 2. "Let me have your attendance, your attention, a while longer, and I will speak but this once, as plainly and as much to the purpose as I can." To gain this, he pleads,

1. That he had a good cause, a noble and fruitful subject; I have yet to speak on God's behalf. He spake as an advocate for God, and therefore might justly expect the ear of the court. Some, indeed, pretend to speak on God's behalf, who really speak for themselves; but those who sincerely appear in the cause of God, and speak in behalf of his honour, his truths, his ways, his people, shall be sure neither to want instruction, (It shall be given them in that same hour what they shall speak,) nor to lose their cause, or their fee. Nor need they fear lest they should exhaust their subject. They that have spoken ever so much, may yet find more to be spoken on God's behalf.

2. That he had a method to offer that was uncommon, and out of the road of vulgar observation; I will fetch my knowledge from afar, (v. 3) that is, "We will have recourse to our first principles, and the highest notions we can make use of to serve any purpose." It is worth while to go far for this knowledge of God, to dig for it, to travel for it; it will recompense our pains, and, though far-fetched, is not dear-bought.

3. That his design was undeniably honest; for all he aimed at was, to ascribe righteousness to his Maker; to maintain and clear this truth, that God is righteous in all his ways. In speaking of God, and speaking for him, it is good to remember that he is our Maker, to call him so, and therefore to be ready to do him, and the interests of his kingdom, the best service we can. If he be our Maker, we have all of him, must use all of him, and be very zealous for his honour.

4. That his management should be very just and fair; (v. 4.) "My words shall not be false, neither disagreeable to the thing itself, nor to my own thoughts and apprehensions. It is truth that I am contending for, and that for truth's sake, with all possible sincerity and plainness." He will make use of plain and solid arguments, and not the subtleties and niceties of the schools. "He who is perfect or upright in knowledge, is now reasoning with thee; and, therefore, let him not only have a fair hearing, but let what he says be taken in good part, as near well." The perfection of our knowledge, in this world, is, to be honest and sincere in searching out truth, in applying it to ourselves, and in making use of what we know for the good of others.

5. Behold, God is mighty, and despiseth not any: he is mighty in strength and wisdom. 6. He preserves not the life of the wicked: but giveth right to the poor. 7. He withdraweth not his eyes from the righteous: but with kings are they on the throne; yea, he doth establish them for ever and they are exalted. 8. And if they be bound in fetters, and be held in cords of affliction; 9. Then he sheweth them their work, and their transgressions that they have exceeded. 10. He openeth also their ear to discipline, and commandeth that they return from iniquity. 11. If they obey and serve him, they shall spend their days in prosperity, and their years in pleasures: 12. But if they obey not, they shall perish by the sword, and they shall die without knowledge. 13. But the hypocrites in heart heap up wrath; they cry not when he bindeth them: 14. They die in youth, and their life is among the unclean.

Elihu, being to speak on God's behalf, and particularly to ascribe righteousness to his Maker, here makes up the disposals of Divine Providence are not, not only according to the eternal counsels of his will, but according to the eternal rules of equity. God acts as a righteous Governor. For,

I. He does not think it below him to take notice of the meanest of his subjects, nor does poverty or obscurity set any at a distance from his favour. If men are mighty, they are apt to look with a haughty disdain upon those that are not of distinction, and make no figure; but God is mighty, infinitely so, and yet he despises not any, v. 5. He humbled himself, to take cognizance of the affairs of the meanest, to do them justice, and to show them kindness. Job thought himself, and his cause slighted, because God did not immediately appear for him. "No," says Elihu, God despiseth not any; which is a good reason why we should honour all men. He is mighty in strength and wisdom, and yet does not look with contempt upon those that have but a little strength and wisdom, if they be honest and upright. Nay, therefore, he despises not any, because his wisdom and strength are incontestably infinite, and therefore the condensations of his grace can be no diminution to him. They that are wise and good, will not look upon any with scorn and disdain.

II. He gives no countenance to the greatest, if they be bad; (v. 6.) He preserves not the life of the wicked. Though their life may be prolonged, yet not under any special care or the divine protection. Job had said that the wicked live, become old, and are mighty in flower, ch. xxi. 7. "No," says Elihu, "he seldom suffers wicked men to become old. He preserves not their life so long as they expected, nor with that comfort and satisfaction which are indeed our life; and their preservation is but a reservation for the day of wrath," Rom. ii. 5.

III. He is always ready to right those that are wronged, and to plead their causes; (v. 6.) He gives right to the poor, avenges their quarrel upon their persecutors, and forces them to make restitution of what they have robbed them of. If men will not right the injured poor, God will.
IV. He takes a particular care for the protection of his good subjects, v. 7. He not only looks on them, but he never looks off them. He withdraws not his eye from them, (v. 7.) Which seems not seem sometimes neglected and forgotten, and that befalls them which looks like an oversight of Providence, yet the tender careful eye of their Heavenly Father never withdraws from them. If our eye be ever toward God in duty, his eye will be ever upon us in mercy, and, when we are at the lowest, will not overlook us.

1. Sometimes he prefers good people to places of trouble and honor; (v. 7.) With kings are they on the throne, and every sheaf is made to bow to theirs. When righteous persons are advanced to places of honor and power, it is in mercy to them; for God's grace in them will both arm them against the temptations that attend preferment, and enable them to improve the opportunity it gives them of doing good. It is also in mercy to those over whom they are set; When the righteous bear rule, the city rejoices. If the righteous be advanced, they are established. They who in their keeping a good conscience, stand upon sure ground; and high places are not such slippery ground, to them as they are to others. But, because it is not often that we see good men made great men in this world, this may be supposed to refer to the honour to which the righteous shall rise when their Redeemer shall stand at the latter day upon the earth; for then only they shall be exalted for ever, and established for ever, then shall they all shine forth as the sun, and be made kings and priests to our God.

2. If, at any time, he bring them into affliction, it is for the good of their souls, v. 8. - 10. Some good people are preferred to honour and power, but others are in trouble. Now observe, (1.) The distress supposed, (v. 8.) If they be bound in fletters, laid in prison, as Joseph was, or holden in the cords of any other affliction, confined by pain and sickness, hampered by poverty, bound in their communities, and, notwithstanding all their struggles, held long in this distress. This was Job's case; he was caught, and kept fast, in the cords of anguish, as some read it. But observe, (2.) The design God has, in bringing his people into such distresses as these; it is for the benefit of their souls; the consideration of which should reconcile us to affliction, and make us think we'll of it. Three things God intends, when he afflicts us, [1.] To discover past sins to us, and to bring them before our eyes; (Job 33.) He shows them that sin in them, which, before, they did not see. He discovers to them the fact of sin, he shows them their work. Sin is our own work; if there be any good in us, it is God's work, and we are concerned to see what work we have made of sin. He discovers the fault of sin, shows them their transgressions of the law of God, and, withal, the sinfulness of sin, that they have exceeded, and harmed God. He shows us, when we are sinning, lay a load upon themselves, do not extenuate, but aggravate, their sins, and own that they have exceeded in them. Affliction sometimes answers to the sin; it serves however to awaken the conscience and puts men upon considering. [2.] To dispose our hearts to receive present instructions; then he opens their ear to discipline, v. 10. Whom God chastens, he teaches; (Ps. xciv. 12.) and the afflic-

3. It is the way to strengthen them to learn, softens the wax, that it may receive the impression. He shows them the sin of sin, if not repented of, will come down wrath. They think they are heaping up wealth, heaping up merits, but, when the treasures are opened, it will prove they were heaping up wrath.

Observe, 1. What they do to heap up wrath, what is it that is so provoking? It is this, They cry not when he binds them; that is, When they are in affliction, bound with the cords of trouble, their hearts are hardened, they are stubborn and unhumbled, and will not cry to God, nor make their application to him. They are stupid and senseless, as stocks and stones, despising the chastening of the Lord. 2. What are the effects of that wrath? (v. 14.) They die in youth, and their life is among the unclean. This is the portion of hypocrites, whom Christ denounced many woes against. If they continue impenitent, (1.) They shall die a sudden death; die in youth, when death is most a surprise; and death (that is, the consequences of it) is always such to hypocrites; as they that die in youth die when they hoped to live, so hypocrites, at death, go to hell, when they hoped to go to heaven. When a wicked man dies, his expectations shall perish. (2.) They are sentenced to the second death, after death, (for so it comes in here,) is among the unclean; among the fornicators, so some; among the worst and vilest of sinners, notwithstanding their specious and plausible profession. It is among the Sodomites, so the margin; those filthy wretches, who, going after strange flesh, are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire, Jude 7. The souls of the wicked live after death, but they live among the unclean, the unclean spirits, the Devil and his angels, for ever separated from the New Jerusalem, which no unclean thing shall enter. 15. He delivereth the poor in his affliction, and openeth their ears in oppression: 16. Even so would he have removed thee out of the strait into a broad place, where there is no straitness; and that which should be set on thy table should be full of fatness. 17. But thou hast fulfilled the judgment of the wicked: judgment and justice take hold on thee. 18. Because there is wrath, beware lest he take thee away with his stroke: then a great ransom cannot deliver thee. 19. Will he esteem thy riches? no, not gold, nor all the forces of strength. 20. Desire not the night, when people are cut off in their place. 21. Take heed, regard not iniquity: for this hast thou chosen rather than affliction. 22. Behold, God exalteth by his power: who teacheth like him? 23. Who hath enjoined him his way? or who can say, Thou hast wrought iniquity? Elisha here comes more closely to Job; and, 1. He tells him what God would have done for him, before this, if he had been duly humbled under his affliction; "We all know how ready God is to deliver the poor in his affliction; (v. 15.) he always was so; the poor in spirit, those that are of a broken and contrite heart, he looks upon with tenderness, and, when they are in affliction, is ready to help them. He opens their ears, and makes them to hear joy and gladness, even in their oppressions: while he does not yet deliver them, he speaks to them good words and comfortable words, for the encouragement of their faith and patience, the silencing of their fears, and the balancing of their griefs; and even so (v. 16.) would he have done to thee, if thou hadst submitted to his providence, and conducted thyself well, he would have delivered and comforted thee; and we should have had none of these complaints. If thou hadst altogether been restored to thee with advantage." 1. "Thou hadst been enlarged, and not confined thus, by thy sickness and disgrace; he would have removed thee into a broad place, where is no straitness, and thou shouldst no longer have been cramped thus, and have had all thy measures broken." 2. "Thou hadst been enriched, and not in this poor condition; thou shouldst have had thy table richly spread, not only with food convenient, but with the finest of the wheat," (see Deut. xxxii. 14.) "and the best of the flesh; and all thou hast been taught to silence us under our afflictions, to consider that if we were better, it would be every way better with us: if we had answered the ends of an affliction, the affliction would be removed; and deliverance would come, if we were ready for it. God would have done well for us, if we had conducted ourselves well, Ps. lxxx. 13, 14. Is. xlviii. 18. 11. He charges him with standing in his own light, and continuing in his own strength, Job xxx. 18, 21. "Thou art a wise and good man, but beware lest he take thee away, for the wisest and best have enough in them to deserve his stroke." 2. Let him not promise himself that, if God's wrath should kindle against him, he could find out ways to escape the strokes of it. (1.) There is no escaping by money; no purchasing a pardon with silver or gold, and such corruptible things. Even the great and the chief of the flesh, when God enters into judgment with thee; his justice cannot be bribed, nor any of the ministers of his justice. Will he esteem thy riches, and take from them a commutation of the punishment? No, not gold, v. 19. If thou hadst as much wealth as ever thou hadst, that would not ease thee, would not secure thee from the strokes of God's wrath, in the day of the revelation of which, riches profit not," Prov. xi. 4. See Ps. lxx. 8, 9. (2.) No escaping by rescue. "If all the forces of strength were at thy command, if thou couldst muster ever so many servants and vassals to appear for thee to force thee out of the hands of divine vengeance, it were all in vain, God would not regard it, there is none that can deliver out of his hand." (3.) No escaping by absconding, v. 20. "Desire not the night, which often favours the retreat of a conquered army, and covers it: think not that thou canst escape the righteous judgment of God, for the darkness hideth not from him," Ps. cxxxix. 11, 12. See ch. xxxiv. 22. Think not, because in the night people retire to their place, go up to their beds, and it is easy then to escape being discovered by them, that God also ascends to his place, and cannot see thee: no, he neither slumbereth nor sleepeth; his eyes are open upon the children of men, not only in all places, but at all times: no rocks or mountain can shelter us from his eye. Let us understand it of the night of death: that is the night by which men are cut off from their place, and Job had earnestly breathed for that night, as the hireling desires the evening, ch. vii. 2. "But do not so," says Elihu, "for thou knowest not what the night of death is." Those that passionately wish for death, in hopes to make that their shelter from God's wrath, may perhaps be mistaken. There are those whom wrath pursues into that night.

3. Let this unwise continue his unjust quarrel with God and his providence, which hitherto he had persisted in, when he should have submitted to the affliction; (v. 21.) "Take heed, look well to thine own spirit, and regard not iniquity, return not to it;" so some; "for it is thy peril if thou do." Let us never dare to think a favourable thought of sin, never indulge it, nor allow ourselves in it. Elihu thinks Job had need of this caution, he having chosen rather iniquity than affliction, which is having chosen rather to gratify his own pride and humour in contending with God, than to mortify it by a submission to him, and accepting the punishment. We may take it more generally, and observe, that they who choose iniquity rather than affliction, make a very foolish choice; they that ease their cares by sinful pleasures, increase their wealth by sinful pursuits, escape their troubles by sinful projects, and evade sufferings for righteousness' sake by sin, can only be disappointed against their consciences, these make a choice they will repent of, for there is more evil in the least sin than in the greatest affliction. It is an evil, it is only evil. Let him not dare to prescribe to God, nor give him his measures; (v. 22, 23.) "Behold, God exaltext by his power;" that is, "He does, may, and can, set up and pull down whom he pleases, and therefore it is not for thee and me to contend with him." The more we magnify God, the more do we humble and abuse ourselves. Now consider,

(1.) That God is an absolute Sovereign: He exaltext by his own power, and not by strength derived from any other: he exalts whom he pleases, exalts those that were afflicted and cast down, by the strength and power which he gives his people. And therefore who has enjoined him his way? Who presides above him in his way? Is there any superior from whom advantage made of distinction, whose counsel is accountable? No, he himself is supreme and independent. Who puts him in mind of his way? (so some.) Does the Eternal Mind need a remembrancer? No, his own way, as well as ours, is ever before him; he has not received orders or instructions from any, (Isa. xi. 13, 14,) nor is he accountable to any: he enjoins to all the creatures their way; let not us then enjoin him his, but leave it to him to go as he pleases, and to do as he pleases. Some,

(2.) That he is an incomparable Teacher; Who teaches like him? It is absurd for us to teach him who is himself the Fountain of light, truth, knowledge, and instruction: he that teaches man knowledge, and so as none else can, shall not he know? Ps. xciv. 9, 10. Shall we light a candle to the sun? Observe, when Elihu would give glory to God as a Ruler, he praises him as a Teacher, for rulers must teach; God does so, he binds with the cords of a man. In this, as in other things, he is unequalled. None so fit to direct his own actions as he himself: he knows what he has to do, and how to do it for the best, and needs no information or advice. Solomon himself had a privy-council to advise him, but the King of kings has none. Nor is any so fit to direct our actions as he is: none teaches with such authority and convincing evidence, with such condescension and compassion, nor with such power and efficacy, as God does. He teaches by the Bible, and that is the best book, teaches by his Son, and he is the best Master.

(3.) That he is unexceptionably just in all his proceedings; Who can say, Thou hast wrought iniquity? Not, Who dares say it? (many do iniquity, and persons tell them of it, at their peril,) but, Who can say it? Who had any cause to say it? Who can say it, and prove it? It is a maxim undoubtedly true, without limitation, that the King of kings can do no wrong. 24. Remember that thou magnify his work, which men behold. 25. Every man may see it; man may behold it afar off. 26. Behold, God is great, and we know him not; neither can the number of his years be searched out. 27. For he maketh small the drops of water: they pour down rain according to the vapour thereof, 28. Which the clouds do drop and distil upon man abundantly. 29. Also can any understand the spreadings of the clouds, or the noise of his tabernacle? 30. Behold, he spreadeth his light upon it, and covereth the bottom of the sea. 31. For by them judgeth he the people; he giveth meat in abundance. 32. With clouds he covereth the light; and commandeth it not to shine, by the cloud that cometh betwixt. 33. The noise thereof sheweth concerning it, the cattle also concerning the vapour. Elihu is here endeavouring to possess Job with great and high thoughts of God, and so to persuade him into a cheerful submission to his providence.

I. He represents the work of God; in general, as illustrious and conspicuous, v. 24. His whole work is so, God does nothing mean: this is a good reason why we should acquaint all the operations of his providence concerning us in particular: his visible works, those of nature, and which concern the world in general, are such as we admire and commend, and in which we observe the Creator's wise, powerful, and goodness; shall we then find fault with his dispensations concerning us, and the counsels of his will concerning our affairs? We are here called to consider the work of God, Eccl. viii. 13. 1. It is plain before our eyes, nothing more obvious, it is what men behold: every man that has but half an eye may see it, may behold it afar off. Look which way we will, we see the productions of God's wisdom and power; we see that done, and that doing, concerning which we cannot but say, This is the work of God; the finger of God; it is the Lord's doing. Every man may see, afar off, the heaven and all its lights, the earth and all its fruits, to be the work of Omnipotence: much more when we be held them high at hand. Look at the minutest works of nature through a microscope; do they not appear curious? The eternal power and godhead of the Creator are clearly seen and understood by the things that are made, Rom. i. 20. Every man, even those that have not the benefit of divine revelation, may see this, for there is no speech or language where the voice of these natural constant preachers is not heard, Ps. xli. 3. It ought to be marvelous in our eyes. The beauty and excellency of the work of God, and the agreement of all the parts of it with what the one true God is, is so glowing and highly to exalt: not only justify it as right and good, and what cannot be blamed, but magnify it as wise and glorious, and such as no creature could contrive or produce. Man may see his works, and is capable of discerning his hand in them, (which the beasts are not,) and therefore ought to praise them, and give him the glory of them.

II. He represents God, the Author of them, as infinite and unsearchable, v. 26. The strength, being, power, and perfection, should lead us to the Fountain. God is great, infinitely so: great in power, for he is omnipotent and independent; great in wealth, for he is self-sufficient, and all-sufficient; great in himself, great in all his works; great, and therefore greatly to be praised; great, and therefore we know him not; we know that he is, but not what he is; we know what he is not, but not what he is. We know in part, but not in perfection. This comes in here as a reason why we must not rigour his proceedings, nor find fault with what he does, because it is speaking evil of the things that we understand not, and answering a matter before we hear it. We know not the duration of his existence, for it is infinite; the number of his years cannot possibly be searched out, for he is eternal, there is no number of them: he is a Being without beginning, succession, or period, who ever was, and ever will be, and ever the same, the great I AM. This is a good reason why we should not presuppose to him, or quarrel with him, because, as he is, such are his operations, quite out of our reach.

III. He gives some instances of God's wisdom, power, and sovereign dominion, in the works of nature, and the dispensations of common providence; beginning, in this chapter, with the clouds, and the rain that desents from them. We need not be critical in examining either the phrase, or the philosophy, or the disquisitions of this section, it is, to say, (1.) That God is infinitely great, and the Lord of all, the first Cause and supreme Director of all the creatures, and has all power in heaven and earth, and whom therefore we ought, with all humility and reverence, to adore, to speak well of, and to give honour to. (2.) That it is presumption for us to prescribe to him the rules and methods of his special providence toward the children of men, or to expect from him an account of the continuance, or the dispensations of common providences, about the meteors, that are so various, and so mysterious and unaccountable.

Elihu, to affect Job with God's sublimity and sovereignty, had directed him (ch. xxxv. 5.) to look unto the clouds: in these verses, he shows us what we may observe in the clouds we see, which will lead us to consider the glorious perfections of their Creator. Consider the clouds, which govern the world: the source and treasure of its moisture, and the great bank through which it circulates, a necessary provision, the stagnation of which would be as hurtful to this lower world as of the blood to the body of man. It is worth while to observe, in this common occurrence, (1.) That the clouds above distil upon the earth below: if the heavens become brass, the brass becomes iron; therefore thus the promise of plenty runs, I will hear the heavens, and they shall hear the earth. This intimates to us, that every good gift is from above, from him who is both Father of lights, and Father of the rain, and it is right that we should direct our prayers to him, and to look up. (2.) That they are here said to distil upon man; (v. 28.) for though indeed he caused it to rain in the wilderness, where no man is, (ch. xxxviii. 26. Ps. civ. 11.) yet special respect is had to man herein, to whom the inferior creatures are all made serviceable, and from whom the actual return of the tributes of praise is required. Among men, he caused his rain to fall upon the just, and upon the unjust, Mal. iv. 25. (3.) They are said to distil the water in small drops; not in spouts, as when the windows of heaven were opened, Gen. vii. 11. God waters the earth with that with which he once drowned it, only dispensing it in another manner, to let us know how much we lie at his mercy, and how kind he is, in giving rain by drops, that the benefit of it may be the further and the more equally diffused, as by an artificial water-course. (4.) Though sometimes, the rain comes in very small drops, yet, at other times, it pours down in great rain, and this difference between one shower and another must be resolved into the Divine providence which orders it so. (5.) Though it comes down in drops, yet it distils upon man abundantly, (v. 28.) and therefore is called the river of God which is full of water, Ps. lxxv. 9. (6.) The clouds pour down according to the vapour that they draw up, v. 27. So just the heavens are to the earth, but the earth is not so in the return it makes. (7.) The produce of the clouds is, sometimes, a great terror, and, at other times, a great favour, to the earth, v. 31. When he pleases, by them he judges the people he is angry with. Storms, and tempests, and excessive rains, destroying the fruits of the earth, and causing inundations, come from the clouds; but, on the other hand, from them, usually, he gives meat in abundance; they drop freshness upon the pastures that are clothed with flocks, and the valleys that are covered with corn.

Ps. lxxv. 11-13. Lastly, Notice is sometimes given of the approach of rain, v. 33. The noise thereof, among other things, shows concerning it. Hence we read (1 Kings xlv. 41.) of the sound of abundance of rain, or, as it is in the margin, a sound of a noise of rain, before it came, and a welcome harbinger it was then. As the noise, so the face of the sky, shows concerning it, Luke xii. 36. The cattle also, by a strange and manifest, consistent, initiation, is informed in the weather nigh at hand, and seek for shelter, shaming man, who will not foresee the evil, and hide himself.

2. As shadows to the upper world; (v. 29.) Can any understand the spreading of the clouds? They are spread over the earth as a curtain or canopy; how they come to be so, how stretched out, and how poised, as they are, we cannot understand, though, in a daily manner, we observe them. We cannot understand the reasons and methods of God's judicial proceedings with the children of men, whose characters and cases are so various, when we cannot account for the spreading of the clouds, which cover the light? v. 32. It is a cloud coming betwixt, v. 32. ch. xxvi. 9. And this we are sensible of, that, by the interposition of the clouds between us and the sun, we are, (1.) Sometimes favoured; for they frequently serve to shelter us from the violent heat of the sun, which otherwise would be destructive to us. A cloud of dew in the heat of harvest, is spoken of as a very great refreshment, Isa. xviii. 4. (2.) Sometimes we are by them frowned upon; for they darken the earth at noon-day, and eclipse the light of the sun. Sin is compared to a cloud, (Isa. xlv. 22.) because it comes between us and the light of God's countenance, and obstructs the shining of it. But though the clouds darken the sun for a time, and pour down rain, yet, (Post nubi-lla Pheebus—The sun shines forth after the rain,) after he had weared the cloud, he spredeth his light upon it, v. 39. There is a clare shining after rain, (3 Sam. xxiii. 4.) the sun-beams are darted forth, and reach to cover even the bottom of the sea, thence to exhale a fresh supply of vapours, and so raise recruits for the clouds. In all this we must remember to magnify the work of God.

CHAP. XXXVII.

Elihu here goes on to extol the wonderful power of God in the meteor, and all the changes of the weather: If, in those changes, we submit to the will of God, take the weather as it is, and make the best of it, why should we not do so in other changes of our condition? Here he observes the hand of God, I. In the thunder and lightning, v. 1-5. II. In the frost and snow, the rains and wind, v. 6-13. III. He applies it to Job, and challenges him to solve the phenomena of these works of nature, that, confessing his ignorance in them, he might own himself an incompetent judge in the proceedings of Divine Providence, v. 14. 22. And then, IV. Concludes with his principle which he undertook to make out, That God is great, and greatly to be feared, v. 23, 24.

1. At this also my heart trembleth, and is moved out of his place. 2. Hear attentively the noise of his voice, and the sound that goeth out of his mouth. 3. He directeth it under the whole heaven, and his lightning unto the ends of the earth. 4. After it a voice roareth: he thundereth with the voice of his excellency; and he will not stay them when his voice is heard. 5. God thundereth marvellously with his voice; great things doeth he, which we cannot comprehend.

Thunder and lightning, which usually go together, are sensible indications of the glory and majesty, the power and terror, of Almighty God, one to the ear, and the other to the eye; in these, God leaves not himself without witness of his greatness, as, in the rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, he leaves not himself without witness of his goodness, (Acts xiv. 17.) even to the most stupid and unthinking. Though there are natural causes and useful effects of them, which the philosophers undertake to account for, yet the sights and sounds are so designed by the Creator to startle and awake the slumbering world of mankind to the consideration of a God above them. The eye and the ear are the two learning senses; and therefore, though such a circumstance is possible, they say it was never known in fact, that any one was born blind and deaf. By the word of God divine instructions are conveyed to the mind through the ear, by his works, through the eye: but because the natural senses are so designed by the Creator to startle and awaken the slumbering world of mankind to the consideration of a God above them. The eye and the ear are the two learning senses; and therefore, though such a circumstance is possible, they say it was never known in fact, that any one was born blind and deaf. If the word of God be not heard, the natural senses are not made use of, and the mind remains in darkness.

How does he describe them. (1.) Their original, not their second causes, but the first. God directs the thunder, and the lightning is his, v. 3. Their production and motion are not from chance, but from the counsel of God, and under the direction and dominion of his providence, though, to us, they seem accidental and ungovernable. (2.) Their extent. The claps of thunder roll under the whole heaven, and are heard far and near; so are the lightnings darted to the ends of the earth, they shine out of the one part under heaven, and shine to the other, Luke xvi. 24. Though the same lightning and thunder do not reach to all places, yet reach they to very distant places in a moment, and there is no place but, some time or other, has these alarms from heaven. (3.) Their order. The lightning is first directed, and after it a voice roars, v. 4. The flash of fire, and the noise it makes in a watery cloud, are really at the same time; but, because the motion of light is much more quick, than that of sound, we think the voice is some time before we hear the thunder, as we see the firing of a great gun at a distance before we hear the report of it. The thunder is here called the voice of God's excellency, because by it he proclaims his transcendent power and greatness. He sends forth his voice, and that a mighty voice, Ps. lxviii. 33. (4.) Their violence. He will not stay them, that is, he does not need to check them, or control them, they go out to execute God's will without restraint from him; but by the lightning and thunder, he breaks in upon them, from heaven, and confounds their purposes, and takes from them the power and influence which he had before, as if it were for the purpose of piercing them to their hearts, and hindering them in their undertakings. God thunders with such great force and power that they are astonished, and if they attempt any thing they do it with great danger and impiety.}

2. God's lightning is especially considered, and he advises Job to affect Job, with the appearances of God's glory in the thunder and lightning; (v. 1, 2.) "For my part," (says Elihu,) "my heart trembles at it; though I have often heard it, often seen it, yet it is still terrible to me, and makes every joint of me tremble, and my heart beat as if it would move out of its place." Thunder and lightning have been dreadful to the wicked; the emperor Caligula would run into a corner, or under a bed, for fear of them; but we see, when they are not very much astonished, we say, they are thunder-struck. And as the people, we think thunder and lightning very awful; that which makes them the more terrible, is, the hurt often done by lightning, many having been killed by it; Sodom and Gomorrah were laid in ruins by it: it is a sensible indication of what God could do to this sinful world, and what he will do, at last, by the fire to which it is reserved. Our hearts, like Elihu's, should tremble at it for fear of God's judgments, Ps. cxxix. 120. He also calls upon Job to attend to it, (v. 2.) Hear attentively the voice of his voice. Ps. li. 4.) His voice, he thundered at a distance, and could not be heard without looking; or rather, though the thunder itself will be heard, and, whatever we are doing, we cannot help attending to it, yet, to apprehend and understand the instructions God thereby gives us, we have need to hear with great attention and application of mind. Thunder is called the voice of the Lord, (Ps. xxxix. 3, &c.) because, by it, God speaks to the children of men, to fear before him, and it should put us in mind of that mighty word by which the world was at first made, which is called thunder; (Ps. civ. 7.) At the voice of thy thunder, they hosted away, namely, the waters, when God said, Let them be gathered into one place. They that are themselves affected with God's greatness should labour to affect others.

How he describes them. (1.) Their original, not their second causes, but the first. God directs the thunder, and the lightning is his, v. 3. Their production and motion are not from chance, but from the counsel of God, and under the direction and dominion of his providence, though, to us, they seem accidental and ungovernable. (2.) Their extent. The claps of thunder roll under the whole heaven, and are heard far and near; so are the lightnings darted to the ends of the earth, they shine out of the one part under heaven, and shine to the other, Luke xvi. 24. Though the same lightning and thunder do not reach to all places, yet reach they to very distant places in a moment, and there is no place but, some time or other, has these alarms from heaven. (3.) Their order. The lightning is first directed, and after it a voice roars, v. 4. The flash of fire, and the noise it makes in a watery cloud, are really at the same time; but, because the motion of light is much more quick, than that of sound, we think the voice is some time before we hear the thunder, as we see the firing of a great gun at a distance before we hear the report of it. The thunder is here called the voice of God's excellency, because by it he proclaims his transcendent power and greatness. He sends forth his voice, and that a mighty voice, Ps. lxviii. 33. (4.) Their violence. He will not stay them, that is, he does not need to check them, or control them, they go out to execute God's will without restraint from him; but by the lightning and thunder, he breaks in upon them, from heaven, and confounds their purposes, and takes from them the power and influence which he had before, as if it were for the purpose of piercing them to their hearts, and hindering them in their undertakings. God thunders with such great force and power that they are astonished, and if they attempt any thing they do it with great danger and impiety.
6. For he saith to the snow, Be thou on the earth; likewise to the small rain, and to the great rain of his strength. 7. He sealeth up the hand of every man, that all men may know his work. 8. Then the beasts go into dens, and remain in their places. 9. Out of the south cometh the whirlwind; and cold out of the north. 10. By the breath of God frost is given; and the breadth of the waters is straitened. 11. Also by watering he weareth the thick cloud; he scattereth his bright cloud. 12. And it is turned round about by his counsel; that they may do whatsoever he commandeth them upon the face of the world in the earth. 13. He causeth it to come, whether for correction, or for his land, or for mercy.

The changes and extremities of the weather, wet or dry, hot or cold, are the subject of a great deal of our common talk and observation; but how seldom do we think and speak of these things, as Elihu does here, with an awful regard to God the Director of them, in the present hour, and serves the purposes of his providence, by them? We must take notice of the glory of God, not only in the thunder and lightning, but in the more common revolutions of the weather, which are not so terrible, and which make less noise. As,

1. In the snow and rain, v. 6. Thunder and lightning happen usually in the summer, but here he takes notice of the winter weather; then he saith to the snow, Be thou on the earth; he commissioned it, he commands it, he appoints it, where it shall light, and how long it shall lie. He speaks, and it is done, as in the creation of the world, Let there be light; so in the works of common providence, Snow, be thou on the earth. Saying and doing are not two things with God, though they are with us. When he speaks the word, the small rain distils, and the great rain pours down as he pleases.

The winter rain, so the LXX.; for, in these countries, when the winter was past, the rain either fell or was scarce. The cloud between the small rain and the great rain, is this, that the former is called a shower of rain, the latter of rains, many showers in one; but all are the showers of his strength: the power of God is to be observed as much in the small rain that soaks into the earth, as in the great rain that batters on the house-top, and washes away all before it. Note, The providence of God is to be acknowledged both by labourers in the fields, and travellers upon the road, in every shower of rain, whether it does them a kindness or a diskindness. It is sin and folly to contend with God's providence in the weather; if he send the snow or rain, can we hinder them? Or shall we be angry at them? It is as absurd to quarrel with any other disposal of Providence concerning ourselves or ours.

The effect of the extremity of the winter weather, is, that it obliges both men and beasts to retire, making them uncomfortable and unsafe for them to go abroad. (1.) Men retire to their houses from their labours in the field, and keep within doors; (v. 7.) He sealeth up the hand of every man. In frost and snow, husbandsmen cannot follow their business, nor some tradesmen, nor travellers, when the weather is extreme: the plough is laid by, the shipping laid up, nothing is to be done, nothing to be got, that men, being taken off from their own work may know his work, and contemplate that, and give him the glory of that; and by the consideration of that work of his in the weather which seals up their hands, be led to celebrate his other great and marvellous works. Note, When we are, upon any account, disabled to follow our worldly business, and taken off from it, we should spend our time rather in the exercises of piety and devotion, (in acquainting ourselves with the works of God, and praising him in them,) than in foolish idle discourses and entertainments. And when we are set up, our hearts should be thus opened, and the less we have at any time to do in the world, the more we should do for God and our souls. When we are confined to our houses, we should thereby be driven to our Bibles and our knees. (2.) The beasts also retire to their dens, and remain in their close places, v. 8. It is meant of the wild beasts, which, being wild, must seek a shelter for themselves, to which, be he, the tame beasts, which are serviceable to man, are housed and protected by his care, as Exod. ix. 20. The ass has no den but his master's crib, and thither he goes, not only to be safe and warm, but to be fed. Nature directs all creatures to shelter themselves from a storm; and shall man only be unprovided with an ark?

2. In the winds, which blow from different quarters, and produce different effects, v. 9. Out of the north cometh the whirlwind; it turns round, and so it is hard to say from which point it comes, but it comes from the secret chamber, as the word signifies, which I am not so willing to understand of the south, because he says here, (v. 17.) that the wind out of the south is so far from being a whirlwind, that it is a warming, quieting, wind. But, at this time, perhaps, Elihu saw a whirlwind-cloud coming out of the south and making toward them, and he is now under the impression of what he saw, and he makes this remark about it, as it may be read, Or, if turbulent winds, which bring showers, come out of the south, cold and drying blasts come out of the north to scatter the vapours, and clear the air of them.

3. In the frost, v. 10. See the cause of it; it is given by the breath of God, that is, by the word of his power, and the command of his will; or, as some understand it, by the wind, which is the breath of God, as the thunder is his voice; it is caused by that prevailing wind out of the north. See the effect of it; The breadth of the waters is straitened; that is, the waters that had spread themselves, and flowed with liberty, are congealed, benumbed, arrested, bound up in crystal fetters. This is such an instance of the power of God, as, if it were not common, would be next to a miracle.

4. In the clouds; the womb where all these watery meteors are conceived, of which he had spoken, ch. xxxvi. 28. Three sorts of clouds he here speaks of:

(1.) Close, black, thick, clouds, pregnant with showers; these with watering he wearies; (v. 11.) they spend themselves, and are exhausted by the rain into which they melt and are dissolved, pouring out water till they are weary, and can pour out no more. See what pains, as I may say, the creatures, even those above us, take to serve man; the clouds water the earth till they are weary; they spend for our benefit; which shames and condemns us for the little good we do in our places, though it would be to our own advantage; for he that watereth shall be watered also himself.

(2.) Bright, thin, clouds, clouds without water; these he scattereth, they are dispersed of themselves, and not dissolved into rain, but what becomes of them we know not. The bright cloud, in the evening, when the sky is red, is scattered, and proves an earnest of a fair day, Matth. xvi. 2.
Flying clouds, which do not dissolve, as the thick cloud, into a close rain, but are carried upon the wings of the wind from place to place, dropping showers as they go; these are said to be turned round about by his counsels, v. 12. The common people say that the rain is determined by the planets, which is as bad divinity as it is philosophy, for it is guided and governed by the counsel of God, which extends itself even to those things that seem most casual and minute, that they may do whatsoever he commands them; for the stormy winds, and the clouds that are driven by them, fulfill his word; and, by this means, he causes it to rain upon one city, and not upon another, Amos iv. 7, 8. Thus his will is done upon the face of the world in the earth, that is, among the children of men, to whom God has an eye in all these things, of whom it is said, that he made them to dwell on the face of all the earth, Acts xxi. 26. The inferior creatures, being incapable of doing moral actions, are incapable of receiving rewards and punishments: but, among the children of men, God causes the rain to come, either for the correction of his land, or for a mercy to it, v. 13. [1.] Rain sometimes turns into a judgment, which turns to a sinful land: so once it was for the destruction of the whole world, so it is now often for the correction or discipline of some parts of it, by hindering seediness and harvest, raising the waters, and damaging the fruits. Some have said that our nation has received much more prejudice by the excess of rain than by the want of it. [2.] At other times, it is a blessing: it is for his land, that may be made fruitful, and, beside that which is just necessary, he gives for mercy, to fatten the land and fruit. [3.] It is not for the necessary dependence we have upon God, when the very same thing, according to the proportion in which it is given, may be either a great judgment, or a great mercy, and without God we cannot have either a shower or a fair gleam.

14. Hearken unto this, O Job: stand still and consider the wondrous works of God. 15. Dost thou know when God disposed them, and caused the light of his cloud to shine? 16. Dost thou know the balancings of the clouds, the wondrous works of him which is perfect in knowledge? 17. How thy garments are warm, when he quieteth the earth by the south wind? 18. Hast thou with him spread out the sky, which is strong, and as a molten looking-glass? 19. Teach us what we shall say unto him: for we cannot order our speech by reason of darkness. 20. Shall it be told him that I speak? If a man speak, surely he shall be swallowed up.

Elihu here applies himself closely to Job, desiring him to apply what he had hitherto said, to himself. He informs him that he has not, of course, (v. 14.) that he would pause a while; Stand still, and consider the wondrous works of God. What we hear, is not likely to profit us, unless we consider it, and we are not likely to consider things fully, unless we stand still, and compose ourselves to the consideration of them. The works of God, being wondrous, both deserve, and need, our consideration, and the due consideration of them will help to reconcile us to all his providences.

Elihu, for the humbling of Job, shows him, I. That he had no insight into natural causes, neither could see the springs of them, nor foresee the effects of them; (v. 15. 17.) Dost thou know the wondrous works of him which is perfect in knowledge? We are here taught,

1. The perfection of God's knowledge: it is one of the most glorious perfections of God, that he is perfect in knowledge; he is omniscient. His knowledge is intuitive; he sees, and does not know by reflection: it is immediate and entire; he knows things truly, and not by their colours, though figuratively, and not by piece-meal. To his knowledge there is no distance, but all near; nothing future, but all present; nothing hid, but all open. We ought to acknowledge this in all his wondrous works, and it is sufficient to satisfy us, in those wondrous works which we know not the meaning of, that they are the works of one that knows what he does.

2. The imperfection of our knowledge. The greatest philosophers of ancient and modern days, concerning the powers and works of nature. We are a paradox to ourselves, and every thing about us is a mystery. The gravitation of bodies, and the cohesion of the parts, are most certain, and yet unaccountable. It is good for us to be made sensible of our own ignorance; some have confessed it, and those that would not have wished to expose it: but we must all suffer from it what incompetent judges we are of the various political, who understand so little even of the divine mechanics. We know not what orders God has given concerning the clouds, nor what orders he will give, v. 15. That all is done by determination and with design, we are sure; but what is determined, and what designed, and when the plan was laid, we know not. God often causes the light of his cloud to shine; in the rainbow, so says; in the lightning, so others; but not to us, for we could not, if we would, foretell, when he would do it? If we foresee the change of weather a few hours before, by vulgar observation, or when second causes have begun to work by the weather-glass, yet how little do these show us of the purposes of God by these changes? (2.) We know not how the clouds are poised in the air, the balancing of them, which is one of the wondrous works of God. They are so balanced, so spread, that they never rob us of the benefit of the sun; when the clouds are balanced, that they do not fall at once, or burst into cataracts or water-spouts: the rainbow is an intimation of God's favour in balancing the clouds, so as to keep them from drowning the world. Nay, so are they balanced, that they impartially distribute their showers on the earth, so that, one time or other, every place has its share. (3.) We know not how the comfortable change comes, when the winter is past, v. 17. 1.) How the weather becomes warm, after it has been cold. We know how our garment came to be warm upon us, that is, how we come to be warm in our clothes, by reason of the warmth of the air we breathe in. Without God's blessing, we should clothe us, yet not be warm, Hag. i. 6. But when he orders it, the clothes are warm upon us, which, in the extremity of cold weather, would not serve to keep us warm. [2.] How it becomes calm, after it has been stormy: he quiets the earth by the south-wind, when the clouds are dispersed: so he has a blustering, freezing, north-wind, so he has a howling, composing, south-wind: the Spirit is compared to both, because he both convinces and comforts, Cant. iv. 16.

II. That he had no share at all in the first making of the world; (v. 18.) “Hast thou with him spread out the sky? Thou camst not pretend to have stretched it out without him, no nor to have stretched it out in conjunction with him, for he was far from needing any help, either in contriving or in working.” The creation of the vast expanse of the visible heavens, (Gen. i. 6. 8.) which we see in... being to this day, is a glorious instance of the divine power, considering, 1. That, though it is fluid, yet it is firm. It is strong, and has its name from its stability. It still is what it was, and suffers no decay, nor shall the ordinances of heaven be altered, till the lease expires with time. 2. That, though it is large, it is bright and most curiously fine; it is a molten looking-glass, smooth and polished, and without the least flaw or crack. In this, as in a looking-glass, we see the reflection of his handy-work, Ps. xix. 1. When we look up to heaven above, we should remember it is a mirror or looking-glass, not to show us our own faces, but to be a feint representation of the purity, dignity, and brightness of the upper world, and its glorious inhabitants.

III. That neither he nor they were able to speak of the glory of God, in any proportion to the merit of the subject, v. 19, 20. 1. He challenges Job to be their director, if he durst undertake it. He speaks it ironically, "Teach us, if thou canst, what we shall say unto him. Thou hast a mind to reason with God, and wouldest have us to contend with him on thy behalf; teach us, then, what we shall say; canst thou further this into this abyss than we can? If thou canst, favour us with the discoveries, furnish us with instructions." 2. He owns his own insufficiency, both in speaking to God, and in speaking of him; "We cannot express a word of the matter, but the best of men are much in the dark concerning the glorious perfections of the divine nature, and the administrations of the divine government. They that through grace know much of God, know little, nothing, in comparison with what is to be known, and what will be known, when that which is perfect is come, and the veil shall be rent. When we would speak of God, we speak confusedly and with great uncertainty, and are soon at a loss, and run a-ground, not for want of matter. As we must always begin with fear and trembling, lest we speak amiss, (Deus etiam vera dicere periculorum est—Even while affirming what is true concerning God, we incur risk,) so we must conclude with shame and blushing, for having spoken no better. Elihu himself had, for his part, spoken well on God's behalf, and yet is far from expecting a fee, or thinking that God was beholden to him for it, or that he would consider it as a work for him, that (1.) He is even ashamed of what he has said; not of the cause, but of his own management of it. Shalt it be told him that I speak? Shalt it be reported to him as a meritorious piece of service, worthy his notice? By no means, let it never be spoken of, for he fears that the subject has suffered by his undertaking it, as a fine face is wrunged by a bad painter, and his performance is so far from meriting thanks, that it needs pardon. When we have done well for God, we must acknowledge that we are unprofitable servants, and have nothing at all to boast of. He is afraid of saying any more. If a man speak, if he undertake to plead, for God, much more, if he offers to plead against him, surely he shall be swallowed up. If he speak presumptuously, God's wrath shall soon consume him; but if ever so well, he will soon lose himself in the mystery, and be overpowered by the divine lustre. Astonishment will strike him blind and dumb.

21. And now men see not the bright light which is in the clouds; but the wind passeth and cleanseth them. 22. Fair weather cometh out of the north: with God is terrible majesty. 23. Touching the Almighty, we cannot find him out: he is excellent in power, and in judgment, and in plenty of justice: he will not afflict. 24. Men do therefore fear him: he respecteth not any that are wise of heart.

Elihu here concludes his discourse with some short, but great, sayings concerning the glory of God, as that which he was himself possessed, and desired to show his fathers, with a holy awe of. He speaks conceisely, and at a distance, because, it should seem, he perceived that God was about to take the work into his own hands. 1. He observes, that God, who has said that he will dwell in the thick darkness, and make that his pavilion, (2 Chron. vi. 1. Ps. xviii. 11.) is in that awful chariot advancing toward them, as if he were preparing his throne for judgment, surrounded with clouds and darkness, Ps. xlvii. 2-9. He saw the cloud, with a whirlwind in the bosom of it, coming out of the south; but now it hung so thick, so black, over their heads, that they could none of them see the bright light, which just before was in the clouds. The light of the sun was now eclipsed; this reminded him of the darkness, by reason of which he could not speak, (v. 19.) and made him afraid to go on, v. 20. Thus the disciples feared when they entered into a cloud, Luke ix. 34. Yet he looks to the more excellent performance, which gives him hope that the clouds are not gathering for a deluge; they are covered, but not surrounded, with them. He expects that the wind will pass, (so it may be read,) and cleanse them; such a wind as passed over the earth, to clear it from the waters of Noah's flood; (Gen. vii. 1.) in token of the return of God's favour; and then fair weather will come out of the north, (v. 22.) and all will be well. God will not always frown, nor contend for ever. He hastens to conclude, now that God is about to speak; and therefore delivers much in a few words, as the sum of all that he had been discoursing of, which, if duly considered, would not only censure the nail he had been driving, but make way for what God would say.

(1.) That with God is terrible majesty. He is a God of glory, and such transcendent perfection as cannot but strike awe upon all his attendants, and a terror upon all his adversaries. With God there is terrible frame; so some; for he is fearful in frame, Exod. xv. 11.

(2.) That when we speak touching the Almighty, we must own that we cannot find him out; our finite understandings cannot comprehend his infinite perfections. Can we put the sea into an egg-shell? We cannot trace the steps he takes in his providence. His way is in the sea.

(3.) That he is excellent in power. It is the excellency of his power, that he can do whatever he pleases, in heaven and earth. The universal extent and irresistible force of his power, are the excellency of it; no creature has an arm like him, so long, so strong.

(4.) That he is no less excellent in wisdom and righteousness; in judgment and plenty of justice; else there would be little excellence in his power. We may urge the same reason that we who can do everything, will do everything for the best, for he is infinitely wise; and will not in any thing do wrong, for he is infinitely just. When he executes judgments upon sinners, yet there is plenty of justice in it, and he inflicts not more than they deserve.

(5.) That he will not afflict, that is, he will not afflict willingly; it is no pleasure to him to grieve the children of men, much less his own children. New afflictions but when there is cause, and when there is need, and he does not overburthen us with affliction, but considers our frame. Some read thus: "The Almighty, whom we cannot find out, is in great power, but he will not afflict in judgment, and with him is plenty of justice, nor is he extreme to mark what we do amiss."

(6.) He values not the censures of those that are wise in their own conceit; He respecteth them not, for he will not with his wrath to oblige them, nor can those that prescribe to him pull with him to do as they would have him do. He regards the prayer of the humble, but not the policies of the crafty. No, the foolishness of God is wiser than men, 1 Cor. i. 25.

Lastly. From all this it is easy to infer, that, since God is great, he is greatly to be feared; nay, because he is gracious, and will not afflict, men do therefore fear him, for there is no forgiveness with him, that may be feared, Ps. xxxv. 4. It is the duty and interest of all men to fear God. Men shall fear him; so some. Sooner or later, they shall fear him. They that will not fear the Lord and his goodness, shall for ever tremble under the pourings out of the vials of his wrath.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

In most disputes, the strife is, who shall have the last word. Job's friends had, in this controversy, tamely yielded it to Job, and then he to Elihu. But, after all the wranglings of the counsels at bar, the Judge upon the bench must have the last word; so God had here, and so he will have his in every controversy, for God's judgement proceeds from him, and by his definitive sentence every man must stand or fall, and every cause be won or lost. Job had often appealed to God, and had talked boldly how he would order his cause before him, and as a prince would he go near unto him; but when God took the throne, Job had nothing to say in his own defence, but was silent before him. It is not so easy a matter, says the Apostle, Acts xiv. 27. A man's friends have sometimes appealed to God too; Oh that God would speak! ch. xi. 5. And now, at length, God does speak, when Job, by Elihu's clear and close arguments, was mellowed a little, and mortified, and so prepared to hear what God had to say. It is the office of ministers to prepare the way of the Lord. That which the great God designs in this discourse, is, to humble Job, and bring him to repent of, and recant, his passionate, indecent, invective manner; to make him mind the controversy, and the court, with a profound speaking, and arowing challenge and demand in general, v. 2, 3, 11. He proceeds in divers particular instances and proofs of Job's utter inability to contend with God, because of his ignorance and weakness. For, 1. He knew nothing of the founding of the earth, v. 4-7. 2. Nothing of the limiting of the sea, v. 8-11. 3. Nothing of the morning-light, v. 12-15. 4. Nothing of the dark recesses of the sea and earth, v. 16-21. 5. Nothing of the springs in the clouds, (as in 2 Cor. ii. 14.) nothing toward the making of his own soul, v. 36. And, lastly, he could not provide for the lions and the raven, v. 39. 41. If, in these ordinary works of nature, Job was puzzled, how durst he pretend to dive into the secrets of God's government, and do as he doth? In this, as Bishop Patrick observes, God takes up the argument begun by Elihu, (who came nearest to the truth,) and prosecutes it in inimitable words, excelling his, and all other men's, in the loftiness of the style, as much as thunder does a whisper.

1. THEN the Lord answered Job out of the whirlwind, and said, 2. Who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge? 3. Gird up now thy loins like a man; for I will demand of thee, and answer thou me.

Let us observe here,
1. Who speaks; The Lord Jehovah, not a created angel, but the Eternal Word himself, the second person in the blessed Trinity, for it is he by whom the worlds were made, and that was no other than the Son of God. The same speaks here that afterward spake from mount Sinai. Here he begins with the creation of the world, and with the redemption of Israel out of Egypt, and, by way of reminder, refers the necessity of our subjection to him. Elihu had said, God speaks to men, and they do not perceive it; (ch. xxxvii. 14.) but this they could not but perceive, and yet we have a more sure word of prophecy, 2 Pet. i. 19.

2. When he spake: Then: when they had all had their saying, and yet had not gained their point, and Job's words, the third of his four friends, make him cry, Peccavi—I have done wrong; and, having humbled him, he puts honour upon him, by convincing his three friends that they had done him wrong. These two things God will, sooner or later, do for his people; he will show them their faults, that they may be themselves ashamed of them, and he will show others their righteousness, and bring it forth as the light, that they may be ashamed of their unjust censures of them.

3. How he spake; Out of the whirlwind, the rolling and involving cloud, which Elihu took notice of, ch. xxxvii. 1, 2, 9. A whirlwind prefaced Ezekiel's vision, (Ezek. i. 4.) and Elijah's, 1 Kings xix. 11. God is said to have his way in the whirlwind, (Nah. i. 3.) and, to show that even the stormy wind fulfils his word, here it was made the vehicle of it. This shows what a mighty voice God's is, even as strong, as it was, and as it is, but perfectly audible, even in the noise of a wide whirlwind. The Lord designs to startle Job, and to command his attention. Sometimes God answers his own people in terrible corrections, as out of the whirlwind, but always in righteousness.

4. To whom he spake: He answered Job, directed his speech to him, to convince him of what was amiss, before he cleared him from the unjust aspersions cast upon him. It is God only that can effectually convince of sin; and those shall so be humbled, whom he designs to exalt. Those that desire to hear from God, as Job did, shall certainly hear from him at length.

5. What he said; We may conjecture that Elihu, or some other of the auditory, wrote down verbatim what was delivered out of the whirlwind, for we find, (Rev. x. 4.) that, when the thunders uttered their voices, John was prepared to write. Or, if it was not written then, yet, the penman of the book being inspired by the Holy Ghost, we are sure that we have here a very true and exact report of what was said; The Spirit (says Christ) shall bring to your remembrance, as he did here, what I have said to you. The preface is very searching.

(1.) God charges him with ignorance and presumption in what he had said, (v. 2.) "Who is this that talks at this rate? Is it Job? What, a man that weak, foolish, despicable creature, whom he pretend to prescribe to me what I must do, or to quarrel with me for what I have done? Is it Job? What! my servant Job, a perfect and an upright man? Can he so far forget himself, and act unlike himself? What, where, is he that darkness counsel through words without knowledge? Let him show his face if he dare, and stand to what he has said."

Note, Darkening the counsel of God's wisdom with our folly, is a great affront and provocation to God. Concerning God's counsel, we must own that we are without knowledge. They are a deep which we cannot fathom; we are quite out of our element, out of our aim, when we pretend to account for them. Yet we are too apt to talk of them as if we understood them, with a great deal of niceness and boldness: but, alas! we do but darken them, instead of explaining them; we confound and perplex ourselves and one another, when we dispute of the order of God's decrees, and the designs, and reasons, and methods, of his operations of providence and grace. A humble faith and sincere obedience shall see further and better into the secret of the Lord, than all the philosophy of their schools, and the sages' science so called. This first word which God spake is the more observable, because Job, in his repentance, fastens upon it as that which succeeded to humble him, ch. xlii. 3. This he repeated and echoed to, as the arrow that stuck fast in him; "I am the fool that have darkened counsel." There was some colour to have mouthed it upon Elijah, as if God meant him, for he spake last, and was speaking when the whirlwind began; but Job applied it to himself, as it becomes us to do, when we with reproofs are given, and not (as most do) to billet them upon other people.

(2.) He challenges him to give such proofs of his knowledge as would serve to justify his inquiries into the divine counsels; (v. 3.) "Gird up now thy loins like a stout man; prepare thyself for the encounter; I will demand of thee, will put some questions to thee; and answer me, if thou canst, before I answer thee." Those that go about to call God to an account, must expect to be catedh, called to an account themselves, that they may be made sensible of their ignorance and arrogance. God here puts Job in mind of what he had said, (ch. xiii. 22.) "Call thou, and I will answer: 'Now make thy words good.'"

4. Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? declare, if thou hast understanding. 5. Who hath laid the measures thereof, if thou knowest? or who hath stretched the line upon it? 6. Whereupon are the foundations thereof fastened? or who laid the corner-stone thereof? 7. When the morning-stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy? 8. Or who shut up the sea with doors, when it brake forth as if it had issued out of the womb? 9. When I made the cloud the garment thereof, and thick darkness a swaddling-band for it, 10. And brake up for it my decreed place, and set bars and doors, 11. And said, Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further; and here shall thy proud waves be stayed?

For the humbling of Job, God here shows him his ignorance, even concerning the earth and the sea. Though so near, though so bulky, yet he could give no account of their origination; much less of heaven above or hell beneath, which are at such a distance, or of the several parts of matter which are so minute, and then, least of all, of the divine counsels.

1. Concerning the founding of the earth. If he have such a mighty insight, as he pretends to have, into the counsels of God, let him give some account of the earth he goes upon, which is given to the children of men.

1. Let him tell where he was when this lower world was made, and whether he was advising or assisting in that wonderful work; (v. 4.) "Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? Thy pretensions are high; canst thou pretend to this? Was thou present when the world was made?" See here, (1.) The greatness and glory of God; I laid the foundations of the earth. This proves him to be the only living and true God, and a God of power, (Isa. xl. 11. Jer. x. 12, 13.) and encourages us to trust in him at all times, Isa. ii. 13, 16. (2.) The meanness and contemptibleness of man; "Where wast thou then? Thou that hast made such a figure among the children of the east, and settled up for an oracle, and a judge of the divine counsels, where wast thou when the foundations of the earth were laid?" So far were we from having any hand in the creation of the world, which might entitle us to a dominion in it, or so much as being witnesses of it, by which we might have gained an insight into it, that we were not then in being. The first man was not, much less were we. It is the honour of Christ that he was present when this was done; (Prov. viii. 29. &c.) John i. 1, 2.) and we are the more the wonder, see what God has been pleased to give us, if we will not, therefore, find fault with the works of God, nor prescribe to him. He did not consult us in making the world, and yet it is well made; why should we expect, then, that he should take his measures from us in governing it?

2. Let him describe how this world was made, and give a particular account of the manner in which this strong and stately edifice was formed and erected; "Declare, if thou hast so much understanding as thou dost pretend to have, what were the advances of that work?" Those that pretend to have understanding above others, ought to give proof of it; show me thy faith by thy works, thy knowledge by thy words. Let Job declare, if he can,

(1.) How the world came to be so finely framed, with so much exactness, and such an admirable symmetry and proportion of all the parts of it; (v. 5.) "So He laid its foundations, and let the measures thereof, and stretched out the line upon it. Wast thou the architect that formed the model, and then drew the dimensions by rule according to it? The vast bulk of the earth is moulded as regularly as if it had been done by line and measure; but who can describe how it was cast into this figure? Who can determine its circumference and diameter, and all the lines that are drawn on the terrestrial globe? Is it to this day a dispute whether the earth stands still or turns round;* how then can we determine by what measures it was first formed?"

(2.) How it came to be so firmly fixed. Though it is hung upon nothing, yet it is established, that it cannot be moved; but who can tell upon what the foundations of it are fastened, that it may not sink with its own weight, or who laid the corner-stone thereof, that the parts of it may not fall asunder? (v. 13.) Wast thou the hewer of the mountains of the earth? (Ecc. iii. 14.) and therefore, as we cannot find fault with God's work, so we need not be in fear concerning it; it will last, and answer the end, the works of his providence, as well as the work of creation; the measures of neither can ever be ever be known; and the work of redemption is no less firm, of which Christ himself is both the Foundation and the Corner-stone. The church stands as fast as the earth.

* Such a dispute, in the present day, scarcely exists, even among the vulgar.—Ed.
3. Let him repeat, if he can, the songs of praise which were sung at that solemnity; (v. 7.) when the morning-stars sang together, the blessed angels, (the First-born of the Father of light,) who, in the morning of time, shone bright as the morning-star, going immediately before the light which God commanded to shine out of darkness upon the seeds of this lower world, the earth, which was without form and void. They were the sons of God, who shouted for joy, when they saw the foundations of the earth laid, because, though it was not made for them, but for the direct use of men, and though it would increase their work and service, yet they knew that the Eternal Wisdom and Word, whom they were to worship, (Heb. i. 6.) would rejoice in the habitable parts of the earth, and that much of his delight would be in the sons of men, Prov. viii. 31. The angels are called the sons of God, because they bear much of his image, are with him in his house above, and serve him as a son does his father. They now observe here, (1.) The glory of God, as the Creator of the world, is to be celebrated with joy and triumph by all his reasonable creatures; for they are qualified and appointed to be the collectors of his praises from the inferior creatures, who can praise him merely as objects that exemplify his workmanship. (2.) The work of angels is to praise God; the more we abound in holy, humble, thankful, joyful praise, the more we do the will of God as they do it; and whereas we are so barren and defective in praising God, it is a comfort to think that they are doing it in a better manner. (3.) They were unanimous in singing God's praises: they sang together with one accord, and there was no jar in their harmony. The sweetest concerts are in praising God. (4.) They all did it, even those who afterward fell, and left their first estate; even those who have praised God may, by the de- cidual power of sin, be brought to blaspheme him, and yet God will be eternally praised. 11. Concerning the limiting of the sea to the place appointed for it, v. 8, &c. This refers to the third day's work, when God said, (Gen. i. 9.) Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and it was so. 10. Out of the great deep or chaos, in which earth and water were intermixed, in obedience to the divine command, the waters break forth like a child out of the teeming womb, v. 8. Then the waters that had covered the deep, and stood above the mountains in repulsive vapors, at God's rebuke they fled, Ps. cix. 6, 7. 2. This new-born babe is clothed and swaddled, v. 9. The cloud is made the garment thereof, with which it is covered, and thick darkness (that is, shores vastly remote and distant from one another, and quite in the dark one to another) is a swaddlingband for it. See with what case the great God manages the raging sea; notwithstanding the violences of its tides, and the strength and violence of its waves, he manages it as the nurse does the child in swaddlingclothes. It is not said, He made rocks and mountains its swaddling-bands, but clouds and darkness; something that we are not aware of, and would think least likely for such a purpose. 3. There is a cradle, too, provided for this babe; I brake up for it my decreed place, v. 10. Valleys were sunk for it in the earth, capacious enough to receive it, and there it is I did to sleep; if it be sometimes referred to the resting place of the sun (as Dr. Clarke observes) is but the rocking of the cradle, which makes it sleep the fester. As for the sea, so for every one of us, there is a decreed place; for he that determined the times before appointed, determined also the bounds of our habitation. 4. This babe being made unruly and dangerous by the sin of man, which was the original of all unhappiness and danger in this lower world, there is also a prison provided for it; bars and doors were set, v. 10. And it is said to it, by way of check to its insolence, Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further. The sea is God's, for he made it, he restrains it; he says to it, Here shalt thou proud waves be stayed, v. 11. This may be considered as an act of God's power over the sea; though it is so vast a body, and though its motion is sometimes extremely violent, yet God has it under check; its waves rise no higher, its tides roll no further, than God permits; and it is mentioned as a reason why we should stand in awe of God, (Jer. v. 23.) and yet why we should encourage ourselves in him; for he that stops the rise of the sea, even the noise of her waves, can, when he pleases, still the tumult of the people, Ps. lxv. 7. It is also to be looked upon as an act of God's mercy to the world of mankind, and an instance of his patience toward that provoking race; though he could easily cover the earth again with the waters of the sea, (and, methinks, every flowing tide twice a-day threatens us, and shows what the sea could do, and would do, if God would give it leave,) yet he restrains them, being not willing that any should perish, and having reserved the world that now is, unto fire, 2 Pet. iii. 7. 12. Hast thou commanded the morning since thy days; and caused the day-spring to know his place; 13. That it might take hold of the ends of the earth, that the wicked might be shaken out of it? 14. It is turned as clay to the seal; and they stand as a garment. 15. And from the wicked their light is withheld, and the high arm shall be broken. 16. Hast thou entered into the springs of the sea? or hast thou walked in the search of the depth? 17. Have the gates of death been opened unto thee? or hast thou seen the doors of the shadow of death? 18. Hast thou perceived the breadth of the earth? declare, if thou knowest it all. 19. Where is the way where light dwelleth? and as for darkness, where is the place thereof? 20. That thou shouldst take it to the bound thereof, and that thou shouldst know the paths to the house thereof? 21. Knowest thou it, because thou wast then born? or because the number of thy days is great? 22. Hast thou entered into the treasures of the snow, or hast thou seen the treasures of the hail, 23. Which I have reserved against the time of trouble, against the day of battle and war? 24. By what way is the light parted, which scattereth the east wind upon the earth? 25. The Lord here proceeds to ask Job many confounding questions, to convince him of his ignorance, and so to shame him for his folly in prescribing to God. If we will but try ourselves with such interrogatories as these, we shall soon be brought to own that what we know is nothing in comparison with what we know not. Job is here challenged to give an account of six things. 1. Of the springs of the morning, the day-spring from on high, v. 12-15. As there is no visible being of which we may be more firmly assured that it is, so there is none which we are more puzzled in describing, nor more doubtful in determining what it is, than the light. We welcome the morning, the day-spring, as the dayspring of the day; but that which commanded since our days, but what it is, it was long before we were born, so that it was neither made by us, nor designed primarily for us, but we take it as we find it, and as the many generations had it that went before us. The day-spring knew its place before we knew ours, for we are but of yesterday. 2. It was not we, it was not any man, that commanded the morning-light at first, or appointed the place of its rising up and shining forth, or the time of it. The constant and regular succession of day and night, was no contrivance of ours, it is the glory of God that it shows, and his hand-work, not ours, Ps. xix. 1, 2. 3. It is quite out of our power to alter this course; "Hast thou countermanded the morning since thy days? Hast thou at any time raised the morning light sooner than its appointed time, to serve thy purpose, when thou hast waited for the morning; or ordered the day-spring for thy convenience to any other place than its own? No, never. Why then wilt thou pretend to direct the divine counsels, or expect to have the methods of Providence altered in favour of thee?"

We may as soon break the covenant of the day and of the night, as any part of God's covenant with his people, and particularly that, I will chasten them with the rod of men. 4. It is God that has appointed the day-spring to visit the earth, and diffuses the light through the air, which receives it as readily as the clay does the seal, (p. 14.) immediately admitting the impressions of it, so as of a sudden to be all one; enlightened by it, as the seal stamps its image on the wax; and they stand as a garment, or as if they were clothed with a garment. The earth puts on a new face every morning, and dresses itself as we do, puts on light as a garment, and is then to be seen. 5. This is made a terror to evil-doers. Nothing is more uncomfortable to mankind than the light of the morning; it is pleasant to the eyes, it is serviceable to life and the business of it, and the favour of it is universally extended, for it takes hold of the ends of the earth; and we should dwell, in our hymns to the light, not on its advantages to the earth, but God here observes how unwelcome it is to those that do evil, and therefore hate the light. God makes the light a minister of his justice, as well as of his grace, and is naturally quick to visit the ends of the earth, and for that purpose it takes hold of the ends of it, as we take hold of the ends of a garment, to shake the dust and moths out of it. Job had observed what a terror the morning-light is to criminals, because it discovers them, (ch. xxiv. 13, &c.) and God here secondeth the observation, and asks him, whether the world was indebted to him for that kindness? No, the great Judge of the world sends forth the beams of the morning-light, as his messenger, to proclaim the doom against him; they may only be defeated in their purposes, and put to shame, but that they may be brought to confound punishment, (p. 15.) that their light may be withheld from them, that is, that they may lose their comfort, their confidence, their liberties, their lives, and that their high arm, which they have lifted up against God and man, may be broken, and they deprived of their power to do mischief. When we see what is hence so much of the morning-light, was designed to represent, as in a figure, the light of the gospel of Christ, and to give a type of it, I will not say; but I am sure it may serve to put us in mind of the encomiums given to the gospel just at the rising of its morning-star, by Zecharias, (Luke i. 78.) By the tender mercy of our God, the day-spring from on high has visited us, to give light to them that sit in darkness, whose hearts are turned to it as clay to the seal, 2 Cor. iv. 6. The virgin Mary too, (Luke i. 31.) shows that God, in his gospel, has showed strength with his arm, scattered the proud, and put down the mighty, by the light which he designed to shake the wicked, to shake the wickedness itself out of the earth, and break its high arm.

II. Of the springs of the sea; (v. 16.) "Hast thou entered into them, or hast thou walked in the search of the depth? Knowest thou what lies in the bottom of the sea, the treasures hid in the sands? Or canst thou give an account of the rise and original of the waters of the sea? Vapours are continually issued out of the sea. Dost thou know how the rains are gathered, by what means they are applied? Rivers are constantly poured into the sea. Dost thou know how they are continually discharged, so as not to overflow the earth? Art thou acquainted with the secret subterraneous passages by which the waters circulate?" God's way, in the government of the world, is said to be in the sea, and in the great waters, (Ps. lxxvii. 19.) intimating that it is hid from us, and not to be tried into by us.

III. Of the gates of death; Have these been often to thee? v. 16. Death is a grand secret. 1. We know not beforehand when and how, and by what means, we or others shall be brought to death; by what read we must go the way whence we shall not return; what disease or what disaster will be the door to let us into the house appointed for all living; Man knows not his time. 2. We cannot describe what death is, how the knot is untied between body and soul, nor how the spiritual light goes out, and that is a query, as Mr. Norris expresses it; with what dreadful curiosity (says he) does the soul launch out into the vast ocean of eternity, and resign to an untried abyss! Let us make it sure that the gates of heaven shall be opened to us on the other side death, and then we need not fear the opening of the gates of death, though it is a way we are to go but once. 3. We have no correspondence at all with separate souls, nor any acquaintance with their state. It is an unknown, undiscovered, region to which they are removed, we can neither hear from them, nor send to them. While we are here in a world of sense, we speak of the world of spirits, as blind men do of colours, and when we remove thither, shall be amazed to find how much we are mistaken.

IV. Of the breadth of the earth; (v. 18.) "Hast thou perceived that? The knowledge of this might seem most proper to him, and within what bounds he is challenged to declare this, if he can. We have our residence on the earth, God has given it to the children of men; but who ever surveyed it, or could give an account of the number of its acres? It is but a point to the universe; yet, small as it is, we cannot be exact in declaring the dimensions of it. Job had never sailed round the world, nor any before him; so little did men know the breadth of the earth, that what is said to a fame that the continent of America was discovered, which had, time out of mind, lain hid. The divine perfection is longer than the earth, and broader than the sea; it is therefore presumption for us, who perceive not the breadth of the earth, to dive into the depth of God's counsels.

V. Of the place and way of light and darkness. Of the day-spring he had spoken before, (v. 12.) and the way he speaks of it again; (v. 19.) Where is the way where light dwelleth? And again, (v. 24.) By what way is the light parted? He challenges him to describe, 1. How the light and darkness were at first made; when God, in the beginning, first spread darkness upon the face of the deep, and afterward commanded the light to shine out of darkness, by that might word, Let there be light, was Job a witness to the order, to the operation? can he tell where the fountains of light and darkness are, and where those mighty princes keep their courts distinct, while in one world they rule alternately? Though we long ever so much either for the shining forth of the morning, or the shadows of the evening, we know not whither to send, or go, to fetch them, nor can tell the paths to the house thereof, v. 26. We were more than the number of our days so great, that we can describe the birth of that first-born of the visible creation, v. 21. Shall we then undertake to discourse of God's counsels, which were from eternity, or to find out the paths to the house thereof, to solicit for the alteration of them? God glories in it, that he forms the light and creates the darkness; and, if we must take those as we find them, take them as they come, and quarrel with neither, but make the best of both, then they must, in like manner, accommodate ourselves to the pean, and the evil which God likewise created, Isa. xlv. 7.

2. How they still keep their turns interchangeably. It is God that makes the outgoings of the morning and of the evening to rejoice; (Ps. lxv. 8.) for it is his order, and no order of ours, that is executed by the outgoings of the morning-light, and the darkness of the night. We cannot so much as tell whence they come, or whither they go, (v. 24.) But God's lightTherefore, if we imagine that we are in the dark, or, in another manner, when, in an instant, it shoots itself into all parts of the air above the horizon, as if the morning-light flew upon the wings of an east-wind, so swiftly, so strongly, as it carried, scattering the darkness of the night, as the east-wind does the clouds? Hence we read of the wings of the morning, (Ps. cxxxix. 9.) on which the light is conveyed to the uttermost parts of the sea, and scattered like an east-wind upon the earth. It is a marvellous change, that passes over us every morning by the return of the light, and every evening by the return of the darkness; but we expect them, and so they are no surprise or uneasiness to us. If we would, in like manner, count upon changes in our outward condition, we should neither in the brightest noon count upon perpetual day, nor in the darkest midnight despair of the return of the morning. God has set the one over against the other, like the day and night; and so have, Ecc. xii. 14.

VI. Of the treasures of the snow and hail; (v. 22, 23.) "Hast thou entered into those, and taken a view of them?" In the clouds the snow and hail are generated, and thence they come in such abundance, that one would think there were treasures of them laid up in store there, whereas indeed they are produced extemore, as I may say, and pro re nata—on the occasion. Sometimes they come so opportune to serve the purposes of Providence, in God's fighting for his people, and against his and their enemies, that one would think they were laid up as magazines, or stores of arms, ammunition, and provisions, against the time of trouble, the day of battle and war; when God will either contend with the world in general, as in the deluge, when the windows of heaven were opened, and the waters fetched out of these treasures to drown a wicked world, that waged war with Heaven, or with some particular persons or parties, as when God out of these treasures fetched great hail-stones where-with to fight against the Canaanites. Josh. x. 11. See what folly it is to strive against God, who is thus prepared for battle and war, and how much it is our interest to make our peace with him, and to keep ourselves in his love! God can fight as effectually with snow and hail, if he pleases, as with thunder and lightning, or the sword of an angel.

25. Who hath divided a water-course for the overflowing of waters; or for a way for the lightning of thunder; 26. To cause it to rain on the earth, where no man is; on the wilderness, wherein is no man; 27. To satisfy the desolate and waste ground, and to cause the bud of the tender herb to spring forth? 28. Hath the rain a father? or who hath begotten the drops of dew? 29. Out of whose womb came the ice? and the hoary frost of heaven, who hath gendered it? 30. The waters are hid as with a stone, and the face of the deep is frozen. 31. Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades, or loose the bands of Orion? 32. Canst thou bring forth Mazzaroth in his season? or canst thou guide Arcturus with his sons? 33. Knowest thou the ordinances of heaven? canst thou set the dominion thereof in the earth? 34. Canst thou lift up thy voice to the clouds, that abundance of waters may cover thee? 35. Canst thou send lightnings, that they may go, and say unto thee, Here we are? 36. Who hath put wisdom in the inward parts, or who hath given understanding to the heart? 37. Who can number the clouds in wisdom? or who can stay the bottles of heaven, 38. When the dust growth into hardness, and the clogs cleave fast together? 39. Wilt thou hunt the prey for the lion? or fill the appetite of the young lions, 40. When they couch in their dens, and abide in the covert to lie in wait? 41. Who provideth for the raven his food? when his young ones cry unto God, they wander for lack of meat.

Hitherto, God had put such questions to Job, as were proper to convince him of his ignorance and short-sightedness. Now, he comes, in the same manner, to show his impotency and weakness. As much is but little that he knows, and therefore he ought not to arrogate the divine counsels, so it is but little that he can do, and therefore he ought not to oppose the proceedings of Providence. Let him consider what great things God does, and try whether he can do the like, or whether he thinks himself an equal match for him.

1. How great God is. (1.) He has a sovereign dominion over the waters, has appointed them their course, even then when they seem to overflow, and to be from under his check, v. 25. He has divided a water-course, directs the rain where to fall, even when the shower is most violent, with as much certainty as if it were conveyed by canals or conduit-pipes. Thus the hearts of kings are said to be in God's hand; and, as the rains, those rivers of God, he turns them whithersoever he will. Every drop goes as it is directed. God has sworn, that the wa-goes on thine errand, and do the execution thou wstretch est for? Will they come at thy call, and say unto thee, Here we are? No, the ministers of God's wrath will not be ministers of ours. Why should they, then, if the work of man works not the righteousness of God?

2. God has the stars of heaven under his command and cognizance; we have not. Our meditations are now to rise higher, far above the clouds, to the glorious lights above. He mentions, not the planets, which move in lower orbs, but the fixed stars, which are much higher. It is supposed that they have an influence upon this earth, notwithstanding they are not under the minds of men, or the events of providence, (man's things are determined by their stars,) but upon the ordinary course of nature; they are set for signs and seasons, for days and years, Gen. i. 14. And if the stars have such a dominion over this earth, (v. 33.) though they have their place in the heavens, and are but mere matter, much more has He who is their Maker, and ours, and who is an Eternal Mind. Now see how weak we are. 1. We cannot take the stars for our counsels; for they are the agents that are instrumental to produce the pleasures of the spring; Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades— the seven stars, that constellation which lies in so small a compass, (none in less,) and yet sheds very benign influences upon the earth. Nor can we alter theirs that introduce the rigour of the winter; Canst thou loose the bands of Orion?—that magnificent constellation which makes so great a figure, (none greater,) and dispenses rough and unpleasant influences, which we cannot control or repel. Both summer and winter will have their course; God can change them when he pleases, can make the spring cold, and so bind the sweet influences of Pleiades, and the winter warm, and so loose the bands of Orion; but we cannot. 2. It is not in our power to order the motions of the stars, nor are we entrusted with the conduct of them. God, who calls the stars by their names, (Ps. cxlvii. 4.) calls them forth in their respective seasons, appoints them the time of their rising and setting; but this is not in our province, we cannot bring forth Mazzaorath—the stars in the southern signs, nor guide Arcturus—those in the northern, v. 32. God can bring forth the stars to battle, (as he did when in their courses they fought against Sisera,) and guide them in the attacks they are ordered to make; but man cannot do so. 3. We are not only unconcerned in the government of the stars, (the government they are under, and the government they intrusted with, for they both rule and are ruled,) but utterly unacquainted with it; we know not the ordinances of heaven, v. 33. So far are we from being able to change them, that we can give no account of them: they are a secret to us. Shall we then pretend to know God's counsels, and the reasons of them? If it were left to us to set the dominion of the stars upon the earth, we should soon be at a loss. Shall we then teach God how to govern? The world did not; but God must.

III. God is the Author and Giver, the Father and Fountain, of all wisdom and understanding, v. 36. The souls of men are nobler and more excellent beings than the stars of heaven themselves, and shine brighter. The powers and faculties of reason with which man is endowed, and the wonderful performances of thought, brings him into some alliance to the blessed angels; and whence comes this light? From God. Here is a lowly term of the expression of wisdom into the inward parts of man, and given understanding to the heart? 1. The rational soul itself, and its capacities, come from him as the God of nature, for he forms the spirit of man within him. We did not make our own souls, nor can we do—scribe how they act, or how they are united to our bodies. He only, that made them, knows them, and knows how to manage them. He fashioneth men's hearts alike in some things, and yet unlike in others. 2. True wisdom, with its furniture and improvement, comes from him as the God of grace, and the Father of every good and perfect gift. Shall we pretend to be wiser than God, who have all our wisdom from him? Nay, shall we pretend to be wise above our sphere, and beyond the limits which he that gave us our understanding sets to it? He designed we should with it serve God, and do our duty, but never intended we should with it set up for directors of the stars or the lightning.

IV. God has the clouds under his cognizance and government, but so have not we, v. 37. Can any man, with all his wisdom, undertake to number the clouds? or (as it may be read) to declare and describe how far the distance of the stars which are, in our own atmosphere, yet we know little more of them than of the stars which are at so great a distance. And when the clouds have poured down rain in abundance, so that the dust grows into solid mire, and the clouds cleave fast together, (v. 38.) who can stay the bottles of heaven? Who can stop them, that it may not always rain? The power and goodness of God are herein to be acknowledged, that he gives the earth rain enough, but deigns not to give us in our own atmosphere, yet we know little more of them than of the stars which are at so great a distance. And when the clouds have poured down rain in abundance, so that the dust grows into solid mire, and the clouds cleave fast together, (v. 38.) who can stay the bottles of heaven? Who can stop them, that it may not always rain? The power and goodness of God are herein to be acknowledged, that he gives the earth rain enough, but deigns not to give us in our own atmosphere, yet we know little more of them than of the stars which are at so great a distance. And when the clouds have poured down rain in abundance, so that the dust grows into solid mire, and the clouds cleave fast together, (v. 38.) who can stay the bottles of heaven? Who can stop them, that it may not always rain? The power and goodness of God are herein to be acknowledged, that he gives the earth rain enough, but deigns not to give us in our own atmosphere, yet we know little more of them than of the stars which are at so great a distance.

V. God provides food for the inferior creatures, and it is by his providence, not by any care or pains of ours, that they are fed. The following chapter is wholly taken up with the instances of God's providence and goodness to the inferior creatures, and therefore some transfer to it the three last verses of this chapter, which speak of the provision made.

For the lions; (v. 39, 40.) "Thou dost not pretend that the clouds and stars have any dependence upon thee, for they are above thee; but, on the earth, thou thinkest thyself paramount, let us try that then; Wilt thou hunt the fowes for the lion? Thou valuest thyself upon thy possessions of cattle which thou wast once owner of, the oxen, and asses, and camels, and all that is thine; but wilt thou undertake the maintenance of the lions, and the young lions, when they couch in their dens, waiting for a prey? No, thou needest not do it, they can shift for themselves without thee: thou canst not do it, for thou hast not wherewithal to satisfy them: thou darest not do it; shouldst thou come to feed them, they would be upon thee. But I do it." See the all-sufficiency of the Divine Providence; it has wherewithal to satisfy the desire of every living thing, even the most ravenous. See the bounty of the Divine Providence, that, wherever it has given life, will give livelihood, even to those creatures that are not only not serviceable, but dangerous, to man. And see its sovereignty, that it suffers some creatures to be killed for the support of other creatures: the harmless sheep are torn to pieces, to fill the appetite of the young lions, who yet sometimes are made to lack and suffer hunger, to punish them for their cruelty, while those that fear God want no good thing.

For the young ravens, v. 41. As ravenous beasts, so ravenous birds, are fed by the Divine Providence. Who but God provides for the raven, his food? Man does not, he takes care only of those creatures that are, or may be, useful to him. But God has a regard to all the works of his hands, over the meanest and least valuable. The ravens, young ones, are in a special manner necessitous, and God supplies them, Ps. cxlvii. 9. God's feeding the fowls, especially these fowls, (Matth. vi. 26.) is an encouragement to us to trust him for our daily bread. See here, (1.) What distress the young ravens are often in; they wander for lack of meat. The old ones, they say, neglect them, and do not provide for them as other birds do for their young: and indeed those that are ravenous to others, are commonly barbarous to their own, and unnatural. (2.) What the young ones do in that distress; they cry, for they are noisy, clamorous, creatures, and this is interpreted a crying to God. It being the distress of nature, it is looked upon as directed to the God of nature. The putting of so favourable a construction as this upon the cries of the young ravens, may encourage us in our prayers, though we can but cry, Abba, Father. (3.) What God does for them; some way or other, he provides for them, so that they grow up, and come to maturity. And he that takes this care of the young ravens, certainly will not be wanting to his people, or theirs. This being but one instance of many of the divine compassion, may give us occasion to think how much good our God does, every day, beyond what we are aware of.

CHAP. XXXIX.

God proceeds here to show Job what little reason he had to charge him with unkindness, who so compassionately doth arise to the inferior creatures, and took such a tender care of them; or to boast of himself, and his own good deeds before God, which were nothing to the divine mercies. He shows him also what great reason he had to be humble, who knows so little of the nature of the creatures about him, and had so little influence upon them, and to submit to that God on whom they all depend. He discourses particularly, I. Concerning the wild goats and the hinds, v. 1-4. II. Concerning the wild ass, v. 5-8. III. Concerning the unicorn, v. 9-12. IV. Concerning the peacock, v. 13. V. Concerning the ostrich, v. 13-18. VI. Concerning the horse, v. 19-25. VII. Concerning the hawk and the eagle, v. 26-30.

1. K NOWEST thou the time when the wild goats of the rock bring forth? or canst thou mark when the hind doth calve? 2. Canst thou number the months that they fulfill; or knowest thou the time when they bring forth? 3. They bow themselves, they bring forth their young ones, they cast out their sorrows. 4. Their young ones are in good liking, they grow up with corn; they go forth, and return not unto them. 5. Who hath sent out the wild ass free? or who hath loosed the bands of the wild ass? 6. Whose house I have made the wilderness, and the barren land his dwellings. 7. He scorneth the multitude of the city, neither regardeth he the crying of the driver. 8. The range of the mountains is his pasture, and he searcheth after every green thing. 9. Will the unicorn be willing to serve thee, or abide by thy crib? 10. Canst thou bind the unicorn with his band in the furrow? or will he harrow the valleys after thee? 11. Wilt thou trust him, because his strength is great? or wilt thou leave thy labour to him? 12. Wilt thou believe him, that he will bring home thy seed, and gather it into thy barn?

God here shows Job what little acquaintance he had with the untamed creatures that run wild in the deserts, and live at large, but are the care of the Divine Providence. As,

I. The wild goats and the hinds. That which is taken notice of concerning them, is, the bringing forth, and bringing up, of their young ones. For as every individual is fed, so every species of the wild ass is provided for, the care of the Divine Providence, Lord, for aught we know, none extinct to this day.

Observe here,

1. Concerning the production of their young. (1.) Man is wholly ignorant of the time when they bring forth, v. 1, 2. Shall we pretend to tell what is in the womb of Providence, or what a day will bring forth, who know not the time of the pregnancy of a hind or a wild goat? (2.) Though they bring forth their young ones in a great number, and sordidly, and have no assistance from man, yet, by the good providence of God, their young ones are safely produced, and their sorrows cast out and forgotten, v. 3. Some think it is intimated, (Ps. xxix. 9.) that God by thunder helps the hinds in calving. Let it be observed, for the comfort of women in labour, that God helps even the hinds to bring forth their young; and shall he not more succour them, and save them in child-bearing, who are his children, and have no servant who can help them to bring forth?

2. Concerning the growth of their young; (v. 4.) They are in good liking; though they are brought forth in sorrow, after their dams have suckled them a while, they shift for themselves in the corn-fields, and are no more burthensome to them, which is an example to children, when they are grown up, not to be always hanging upon their parents, and craving from them, but to put forth themselves to get their own livelihood, and to require their parents.

II. The wild ass: a creature we frequently read of in scripture; some say, untemprable. Man is said to be born as the wild ass’s colt, so hard to be governed. Three things Providence has allotted to the wild ass. 1. An unbounded liberty; (v. 5.) Who, but God, has sent out the wild ass free? He has given a disposition to it, and therefore a dispensation for it. The tame ass is bound to labour, the wild ass has no bonds on him. Note, Freedom from service, and liberty to range at pleasure, are but the privileges of a wild ass. It is a pity that any of the children of men should covet it, or value themselves on it. It is better to labour and be good for something, than ramble and be good for nothing. But if, among men, Providence sets some at liberty, and suffers them to live at ease, while others are doomed to servitude, we must not marvel at the matter, it is so among the brute-creatures. 2. An uncensured lodging; (v. 6.) whose house I say, during the wilderness, where he has room enough to traverse his ways, and snuff up the wind at his pleasure, as the wild ass is said to do, (Jer. ii. 24.) as if he were to live upon the air, for it is the barren land that is his dwelling. Observe, The tame ass, that labours, and is serviceable to man, has his master’s crib to go to, both for shelter and food, and lives in a fruitful land; but the wild ass, that will have his liberty, must live in complete misery, that will not labour, let him not eat. He that will, shall eat the labour of his hands, and have also to give to him that needs. Jacob, the shepherd, has good red potage to spare, when Esau, a sportsman, was ready to perish for hunger. A further description of the liberty and livelihood of the wild ass we have, v. 7, 8. (1.) He has no owner, nor will he be in subjection; he scorns the multitude of the city. If they have a multitude of their own, that will reward him with a multitude, he will soon get clear of them, and the crying of the driver is nothing to him. He laughters at those that live in the tumult and bustle of cities, (so Bishop Patrick,) thinking himself happier in the wilderness; and opinion is the rate of things. (2.) Having no owner, he has no feeder, nor is any provision made for him, but he must shift for himself; the range of the mountains is his pasture, and a bare pasture it is; there he searches here and there after a green thing, as he can find it and pick it up; whereas the labouring labours have green things in plenty, without their searching for them. From these and other tokens of this and other creatures, we may infer how unfit we are to give law to Providence, who cannot give law even to a wild ass’s colt.

III. The unicorn; Rhem; a strong creature, (Numb. xcvii. 22.) a stately proud creature, Ps. lix. 10. He is able to serve, but not willing; and God here challenges Job to force him to it. Job expected every thing should be just as he would have it. "Since thou dost pretend," (says God) "to bring every thing beneath thy sway, begin with the unicorn, and try thy skill upon him. Now that thine oxen and asses are all gone, try whether he will be willing to serve thee in their stead, (v. 9.) and whether he will take up with the provision thou usest to make for them. Will he abide by thy crib? No," 1. "Thou canst not tame him, nor bind him with his band, nor set him to draw the harrow," v. 10. These are creatures that are willing to serve man, and seem to take a delight to have a love for their masters; but there are such as will never be brought to it; and it is the effect of sin: m. n. is revoluted from his subjection to his Maker, and is therefore justly punished with the revolt of the inferior creatures from their subjection to him; and yet, as an instance of God’s good-will to man, there are some that are still serviceable to humankind. Though the wild bull (which some think is meant here by the unicorn) will not serve man, nor submit to his hand in the furrows, yet there are tame bullocks that will, and other animals that are not ferre nature—of a wild nature, in whom man may have a property, for whom he provides, and to whose service he is entitled. Lord, what is man, that thou art thus mindful of him? 2. ‘Thou darst not trust him; though his strength is great, yet thou wilt not leave thy labour to him, as thou dost where the unicorn will not serve man, nor submit to his hand in the furrows, yet there are tame bullocks that will, and other animals that are not ferre nature—of a wild nature, in whom man may have a property, for whom he provides, and to whose service he is entitled. Lord, what is man, that thou art thus mindful of him? 2. ‘Thou darst not trust him; though his strength is great, yet thou wilt not leave thy labour to him, as thou dost where the unicorn will not serve man, nor submit to his hand in the furrows, yet there are tame bullocks that will, and other animals that are not ferre nature—of a wild nature, in whom man may have a property, for whom he provides, and to whose service he is entitled. Lord, what is man, that thou art thus mindful of him? 2. ‘Thou darst not trust him; though his strength is great, yet thou wilt not leave thy labour to him, as thou dost where the unicorn will not serve man, nor submit to his hand in the furrows, yet there are tame bullocks that will, and other animals that are not ferre nature—of a wild nature, in whom man may have a property, for whom he provides, and to whose service he is entitled. Lord, what is man, that thou art thus mindful of him? 2. ‘Thou darst not trust him; though his strength is great, yet thou wilt not leave thy labour to him, as thou dost where the unicorn will not serve man, nor submit to his hand in the furrows, yet there are tame bullocks that will, and other animals that are not ferre nature—of a wild nature, in whom man may have a property, for whom he provides, and to whose service he is entitled. Lord, what is man, that thou art thus mindful of him? 2.

13. Gavest thou the goodly wings unto the peacocks? or wings and feathers unto the ostrich? 14. Which leaveth her eggs in the earth, and warmeth them in the dust, 15. And forgettest that the foot may crush them, or that the wild beast may break them. 16. She is hardened against her young ones, as, though they were not hers: her labour is in vain without fear; 17. Because God hath deprived her of wisdom.
neither hath he imparted to her understanding. 18. What time she lifteth up herself on high, she scorneth the horse and his rider.

The ostrich is a wonderful animal, a very large bird, but it never flies. Some have called it a winged camel. God here gives an account of it, and observes,

I. Something that it has in common with the peacock, that is, beautiful feathers; (v. 13.)

1. Gavest thou proud wings unto the peacock? So some read it, and therefore merit compassion, the peacock is an emblem of pride; when he struts, and shows his fine feathers, Solomon, in all his glory, is not arrayed like him. The ostrich too has goodly feathers, and yet is a foolish bird; for wisdom does not always go along with beauty and gaiety. Other birds do not envy the peacock or the ostrich their gaudy colours, nor complain for want of them; why then should we repine, if we see others wear better clothes than we can afford? Does God give his gifts variously, and these gifts are not always the most valuable, that make the finest show? Who would not rather have the voice of the nightingale, than the tail of the peacock, the eye of the eagle, and her soaring wing, and the natural affections of the stork, than the beautiful wings and feathers of the ostrich, which can never rise above the earth, and is without natural affection?

II. Something that is peculiar to itself, the docility of her young. It is well that this is peculiar to herself, for it is a very bad character. Observe, (1.) How she exposes her eggs; she does not retire to some private place, and make a nest there, as the sparrows and swallows do, (Ps. lxxiv. 5.) and there lay eggs and her young. Most birds, as well as other animals, are strangely guided by natural instinct in providing for the preservation of their young. But the ostrich is a monster in nature, for she drops her eggs any where upon the ground, and takes no care to hatch them. If the sand and the sun will hatch them, well and good, they may for her, she will not warm them, v. 14. Nay, she takes no care to preserve them; the foot of the traveller may crush them, and the wild beast break them, v. 15. But how then are any young ones brought forth, and whence is it that the species is not perished? We must suppose, either that God, by a special providence, with the heat of the sun and the sand (so some think) bathes the neglected eggs of the ostrich, as he feeds the artless young ones of the raven; or, that, though the ostrich often leaves her eggs thus, yet not always. (2.) The reason why she does thus expose her eggs; it is, [1.] For want of natural affection; (v. 16.) She is hardened against her young ones. To be hardened against any is unamiable, even in a brute creature, much more in a rational creature that boasts of humanity; especially to be hardened against young ones, that cannot help themselves, and therefore merit compassion, and therefore merit no hard usage: but it is worst of all for her to be hardened against her own young ones, as though they were not hers, whereas, really, they are parts of herself. Her labour in laying her eggs, is in vain, and all lost, because she has not that fear and tender concern for them, that she should have. Those are most likely to lose their labour, that are least in fear of losing it. (2.) She is hardened against them; (v. 17.) God has deprived her of wisdom. This affirms, that she has, in her senses, which other animals have to nourish and preserve their young, is God's gift, and that, where it is not, God denies it, that, by the folly of the ostrich, as well as by the wisdom of the ant, we may learn to be wise; for, First, As careless as the ostrich is of her eggs, many people are of their own souls; they make no provision for them, no proper nest in which they may be safe, they leave them exposed to Satan and his temptations; a certain evidence that they are deprived of wisdom. Secondly, So careless are many parents of their children; some, of their bodies, not providing for their own house, their own bowels, and therefore worse than infants, and as bad as the ostrich; but many more are thus careless of their children's souls, take no care of their education, send them abroad into the world untaught, unarmed, forgetting what corruption there is in the world through lust, which will certainly crush them. Thus their labour in rearing them comes to be in vain; it was better for their country that they had been never born. Thus God says, So care less are too many ministers of their people, with whom they should reside; but they leave them in the earth, and forget how busy Satan is to sow tares while men sleep. They overlook those whom they should oversee, and are really hardened against them.

2. Care of herself. She leaves her eggs in danger, but, if she herself be in danger, no creature shall strive better to get out of the way of it than the ostrich. 18. Then she lifts up her wings on high, (the strength of her own的力量, and in better stead than their beauty,) and, with the help of them, runs so fast, that a horseman, at full speed, cannot overtake her; She scorneth the horse and his rider. Those that are least under the law of natural affection, often contend most for the law of self-preservation. Let not the rider be proud of the swiftness of his horse, when such an animal as the ostrich shall out-run him.

19. Hast thou given the horse strength? hast thou clothed his neck with thunder? 20. Canst thou make him afraid as a grasshopper? the glory of his nostrils is terrible. 21. He paweth in the valley, and rejoiceth in his strength: he goeth on to meet the armed men. 22. He mocketh at fear, and is not affrighted: neither turneth he back from the sword. 23. The quiver rattleth against him, the glittering spear and the shield. 24. He swalloweth the ground with fierceness and rage; neither believeth he that it is the sound of the trumpet. 25. He saith among the trumpets, Ha, ha! and he smelleth the battle afar off, the thunder of the captains, and the shouting.

God, having displayed his own power in those creatures that are strong, and desipse man, here shows it in one scarcely inferior to any of them in strength, and yet very tame, and serviceable to man, and that is, the horse; especially, the horse that is trained for the day of battle, and is serviceable to man at a time when he has more than ordinary occasion for his service. It seems there was, in Job's country, a noble generous breed of horses. Job, it is probable, kept many, though they are not mentioned among his possessions; cattle for use in husbandry being there valued more than those for state and war, which alone horses were then reserved for; and they were not then put to such mean services as with us they are commonly put to. Concerning the great horse, that stately beast, it is here observed,

1. That he has a great deal of strength and spirit; (v. 19.) Hast thou given the horse strength? He uses his strength for man, but has it not from him: God gave it him, who is the Fountain of all the powers of nature, and yet he himself delights not in the strength of the horse, (Ps. cxlii. 10.) but has told us that a horse is a vain thing for safety, Ps. xxxiii. 17. For running, drawing, and carrying, no creature that is ordinarily in the service of man, has much strength as the horse has, nor is of so stout and bold a spirit; not to be made afraid as a grasshopper, but daring and forward to face danger. It is a mercy to man to have such a servant, which, though very strong, submits to the management of a child, and rebels not against his owner; but let not the strength of a horse be trusted to, Hos. xiv. 3. Ps. xx. 7. Isa. xxxii. 1, 3.

That his neck and nostrils look great; his neck is close, and the flow of his mane, which makes him formidable, and is an ornament to him. The glory of his nostrils, when he snorts, flings up his head, and throws foam about, is terrible. Perhaps there might be, at that time, and in that country, a more stately breed of horses than any we have now.

3. That he is very fierce and furious in battle, and charges with an undaunted courage, though he pushes on in imminent danger of his life. (1.) See how frolicsome he is; (v. 21.) He fawns in the valley, scarcely knowing what ground he stands upon. He is proud of his strength, and he has much more reason to be so as using his strength in the service of man, and under his direction, than the wild ass that uses it in contempt of man, and in a revolt from him, v. 8. (2.) See how forward he is to engage; he goes on to meet the armed men, animated, not by the goodness of the cause, or the prospect of honour, but only by the soul of the trumpet, the thunder of the captains, and the shout of the soldiers, which are as bellows to the fire of his innate courage, and make him spring forward with the utmost eagerness, as if he cried, Ha, ha, v. 25. How wonderfully are the brute-creatures fitted for, and inclined to, the services for which they were designed. (3.) See how fearless he is; how he despises death, and the most threatening dangers; (v. 22.) He mocks at fear, and makes a jest of it; slash at him with a sword, rattle the quiver, brandish the spear, to drive him back, he will not retreat, but press forward, and even inspires courage into his rider. (4.) See how furious he is; he curvets and prances, and runs on with so much violence and heat against the enemy, that one would think he even swallowed the ground with fierceness and rage, v. 24. High mettle is the praise of a horse rather than of a man, whom fierceness and rage ill become. This description of the war-horse will help to explain that character which is given to presumptuous sinners; (Jer. viii. 6.) Every one turneth to his course, as the horse rusheth into the battle. When a man's heart is fully set in him to do evil, and he is carried on in a wicked way by the violence of inordinate appetites and passions, there is no making him afraid of the wrath of God, and the fatal consequences of sin. Let his own conscience set before him the curse of the law, the death, that is, the sentence of sin, and all the miseries of the mighty, in battle with the mockers at this fear, and is not affrighted, neither turns he back from the flaming sword of the cherubim. Let ministers lift up their voice like a trumpet, to proclaim the wrath of God against him, he believes not that it is the sound of the trumpet, nor that God and his heralds are in earnest with him; but what will be in the end hereof it is easy to foresee.

26. Dost thou keep the prey, and stretch thy wings toward the south? 27. Dost thou march about at thy command, and make her nest on high? 28. She dwelleth and abideth on the rock, upon the crag of the rock, and the strong place. 29. From thence she seeketh the prey, and her eyes behold afar off. 30. Her young ones also suck up blood: and where the slain are, there is she.

The birds of the air are proofs of the wonderful power and providence of God, as well as the beasts of the earth; God here specifies two stately ones. 1. The hawk, a noble bird, of great strength and sagacity, and yet a bird of prey, v. 26. This bird is here taken notice of for her flight, which is swift and strong, and especially for the course she steers toward the south, whither she follows the sun in winter, out of the colder countries in the north, especially when she is to cast her plumes, and renew her strength. That is, a wise bird, who gave her this wisdom, not man. Perhaps the extraordinary wisdom of the hawk's flight after her prey, was not used then for men's diversion and recreation, as it has been since. It is pity that the reclaimed hawk, which is taught to fly at man's command, and to make him sport, should at any time be abused to the dishonour of God, since it is from God that she receives that wisdom which makes her flight entertaining and serviceable. The hawk had a royal law, as a king of prey too, the permission of which, nay, the giving of power to which, may help to reconcile us to the prosperity of oppressors among men. The eagle is here taken notice of, (1.) For the height of her flight; no bird soars so high, has so strong a wing, nor can so well bear the light of the sun; * Doth she mount at thy command? (v. 27.) Is it by any strength she has from thee; or doth thou direct her flight? Not that she is above the power and dictates of prey too, the permission of which, nay, the giving of power to which, may help to reconcile us to the prosperity of oppressors among men. The eagle is here taken notice of, (1.) For the height of her flight; no bird soars so high, has so strong a wing, nor can so well bear the light of the sun; * Doth she mount at thy command? (v. 27.) Is it by any strength she has from thee; or doest thou direct her flight? Not that she is above the power and dictates of prey too, the permission of which, nay, the giving of power to which, may help to reconcile us to the prosperity of oppressors among men. The eagle is here taken notice of, (2.) For the strength of her nest; her house is her castle and strong hold; she makes it on high and on the rock, the crag of the rock, (v. 28.) which sets her and her young out of the reach of danger. Secure sinners think themselves as safe in their sins as the eagle in her nest on high, in the clefts of the rock; (Jer. xlix. 16.) But I will bring thee down from thence, saith the Lord. The higher the bad men set above the resiements of the earth, the nearer they ought to think themselves to the vengeance of Heaven. (3.) For her quicksightedness; (v. 29.) Her eyes behold afar off, not upward, but downward, in quest of her prey. In this, she is an emblem of a hypocrite, who, while in the profession of religion, he seems to rise toward heaven, keeps his eye and heart upon the prey on earth, some temporal advantage, some widow's house or other, that he hopes to devour, under pretence of devotion. (4.) For the way she has of maintaining herself and her young; she preys upon living animals, which she seizes and tears to pieces, and then carries to her young ones, who are taught to suck up blood; they do it by instinct, and know no better; but for men that have reason and conscience, to thirst after blood, is what could scarcely be believed, if there had not been, in every age, wretched instances of it. She preys upon the dead bodies of men; where the slain are, there is she. These birds of prey (in another sense than the horse, v. 25.) smell the battle afar off. Therefore, when a great slaughter is to be made among the enemies of the church, the fowls are invited to the sufferer of the great God, to eat the flesh of kings and captains, Rev. xix. 17, 18. Our Saviour refers to this instinct of the eagle, (Matth. xxiv. 28.) Whereunto the carcase in, there will the eagles be gathered together. Every creature, according to that which is its proper food; for he that provides them their food, has implanted in them that inclination. These, and many such instances of natural power and sagacity in the inferior crea-
Many humbling confounding questions God had put to Job, in the foregoing chapter; now, in this chapter, 1. He demands an answer to them, v. 1, 2. II. Job submits in a humble silence, v. 3. III. God proceeds to reason with him, for his conviction of the infinite distance and disproportion between him and God, and that he was by no means an equal disputant with him. He challenges him (v. 6.) to come with him, if he durst, for justice, (v. 8.) power, (v. 9.) majesty, (v. 10.) and dominion over the proud; (v. 11., 14.) and he gives an instance of his power in one particular animal, here called Behemoth, v. 15., 16.

1. Moreover, the Lord answered Job, and said, 2. Shall he that contendeth with the Almighty instruct him? he that reproves God, let him answer it. 3. Then Job answered the Lord, and said, 4. Behold, I am vile; what shall I answer thee? I will lay my hand upon my mouth. 5. Once have I spoken, but I will not answer; yea, twice; but I will proceed no further.

Here is,

1. A humbling challenge which God gave to Job. After he had heaped up many hard questions upon him, to show him, by his manifest ignorance in the works of nature, what an incompetent judge he was of the methods and designs of Providence, he clenches the nail with one demand more, which stands by itself here as the application of the whole. It should seem, God paused a while, as Elihu had done, to give Job time to say what he had to say, or to think of what God had said; but Job was in such confusion, that he remained silent, and therefore God here put him upon replying, v. 1, 2. This is not said to be spoken out of the whirlwind, as before; and therefore some think God said it in a still small voice, which wrought more upon Job than the whirlwind did, as upon Elijah, 1 Kings xix. 12, 13. My doctrine shall drop as the rain, and then it does wonders. Though Job had not spoken any thing, yet God is said to answer him; for he knows men's thoughts, and can return a suitable answer to their sense. Here,

1. God puts a convincing question to him; "Shall he that contendeth with the Almighty instruct him? Shall he pretend to dictate to God's wisdom, or prescribe to his will? Shall God receive instruction from every peevish complainer, and change the measures he has taken, to please him?" It is a question with disdain; Shall any teach God knowledge? ch. xxxi. 22. It is intimated, that those who quarrel with God, do, in effect, go about to teach him, and mend his work. For if we contend with men like ourselves, as not having done well, we ought to instruct them how to do better; but is it a thing to be suffered, that any man should teach his Maker? He that contends with God, is justly looked upon as his enemy; and shall he pretend so far to have prevailed in the contest, as to prescribe to him? We are ignorant and short-sighted, but before him all things are naked and open: nothing is hid from him; he is the Sovereign Creator; and shall we pretend to instruct him? Some read it, Is it any wisdom to contend with the Almighty? The answer is easy; No, it is the greatest folly which God can be troubled with; it will certainly be our ruin to oppose, and unspeakably our interest to submit to.

2. He demands a speedy reply to it; "He that reproaches God, let him answer this question to his own conscience, and answer it thus, Far be it from me to contend with the Almighty, or to instruct him. Let him answer all those questions which I have put, if he can. Let him answer for his presumption and insolence, answer it at God's bar, to his confusion." Those have high thoughts of themselves, and mean thoughts of God, who reprove any thing he says or does.

II. Job's humble submission thereunto. Now Job came to himself, and began to melt into godly sorrow; when his friends reasoned with him, he did not yield; but the voice of the Lord is powerful. When the Spirit of truth is come, he shall convince. They had condemned him for a wicked man, Elihu himself had been very sharp upon him, (ch. xxxiv. 7, 8, 37.) but God had not given him such hard words. We may sometimes have reason to expect better treatment from God, and a more candid construction of what we do, than we meet with from our friends. This the good man is here overcome by, and yields himself a conquered captive to the grace of God. 1. He owns himself an offender, and has nothing to say in his own justification, (v. 4.) "Behold, I am vile; not only mean and contemptible, but vile and abominable, in my own eyes." He is now sensible that he has sinned, and therefore calls himself vile. Sin debasest us, and penitents abase themselves, reproach themselves, and ashamed are they, even confounded. I have acted unfruitfully, unto my Father, ungraciously to my Benefactor, unwisely for myself; and therefore I am vile. Job now viliﬁes himself as much as ever he had justified and magniﬁed himself: repentance changes men's opinion of themselves. Job had been too bold in demanding a conference with God, and thought he could make his part good with him; but now he is convinced of his error; and owns himself utterly unable to stand before God, or to produce any thing worth his notice, the vileness and worth that ever crawled upon God's ground. While his friends talked with him, he answered them, for he thought himself as good as they; but when God talked with him, he had nothing to say; for, in comparison with him, he sees himself nothing, less than nothing, worse than nothing, vanity and vileness itself; and, therefore, What shall I answer thee? God demanded an answer, v. 2. Here he gives the reasons of his silence; it was not because he was short of words, but because he was convinced he had been in the wrong. Those that are truly sensible of their own sinfulness and vileness, dare not justify themselves before God, but are ashamed that ever they entertained such a thought, and, in token of their shame, lay their hand upon their mouth. 2. He promises not to offend any more as he had done; for Elihu had told him this was meet to be said unto God. When we have spoken amiss, we must repent of it, and not repeat nor stand it to it. He enjoins himself silence; (v. 4.) "I will lay my hand upon my mouth, will keep that as with a bridle, to suppress all passionate thoughts which may arise in my mind, and keep them from breaking out in inexpressive speeches." It is bad to think amiss, but it is much worse to speak amiss, for that is an allowance of the evil thought, and gives it an imprimatur—a sanction; it is publishing the seditious libel; and, then, if others join therewith, lay thy hand upon thy mouth, and let it go no farther, (Prov. xxx. 32.) and that will be an evidence for thee, that which thou thoughtest, thou allowedst. Job had suffered his evil thoughts to vent themselves; Once have I spoken amiss, yea twice, that is, divers times, in one discourse and in another; but I have done, I will not answer, I will not stand to what I have said, nor say it again, I will proceed no further. Observe here what
This is that which every proud heart must be brought to at last, either by its repentance, or by its ruin; and thus low must every mountain and hill be, sooner or later, brought. We must acknowledge,

I. That we cannot vie with God for justice; that the Lord is righteous and holy in his dealings with us. Yet shall we, by our own conduct toward him; we have a great deal to blame ourselves for, but nothing to blame him for; (v. 8.) "Will thou disannul my judgment? wilt thou take exceptions to what I say and do, and bring a writ of error, to reverse the judgment I have given as erroneous and unjust?" Many of Job's complaints had too much of a tendency this way; I try out of wrong, says he, but I am not heard; but this is not the language of him who is to be suffered.

God's judgment cannot, must not, be disannulled, for we are sure it is according to truth, and therefore it is a great piece of impudence and iniquity in us to call it in question. "Wilt thou," says God, "condemn me, that thou mayest be righteous?" Must my honour suffer for the support of thy reputation? Must I be charged as dealing unjustly with thee, because thou canst not otherwise clear thyself from the censures thou liest under? Our duty is to condemn thou wilt the law, and thyself too. "David is therefore ready to own the evil he has done in God's sight," that God may be justified, when he speaks, and clear when he judges, Ps. ii. 4. See Neh. ix. 33. Dan. ix. 7. But those are very proud, and very ignorant both of God and themselves, who, to clear themselves, will condemn God; and the day is coming, when, if the mistake be not rectified in time by repentance, the eternal judgment will come both to the conformation of the儿, and the confusion of the proceedings; for the heavens shall declare God's righteousness, and all the world shall become guilty before him.

II. That we cannot vie with God for power: and therefore, as it is great impiety, so it is great impudence, to contest with him, and we go as much against our interest, as we do against reason and right; (v. 9.) "Hast thou an arm like God, equal to his in length and strength? Or canst thou thunder with a voice like him? (ch. xxxvi. 12.) or does now, out of the whirlwind?" To convince Job that he was not so able as he thought himself, to contest with God, he shows him, 1. That he could never fight it out with him, nor carry his cause by force of arms. Sometimes, among men, controversies have been decided by battle, and the victorious champion is adjudged to have the right on his side; but if it be put upon that issue between God and man, man would certainly go by the worse, for all the force he could raise against the Almighty, would be but like briars and thorns before a consuming fire, Isa. xxi. 4. "Hast thou, a poor weak worm of the earth, an arm comparable to his, who upholds all things?" The power of creatures, even of angels themselves, is derived from God, limited by him, and dependent on him; but the power of God is original, independent, and unlimited. He can do every thing without us, and we can do nothing without him, and therefore we have not an arm like God. 2. That he could never talk it out with him, nor carry his cause by noise and big words, which sometimes among men go a great way toward the gaining of a point; "Canst thou thunder with a voice like him? No, his voice will soon drown thine, and one of his thunders will overpower and overrule all thy whispers." Man cannot speak so convincingly, so powerfully, nor with such a commanding conquering voice as God, who speaks, and it is done. His creating voice is called his thunder; (Ps. cvii.) so that is voice of his, with which he terrifies and discomfits his enemies; (1 Sam. ii. 10.) "Out of heaven shall he thunder upon them. The wrath of a king may sometimes be like the roaring of a lion, but can never pretend to imitate God’s thunder.

III. That we cannot vie with God for beauty and majesty; (v. 10.) “If thou wilt enter into a companion with him, and appear more amiable, put on thy best attire; Deck thyself now with majesty and excellency. Appear in all the martial, in all the royal pomp thou hast, and the best of every thing that will set thee off, array thyself with glory and beauty, such as may awe thine enemies, and charm thy friends; but what is it all to the divine majesty and beauty? No more than the light of a glow-worm to that of the sun, when he goes forth in his strength.” God decks himself with such majesty and glory as are the terror of devils, and all the powers of darkness, and make them tremble; he arrayes himself with such glory and beauty, as are the wonder of angels, and all the saints in light, and make them rejoice. David could dwell all his days in God’s house, to behold the beauty of the Lord. But, in comparison with this, what is all the majesty and excellency by which princes think to make themselves feared, and all the glory and beauty by which rulers think to make themselves beloved? If Job think, in contending with God, to carry the day by looking great, and making a figure, he is in the wrong, and he has no chance against God, and the moon confounded, when God shines forth.

IV. That we cannot vie with God for dominion over the proud, v. 11-14. Here the cause is put upon this short issue; if Job can humble and abase proud tyrants and oppressors as easily and effectually as God can, it shall be acknowledged that he has some colour to compare with God. Observe here,

1. The justice Job is here challenged to do, and that is, to bring the proud low, with a look; if Job will pretend to be a rival with God, especially if he pretend to be a judge of his actions, he must be able to do this.

(1.) It is here supposed that God can do it, and will do it, himself, else he would not have put it thus upon Job. By this, God proves himself to be God, that he resisted the proud, sat Judge upon them, and is able to bring them to ruin. Observe here, People are proud, and pride and pride is at the bottom of a great deal of wickedness that is in this world, both toward God and man. [2.] Proud people will certainly be abased and brought low, for pride goes before destruction. If they bend not, they will break; if they humble not themselves by true repentance, God will humble them, to their everlasting confusion. The wicked will be trodden down in their place, that is, Wheresoever they are found, though they pretend to have a place of their own, and to have taken root in it, yet even there they shall be trodden down, and all the wealth, and power, and interest, which their place entitles them to, will not be their security. [3.] The wrath of God, scattered among the proud, will humble them, and break them, and bring them down. If he casts abroad the rage of his wrath, as he will do at the great day, and sometimes does in this life, the stoutest heart cannot hold out against him; who knows how many there are, who are sure of power, does, easily abuse proud tyrants; he can look upon them, and bring them low, can overwhelm them with shame, and fear, and utter ruin, by one angry look, as he can, by a gracious look, revive the hearts of the contrite ones. [4.] He can, and will, at last, do it effectually, (v. 13.) not only bring them to the dust, from which they might hope to arise, but hide them in the dust, like the proud Egyptian whom Moses slew, and hid in the sand, (Exod. xix. 12.) that is, They shall be brought not only to death, but to the grave, that pit out of which there is no return. They were proud of the figure they made, but they shall be buried in oblivion, and be no more remembered than those that are hid in the dust; out of sight, and out of mind. They were linked in leagues and confederacies to do mischief, and are now bound in bundles; they are hid together, not their rest, but their shame together is in the dust, ch. xvii. 16. Nay, they are treated as malefactors, who, if not condemned, had their faces covered, as Haman’s was; he was treated in secret; they are treated as dead men; Lazarus in the grave, had his face bound about. So complete will the victory be that God will gain, at last, over proud sinners that set themselves in opposition to him. Now by this he proves himself to be God. Does he thus hate proud men? Then he is holy. Will he thus punish them? Then he is the just Judge of the world. Can he thus humble them? Then he is the Lord Almighty. When he had abased proud Pharaoh, and hid him in the sand of the Red-sea, Jethro inferred, that doubtless the Lord is greater than all gods, for wherein the proud enemies of his Israel dealt proudly, he was above them, he was too hard for them, Exod. xviii. 11. See Rev. x. 1, 2.

(2.) It is here proposed to Job to do it. He had been passionately quarrelling with God and his providence, casting abroad the rage of his wrath toward himself; is it thought thereby to bring God himself to his mind? Come, Job: God will try thy hand first upon proud men, and then wilt thou see how little they value the rage of thy wrath; and shall I then regard it, or be moved by it? Job had complained of the prosperity and power of tyrants and oppressors, and was ready to charge God with mal-administration for suffering it; but he ought not to find fault, except he could mend. If God, and he only, has power enough to humble and bring down proud men, do doubt he has wisdom enough to know when and how to do it, and it is not for us to prescribe to him, or to teach him how to govern the world; unless we had an arm like God, we must not think to take his work out of his hands.

2. The justice which is here promised, shall be done him, if he can perform such mighty works as these; (v. 14.) “Then will I also confess unto thee, that thy right hand is sufficient to save thee, though, as it is, it would be too weak to contend with me.” It is the innate pride and ambition of man, that he would be his own saviour, would have his own hands sufficient for him, and be independent; but it is presumption to pretend to it; our own hands cannot save us by recommending us to God’s grace, much less by rescuing us from his justice; unless we could by our own power humble our enemies, we cannot pretend by our own power to save ourselves; but if we could, God himself would confess it. He never did, nor ever will, deprive any man of his just praise, nor deny him the honour he has merited. But since we cannot do this, we must confess unto him, that our own hands cannot save us, and therefore into his hand we must commit ourselves.

15. Behold now behemoth, which I made with thee; he eateth grass as an ox. 16. Lo now, his strength is in his loins, and his force is in the navel of his belly. 17. He moveth his tail like a cedar: the sinews of his stones are wrapped together. 18. His bones are as strong, pieces of brass; his bones are like bars of iron. 19. He is the chief of the ways of God: he that made him can make his sword to approach unto him. 20. Surely the mountains bring him forth food, where all the beasts of the field play
21. He lieth under the shady trees, in the covert of the reed, and fens. 22. The shady trees cover him with their shadow; the willows of the brook compass him about. 23. Behold, he drinketh up a river, and hasteth not: he trusteth that he can draw up Jordan into his mouth. 24. He taketh it with his eyes: his nose pierceth through snares.

God, for the further proving of his own power, and disproving of Job's pretensions, concludes his discourse with the description of this last animal. He does with style and strength; one he calls behemoth, the other, leviathan. In these verses, we have the former described. "Behold now behemoth, and consider whether thou art able to contend with him who made that beast, and gave him all the power he has, and whether it is not thy wisdom rather to submit to him, and make thy peace with him."

Behemoth signifies beasts in general, but must here be meant of some one particular species. Some understand it of the bull; others of an amphibious animal, well-known (they say) in Egypt, called the river-horse. (Hippopotamus,) living among the fish in the river Nile, but coming out to feed upon the earth. But I confess I see no reason to depart from the ancient and most generally received opinion, that it is the elephant that is here described, which is a very strong stately creature, of very large stature above any other, and of wonderful sagacity; and of so great a reputation in the animal kingdom, that, among so many four-footed beasts as we have had the natural history of, (ch. xxxviii. and xxxix.) we can scarcely suppose this should be omitted.

Observe,
I. The description here given of the behemoth.
1. His body is very strong, and well-built; His strength is in his loins, v. 16. His bones, compared with those of other creatures, are like bars of iron, and as strong as cedar, for his back is the bar of his tail be not large, yet he moves it like a cedars, with a commanding force, v. 17. Some understand it of the trunk of the elephant, for the word signifies any extreme part, and in that there is indeed a wonderful strength; so strong is the elephant in his back and loins, and the sinews of his thighs, that he will carry a large wooden tower, and a great number of fighting men in it. No animal whatsoever comes near the elephant for strength of body, which is the main thing insisted on in this description.
2. He feeds on the productions of the earth, and does not prey upon other animals, he eats grass as an ox, (v. 15.) the mountains bring forth food, (v. 20.) and the beasts of the field do not tremble before him, nor flee from him, as from a lion, but they play about him, knowing they are in no danger from him. This may give us occasion, (1.) To acknowledge the goodness of God, in ordering it so, that whilst we have much food, should not feed upon flesh, (for then multitudes must die, to keep him alive,) but should be content with the grass of the field, to prevent such destruction of lives as otherwise must have ensued. (2.) To commend living upon herbs and fruits, without flesh, according to the original appointment of man's food, Gen. i. 29. Even the strength of an elephant, as of a horse and an ox, may be supported without flesh; and why not that of a man? Though, therefore, we use the liberty God has allowed us, yet be not among ravenous eaters of flesh, Prov. xxi. 20. (3.) To command a quiet and peaceable life. Who would not rather, like the elephant, have his neighbours easy and pleasant about him, than, like the lion, have them a' afraid of him?
3. He lodges under the shady trees, (v. 21.) which cover him with their shadow, (v. 22.) where he has trees and open air to breathe in, while lions, which live by stealth, when they would dispose themselves, are obliged to retire into a close and dark den, to live therein, and to abide in the covert of that, ch. xxxviii. 40. They who are a terror to others, cannot but be sometimes a terror to themselves too; but they will be easy, who will let others be easy about them; and the reed and fens, and the willows of the brook, though a very weak and slender fortification, yet are sufficient for the defence and comfort of the great bull, therefore dread no harm, because they design none.
4. That he is a very great and greedy drinker, not of wine and strong drink, (to be greedy of that is peculiar to man, who by his drunkenness makes a beast of himself,) but of fair water. (1.) His size is prodigious, and therefore he must have supply accordingly, v. 23. He drinks so much, that one would think he could drink up a river, if you would give him time, and not, hasten him to drink, He drinks, v. 24. behemoth not, so that do drink that in fear he is confident of his own strength and safety, and therefore makes no haste when he drinks, no more haste than good speed. (2.) His eye anticipates more than he can take; for, when he is very thirsty, having been long kept without water, he trusts that he can drink up Jordan in his mouth, and even takes it with his eyes, v. 24. As a covetous man causes his eyes to fly upon the wealth of this world, which he is greedy of, so this great beast is said to snatch, or draw up, even a river with his eyes. (3.) His nose has in it strength enough for both; for when he goes greedily to drink with it, he pierces through snares or nets, which perhaps are laid in the waters to catch fish. He makes nothing of the difficulties that lie in his way, so great is his strength, and so eager his appetite.

II. The use that is to be made of this description. We have taken a view of this mountain of a beast, this overgrown animal, which is seen set before us, not merely as a show, (as sometimes it is in our country,) to satisfy our curiosity and to amuse us, but as an argument with us to humble ourselves before the great God; for,
1. He made this vast animal, which is so fearful and wonderfully made; it is the work of his hands, the contrivance of his wisdom, the production of his power; it is behemoth which I made, v. 15. Whatever strength this, or any other creature, has, it is derived from God, who therefore must be acknowledged to have all power originally and infinitely in himself, and such an arm as it is for us to contest with. This beast is here called the chief, in its kind, of the ways of God; (v. 19.) an eminent instance of the Creator's power and wisdom. They that will peruse the accounts given by historians of the elephant, will find that his capacities approach near to the understanding of reason, than any other brute-creature that is known to us, however, and therefore he is fitly called the chief of the ways of God, in the inferior part of the creation no creature below man being preferable to him.
2. He made him with man, as he made other four-footed beasts; on the same day with man, (Gen. i. 25, 26.) whereas the fish and fowl were made the day before; he made him, to live and move on the same earth, in the same element, and therefore man and beast are said to justly be served by Divine Providence, as fellow-commoners; (Ps. xxxvi. 6.) "It is behemoth which I made with thee; I made that beast as well as thee, and he doest not quarrel with me; why then dost thou? Why shouldst thou demand peculiar favours, because I made thee, (ch. x. 9) when I made the behemoth likewise with thee? I made thee as well as that beast, and therefore can as easily manage thee as pleasure as that beast, and will do it, whether thou refuse or whether thou choose. I made him with thee, that thou mayest look upon him, and receive instruction. We need not go far for proofs and instances of God's almighty power and sovereign dominion; they are near us, they are with us, they are under our eye, wherever we are.

3. He that made him can make of his sword to appear afeared him. (v. 19.) that is, The same hand that made him, notwithstanding his great bulk and strength, can unmake him again at pleasure, and kill an elephant as easily as a worm or a fly, without any difficulty, and without the imputation either of caste or wrong. God, that gave to all the creatures their being, may take away the being he gave; for may he not do what he will with his own? And he can do it; he that has power to create with a word, no doubt, has power to destroy by a word, and can as easily speak the creature into nothing, as, at first, he spake it out of nothing. The behemoth perhaps is here intended (as well as the leviathan afterward) to represent those proud tyrants and oppressors, whom God had just now challenged Job to abuse and bring down. They think themselves as well fortified against the judgments of God, as the elephant with his bones of brass and iron; but he that made them, and one knows them, to him, here, he can make the sword of justice, his wrath, to approach to it, and touch it in the most tender and sensible part. He that framed the engine, and put the parts of it together, knows how to take it in pieces. Woe to him therefore that strives with his Maker, for he that made, has therefore power to make him miserable, and will not make him happy, unless he will be ruled by him.

CHAP. XLI.

The description here given of the leviathan, a very large, strong, formidable, fish, or water-animal, is designed yet further to compare the dignity and power of God's omnipotence, and of God's omnipotence, that he might be humbled for his folly in making so bold with him as he had done. I. To convince Job of his own weakness, he is here challenged to subdue that; if he could, he must make himself master of him, (v. 2. 3.) because he cannot do, he must own himself utterly unable to stand before the great God, v. 10. II. To convince Job of God's power and terrible majesty, divers particular instances are given, of the strength and terror of the leviathan, which is no more than what God has given him, nor more than he has under his check, v. 11. 12. The face of the leviathan is here described to be terrible; (v. 13. 14.) his scales close, (v. 15. 17.) his breath and nostrils sparkling, (v. 18. 21.) his flesh firm, (v. 22. 24.) his strength and spirit, when he is attacked, inexpressible, (v. 25. 30.) his motions turbulent, and disturbing to the deeps; (v. 31. 32.) that, upon the whole, he is a very terrible, creating, and man is no match for him, v. 33, 34.

1. CANST thou draw out leviathan with a hook? or his tongue with a cord which thou lettest down? 2. Canst thou put a hook into his nose? or bore his jaw through with a thorn? 3. Will he make many supplications unto thee? will he speak soft words unto thee? 4. Will he make a covenant with thee? wilt thou take him for a servant for ever? 5. Wilt thou play with him as with a bird? wilt thou bind him for thy maidens? 6. Shall thy companions make a banquet of him? shall they part him among the merchants? 7. Canst thou fill his skin with barbed irons? or his head with fish-spears? 8. Lay thy hand upon him, remember the battle, do no more. 9. Behold, the hope of him is in vain: shall not one be cast down even at the sight of him? 10. None is so fierce that dare stir him up; who then is able to stand before me?

Whether this leviathan be a whale or a crocodile, is a great dispute among the learned, which I will not undertake to determine; some of the particulars agree more easily to the one, others to the other; both are very strong and fierce, and the power of the Creator appears in them. The ingenious Sir Richard Blackmore, though he admits the more received opinion concerning the behemoth, that that must be meant of the elephant, yet agrees with the learned Bochart's notion of the leviathan, that it is the crocodile which was so well known in the river of Egypt. I confess that that which in clines me rather to understand it of the whale, is not only because it is much larger, and a nobler animal, but because, in the history of the Creation, there is such an express notice taken of it, as is not of any other species of animals whatsoever; (Gen. 1. 21.) God created great whales; by which it appears, not only that whales were well known in those parts, in Moses's time, who lived a little after Job, but that the creation of whales was generally looked upon as a most illustrious proof of the eternal power and godhead of the Creator; and we may conjecture that this was the reason (for otherwise it seems unaccountable) why Moses there so particularly mentions the creation of the whales, because God had so lately, in this discourse with Job, more largely insisted upon the bulk and strength of that creature than of any other, as the proof of his power; and the leviathan is here spoken of as an inhabitant of the sea, (v. 31.) which the crocodile is not; and (Ps. cv. 25. 26.) There, in the great and wide sea, to that leviathan.

Here, in these verses, 1. He shows how unable Job was to master the leviathan. (1.) That he could not catch him, as a little fish, with angling, v. 1. 2. He had no bait wherewith to deceive him, no hook where with to catch him, no fish-line wherewith to draw him out of the water, nor a thorn to pass through his gills, on which to carry him home. (2.) That he could not make him his prisoner, nor force him to cry for quarter, or surrender himself at discretion, v. 3. 4. "He knows his own strength too well to make many supplications to thee, and to make a covenant with thee to be thy servant, on condition thou wilt save his life." (3.) That he could not entice him into a cage, and keep him there as a bird for the children to play with, v. 5. There are creatures so little, so well cared for, as to be easily enticed, and triumphed over; but the leviathan is none of those, he is made to be the terror, not the sport and diversion, of mankind. (4.) That he could not have him served up to his table; he and his companions could not make a banquet of him; his flesh is too strong to be fit for food, and if it were not, he is not easily caught. (5.) That they could not enrich themselves with the spoil of him; Shall they part him among the merchants? shall they fill their houses with him? another? If they can catch him, they will; but it is probable that the art of fishing for whales was not brought to perfection then, as it has been since. (6.) That they could not destroy him, could not fill his head with fish-spears, v. 7. He kept out of the reach of their instruments of slaughter, or, if they touched him, they could not touch him to the quick. (7.) That it was to no purpose to attempt it; The hope of taking him is in vain, v. 9. If men go about to seize him, so formidable is he, that the very sight of him will appal them, and make a stout man ready to faint away; Shall not one be cast down even at the sight of him? And will not that deter the pursuers from their attempt? Job is bid, at his peril, to lay his hand upon him, (v. 8.) "Touch him if thou dare, remember the battle, how unable thou art to encounter such a foe; and what is there likely to be the issue of the battle, and do no more, but desist from the attempt." It is good to remember the battle before we engage in a war, and put off the harness in time, if we foresee it will be to no purpose to gird it on. Job is hereby admonished not to proceed in his controversy with God, but to make his peace with him, remembering what the battle will certainly end in, if he come to an engagement. See Isa. xxvii. 4, 5.

Thence he infers how unable he was to contend with the Almighty. None is so fierce, none so fool-hardy, as to stir up the leviathan, (v. 10.) it being known that he will certainly be too hard for them; and when then is able to stand before God, either to impeach and arraign his proceeding, or to out-face the power of his wrath? If the inferior creatures that are put under the feet of man, and over whom he has dominion, keep us in awe thus, how terrible must the majesty of our great Lord be, who has a sovereign dominion over the world, and against whom man has been so long in rebellion! Who can stand before him when once he is angry?

11. Who hath prevented me, that I should repay him? whatsoever is under the whole heaven is mine. 12. I will not conceal his parts, nor his power, nor his comely proportion. 13. Who can discover the face of his garment? or who can come to him with his double bridle? 14. Who can open the doors of his face? his teeth are terrible round about. 15. His scales are his pride, shut up together as with a close seal. 16. One is so near to another, that no air can come between them. 17. They are joined one to another, they stick together, that they cannot be sundered. 18. By his necesings a light doth shine, and his eyes are like the eyelids of the morning. 19. Out of his mouth go burning lamps, and sparks of fire leap out. 20. Out of his nostrils goeth smoke, as out of a seething-pot or caldron. 21. His breath kindleth coals, and a flame goeth out of his mouth. 22. In his neck remaineth strength, and sorrow is turned into joy before him. 23. The flaxes of his flesh are joined together: they are firm in themselves; they cannot be moved. 24. His heart is as firm as a stone: yea, as hard as a piece of the nether millstone. 25. When he raiseth himself, the mighty are afraid: by reason of breakings they purify themselves. 26. The sword of him that lieth at him cannot hold; the spear, the dart, nor the habergeon. 27. He esteemeth iron as straw, and brass as rotten wood. 28. The arrow cannot make him flee: sling stones are turned with him into stubble.

29. Darts are counted as stubble: he laugheth at the shaking of a spear. 30. Sharp stones are under him: he spreadeth sharp-pointed things upon the mire. 31. He maketh the deep to boil like a pot: he maketh the sea like a pot of ointment. 32. He maketh a path to shine after him: one would think the deep to be hoary. 33. Upon earth there is not his like, who is made without fear. 34. He beholdeth all high things: he is a king over all the children of pride.

God, having in the foregoing verses showed how unable he was to deal with the leviathan, here sets forth his own power in that massy mighty creature. Here is,

1. God's sovereign dominion and independency laid down. v. 11. That he is indebted to none of his creatures. If any pretend he is indebted to them, let them make their demand and prove their debt, and they shall receive it in full, and not by composition; "Who has prevented me?" that is, "Who has laid any obligations upon me, by any service they have done me? Who can pretend to be before-hand with me? If any were, I would not long be behind-hand with them, I would soon repay them." The apostle quotes this, for the silencing of all flatterers in God's presence; (Rom. xi. 33.) Who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompen sensed to him again? As God does not inflict upon us the evils we have deserved, so he does bestow upon us the favours we have not deserved. 2. That he is the rightful Lord and Owner of all the creatures; "Whatsoever is under the whole heavens, animate or inanimate, is mine, (and particularly this leviathan,) at my command and disposal; what I have an incontestable property in, and dominion over." All is his, we are his, all we have and do, and therefore we cannot make God our Debtor; but of thine own, Lord, have we given thee. All is his, and therefore, if he were indebted to any, he has wherewithal to repay them; the debt is in good hands. All is his, and therefore he needs not our services, nor can he be benefitted by them. If I were hungry I would not tell thee, for the world is mine, and the fulness thereof, Ps. v. 12.

II. The proof and illustration of it, from the wonderful structure of the leviathan, v. 12. The parts of his body, the power he exerts, especially when he is set upon, and the comely proportion of the whole of him, are what God will not conceal, and therefore what we must observe and acknowledge the power of God in. Though he is a creature of monstrous bulk, yet there is in him a comely proportion. In our eye, beauty lies in little, (Trist Austiniana part 1. Little is the greatest beauty.) who he gives them all their own, because we ourselves are little; but in God's eye, even the leviathan is comely; and if he pronounce even the whale, even the crocodile, so, it is not for us to say of any of the works of his hands, that they are ugly or ill-favoured; it is enough to say so, as we have cause, of our own works. God here goes about to give us an anatomical view (as it were) of the leviathan; for his works appear most beautiful and excellent, and his wisdom and power appear most in them, when they are taken in pieces, and viewed in their several parts and proportions.

1. The leviathan, even prima facie—at first sight, appears formidable and inaccessible, v. 13, 14. Who dares come so near him, while he is alive, as to discover or take a distinct view of the face of the garment, the skin with which he is clothed as with a garment; so near him, as to bridge him like a horse, and so lead him away; so near him, as to be within reach of his jaws, which are like a double bridle? Who will venture to look into his mouth, as we do into a horse's mouth? He that opens the doors of his face, will see his teeth terrible round about, strong and sharp, and fitted to devour; it would make a man tremble to think of having a leg or an arm between them.

He is distinguished by his beauty and strength, and therefore his pride, v. 15-17. The crocodile is indeed remarkable for his scales; if we understand it of the whale, we must understand by these shields, (for so the word is,) the several coats of his skin; or there might be whales in that country with scales. That which is remarkable concerning the scales, is, that they stick so close together, by which he is not only kept warm, for no air can pierce him, but kept safe, for no sword can pierce him, through these scales, and so he is fortified accordingly by the wisdom of Providence, which gives clothes as it gives cold.

3. He scatters terror with his very breath and looks; if he sneeze or spout by water, it is like a light shining, either with the froth, or the light of the sun shining through it, v. 18. The eyes of the whale are reported to shine in the night-time, like a flame, or, as here, like the eye-lids of the morning; the breath of his mouth is also like the say of the crocodile. The breath of this creature is so hot and fiery, from the great natural heat within, that burning lamps and sparks of fire, smoke and a flame, are said to go out of his mouth, even such as one would think sufficient to set coals on fire, v. 19-21. Probably, these hyperbolic expressions are used concerning the leviathan, to intimate the power and terror of the wrath of God, for that is it which all this is designed to convince us of: fire out of his mouth devours Ps. xcvii. 13. The breath of the Almighty is a stream of brimstone, kindles Tophet, and will for ever keep it burning, Isa. xxxv. 33. The wicked shall one be consumed with the breath of his mouth, 2 Thess. ii. 8.

4. He is of invincible strength and most terrible fierceness, so that he frightens all that come in his way, but is not himself frightened by any. Take a view of his neck, and there remains strength, v. 22. His neck was joined together, raw rejoices, or rides in triumph, before him, for he makes terrible work wherever he comes. Or, Those storms which are the sorrow of others, are his joy; what is tossing to others, is dancing to him. His flesh is well-knit, v. 23. The flakes of it are joined so closely together, and are so firm, that it is hard to pierce it; he is as if he were all bone; his flesh is of brass, which Job had complained his was not, ch. vi. 12. His heart is as firm as a stone, v. 24. He has spirit equal to his bodily strength, and, though he is bulky, he is sprightly, and not unwieldy; as his flesh and skin cannot be pierced, so his courage cannot be daunted; but, on the contrary, he daunts all he meets, and puts them into a consternation; (v. 23.) When he raises up himself like a moving mountain in the great waters, even the mighty are afraid lest he overturn their ships, or do them some other mischief: by reason of the breas- thes of his mouth, when the whale is dead, they purify themselves, consume their vessels, and cast themselves to their prays, and get ready for death. We read (ch. iii. 8.) of those who, when they raise up a leviathan, are in such a fright, that they curse the day. It was a fear which, it seems, used to drive some to their curses, and others to their prayers; for as now, so then there were seafaring men of different characters, and on whom the ter- rors of Fishes have contrary effects; but all agree there is a great fright among them when the levi- thans raise up himself.

5. All the instruments of slaughter that are used against him, do him no hurt, and therefore are no terror to him, v. 26-29. The sword and the spear, which wound nigh at hand, are nothing to him, the darts, arrows, and sling-stones, which wound at a distance, do him no damage; nature has so well armed him against them all. The defensive wea-pons which men use when they engage with the leviathan, or sea-devils, serve not; the high plate, often serve men no more than their offensive weapons; iron and brass are to him as straw and rotten wood, and he laughs at them. It is the picture of a hard- hearted sinner, that despises the terrors of the Al- mighty, and laughs at all the threatenings of his word. The leviathan so little dreads the weapons that are used against him, that, to show how hardly he is, he chooses to lie on the sharp stones, the sharp pointed things, (v. 29.) and lies as easy there, as if he lay on the soft mire. Those would endure hardness, must inure themselves to it.

6. His very motion in the water troubles it, and puts it into a ferment, v. 31, 32. When he rolls and tosses, and makes a stir in the water, or is in pursuit of his prey, he makes the deep to boil like a pot, he raises a great froth and foam upon the water, such as is upon a boiling pot, especially a pot of boiling ointment; and he makes a path to shine and boil with him, and his waves in the midst of the sea does not, Prov. xxxv. 19. One vessel of the leviathan under water by the bubbles on the surface; and yet who can take that advantage against him in pursuing him? Men track hares in the snow and kill them, but he that tracks the leviathan dares not come near him.

Lastly, Having given this particular account of his parts, and his power, and his comely proportion, he concludes with four things in general concerning this animal, v. 33, 34. (1.) That he is great among the inferior creatures. Upon earth there is not his like, no creature in this world is comparable to him for strength and terror; or, the earth is here distinguished from the sea; His do- minion is not upon the earth, so some, but in the waters; none of all the savage creatures upon earth come near him for bulk and strength, and it is well for man that he is confined to the waters, and there he dwells, a water, or a water, v. 11; (ch. vii. 12.) by the Divine Providence, because it is such a terrible creature, that he is allowed to roam and rage upon this earth, it would be an unsafe and uncomfortable habitation for the children of men, for whom it is intended. (2.) That he is more bold and daring than any other creature whatsoever; He is made without fear: the creatures are as they are made; the leviathan has courage in his constitution, nothing can frighten him; other creatures, quite contrary, seem as much designed for flying as for fighting; among men, some are in their natural terror, others are timidous. (3.) That he is himself very proud; though lodged in the deep, yet he beholds all high things; the rolling waves, the impending rocks, the hovering clouds, and the ships under sail with top and top-gallant, this mighty animal beholds with contempt, for he does not think they either lessen him or threaten him. Those that are great, are apt to be scornful. (4.) That he is a king over all his creatures, and is so, and he is a king over all his children, and is so, that he is a king over all his creatures, and is so, and he is a king over all. Some read it, so as to understand it of God; He that beholds all high things, even he is King over all the children of pride; he can tame the behemoth, (ch. xl. 19.) and the leviathan, } as they are, and stout-hearted as they are. This discourse, concerning these two animals, was brought in to prove that it is God only who can look upon forsud men and abuse them, bring them low and tread them down, and hide them in the dust; (ch.
xl. 11-13.) and so it concludes with a Quod erat Demonstrandum—Which was to be demonstrated;
there is one that beholds all things, and, wherein delinquent persons are, is above them; he is King over all the children of pride, whether brutal or rational, and can make them all either bend, or break, be fore him; (Isa. ii. 11.) The lofty looks of man shall be humbled, and the haughtiness of men shall be bowed down, and thus the Lord alone shall be excalted.

CHAP. XLII.

Solomon says, Better is the end of a thing than the beginning thereof, Ecc. vii. 8. It was so here in the story of Job; at evening-time it was light. Three things we have met with in this book, which, perhaps, have troubled me much; but we find all the three grievances re-dressed, thoroughly redressed, in this chapter, every thing set to rights. I. It has been a great trouble to us, to see such a body as Job was, so fretful and peevish, and an enemy to himself, and uncouthly to hear the quarrel with God, and speak indelicately to him; but, though he thus falls, he is not utterly cast down, for here he recovers his temper, comes to himself, and to his right mind again, by repentance, is sorry for what he has said amiss, unsays it, and humbles himself before God, v. 1-6. II. It has been likewise a great trouble to us, to see Job and his friends so much at variance, not able to give a composure to his mind, in giving one thing, a greater many hard words, and paining severe curses one upon another, though they were all very wise and good men; but here we have this grievance redress-ed likewise, the differences between them happily addusted, the quarrel taken up, all the peevish reflections
they had cast upon one another forgiven and forgotten, and all joining in sacrifices and prayers, mutually accepted of God, v. 7-9. III. It has troubled us, to see a man, they say, so proud and unrefined as Job was, so grievously afflicted, so pained, so sick, so poor, so reproached, so slighted, and made the very centre of all the calamities of human life; but here we have this grievance redressed too; Job healed of all his ailments, more honoured and beloved than ever, exalted with an estate double to what he had before, surrounded with all the comforts of life, and as great an instance of prosperity as ever he had been of affliction and patience,
v. 10-12. And I have been often for some time past, that has been, under these and the like discouragements that we meet with, through patience and comfort of this scripture, may have hope.

1. THEN Job answered the Lord, and said, 2. I know that thou canst do every thing, and that no thought can be withholden from thee. 3. Who is he that hideth counsel without knowledge? therefore have I uttered that I understood not;
things too wonderful for me, which I knew not. 4. Hear, I beseech thee, and I will speak: I will demand of thee, and declare thou unto me. 5. I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear; but now mine eye seeth thee: 6. Wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes.

The words of Job justifying himself, were ended, ch. xxxi. 40. After that, he said no more to that purport: the words of Job judging and condemning himself, began, ch. xl. 4, 5. Here he goes on with words to the same purport; though his patience had not its perfect work, his repentance for his impatience had. He is here thoroughly humbled for his folly and unadvised speaking, and it was forgiven him. Good men will see and own their faults at last, though it may be some difficulty to bring them to it. Then when God had said all this to him concerning his own greatness and power appearing in the creatures, then Job answered the Lord, (v. 1.) not by way of contradiction, he had promised not so to answer again, (ch. xl. 5.) but by way of submission; and thus we must answer all the calls of God.

I. He subscribes to the truth of God’s unlimited power, knowledge, and dominion, to prove which was the great concern of Job, to cast down the wind, v. 2. Corrupt passions and practices arise either from some corrupt principles, or from the neglect and disbelief of the principles of truth; and therefore true repentance begins in the acknowledgment of the truth, 2 Tim. ii. 25. Job here owns his judgment convinced of the greatness, glory, and perfe-tion, of God, from which would follow the conviction of his conscience concerning his own folly, in speaking irreverently of him. 1. He owns that God can do every thing. What can be too hard for him that made behemoth and leviathan, and manages both as he pleases? He knew this before and had himself discoursed very well upon the subject, but now he knew it with application; God had spoken it once, and then he heard it twice, that dower belongs to God; and therefore it is the greatest madness and presumption imaginable to contend with him. Thou canst do every thing, and therefore cannot raise me out of this low condition, which I have so often foolishly despairs of as impossibile; I now believe thou art able to do this.” 2.
That no thought can be withholden from him, that is, (1.) There is no thought of ours that can be hindered from the knowledge of it. Not a fretful, discontented, unbelieving, thought is in our minds
at any time, but God is a Witness to it: it is in vain to contest with him, for we cannot hide our counsels and projects from him; and if he discover them, he can defeat them. (2.) There is no thought of his that he can be hindered from the execution of; Whatever the Lord pleased, that did he.
Job had said this passionately, complaining of it; (ch. xxxiii. 13.) What his soul desireth, that he doeth; now he says, with pleasure and satisfaction, that God’s counsels shall stand. If God’s thoughts concerning us be thoughts of good, to give us an unexpected end, he cannot be withheld from accomplishing them; the works of his grace are so surprising, whatever difficulties may seem to lie in the way.

II. He owns himself to be guilty of that which God had charged him with in the beginning of his discourse; (v. 3.) “Lord, the first word thou saidst, was, Who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge? There needed no more; that word convinced me; I own, I am the man that has been so foolish. That word reached my conscience, that was set before me, and is stouter before me to
to be denied, too bad to be excused; I have hid counsel without knowledge; I have ignorantly overlooked the counsels and designs of God in afflicting me, and therefore have quarrelled with God, and insist-ted too much upon my own justification; Therefore I uttered that I understood not,” that is, “I have passed a judgment upon the dispensations of Providence, though I was utterly a stranger to the reas of God’s operations. Here I see myself ignorant of the divine counsels; and so we are all.
God’s judgments are a great deep, which we cannot fathom, much less find out the springs of. We see what God does, but we neither know why he does it, what he is driving at, nor what he will bring to it; these are things too wonderful for us, out of our sight to discover, out of our reach to alter, and out of our jurisdiction to judge of; they are things which we know not, it is quite above our repacity to pass a verdict upon them: the reason why we quarrel with Providence is, because we do not understand it; and we must be content to be in the dark about it, until the mystery of God shall be finished. He owns himself imprudent and presumptuous, in undertaking to discourse of that which he did not understand, and to arraign that which he did not know. He had before said: in matter before he heareth it, it is folly and shame to him. We wrong ourselves, as well as the cause which we undertake to determine, while we are no competent judges of it.

III. He will not answer, but he will make supplication to his Judge, as he had said; (ch. ix. 15.) ‘Hear, I beseech thee, and I will speak, (v. 4.) not speak either as plaintiff or defendant, (ch. xiii. 22.) but as a humble petitioner; not as one that intends to undertake to teach and prescribe, but as one that desires to learn, and is willing to be prescribed to. Lord, put no more hard questions to me, for I am not able to answer thee one of a thousand of those which thou hast put; but give me leave to ask instruction from thee, and do not deny it me, do not upbraid me with my folly and self-sufficiency,” Jam. i. 5. Now he is brought to the prayer Elisha took, I see not, teach thou me, (2 Kings iv. 29.) He puts himself into the presence of a penitent, and therein goes upon a right principle. In true repentance there must be not only conviction of sin, but contrition and godly sorrow for it, sorrowing according to God, 2 Cor. vii. 9. Such was Job’s sorrow for his sins.

1. Job had an eye to God in his repentance, thought highly of him, and went upon that as the principle of it; (v. 5.) ‘I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear;’ (Ps. lxxi. 4.) I have not heard of thee by the hearing of my ears. When I was young; from my friends, now of late; I have known something of thy greatness, and power, and sovereign dominion; and yet was not brought, by what I heard, to submit myself to thee as I ought; the notions I had of these things, served me only to talk of, and had not a due influence upon my mind; but now thou hast by immediate revelation discovered thyself to me in thy glorious majesty; now my eyes see thee, now I feel the power of those truths which before I had only the notion of, and therefore now I repent, and unsay what I have foolishly said.” Note, (1.) It is a great mercy to have a good education, and to know the things of God by the instructions of his word and ministers; faith comes by hearing, and then it is most likely to come, when we hear attentively, and with the hearing of the ear. (2.) When the understanding is enlightened by the Spirit of grace, our knowledge of divine things as far exceeds what we had before, as that by ocular demonstration exceeds that by report and common fame. By the teachings of men God reveals his Son to us; but by the teachings of his Spirit he reveals his Son in us, (Gal. i. 16.) and so changes us into the same image, 2 Cor. iii. 18.

(3.) God is pleased sometimes to manifest himself most fully to his people by the rebukes of his word and providence; “Now that I have been afflicted, now that I have been told of my faults, now mine eyes see thee. The rod and reproof give wisdom. Blessed is the man whom thou chastenest and teachest.”

2. Job had an eye to himself in his repentance, thought hardly of himself, and thereby expressed his sorrow for his sins; (v. 6.) ‘Wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes. Observe, (1.) It concerns us to be deeply humbled for the sins we have committed, and not to be led by any slight superficial displeasure against ourselves for them. Even good people, that have no gross enormities to repent of, must be greatly afflicted in soul for the workings and breakings out of pride, passion, perverseness, and discontent, and all their hasty unadvised speeches; for these we must be pricked to the heart, and be in bitterness. Till the enemy be effectually humbled, the peace will be insecure. (2.) Outward expressions of godly sorrow well become penitents; Job repented in dust and ashes. These, without an inward change, do but mock God; but where they come from sincere contrition of soul, they show a love and religion that gives glory to God, takes shame to himself, and may be instrumental to bring others to repentance. Job’s afflictions had brought him to the ashes, (ch. ii. 8.) he sat down among the ashes; but now his sins brought him thither. True penitents mourn for their sins as heartily as ever they did for any outward affections; and are in bitterness, as for an only son or a first-born, for they are brought to see more evils in their place, than all their troubles. (3.) Self-loathing is evermore the companion of true repentance. The more we see the glory and majesty of God, the more we see of the vileness and odiousness of sin, and of ourselves because of sin, the more we shall abase and abhor ourselves for it. “Now mine eyes see what a God he is, whom I have offended, the brightness of that majesty which by willful sin I have spit in the face of, the tenderness of that mercy which I have spurned at the bowels of; now I see, as the juster and holy God he is, whose wrath I have incurred; wherefore I abhor myself. Who am I, saith Job, for I am undone.” Isa. vi. 5. God had challenged Job to look upon proud men and abase them; “I cannot,” says Job, “pretend to it; I have enough to do to get my own proud heart humbled, to abase that and bring that low.” Let us leave it to God to govern the world, and make it our care, in the strength of his grace, to govern ourselves and our own hearts well.

7. And it was so, that, after the Lord had spoken these words unto Job, the Lord said to Eliphaz the Temanite, My wrath is kindled against thee, and against thy two friends: for ye have not spoken of me the thing that is right, as my servant Job hath. 3. Therefore take unto you now seven bullocks and seven rams, and go to my servant Job, and offer up for yourselves a burnt-offering: and my servant Job shall pray for you, for him will I accept: lest I deal with you after your folly, in that ye have not spoken of me the thing which is right, like my servant Job. 9. So Eliphaz the Temanite, and Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite, went, and did according as the Lord commanded them: the Lord also accepted Job.
would have thought that he only was in the wrong, and that the cause would certainly go against him; but he has been found quite otherwise, and the definitive sentence given in Job's favour. Wherefore judge nothing before the time. Those who are truly righteous before God, may have their righteousness clouded and eclipsed by great and uncommon afflictions, by the severe censures of men, by their own frailties and foolish passions, by the sharp reproofs of the word and conscience, and the deep humiliation of their own spirits in the sight of God. Yet, at a time, these clouds shall all blow over, and God will bring forth their righteousness as the light, and their judgment as the noon-day, Ps. xxxvii. 6. He cleared Job's righteousness here, because he, like an honest man, held it fast, and would not let it go. We have here, I. Judgment given against Job's three friends, upon the controversy between them and Job. Elihu is not censured here, for he did exculpate himself from the rest in the management of the dispute, and acted, not as a party, but as a moderator; and moderation will have its praise with God, whether it have with men or no. In the judgment here given, Job is magnified, and his three friends mortified. While we were examining the discourses on both sides, we could not discern, and therefore durst not determine, who was in the right; something of truth we thought they both had on their side, but we could not cleave the chasm between them; nor would we, for all the world, have been to give the decisive sentence upon the case, lest we should have determined wrong; but it is well that the judgment is the Lord's, and we are sure that his judgment is according to truth; to it we will refer ourselves, and by it we will abide. Now, in the judgment here given, 1. Job is greatly magnified, and comes off with honour. He was but one against three; yet beggar against princes, and yet, having God on his side, he needed not fear the result, though thousands set themselves against him. Observe here, (1.) When God appeared for him; After the Lord had spoken these words unto Job, v. 7. After he had convinced and humbled him, and brought him to repentance, for what he had said amiss, then he owned him in what he had said well, comforted him, and put honour upon him; not till then, for we are not privy to the Lord's affairs, till he will judge and condemn ourselves; but then he pleased his cause, for he that has torn, will heal us, he that has smitten, will bind us. The Comforter shall convince, John xvi. 8. See in what method we are to expect divine acceptance; we must first be humbled under divine rebukes. After God, by speaking these words, had caused grief, he returned and had compassion, according to the multitude of his mercies; for he will not contend for ever, but will deceive the spirit of man, and stay his rough wind in the day of his east wind. Now that Job had humbled himself, God exalted him. True penitents shall find favour with God, and what they have said and done amiss, shall no more be mentioned against them. Then God is well-pleased with us, when we are brought to abhor ourselves. (2.) How he appeared for him. It is taken for granted that all his offences are forgiven, for if he had pleased his God, as he had not, he was justified. Job had sometimes intimated with great assurance, that God would clear him at last, and he was not made ashamed of the hope. [1.] God calls him again and again his servant Job; four times in two verses, and he seems to take a pleasure in calling him so, as before his troubles, (ch. i. 8.) Hast thou considered my servant Job? Though he is born and despised, he is my servant, and as dear to me as when he was in prosperity; though he has his faults, and has appeared to be a man like passions as others; though he has contended with me, he has gone about to thwart my judgment, and has darkened counsel by words without knowledge; yet he sees his error, and retracts it, and therefore he is my servant Job still. If we still hold fast the integrity and fidelity of servants to God, as Job did, though we may for a time be deprived of the credit and comfort of the relation, we shall be restored to it at last, as he was. The Devil had undertaken to prove Job a hypocrite, but he and his friends had condemned him as a wicked man; but God will confess those whom he accepts, and will not suffer them to be run down by the mule of hell or earth. If God says, Well done, good and faithful servant, it is of little consequence who says otherwise. [2.] He owns that he had spoken of him the thing that was right, beyond what his antagonists had done; he had given a much better account of the Divine Providence, than they had done. They had wronged God, by making a prey of a man of the true church, and affliction a certain indication of God's wrath; but Job had done him right, by maintaining that God's love and hatred are to be judged of by what is in men, not by what is before them, Eccl. ix. 1. Observe, First, Those do the most justice to God and his providence, who have an eye to the rewards and punishments of another world more than to those of this, and with the prospect of those solve the difficulties of the present administration. Job had referred things to the future judgment, and the future state, more than his friends had done, and therefore he spake of God that which was right, better than his friends had done. Second-ly, Though Job had spoken some things amiss, even concerning God, whom he made too bold with, yet he is commanded for what he spake that was right. We must not only not reject that which is true and good, but must not deny it its due praise, though there appears in it a mixture of human frailty and infirmity. Thirdly, Job was in the right, and his friends in the wrong, and yet he was in pain, and they at ease; a plain evidence that we cannot judge of men and their sentiments by looking in their faces or purses; He only can do it infallibly, who sees men's hearts. [3.] He will pass his word for Job, that, notwithstanding all the wrong his friends had done him, he would be a good man, and of such a human, tender, forgiving spirit, that he will very readily pray for them, and use his interest in heaven on their behalf. My servant Job will pray for you, I know he will. I have pardoned him, and he has the comfort of it, and therefore he will pardon you. [4.] He appoints him to be the priest of this congregation, and promises to accept him and his mediation for his friends. Take your sacrifices to my servant Job, for him will I accept. Thus from God's enemies here he makes to himself kings and priests. True penitents shall not only find favour as petitioners for themselves, but be accepted as intercessors for others also. It was a great honour that God hereby put upon Job, in appointing him to offer sacrifice for his friends, as formerly he used to do for his own children, ch. i. 5. And a happy presage it was of his restoration to his prosperity again, and indeed a good omen; for God wanted it for the priesthood. Thus he became a type of Christ, through whom alone we and our spiritual sacrifices are acceptable to God; see 1 Pet. ii. 5. Go to my servant Job, to my servant Jesus, (from whom for a time he hid his face,) *put your sacrifices into his hand, make use of him as your Advocate, for him I accept, but, out of him, you must expect to Then every friend. I am wise, and know the importance of the thing requires, before we can hope to obtain from God the forgiveness of sins. See how thoroughly God espoused the cause of his servant Job, and engaged in it; God will not be reconciled to those that have offended him, till they have first begged his pardon, for, it is to be observed, Job and his friends had differed in their opinion about many things, and been too keen in their reflections one upon another, but now they were to be made friends; in order to that, they are not to argue the matter over again, and try to give it a new turn, (that might be endless,) but they must agree in a sacrifice and a prayer, and that must reconcile them: they must unite in affection and devotion, when they could not concur in the same sentiments. Those who differ in judgment about lesser things, yet are one in Christ the great Sacrifice, and meet at the same throne of grace, and therefore ought to love and bear with one another. Once more, observe, When God was angry with Job's friends, he did himself mix himself in it, and made their peace with him. Our quarrels with God always begin on our part, but the reconciliation begins on his.

II. The acquiescence of Job's friends in this judgment given, v. 9. They were good men, and, as soon as they understood what the mind of the Lord was, they did as he commanded them, and that speedily and without gainsaying, though it was against flesh and blood to court him thus whom they had condemned. Note, Those who would be reconciled to God, must carefully use the prescribed means and methods of reconciliation. Peace with God is to be had only in his own way, and upon his own terms, and they will never seem hard to those who know how to value the privilege, but they will be glad of it upon any terms, though ever so humbling. Job's friends had all joined in accusing Job, and now they join in begging his pardon; those that have sinned together, should repent together. They that appeal to God, as both Job and his friends had done, do not lose their sovereignty, by his award, whether pleasing or displeasing to their own thoughts. And they that conscientiously observe God's commands, need not doubt of his favour; The Lord also accepted Job, and his friends, in answer to his prayer. It is not said, He accepted them, (though that is implied,) but, He accepted Job, for them; so he has made us accepted in the Beloved, Eph. i. 6. Matth. iii. 17. Job did not insult over his friends, upon the testimony God had given concerning him, and the submission they were obliged to make to him; but, God being graciously reconciled to him, he was easily reconciled to them, and then God accepted him. This is what we should aim at in all our prayers and services, to be accepted of the Lord; this must be the top of our ambition, not to have praise of men, but to please God.

10. And the Lord turned the captivity of Job, when he prayed for his friends: also the Lord gave Job twice as much as he had before. 11. Then came there unto him all his brethren, and all his sisters, and all they that had been of his acquaintance before, and did eat bread with him in his house; and they bemoaned him, and comforted him over all the evil that the Lord had brought upon him: every man also gave him a piece of money, and every one an ear-ring of gold. 12. So the Lord blessed the latter end of Job more than his beginning: for he had fourteen thousand sheep, and six thousand camels, and a thousand yoke of oxen, and a thousand she asses. 13. He had also seven sons and three daughters. 14. And he called the name of the first Jemima; and the name of the second, Keziah; and the name of the third, Keren-happuch. 15. And in all the land were no women found so fair as the daughters of Job: and their father gave them inheritance among his brethren. 16. After this lived Job a hundred and forty years, and saw his sons, and his sons' sons, even four generations. 17. So Job died, being old and full of days.

Ye have heard of the patience of Job, (says the apostle, Jam. v. 11.) and have seen the end of the Lord, that is, what end the Lord, at length, put to his troubles. In the beginning of this book, we had Job's patience under his troubles, for an example; here, in the close, for our encouragement to follow that example, we have the happy issue of his troubles, and the prosperous condition to which he was restored after them, which confirms us in counting them happy which endure. Perhaps, too, the extraordinary prosperity which Job was crown'd with after his afflictions, was intended to be to us Christians a type and figure of the glory and happiness of heaven, which the afflictions of this present time are working for us, and in which they will issue at last; this will be more than double to all the delights and satisfactions we now enjoy, as Job's after-prosperity was to his former, though then he was the greatest of all the men of the east. He that rightly endures temptation, when he is tried, shall receive a crown of life, (Jam. i. 12.) as Job, when he was tried, received all the wealth, and honour, and comfort, which here we have an account of.

I. God returned in ways of mercy to him; and his thoughts concerning him were thoughts of good, and not of evil, to give the expected (pay the unexpected) end, Jer. xxix. 11. His troubles began in Satan's malice, which God restrained; his restoration began in God's mercy, which Satan could not oppose. Job's sorest complaint, and indeed the sorrowful accent of all his complaints, on which he laid the greatest emphasis, was, that God appeared against him: but now God plainly appeared for him, and watched over him to build and to plant, like as he had (in his apprehension) watched over him to pluck up and to throw down, Jer. xxxi. 28. This put a new face upon his affairs immediately, and every thing now looked as pleasing and promising, as, before, it had looked gloomy and frightful. 1. God turned his captivity, that is, he repressed his grievances, and took away all the causes of his complaints; he lodged him from the hand with which Satan had bound him, and delivered him out of those cruel hands into which he had delivered him. We may suppose that now all his bodily pains and distempers were healed, so suddenly, and so thoroughly, that the cure was next to miraculous; His flesh became fresher than a child's, and he returned to the days of his youth; what was more, he felt a very great alteration in his mind; it was calm and easy, and the tumult was all over, his disquieting thoughts were all vanished, his fears silenced, and the emotions of God were now as much the delight of his soul, as his terrors had been its burtthen. The tide thus turned, and his troubles began to ebb as fast as they had flowed, just then when he was praying for his friends, praying over his sacrifice which he offered for them. Mercy did not return, when he was disputing with his friends, no, not though he had right on his side, but when he was praying for them; for God is better served and pleased with our prayers than with our words, in the hearing of his ears. When Job completed his repentance by this instance of his forgiving men theirtrespasses, then God completed his restoration by turning his captivity.

Note, We are really doing our business, when we are praying for our friends, if we pray in a right manner, for in those prayers there is not only faith, but love. Christ has taught us to pray with, and for, others, in teaching us to say, Our Father; and in seeking mercy for others, we may, and must, pray that God will turn their captivity. Our Lord Jesus has his exaltation and dominion there, where he ever lives making intercession. Some, by the turning of Job's captivity, understand the restitution which the Sabeans and Chaldeans made of the cattle which they had taken from him, God wonderfully inclining them to do it; and with these he began the world again. Probably, it was so; those spoilers had swallowed down his riches, but they were forced to vomit them up again, as is said of the 'puppets.' Ex. xxi. 36. I think it more likely, as we are generally of the turn now given. 2. God doubled his possessions; Also the Lord gave him twice as much as he had before. It is probable that he did at first, by some way or other, intimate to him, that it was his gracious purpose, by degrees, in due time, to bring him to such a height of prosperity, that he should have twice as much as he had, for the encouraging of his hope and the quickening of his industry, and that it might appear that he, by a wonderful increase was a special son of God's favour. And it may be considered as intended, (1.) To balance his losses: he suffered for the glory of God, and therefore God made it up to him with advantage, and allowed him more than interest upon interest. God will take care that none shall lose by him. (2.) To recom pense his patience and his confidence in God, which (notwithstanding the workings of corruption) he did not cast away, but still walked in the fear of God; and the issue of that was, that it which has a great recompense of reward, Heb. x. 35. Job's friends had often put their severe censure of Job upon this issue, If thou wert pure and upright, surely now he would awake for thee, ch. viii. 6. But he does not awake for thee, therefore thou art not upright; "Well," says God, "though your argument be not conclusive, I will, even by that, demonstrate the integrity of my servant Job; his latter end shall greatly increase, and by that it shall appear, since you have it so, that it was not for any injustice in his hands, that he suffered the loss of all things." Now it appeared that Job had reason to bless God for taking away, (as he did, ch. i. 21.) since it made so good a return.

II. His old acquaintance, neighbours, and relations, were very kind to him, v. 11. They had been estranged from him, and it was not the least of the grievances of his complaint that they were the cause of his unhappiness, ch. xix. 13, &c. But now they visited him, with all possible expressions of affection and respect. 1. They put honour upon him, in coming to dine with him as formerly, (but we may suppose) privately bringing their entertainment along with them, so that he had the reputation of feasting them without the expense. 2. They sympathized with him, and showed a tender concern for him, such as becomes brethren. They mourned him, when they talked over the calamities of his afflicted state; and comforted him, when they took notice of God's gracious returns to him. They wept for his griefs, and rejoiced in his joys, and proved not such miserable comforters as his three friends, that, at first, were so forward and officious to attend him. These were not such great men, nor such learned and eloquent as those, but he had a finer, skilful, and kinder comforter. Job. God sometimes chooses the foolish and weak things of the world, as for conviction, so for comfort. 3. They made a collection among them for the repair of his losses, and the setting of him up again; they did not think it enough to say, Be warmed, Be filled, but gave him such things as would be of use to him, Jam. ii. 16. Every one gave him a piece of money, more than he could use; it is likely, and some rejoiced in their ability, to give every one an an-ring of gold, (an ornament much used by the children of the east,) which would be as good as money to him; this was a superfluity which they could well spare, and the rule is, That our abundance must be a supply to our brethren's necessity. But why did Job's relations now, at length, show this kindness to him? (1.) God put it in their hearts to do so; and every creature is that to us, which God has known God in their estrangement from him, for which he now rewarded him in turning them to him again. (2.) Perhaps some of them withdrew from him because they thought him a hypocrite, but, now that his integrity was made manifest, they returned to him, and to communion with him again. When God was friendly to him, they were all willing to be friendly too, Ps. cxix. 74, 75. Others of them, it may be, withdrew, because he was poor, and sore, and a refulge spectacle, but now that he began to recover, they were willing to renew their acquaintance with him. Swallow-friends, that are gone in winter, will return in the spring, though their friendship is of little value. (3.) Perhaps the rebuke which God had given to Eliphaz and the other two, for their unkindness to Job, awakened the rest of his friends to return to their duty. Reproofs to others we should thus take as admonitions and instructions to us. 4. Job prayed for his friends, and then they flacked about him, overcome by his kindness, and every one desiring an interest in his prayers. The more we pray for our friends and relations, the more comfort we may expect in them.

III. His estate strangely increased, by the blessing of God upon the little that his friends gave him. He thankfully received their coffers, and did not think it below him to have his estate repaired by contributions; he did not, on the one hand, urge his friends to raise money for him, he acquits himself from that, (ch. vi. 22.) Did I say, Bring unto me or give me a reward of your substance? Yet what they brought, he thankfully accepted, and did not upbraud them with their former unkindness, nor ask them why they did not do this sooner; he was neither so covetous and griping as to ask their charity, nor so proud and ill-natured as to be angry at them, when they offered it; and being in so good a temper, God gave him that which was far better than their money and ear-rings, and that was, his blessing, v. 12. The Lord comforted him now, according to the days wherein he had afflicted him, and blessed his latter end more than his beginning. Observe, 1. The blessing of the Lord makes rich; it is he that gives us power to get wealth, and gives success, in our endeavors. Those therefore that would thrive, must have an eye to God's blessing, and never go out of it, no, not into the warm sun; and those that have thriven, must not sacrifice to their own net, but acknowledge their obligations to God for his blessing. 2. That blessing can make very rich, and sometimes make good people so. Those that are become rich by getting, think they can easily make themselves very rich by saving; but as those that have little, must depend upon God to make it much, so those that have much, must depend upon God to make it more and to double it, Prov. i. 3. The last days of a good man sometimes prove his best days, his last works his best works, his last comforts his best comforts: for his path, like that of the morning-light, shines more and more to the perfect day. Of a wicked man it is said, His last state is worse than his first, (Luke xi. 26.) but of the upright man, His end is peace; and sometimes the nearer it is, the clearer are the views of it. Job's case shews, that though God is pleased sometimes to make the latter end of a good man's life more comfortable than the former part of it has been, and strangely to outdo the expectations of his afflicted people, who thought they should never have lived to see better days, that we may not despair even in the depths of adversity; we know not what good times we may yet be reserved for in our latter day. Non si male nune, etiamsi longe est ita, it is otherwise. Job, in his affliction, had wished to be as in months past, as rich as he had been before, and quite despaired of that; but God is often better to us than our own fears, nay, than our own wishes, for Job's possessions were doubled to him; the number of his cattle, his sheep and camels, his oxen and she-asses, is just double here to what it was, ch. i. 3. This is a remarkable instance of the extent of the Divine Providence to things that seem so minute, as this, of the exact number of a man's cattle, as also of the harmony of Providence, and the reference of one event to another; for known unto God are all his works, from the beginning to the end. Job's other possessions, no doubt, were increased, in proportion to his cattle, lands, money, and servants, &c. So that if before he was the greatest of all the men of the east, what was he now?

IV. His family was built up again, and he had great comfort in his children, v. 13.-15. The last of his afflictions that are recorded, (ch. i.) and the most grievous, was, the death of all his children at once: his friends upbraided him with it, (ch. viii. 4.) but God repaired even that breach in process of time, either by the same wife, or, she being dead, by another. i. The number of his children was the same as before, seven sons and three daugh.-ters. Some give this reason why they were not doubled as his cattle were, because his children that were dead, were not lost, but gone before to a better world; and therefore if he have but the same number of them, they may be reckoned double, for he has two fleeces of children, (as I may say,) Mahanaim,—two hosts, one in heaven, the other on earth, and in both he is rich. 2. The names of his daughters are here registered, (v. 14.) because, in the significations of them, they seemed designed to perpetuate the remembrance of God's goodness to him in the surprising change of his condition; he called the first Jemima, The day, (whence perhaps Diana had her name,) because of the shining forth of his prosperity after a dark night of affliction. The next Keziah, a spice of a very fragrant smell, because (says Bishop Patrick) God had healed his ulcers. The third Keren-happuch, that is, Plenty restored, or A horn of paint; because (says he,) God had renewed his family, and filled his face, ch. xvi. 16. Concerning these daughters we are here told, v. 15. (1.) That God adorned them with great beauty, no women so fair as the daughters of Job. In the Old Testament we often find women praised for their beauty, as Sarah, Rebekah, and many others; but we never find any women in the New Testament, whose beauty is in the least taken notice of, no not the Virgin Mary herself, because the beauty of holiness is that which is brought to a much clearer light by the gospel. (2.) That their father (God enabling him to do it) supplied them with great fortunes. He gave them inheritance among their brethren, and did not turn them off with small portions, as most did. It is probable they had some extraordinary personal merit, which Job had an eye to in the extraordinary favour he showed them. Perhaps they excelled their brethren in wisdom and piety; and therefore, that they might continue in his family, to be a stay and blessing to it, he made them co-heirs with their brethren.

V. His life was long. What age he was, when his troubles came, we are nowhere told; but here we are told he lived 140 years; whence some conjecture that he was 70 when he was in his troubles, and that so his age was doubled, as his other possessions.

1. He lived to have much of the comfort of this life, for he saw his posterity to the fourth generation, v. 16. Though his children were not doubled to him, yet, in his children's children, (and those are the crown of old men,) they were more than doubled. As God appointed to Adam another seed instead of that which was slain, (Gen. iv. 25.) so he did to Job with advantage. God has ways to repair the losses, and balance the griefs, of those who are written childless, as Job was, when he had buried all his children.

2. He lived till he was satisfied, for he died full of days, satisfied with living in this world, and willing to leave it; not peevishly so, as in the days of his affliction, but piously so, and thus, as Eliphaz had encouraged him to hope, he came to his grave like a shock of corn in his season.
AN

EXPOSITION,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS,

OF THE BOOK OF

PSALMS.

We have now before us one of the choicest and most excellent parts of all the Old Testament; nay, so much is there in it of CHRIST and his gospel, as well as of GOD and his law, that it has been called the abstract, or summary, of both Testaments. The History of Israel, which we were long upon, led us to camps and council-boards, and there entertained and instructed us in the knowledge of GOD. The book of Job brought us into the schools, and treated us with profitable disputations concerning GOD and his providence; but this book brings us into the sanctuary, draws us off from converse with men, with the politicians, philosophers, or disputers, of this world, and directs us into communion with GOD, by solacing and reposing our souls in him, lifting up, and letting out, our hearts toward him. Thus may we be in the mount with GOD; and we understand not ourselves, if we say not, It is good to be here.

Let us consider,

I. The title of this book. It is called, 1. The Psalms; under that title it is referred to, Luke xxiv. 44. The Hebrew calls it Tehillim, which properly signifies Psalms of praise; because many of them are such: but Psalms is a more general word, meaning all metrical compositions fitted to be sung, which may as well be historical, doctrinal, or supplicatory, as laudatory. Though express and to excite all the other affections, as well as this of joy. The priests had a mournful muse as well as joyful ones; and the divine institution of singing psalms is thus largely displayed; for we are directed, not only to praise GOD, but to teach and admonish ourselves and one another in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs, Col. iii. 16. 2. It is called the Book of Psalms; so it is quoted by St. Peter, Acts i. 20. It is a collection of psalms, of all the psalms that were divinely inspired, which, though composed at several times and upon several occasions, are here put together without any reference to, or dependence upon, one another; thus they were preserved from being scattered and lost, and laid in so much greater readiness for the service of the church. See what a good Master we serve, and what pleasantness there is in wisdom's ways, when we are not only commanded to sing at our work, and have cause enough given us to do so, but have words also put in our mouths, and songs prepared to our hands.

II. The Author of this book. It is, no doubt, derived originally from the Blessed Spirit. They are spiritual songs, words which the Holy Ghost taught. The penman of most of them was David, the son of Jesse, who is therefore called the sweet Psalmist of Israel, 2 Sam. xxiii. 1. Some that have not his name in their titles, yet are expressly ascribed to him elsewhere; as Ps. ii. (Acts iv. 25.) and Ps. xcvi. cv. (1 Chron. xvi.) One psalm is expressly said to be the prayer of Moses; (Ps. xc.) and that some of the psalms were penned by Asaph, is intimated, 2 Chron. xxxix. 30, where they are said to praise the Lord in the words of David, and Asaph, who is there called a seer or prophet. Some of the psalms seem to have been penned long after; as Ps. cxxviii. at the time of the captivity in Babylon; but the far greater part of them were certainly penned by David himself, whose genius lay toward poetry and music, and who was raised up, qualified, and animated, for the establishing of the ordinance of singing psalms in the church of GOD, as Moses and Aaron were, in their day, for the settling of the ordinances of sacrifice; theirs is superseded, but his remains, and will to the end of time, when it shall be swallowed up in the songs of eternity. Herein David was a type of CHRIST, who descended from him, not from Moses, because he came to take away sacrifice, (the family of Moses was soon lost and extinct,) but to establish and perpetuate joy and praise; for of the family of David in CHRIST there shall be no end.

III. The scope of it. It is manifestly intended, 1. To assist the exercises of natural religion, and to kindle in the souls of men those devout affections which we owe to GOD as our Creator, Owner, Ruler, and Benefactor. The book of Job helps to prove our first principles of the divine perfections and providence; but this helps to improve them in prayers and praises, and professions of desire toward him, dependence on him, and an entire devotedness and resignation to him. Other parts of scripture show that GOD is infinitely above man, and his sovereign LORD; but this shows us that he may, notwithstanding, be conversed with by us sinful worms of the earth; and there are ways in which, if it be not our own fault, we may keep up communion with him in all the various conditions of human life. 2. To advance the excellencies of revealed religion, and, in the most pleasing powerful manner, to recommend it to the world. There is indeed little or nothing, in all the book of Psalms, of the ceremonial law. Though sacrifice and offering were yet to continue many ages, yet they are here represented as things which God himself had made (Ps. cxlv. 16); as things which he did not merely suffer, but from time to time did vanish away. But the word and law of GOD, those parts of it which are moral, and of perpetual obligation, are here, all along, magnified and made honourable, no where more. And CHRIST, the Crown and Centre of revealed religion, the Foundation, Corner, and Top-stone, of that blessed building, is here clearly spoken of in type and prophecy; both his sufferings and the glory that should follow, and the kingdom that he should set up in the world, which GOD's covenant with David, concerning his kingdom, was to have its accomplishment in. What a high value does this book put upon the word of GOD, his statutes and judgments, his covenant, and the great and precious promises of it; and how does it recommend them to us as our guide and stay, and our heritage for ever.

Jv. The use of it. All scripture, being given by inspiration of GOD, is profitable to convey divine light into our minds; but the book of singular use with that to convey divine life and power, and a holy warmth, into our affections. There is no one book of scripture that is more helpful to the devotions of the saints than this, and it has been so in all ages of the church, ever since it was written, and the several parts of it delivered to the chief musician, for the service of the church. 1. It is of use to be sung. Further than David's psalms we may go, but we need not, for hymns and spiritual songs. What the rules of the Hebrew metre were, even the learned are not certain. But these psalms ought to be rendered according to the metre of every language, at least, so that they may be sung for the edification of the church. And methinks it is a great comfort to us, when we are singing David's psalms, that we are offering the very same praises to GOD, that were offered him in the days of David, and the other godly kings of Judah. So rich, so well made, are these divine poems, that they can never be exhausted, can never be worn thread-bare. 2. It is of use to be read and opened by the ministers of CHRIST, as containing great and excellent truths, and rules concerning good and evil. Our Lord JESUS expounded the psalms to his disciples, the gospel psalms, and opened their understandings (for he had the key of David) to understand them, Luke xxiv. 44. 3. It is of use to be read and meditated upon by all good people. It is a full fountain, out of which we may all be drawing water with joy. The Psalmist's experiences are of great use for our direction, caution, and encouragement. In telling us, as he often does, what passed between God and his soul, he lets us know what we may expect from GOD, and what he will expect, and require, and graciously accept, from us. David was a man after GOD's own heart, and therefore those who find themselves in some measure according to his heart, have reason to hope that they are renewed by the grace of GOD, after the image of GOD, and may have much comfort in the testimony of their consciences for them, that they can heartily say Amen to David's prayers and praises. 4. Even the Psalmist's expressions too are of great use; and by them the Spirit helps our praying infirmities, because we know not what to pray for as we ought. In all our approaches to GOD, as well as in our first returns to GOD, we are directed to take with us words, (Hos. xiv. 2.) these words, words which the Holy Ghost teaches. If we make David's psalms familiar to us, as we ought to do, whatever errand we have at the throne of grace, by way of confession, petition, or thanksgiving, we may from thence be assisted in the delivery of it; whatever devout affection is working in us, holy desire or hope, sorrow or joy, we may there find apt words whereby to clothe it; sound speech which cannot be condemned. It will be good for the most religious minds, when it is committed to memory, to reduce it to a short, plain form, in the spirit of the psalm, we may then be sure of acceptance with GOD, in using the language of it. Nor is it only our devotion, and the affections of our mind, that the book of Psalms assists, teaching us how to offer praise so as to glorify GOD, but it is also a directory to the actions of our lives, and teaches us how to order our conversation aright, so as that, in the end, we may see the salvation of GOD, Ps. l 23. The Psalms were thus serviceable to the Old Testament Church, but to us Christians they may be of more use than they could be to them who lived before the coming of CHRIST; for, as Moses's sacrifices, so David's songs, are expounded and made more intelligible by the gospel of CHRIST, which lets us within the veil; so that, if to David's prayers and praises we add St. Paul's prayers in his Epistles, and the new songs in the Revelation, we shall be thoroughly furnished for this good work; for the new song, made of the old, maketh new Psalms of the most sweet.
PSALM I.

This is a psalm of instruction concerning good and evil, setting before us life and death, the blessing and the curse, that we may take the right way which leads to happiness, and avoid that which will certainly end in our misery and ruin. The different character and condition of godly people and wicked people, those that serve God and those that serve him not, is here plainly stated in a few words; so that every man, if he will be faithful to himself, may here see his own face, and then read his own doom. That division of the children of men into saints and sinners, righteous and unrighteous, the children of God and the children of the wickedness, is ancient; and every part of the struggle between sin and grace, the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent, it is lasting, and will survive all other divisions and subdivisions of men into high and low, bond and free, by right, by birth, and by the will of him, the ever-living, that makes the distinction between sin and grace, will last as long as heaven and hell. This psalm shows us, I. The holiness and happiness of a godly man, v. 1.-3. II. The sinfulness and misery of a wicked man, v. 4.-5. III. The ground and reason of both, v. 6. Whoever collected the psalms of David, (probably it was Ezra,) with good reason put this psalm first, as a preface to the rest, because it is absolutely necessary, that we know the way before God, (for it is only the prayer of the upright that is his delight,) and, therefore, that we be right in our notions of blessedness, and in our choice of the way that leads to it. Those are not fit to put up good prayers, who do not walk in good ways.

1. BLESSED is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scorners: 2. But his delight is in the law of the Lord; and in his law doth he meditate day and night. 3. And he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season: his leaf also shall not wither; and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper.

The psalmist begins with the character and condition of a godly man, that those may take the comfort of that, to draw it in long. Here is, A blessed one, given of the godly man's spirit and way, by which we are to try ourselves. The Lord knows them that are his by name, but we must know them by their character; for that is agreeable to a state of probation, that we may study to answer to the character, which is indeed both the command of the law, which we are bound in duty to obey, and the condition of the promise, which we are bound by. The character of a good man is here given by the rules he chooses to walk by, and to take his measures from. What we take at our setting out, and at every turn, for the guide of our conversation, whether the course of this world, or the word of God, is of material consequence. An error in the choice of our standard and leader, is original and fatal; but if we be right here, we are in a fair way to do well.

1. A godly man, that he may avoid the evil, utterly renounces the conduct of evil-doers, and will not be led by them; (v. 1.) He walks not in the counsel of the ungodly, &c. This part of his character is put first, because those that will keep the commandments of their God, must say to evildoers, Depart from us; (cxix. 115.) and departing from evil, is that in which wisdom begins. (1.) He sees evildoers round about him, the world is full of them, they walk on every side; these are here described by three characters, ungodly, sinners, and scornful. See by what steps men arrive at the height of impiety: Nemo respente fit turpisimius—None reach the height of vice at once. They are ungodly first, casting off the fear of God, and living in the neglect of their duty to him: but they rest not there; when the services of religion are laid aside, they come to be sinners, they break out into open rebellion against God, and engage in the service of sin and Satan; omissions make way for commissions; and, by these the heart is not hardened, that, at length, they come to be scorners, they openly defy all that is sacred, scoff at religion, and make a jest of sin. Thus is the way of iniquity down hill; the bad grow worse, sinners themselves become tempters to others, and advocates for Baal. The word which we translate ungodly, signifies such as are unsettled, aim at no certain end, and walk by no certain rule, but are at the command of every lust, and at the beck of every evil counsel. The word sinners, signifies such as are determined for the practice of sin, and set it up as their trade. The scornful, are those that set their mouths against the heavens. These the good man sees with a sad heart, they are a constant vexation to his righteous soul. But, (2.) He shuns them, wherever he sees them. He does not do as they do; and, that he may not, he does not converse familiarly with them. (1.) He does not walk in the counsel of the ungodly; his not walking with their councils, nor does he advise with them; though they are ever so witty, and subtle, and learned, if they are ungodly, they shall not be the men of his counsel; he does not consent to them, nor say as they say; (Luke xxiii. 51.) he does not take his measures from their principles, nor act according to the advice which they give and take. The ungodly are forward to give their advice against religion, and it is managed so artfully, that we have reason to think ourselves happy, if we escape being tainted and ensnared by it. (2.) He stands not in the way of sinners; he avoids doing as they do; their way shall not be his way, he will not come into it, much less will he continue in it, as the sinner does, who sets himself in a way that is not good, xxxvi. 4. He avoids (as much as may be) being where they are: that he may not imitate them, he will not associate with them, nor choose them for his companions. He does not stand in their way, to be picked up by them, (Prov. vii. 2.) but keeps as far from them as from a place or person infected with the plague, for fear of the contagion, Prov. iv. 14, 15. He would that he be kept from harm, must keep out of harm's way. (3.) He sits not in the seat of the scornful; he does not repose himself with those that sit down secure in their wickedness, and please themselves with the sordidness of their own consciences; he does not associate with those that sit in close cabal, to find out ways and means for the support and advancement of the Devil's kingdom, or that sit in open judgment, magnificently to condemn the generation of the righteous. The seat of the drunkards, is the seat of the scornful; xxix. 12. Happy is the man that never sits in it, Hos. vii. 5.

2. A godly man, that he may do that which is good and cleave to it, submits to the direction of the word of God, that makes it familiar to him, v. 2. This is that which keeps him out of the way of the ungodly, and fortifies him against their temptations; By the words of thy lips I have kept me from the path of the deceiver, xvii. 4. We need not court the fellowship of sinners, either for pleasure or for improvement, while we have fellowship with the word of God, and with God himself in and by his word; When thou walkest, it shall walk with thee, Prov. iv. 7. He may judge himself and his state by asking, What is the law of God to us? What account do we make of it? What place has it in us? See here, (1.) The entire affection which a good man has for the law of God; his delight is in it. He delights in it, though it be a law, a yoke, because it is the law of God, which is holy, just, and good, which he freely consents to, and so delights in, after the image of God made him. All who are well pleased that there is a God, must be well pleased that there is a Bible, a revelation of God, of his will, and the only way to happiness in him. (2.) The intimate acquaintance which a good man keeps up with the word of God; in that law doth he meditate day and night; by this it appears that his delight is in it, for what we love, we love to think of, cxix. 97. To meditate on God's word, is to discourse with our- selves concerning the great things contained in the word, with a close application of mind, a fixedness of thought, till we be suitably affected with those things, and experience the power and the efficacy of them in our hearts. This we must do, day and night; we must have a constant habitual regard to the word of God, as the rule of our actions and the spring of our comforts, and we must have it in our thoughts, accordingly, upon every occasion that occurs, whether night or day. No time is amiss for meditating on the word of God, nor any time unseasonable for those visits. We must not only set ourselves to med- itate on God's word, morning and evening, at the entrance of the day and of the night; but these thoughts should be interwoven with the business and converse of every day, and with the reposi and slumber of every night; When I awake, I am still with thee. II. An assurance given of the godly man's happiness, with which we should encourage ourselves to answer for such. 1. In general, he is blessed, v. 1. God blesses him, and that blessing will make him happy. Bless- edness are to him; blessings of all kinds, of the upper and nether springs, enough to make him completely happy; none of the ingredients of happiness shall be wanting to him. When he undertakes to describe a blessed man, he describes a good man; for, after all, those only are happy, truly happy, that are holy, truly holy; and we are more concerned to know the way to blessedness, than to know where it is found; blessedness will consist. Nay, goodness and holiness are not only the way to happiness, (Rev. xxii. 14.) but happiness itself; supposing there was not another life after this, yet that a man is a happy man, that keeps in the way of his duty. 2. His blessedness is here illustrated by a simili- tude; (v. 3.) He shall be like a tree, fruitful and flourishing. This is the effect, (1.) Of his pious preparation, he is planted by the word of God, in succum et sanguinem—into juice and blood, and that makes him like a tree. The more we converse with the word of God, the better furnished we are for every good word and work. (2.) Of the promised blessing; he is blessed of the Lord, and therefore he shall be like a tree. The divine blessing produces real effects. It is the happiness of a godly man, (1.) That he is planted by the grace of God; they are watered by nature wild olives, and yet continue so till the Spirit of God shall make them fruitful. There is no fruit from a tree which is not planted by a power from above. Never any good tree grew of itself, it is the planting of the Lord, and therefore he must in it be glorified; (Isa. lxi. 3.) The trees of the Lord are full of sap. (2.) That he is placed by the means of grace; here called the rivers of water, those rivers which make glad the city of our God; (xlvi. 4.) from these a good man receives supplies of strength and vigour, but in secret, un- discerned works of grace, they shall bring forth fruit, abounding to a good account, Phil. iv. 17. To those whom God first blessed, he said, Be fruitful; (Gen. i. 22.) and still, the comfort and honour of fruitfulness are a recompense for the labour of it. It is expected from those who enjoy the mercies of grace, that, both in the temper of their minds, and in the tenor of their lives, they comply with the intentions of that grace, and then they bring forth fruit. And, be it observed to the praise of the great Dresser of the vineyard, they bring forth their fruit, (xxv. 1.) not only in the midst of them all, but of all kinds, divers sorts and qualities of fruit; to the glory of God, who is in the midst of them all. In that season, when it is most beautiful and most useful, improving every opportunity of doing good, and doing it in its proper time. 4.] That his profession shall be preserved from blemish and decay; His leaf shall not wither. Even the leaf of those who bring forth only the leaves of profession, without any good fruit, will wither, and they shall be as much ashamed of their profession as ever they were proud of it; but of the word of God rule in the heart, that will keep the profession green, both to our comfort and to our credit; the laurels, thus won, shall never wither. (5.) That prosperity shall attend him, wherever he goes, soul-prosperity. Whatever he does, in conformity to the law, it shall prosper and succeed, to his mind, or above his hope. In singing these verses, being duly affected with the malignant and dangerous nature of sin, and transcendent excellencies of the divine law, and the power and efficacy of God's grace, from which our fruit is found, we must teach and admonish ourselves, and one another, to watch against sin and all approaches toward it, to converse much with the word of God, and abound in the fruit of righteousness: and, in praying over them, we must seek to God for his grace both to fortify us against every evil word and work, and to furnish us for every good word and work. 4. The ungodly are not so: but are like the chaff which the wind driveth away. (1.) In general; they are the reverse of the righteous, both in character and condition; they are not so. The LXX emphatically repeat this, not so the ungodly, they are not so; they are led by the counsel of the wicked, in the way of sinners, to the seat of the scornful; they have no delight in the law of God, nor ever think of it; they bring forth no fruit, but grapes of Sodom; they cumber the ground. (2.) In particular; whereas the righteous are like useful, fruitful, trees, they are like the chaff which the wind driveth away, the very lightest of the chaff, the dust which the owner of the floor desires to have driven away, as not capable of being put to any use. Would you value them? Would you weigh them? They are like chaff, of no worth at all in God's account, how highly soever they may value themselves. Would you know the temper of their minds? They are the dust driven away; they have no manifest- ance in them, no solidity; they are easily driven to and fro by every wind and temptation, and have no steadfastness. Would you know their end? The wrath of God will drive them away in their wick- edness, as the wind does the chaff, which is never gathered, or looked after more. The chaff may be for a while, among the wheat; but He is coming, whose fan is in his hand, and who will thoroughly purge his floor. That which is filthy and foully make themselves as chaff, will be found so, before the whirlwind and fire of divine wrath, (xxxv. 5.) so unable to stand before it, or to escape it, Isa. xlvii. 13. 2. The doom of the ungodly read, v. 5. (1.) They will be cast, upon their trial, as traitors convicted; they shall not stand in the judgment; they shall be found guilty, shall hang down the head with shame.
and confusion, and all their pleas and excuses will be overruled as frivolous. There is a judgment to come, in which every man's present character and work, though ever so artfully concealed and disguised, shall be truly and perfectly discovered, and appear in its own colours; and every man's future state will be, by an irreversible sentence, determined for eternity. The ungodly must appear in that judgment, to receive according to the things done in the body; they may hope to come off, nay, to come off with honour, but their hope will deceive them; they shall not stand in the judgment; so plain will the evidence be against them, and so just and impartial will the judgment be upon it. (2.) There will be formed from before the state of the blessed; they shall not stand in the congregation of the righteous; in the judgment, so some, in that court wherein the saints, as assessors with Christ, shall judge the world, those holy myriads with which he shall come to execute judgment upon all, Jude 14. 1 Cor. vi. 2. Or, in heaven; there will be seen, shortly, a general assembly of the church of the first-born, a congregation of the righteous, of all the saints, and none but saints, and saints made perfect, such a congregation of them as never was in this world, 2 Thess. ii. 1. The wicked shall not have a place in the congregation. Into the new Jerusalem none unclean or unsanctified shall enter; they shall see the righteous enter into the kingdom, and themselves, to their everlasting vocation, thrust out, Luke xiii. 27. The wicked and profane, in this world, ridiculed the righteous and their congregation, despised them, and cared not for their company; justly, therefore, will they be for ever separated from them. Hypocrites, in this world, under the disguise of a plausible profession, may thrust themselves into the congregation of the righteous, and remain undisturbed and undiscovered there; but Christ cannot be imposed upon, though his ministers may; the day is coming when he will separate between the sheaf and the goats, the tares and the wheat; see Matth. xiii. 41, 49. That great day, so the Chaldee here calls it, will be a day of discovery, a day of distinction, and a day of final division. Then you shall return, and discern between the righteous and the wicked, which here it is sometimes hard to do, Mal. iii. 18. 3. The reason rendered of this different state of the godly and wicked, v. 6. (1.) God must have all the glory of the prosperity and happiness of the righteous. They are blessed, because the Lord knew their way; he chose them into it, inclined them to choose it, leads and guides them in it, and orders all their steps. (2.) Sinners must bear all the blame of their own destruction. Therefore the ungodly perish, because the very way in which they have chosen and resolved to walk, leads directly to destruction; it naturally tends toward ruin, and therefore must necessarily end in it. Or, we may take it thus, The Lord approves of, and is well pleased with, the way of the righteous, and therefore the influence of that way shall prosper, and end well; but he is angry at the way of the wicked, all they do is offensive to him, and therefore it shall perish, and they in it. It is certain that every man's judgment proceeds from the Lord, and it is well or ill with us, and is likely to be so to all eternity, according as we are, or are not, accepted of God. Let this support the drooping spirits of the righteous, that the Lord knows their way, knows their hearts, (Job iii. 26;) and provokes them to speak of it. (Mic. vi. 1.) knows their character, how much sweeter it is blackened and blemished by the reproaches of men, and will shortly make them and their way manifest before the world, to their immortal joy and honour. Let this cast a damp upon the secuity and jollity of sin-ners, that their way, though pleasant now, will perish at last.

In singing these verses, and praying over them, let us possess ourselves with a holy dread of the wicked man's portion, and depurpose it with a firm and lively sense of the judgment which is to come, and stir up ourselves to prepare for it, and with holy care, to approve ourselves to God in every thing, entreating his favour with our whole hearts.

PSALM II.

As the foregoing psalm was moral, and showed us our duty, so this is evangelical, and shows us our Saviour. Under the type of David's kingdom, which was of divine appointment, met with much opposition, but prevailed at last, the kingdom of the Messiah, the Son of David, is professedly, of which is the primary intention and scope of the psalm; and I think there is less in it of the type, and more of the anti-type, than in any of the gospel-psalms, for there is nothing in it but what is applicable to Christ, but some things that are not at all applicable to David. v. 6, 7. Thou art my Son, (v. 8.) I will give thee the uttermost parts of the earth, and, (v. 12.) kiss the Son. It is interpreted of Christ, Jers iv. 27. — xiii. 33. Heb. i. 5. The Holy Ghost here foretells, I. The opposition that should be given to the kingdom of the Messiah, v. 1. 3. II. The bating and challenging of that opposition, v. 4. 5. III. The setting up of the kingdom of Christ, notwithstanding the opposition; v. 6. 7. IV. The establishment of it, v. 7. V. A promise of the enlargement and success of it, v. 8. 9. VI. A call and exhortation to kings and princes, to yield themselves the willing subjects of this kingdom, v. 10. 12. Or thus; We have here, 1. Threatenings denounced against the adversaries of Christ's kingdom, v. 1. 6. 2. Promises made to Christ himself the Head of this kingdom, v. 7. 9. 3. Counsel given to all, to espouse the interests of this kingdom, v. 10. 12. 4. It is a promise to us, that in the days of the Messiah, we shall be subject to the precepts of his law, so it is likewise, that we should be subject to the grace of his gospel, and come to him in the name of a Mediator.

1. Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing? 2. The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together, against the Lord, and against his Anointed, saying, 3. Let us break their bands asunder, and cast away their cords from us. 4. He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh: the Lord shall have them in derision. 5. Then shall he speak unto them in his wrath, and vex them in his sore displeasure. 6. Yet have I set my king upon my holy hill of Zion.

We have here a very great struggle about the kingdom of Christ, hell and heaven contesting it; the seat of the war is this earth, where Satan has long had an usurped kingdom, and exercised dominion to that degree, that he has been called The prince of this world, and The god of the world we live in. He knows very well, that as the Messiah's kingdom rises and gets ground, his falls and loses ground; and therefore, though it will be set up certainly, it shall not be set up tamely. Observe here, I. The mighty opposition that would be given to the Messiah and his kingdom, to his holy religion and all the interests of it, v. 1-3. One would have expected that this thing should have been universally welcomed and embraced, and that every sheaf should immediately have bowed to that of the Messiah, and all the crowns and sceptres on earth should have been laid at his feet; but it proves quite contrary. Never were the notions of any sect of philosophers, though ever so absurd, nor the powers of any prince or state, though ever so tyrannical, opposed with so much violence as the Jewish or Roman governments. Christ's religion was from heaven, for the opposition was plainly from hell originally.

1. We are here told who would appear as adversaries to Christ, and the Devil's instruments in this opposition to his kingdom. Princes and people, court and country, have sometimes separate interests, but here they are united against Christ; not the mighty only, but the mob, the heathen, the people, numbers of them, communities of them; they usually fund of liberty, yet they were averse to the liberty Christ came to procure and proclaim. Not the mob only, but the mighty, (among whom one might have expected more sense and consideration,) appear violent against Christ; though his kingdom is not of this world, nor intended to weaken their interests, but very likely, if they pleased, to strengthen them, yet the kings of the earth and rulers are up in arms immediately. See the effects of the old enmity in the seed of the serpent against the seed of the woman, and how general and malignant the corruption of mankind is. See how formidable the enemies of the church are, they are numerous, they are potent. The unbelieving Jews are here called heathen, so wretchedly were they degenerated from the faith and holiness of their ancestors; they stirred up the heathen, the Gentiles, to persecute the christians. As the Philistines and their lords, Saul and his confederates, the disaffected party and their ringleaders, opposed David's coming to the crown; so Herod and Pilate, the Gentiles and the Jews, did their utmost against Christ and his interest in men, Acts iv. 27.

2. Who is it that they quarrel with, and muster up all their forces against it; is against the Lord, and against his Anointed, against all religion in general, and the christian religion in particular. It is certain that all who are enemies to Christ, whatever the pretense, are enemies to God himself; they have hated both me and my Father, John xv. 24. The great Author of our holy religion is here called the Lord's Anointed, or Messiah, or Christ, in allusion to the anointing of David to be king; he is both authorized and qualified to be the church's Head and King, is duly invested in the office, and every way fitted for it; yet there are those that are against him; may, therefore they are against him, because they are against God's authority, obvious at Christ's advancement, and have a rooted enmity to the Spirit of holiness.

3. The opposition they give, is here described: (1. It is a most spiteful and malicious opposition. They rage and fret, they gnash their teeth, for vexation at the setting up of Christ's kingdom; it creates them the utmost uneasiness, and fills them with indignation, so that they have no enjoyment of themselves; see Lord's case, Matt. xvii. 27, 33.—(2. Idolaters raged at the discovery of their folly, the chief priests and Pharisees at the eclipsing of their glory and the shaking of their usurped dominion. They that did evil, raged at the light. (3. It is a deliberate and polite opposition. They imagine, or meditate; they contrive means to suppress the rising interests of Christ's kingdom, and are very confident of the success of their schemes; see Lord's case, Matt. xvi. xxiv. (4. It is a resolute and obstinate opposition. They set themselves, set their faces as a flint, and their hearts as an adamant, in defiance of reason and conscience, and all the terrors of the Lord; they are proud and daring, like the Babel-builders, and will persist in their resolution come what will. (4.) It is a combined and confederate opposition. They take counsel together, to assist and animate one another in the destruction of their adversary; and the doctrine and government of Christ, as viewed, by them, as nemine contradicente—unanimously, that they will push on the unholy war against the Messiah with the utmost vigour: and, thereupon, councils are called, cabals are formed, and all their wits are at work, to find out ways and means for the preventing of the establishment of Christ's kingdom, lxviii. 5.

4. We are here told what it is they are exasperated at, and what they aim at in this opposition; (v. 3.) Let us break their bands assunder. They will not be under any government; they are children of Belial, that cannot endure the yoke, at least, the yoke of the Lord and his Anointed. They will be content to entertain such notions of the kingdom of God and the Messiah, as will serve them to dispute of, and to support their own dominion with: if the Lord and his Anointed will make them rich and great in the world, they will bid them welcome, but if they will retain their corrupt appetites and passions, regulate and reform their hearts and lives, and bring them under the government of a pure and heavenly religion, truly then they will not have this man to reign over them, Luke xix. 14. Christ has bands and cords for us; they that will be saved by him, must be ruled by him; but they are cords of a man, agreeable to right reason, and bands of love, conducing to our true interest; and yet against those the quarrel is. Why do men oppose religion, but because they are impatient of its restraints and obligations? They would break asunder the bands of conscience they are under, and the cords of God's commandments by which they are called to tie themselves out from all sin, and to tie themselves up to all duty; they will not receive, but cast them away as far from them as they can.

5. They are here reasoned with concerning it, v. 1. Why do they do this? (1. They can show no good cause for opposing so just, holy, and gracious a government, which will not interfere with the secular powers, nor introduce any dangerous principles hurtful to kings or princes; but, on the contrary, if universally received, would bring a heaven upon earth. (2. They can hope for no good success in opposing so powerful a kingdom, with which they are utterly unable to contend. It is a vain thing; when they have done their worst, Christ will have a church in the world, and that church will be victorious and triumphant; it is built upon a rock, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. The moon walks in brightness, though the dogs bark at it.

II. The mighty conquest gained over all this threatening opposition. If heaven and earth be the combatants, it is easy to foretell which will be the conqueror. They that make this mighty struggle, are the people of the earth, and the kings of the earth, who think they will prove better judges of affairs than God, whom they contest with, is one that sits in the heavens, v. 4. He is in the heaven, a place of such a vast prospect, that he can oversee them all, and all their projects; and such is his power, that he can overcome them all, and all their attempts: he sits there, as one easy and at rest, out of the reach of all their impotent menaces and attempts. There he sits as Judge in all the affairs of the children of men, perfectly acquainted with all of his own purposes and designs, in spite of all opposition, xxix. 10. The perfect reposé of the Eternal Mind may be our comfort under all the disquietments of our mind. We are tossed on earth, and in the sea, but he sits in the heavens, where he has prepared his throne for judgment; and therefore,

1. The attempts of Christ's enemies are easily ridiculed; God laughs at them as a company of fools. He has them, and all their attempts, in deserion, and therefore the virgin, the daughter of Zion, has despised them, Isa. xxxvii. 22. Sinners’ follies are the just sport of God’s infinite wisdom and power; and those attempts of the kingdom of Satan, which in our eyes are formidable, in his are despicable. Sometimes God is in the utmost armour of his adversaries, for the vanquishing of his enemies; here he is said to sit still, and do it; for the utmost operations of God’s omnipotence create no difficulty at all, nor the least disturbance to his eternal rest.

2. They are justly punished, v. 5. Though God despairs them as impotent, yet he does not therefore wink at them, but is justly displeased with them as impudent and impious, and will make the most of their words to know that he is so, and to tremble before him. (1.) Their sin is a provocation to him; he is wroth, he is sorely displeased.
We cannot expect that God should be reconciled to us, or well pleased in us, but in and through the Anointed; and therefore, if we affront and reject him, we sin against the remedy, and forfeit the benefit of his interposition between us and God. (2.)
His anger will be a vexation to them; if he but speak of them in his wrath, even his mere word his mouth will be their confusion, slaughter and consumption, Isa. xi. 4. 2 Thess. ii. 8. He speaks, and it is done; he speaks in wrath, and sinners are undone: as a word made us, so a word can unmake us again: Who knows the power of his anger? The enemies rage, but cannot vex God. God sits still, and yet vexes them, puts them into a consternation, (as the word is,) and brings them to their wit’s end:
his setting up this kingdom of his Son, in spite of them, is the greatest vexation to them that can be.
They were vexations to Christ’s good subjects; but the day is coming, when vexation shall be recompensed to them.

3. They are certainly defeated, and all their counsels turned headlong; (v. 6.) Yet have I set my king upon my holy hill of Zion. David was advanced to the throne, and became master of the strong hold of Zion, notwithstanding the disturbanee given to it by the confederacy of the ten kingdoms, and particularly the affronts he received from the garrison of Zion, who taunted him with their blindness and their lamen, their maimed soldiers, 2 Sam.
v. 6. The Lord Jesus is exalted to the right hand of the Father, has all power both in heaven and in earth, and is Head over all things to the church, notwithstanding the restless endeavours of his en-enemies to hinder his advancement. (1.) Jesus Christ is a King, and is invested by him who is the Fountain of power, with the dignity and authority of a sovereign Prince, in the kingdom both of providence and grace. (2.) God is pleased to call him his King, because he is appointed by him, and intrusted for him with the sole administration of government and judgment. He is his King, for he is dear to the Father, and one in whom he is well-pleased. (3.)
Christ took not this honour to himself, but was called unto it, and he that called him, owns him; I have set him there for a vindication, his commission, he received from the Father. (4.) Being called to this honour, he was confirmed in it; high places (we say) are slippery places, but Christ, being raised, is fixed; ‘ I have set him, I have settled him.’ (5.)
He is set upon Zion, the hill of God’s holiness, a type of the gospel-church, for on that the temple was built, for the sake of which the whole mount was called holy. Christ’s throne is set up in his church, that is, by his own influence, his commission, and in the societies they form. The evangelical law of Christ is said to go forth from Zion, (Isa. ii. 3. Mic.
v. 2.) and therefore that is spoken of as the headquarters of this General, the royal seat of this Prince, in whom the children of men shall be joyful.

We are to sing these verses with a holy exultation, triumphing over all the enemies of Christ’s kingdom, (not doubting but they will all of them be quickly made his footstool,) and triumphing in Jesus Christ as the great Trustee of power; and we are to pray, in firm belief of the assurance here given; ‘That Father has a kingdom, Thy kingdom come; let thy Son’s kingdom come.”

7. I will declare the decree: the Lord hath said unto me, Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee. 8. Ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession. 9. Thou shalt brake them with a rod of iron; thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter’s vessel.

We have heard what the kings of the earth have to say against Christ’s kingdom, and have heard it gain said by him that sits in heaven; let us now hear what the Messiah himself has to say for his kingdom, to make good his claims; it is what all the powers on earth cannot gainsay. I. The kingdom of the Messiah is founded upon decree, an eternal decree, of God the Father. It was not a sudden resolve, it was not the trial of an experiment, but the result of the counsels of the divine wisdom, and the determinations of the divine will, before all worlds, neither of which can be altered. The precept or statute, so some read it; the covenant or compact, so others; the federal transactions between the Father and the Son concerning mankind, and the appointment of the tennant of royalty made with David and his seed, Ixxxix. 3. This our Lord Jesus often referred himto, as that which, all along in his undertaking, governed himself by; This is the will of him that sent me, John vi. 40. This commandment have I received of my Father, John x. 18.—xiv. 31.

II. There is a declaration of that decree, as far as is necessary for the satisfaction of all those who are called and sanctified to yield themselves subjects to this King, and to leave them inexorable, who will not have him to reign over them. The decree was secret, it was what the Father said to the Son, when he possessed him in the beginning of his way, before his works of old; but it is declared by a faithful Witness, who had lain in the bosom of the Father from eternity, and came into the world as the Prophet of the church, to declare him, John i. 18. The Fountain of all being, is without doubt, the Fountain of all power; and it is by, from,
and under, him; that the Messiah claims his right to rule, from what Jehovah said to him, by whose word all things were made, and are governed.
Christ here makes out a twofold title to his kingdom.

1. A title by inheritance; (v. 7.) Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee. This scripture the apostle quotes, (Heb. i. 5.) to prove, not only that Christ has a more excellent name than the angels, but that he obtained it by inheritance, v. 4.
He is the Son of God, not by adoption, but his begotten Son, the only begotten of the Father, John i. 14. And the Father owns him, and will have this declared to the world, as the reason why he is constituted King upon the holy hill of Zion; he is therefore unquestionably entitled to, and perfectly qualified for, that great trust. He is the Son of God, and therefore of the same nature with the Father, has in him all the fulness of the Godhead, infinite wisdom, power, and holiness. The supreme government of the church is too high an honour, and too hard an undertaking, for any mere creature; none can be fit for it but he who is one with the Father, and was from eternity by him, as one brought up with him, thoroughly apprized of all his counsels, Prov. viii. 30. He is the Son of God, and therefore dear to him, his beloved Son, in whom he is well-pleased; and upon this account we are to receive him as a King; for because the Father loveth the Son, he hath given all things into his hand, John iii. 35. — v. 20. "Being a Son, he is Heir of all things, and the Father having made the world all, it is easy to infer thence, that by him also he governs them; for he is the eternal Wisdom and the eternal Word. If God hath said unto him, "Thou art my Son," it becomes each of us to say to him, "Thou art my Lord, my Sovereign." Further, to satisfy us that his kingdom is well-grounded upon his Sonship, we are here told what his Sonship is grounded on; This day have I begotten thee; which refers both to his eternal generation itself, for it is quoted (Heb. i. 5.) to prove that he is the Brightness of his Father's glory, and the express Image of his person, (v. 3.) and to the evidence and demonstration given of it by his resurrection from the dead, for to that also it is expressly applied by the apostle; (Acts xiii. 33.) He hath raised up Jesus again, as it is written, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee. It was by the resurrection from the dead, that sign of the prophetJeans, which was for him the most convincing of all, that he was declared to be the Son of God with power, Rom. i. 4. Christ is said to be the first-begotten and first-born from the dead, Rev. i. 5. Col. i. 18. Immediately after his resurrection, he entered upon the administration of his mediatorial kingdom; it was then that he said, All power is given unto me, and to that especially he had an eye when he taught his disciples to pray, Thy kingdom come.

3. A title by agreement, v. 8, 9. The agreement is, in short, this; The Son must undertake the office of an intercessor, and, upon that condition, he shall have the honour and power of a universal Monarch; see Isa. liii. 12. Therefore will I divide him a portion with the great, because he made intercession for the transgressors: he shall be a Priest upon his throne, and the counsel of peace shall be between them both, Zech. vi. 13.

(1.) The Son must ask. This supposes his putting himself into a state of inferiority to the Father, by taking upon him the human nature; for, as God, he was equal in power and glory with the Father, and had nothing to ask. It supposes the making of a satisfaction, by the virtue of which, the intercession must be made, and the paying of a price, on which this large demand was to be grounded; see John xvii. 4. 5. The Son, in asking the heathen for his inheritance, aims, not only at his own honour, but at their happiness in him; so that he pleads for them, even to do so, and is therefore able to save to the uttermost.

(2.) The Father will grant more than to the half of the kingdom, even to the kingdom itself. It is here promised him, [1.] That his government shall be universal; he shall have the heathen for his inheritance; not the Jews only, to whose nation the church had been long confined, but the Gentiles also; those in the uttermost parts of the earth, (as this may be here understood, and should have multitudes of willing loyal subjects among them. Baptized Christians are the possession of the Lord Jesus; they are to him for a name and a praise, God the Father gives them to him, when by his Spirit and grace he works upon them to submit their necks to the yoke of the Lord Jesus. This is, in part, fulfilled; a great part of the Gentile world received the gospel, when it was first preached, and Christ's throne was set up there where Satan's seat had long been. But it is to be yet further accomplished, when the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of the Lord, and of his Christ, Rev. xi. 15. Who shall live when God doth this? [2.] That it shall be victorious; Thou shalt break them, those of them that oppose thy kingdom, with a rod of iron, v. 9. This was, in part, fulfilled, when the nation of the Jews, those that persisted in unbelief and enmity to Christ's gospel, were destroyed by the Roman power, which was represented, (Dan. ii. 40.) by feet of iron, as here by a rod of iron. It had a further accomplishment in the destruction of the Pagan powers, when the christian religion came to be established; but it will not be completely fulfilled, till all opposing rule, principality and power, shall be finally put down, 1 Cor. x. 24. See ex. 3. 6. Observe, How powerful Christ is, and how weak the enemies of his kingdom are before him; he has a rod of iron wherewith to crush them that will not submit to his golden sceptre; they are but like a potter's vessel before him, suddenly, easily, and irreparably, dashed in pieces by him; see Rev. ii. 27. "Thou shalt do it; thou shalt have leave to do it." Nations shall be ruined, rather than the gospel-church shall not be built and established; I have loved thee, therefore will I give men for thee, Isa. xlvii. 4. "Thou shalt have power to do it; none shall be able to stand before thee, thou shalt do it effectually." They that will not bow, shall break.

In singing this, and praying it over, we must give glory to Christ as the eternal Son of God, and our rightful Lord, and must take comfort from this promise, and plead it with God, that the kingdom of Christ shall be enlarged and established, and shall triumph over all opposition.

10. Be wise now, therefore, O ye kings; be instructed, ye judges of the earth. 11. Serve the Lord with fear, and rejoice with trembling. 12. Kiss the Son, lest he be angry, and ye perish from the way, when his wrath is kindled but a little. Blessed are all they that put their trust in him.

We have here the practical application of this gospel doctrine, concerning the kingdom of the Messiah, by way of exhortation to the kings and judges of the earth. It is in vain to oppose Christ's government; let them therefore be so wise for themselves, as to submit to it. He that has power to destroy them, shows that he has no pleasure in their destruction, for he puts them into a way to make themselves happy, v. 10. Those that would be wise, must be instructed; and those are truly wise, that receive instruction from the word of God. Kings and judges stand upon a judgment-seat with common persons before God; and it is as necessary for them to be instructed in right judgment as others. They that give law and judgment to others, must receive it from Christ; and it will be their wisdom. What is said to them, is said to all, and is required of everyone of us; only it is directed to kings and judges, because of the influence which their example will have upon their inferiors, and because they were men of rank and power, that opposed the setting up of Christ's kingdom, v. 2. We are exhorted, 1. To seek true knowledge of God, and to accept of him, v. 11. This is the great duty of natural religion. God is great, and infinitely above us, just and holy, and provoked against us, and therefore we ought to fear him and tremble before him; yet he is our Lord and Master, and we are bound to serve him, our Friend and Benefactor, and we have reason to rejoice in him; and these are very well consistent.
with each other, for, 1. We must serve God in all ordinances of worship, and all instances of a godly conversation, but with a holy fear, a jealousy over ourselves, and a reverence of him. Even kings themselves, whom others serve and fear, must serve and fear God; there is the same infinite distance between them and God, that there is between the meanest of their subjects and him. 2. We must rejoice in God; in subordination to him, when we rejoice in other things, but still with a holy trembling, as those that know what a glorious and jealous God he is, whose eye is always upon us; our salvation must be wrought out with fear and trembling, Phil. ii. 12. We ought to rejoice in the setting up of the kingdom of Christ, but rejoice with trembling, with a holy awe of him, a holy fear for ourselves, lest we come short, and a tender concern for the many precious souls to whom his gospel and kingdom are preached; though ever we rejoice in, in this world, it must always be with trembling, lest we grow vain in our joy, and be puffed up with the things we rejoice in, and because of the uncertainty of them, and the damps which by a thousand accidents may soon be cast upon our joy. To rejoice with trembling, is to rejoice as though we rejoice not, 1 Cor. vii. 30.

11. To welcome Jesus Christ, and to submit to him, v. 11. This is the duty of the Christian, and the vocation; it is that which is required of all, even kings and judges, and it is our wisdom and interest to do it. Observe here,

1. The command given for this purpose; Kiss the Son. Christ is called the Son, because so he was declared, (v. 7.) Thou art my Son. He is the Son of God by eternal generation, and, upon that account, he is to be adored by us. He is the Son of man, the Mediator, (John v. 27.) and, upon that account, to be received and served. He is called Christ, to include both, as God is often called emphatically the Father, because he is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and in him our Father, and we must have an eye to him under both considerations. Our duty to Christ is here expressed figuratively, Kiss the Son: not with a betraying kiss, as Judas kissed him, and as all hypocrites, who pretend to honour him, but really afflict him, with a base and perjured kiss. (1.) With a kiss of agreement and reconciliation; Kiss, and ye shall be written in the book of the living, Isa. iv. 3. (2.) With a kiss of adoration and religious worship; they that worshipped idols, kissed them, 1 Kings xix. 18. Hos. xiii. 2. Let us study how to do honour to the Lord Jesus, and to give unto him the glory due unto his name. He is thy Lord, and worship thou him, xiv. 11. We must worship the Lamb, as well as he that sits on the throne, Rev. v. 9-13. (3.) With a kiss of affection and sincere love; Kiss the Son; enter into a covenant of friendship with him, and let him be very dear and precious to you; love him above all, love him in sincerity, love him much, as she did, to whom much was forgiven, and, in token of it, kissed his feet,” Luke vii. 43. (4.) With a kiss of allegiance and loyalty, hence, 1 Sam. xvi. 14. Swear fealty and homage to him, submit to his government, take his yoke upon you, and give up yourselves to be governed by his laws, disposed of by his providence, and entirely devoted to his interest.

2. The reasons to enforce this command; they are taken from our own interest, which God, in his gospel, shows a concern for. Consider,

(1.) The certain ruin we run upon, if we refuse and pretend to do otherwise than at your peril if you do not. [1.] “It will be a great provocation to him; do it, lest he be angry.” The Father is angry already; the Son is the Mediator that undertakes to make peace; if we slight him, the Father’s wrath abides upon us (John xiv. 6.) and not only so, but there is an addition of the Son’s wrath too, to whom nothing is more displeasing than to have the offers of his grace slighted, and the designs of it frustrated. The Son can be angry, though a Lamb; he is the Lion of the tribe of Judah, and the wrath of this King, this King of kings, will be as the roaring of a lion, and will drive even mighty men and chief captains to seek in vain for shelter in rocks and mountains. Rev. vii. 16. If the Son be angry, who shall intercede for us? There remains no more sacrifice, no other name, by which we can be saved. Unbelief is a sin against the remedy. [2.] It will be utterly destruction to yourselves; lest ye be cast out from him as your way to God.” It intimates that they were, or, at least, thought themselves, in the way; but, by neglecting Christ, they perished from it, which aggravates their ruin, that they go to hell from the way to heaven; are not far from the kingdom of God, and yet never arrive there.

(2.) The happiness we are sure of, if we yield ourselves to Christ. When his wrath is kindled, though but the least spark of that fire is enough to make the proudest sinners tremble, if it fasten upon his conscience; for it will burn to the lowest hell: one would think it should therefore follow, “When his wrath is kindled, woe be to those that despise him;” but the Psalmist startles at the thought, and blesses those that escape such a doom. They that trust in him, and so kiss him, are truly happy; but they will especially appear to be so, when the wrath of Christ is kindled against others. Blessed will they be in the day of wrath, who, by trusting in Christ, have made him their Refuge and Patron; when the hearts of others fail them for fear, they shall lift up their heads with joy; and then those who now despise Christ and his followers, will be forced to say to their own greater confusion, “Now we see that blessed are all they, and they only, that trust in him.”

In singing this, and praying it over, we should have our hearts not only filled with a holy awe of God, but borne, with a certain confidence in Christ, in whose mediation we may comfort and encourage ourselves and one another; We are the circumcision, that rejoice in Christ Jesus.

PSALM III.

As the foregoing psalm, in the type of David in preferment, showed us the royal dignity of the Redeemer; so this, by the example of David in distress, shows us the peace and holy security of the redeemed: how safe they really are, and think themselves to be, under the divine protection. David, being now driven out of his palace, from the royal city, from the holy city, by his rebellious son Absalom, I. Complains to God of his enemies, v. 1, 2. II. Confides in God, and encourages himself in him as his God, notwithstanding. Rev. iii. 11. He reflects on the satisfaction he had in the gracious answers God gave to his prayers, and his experience of his goodness to him, v. 4, 5. IV. Triumphs over his fears, (v. 6.) and over his enemies, whom he prays against, v. 7. Gives God the glory, and takes to him and his name all the credit of the peace and salvation which are sure to all the people of God, v. 8. Those speak best of the truths of God, who speak experimentally; so David here speaks of the power and goodness of God, and of the safety and tranquillity of the godly.

A Psalm of David, when he fled from Absalom his son.

1. LORD, how are they increased that trouble me? many are they that rise
2. Many there be which say of my soul, There is no help for him in God. Selah. 3. But thou, O Lord, art a shield for me; my glory, and the lifter up of my head.

The title of this psalm and many others, is as a key hung ready at the door, to open it, and let us into the entertainments of it; when we know upon what that chosen psalm was sung to, we know the better how to expound it. This was composed, or, at least, the substance of it was meditated and digested in David's thoughts, and offered up to God, when he fled from Absalom his son, who formed a conspiracy against him, to take away, not his crown only, but his life; we have the story, 2 Sam. xv. &c. 1. David was now in great grief; when, in his flight, he went up the mount of olives, he wept greatly, with his head covered, and marching bare-foot; yet then he composed this comfortable psalm. He wept and prayed, wept and sung, wept and believed; this was sowing in tears. Is any afflicted? Let him pray; nay, let him sing psalms, let him sing this psalm. Is any afflicted with un- dutiful disobedient children? David was; and yet that did not hinder his joy in God, nor put him out of tune for holy songs.

2. He was now in great danger, the plot against him was laid deep, the party that against him was very formidable, and his own son at the head of them, so that his affairs seemed to be at the last extremity; yet then he kept hold of his interest in God, and improved that. Perils and frights should drive us to God, not drive us from him. 3. He had now a great deal of provocation given him by those from whom he had reason to expect better things; from his son, whom he had been indulgent of; from his subjects, whom he had been so great a blessing to; this he could not but resent, and it was enough to break upon any man's temper; yet he was so far from any indecent expressions of passion and indignation, that he had calmness enough for those acts of devotion, which require the greatest fixity and freedom of thought. The sedateness of his mind was evinc'd by the Spirit's coming upon him; for the Spirit chooses to move upon the still waters. Let no unkindness, no not of a child or a friend, ever be laid so much to heart as to disturb us for communion with God. 4. He was now suffering for his sin in the matter of Uriah; this was the evil which, for that sin, God threatened to raise up against him out of his own house; (2 Sam. xii. 11.) which, no doubt, he observed, and took occasion thence to renew his repentance for it. Yet he did not therefore cast away his confidence in the divine power and goodness, nor despair of succour. Even our sorrow for sin must not hinder either our joy in God, or our hope in God. 5. He seemed carefully to be keeping away from Absalom, quitting his royal city, before he had had one struggle for it; and yet, by this psalm, it appears that he was full of true courage arising from his faith in God. True Christian fortitude consists more in a gracious security and serenity of mind, in patient bearing, and patient waiting, than in daring enterprises with sword in hand.

In these three verses, he applies himself to God. When he was so far from God, let us go to him, when any thing grieves us or frightens us? David was now at a distance from his own closet, and from the courts of God's house, where he used to pray; and yet he could find a way open heaven-ward. Wherever we are, we may have access to God, and may draw nigh to him, whithersoever we are driven. David, in his flight, attends his God,

1. With a representation of his distress, v. 1, 2. He looks round, and takes, as it were, a view of his enemies' camp, or receives information of their designs against him, which he brings to God, not to his own council-board. Two things he complains of, concerning his enemies.

1. That they were very many; Lord, how are they increased? Beyond what they were at first, and beyond whatever he thought they would have been. Absalom's faction, like a snow-ball, strangely gathered in its motion. He speaks of it as one amazed; and well he might, that a people he had so many years, and such a child, should rebels his sovereign rebel against him, and choose for their head such a foolish and giddy young man as Absalom was. How slippery and deceitful are the many! And how little fidelity and constancy is to be found among men! David had had the hearts of his subjects, as much as ever any king had, and yet now, of a sudden, he had lost them. As people must not trust too much to princes, (cxlv. 3.) so princes must not build too much on their interest in the people. Christ, the Son of David, had many enemies, when a great multitude came to seize him, when the crowd cried, Crucify him, Crucify him. How were they then increased, that troubled him! Even good people must not think it strange, if the stream he against them, and the powers that threaten them, grow more and more formidable.

2. That they were very malicious; they rose up against him, they aimed to trouble him; but that was not all, they sought of their interest in the people. Christ, the Son of David, had many enemies, when a great multitude came to seize him, when the crowd cried, Crucify him, Crucify him. How were they then increased, that troubled him! Even good people must not think it strange, that so great unbelief should be found in any, especially in many, in Israel, as to think any party of men too strong for Omnipotence to deal with. (3.) They endeavoured to shake his confidence in God, and drive him to despair of relief from him. "They have said it to my soul;" so it may be read; compare xi. —xiii. 10. This grieved him worst of all, that they had so bad an opinion of him. It is impossible they could have taken him off from that foundation. The mere temptation was a buffeting to him, a thorn in his flesh, nay, a sword in his bones. Note, A child of God startles at the very thought of despairing of help in God; you cannot vex him with anything so much, as if you offer to persuade him, There is no help for him in God. David comes to God, and tells him what his enemies said of him, as Hezekiah spread Rabshakeh's blasphemous letter before the Lord. "They say to my soul, There is no salvation" (for so the word is) "for him in God; but, Lord, do thou say unto my soul, I am thy salvation, (xxxv. 3.) and that shall satisfy me, and, in due time, silence them." To this complaint he adds Selah, which occurs about 70 times in the book of psalms. Some refer it to the music with which, in David's time, the psalms were sung; others as a sign of special reverence, and an inhaling a solemn pause. Selah, Mark that, or, "Stop there, and consider a little." As here, they say, There is no help for him in God, Selah. "Take time for such a thought as this, Get thee behind me, Satan; The Lord rebuke thee! Away with such a vile suggestion!"

vidence, or the reproaches of enemies, the faster he laid will take of him, and the closer will he cleave to him; so David here, when his enemies said, There is no help for him in God, cries out with so much the more assurance, “But thou, O Lord, art a shield for me; let them say what they will, I am sure thou wilt never desert me, and I am resolved, I will trust the Lord. See what God is to his people, what he will be, what they have found him, what David found in him. 1. Safety. “Thou art a Shield for me, a Shield about me,” so some, “to secure me on all sides, since my enemies surrounded me.” Not only my Shield, (Gen. xv. 1.) which denotes an interest in the divine protection; but a shield for me, which denotes the present benefit and advantage of that protection. 2. Honour; Thou art my Glory. Those whom God owns for his, are not only safe and easy, but really look great, and have true honour put upon them, far above that which the great ones of the earth are proud of. David was now in disgrace, the crown was fallen from his head; but he will not think the worse of himself, while he has God for his Glory, Isa. lx. 19. “Thou art my Glory; thy glory I reckon mine;” (so some;) “this is what I aim at, and am ambitious of, whatever my lot is, and whatever becomes of my head.” 3. Joy and deliverance; “Thou art the lifter up of my head; thou wilt lift up my head out of my troubles, and restore me to my dignity again, in due time; however, thou wilt lift up my head under my troubles, so that I shall not droop nor be discouraged, nor shall my spirits fail.” If, in the worst of times, God’s people can lift up their heads with joy, knowing that all shall work for good to them, they will own it is God that is the Lifter up of their head, that gives them both cause to rejoice, and hearts to rejoice. In singing this, and praying it over, we should possess ourselves with an apprehension of the danger we are in from the multitude and malice of our spiritual enemies, who seek the ruin of our souls by driving us from God, and we should concern ourselves in the distresses and dangers of the church of God, which is every where sought against; but, in reference to both, we should encourage ourselves in our God who owns and protects, and will, in due time, crown his own interest both in the world, and in the hearts of his people. 4. I cried unto the Lord with my voice, and he heard me out of his holy hill. Selah. 5. I laid me down and slept; I awoke: for the Lord sustained me. 6. I will not be afraid of ten thousands of people, that have set themselves against me round about. 7. Arise, O Lord: save me, O my God; for thou hast smitten all mine enemies upon the cheek-bone; thou hast broken the teeth of the ungodly. 8. Salvation belongeth unto the Lord: thy blessing is upon thy people. Selah.

David, having stirred up himself by the irritations of his enemies to take hold on God as his God, and so gained comfort, in looking upward, when, if he looked round about him, nothing appeared but what was discouraging, here looks back with pleasing reflections upon the benefit he had derived from trusting in God, and looks forward with pleasing expectations of a very bright and happy issue to which the dark dispension he was now under would shortly be brought.

I. See with what comfort he looks back upon the communion he had had with God, and the communications of his favour to him, either in some former troubles he had been in, and, through God’s goodness, got through or, in this, hitherto. David had been exercised with many difficulties, often oppressed and brought very low; but still he had found God his help. He now remembered, with pleasure,

1. That his troubles had always brought him to his knees, and that, in all his difficulties and dangers, he had been enabled to acknowledge God, and to lift up his heart to him, and his voice too; (this will be a comforting reflection, when we are in trouble;) I cried unto God with my voice. Care and grief do us good and no hurt, when they set us praying, and engage us, not only to speak to God, but to cry to him, as those that are in earnest. And though God understands the language of the heart, when the voice is not heard, (1 Sam. i. 13.) and values not the hypocritical prayers of those who cause their voice to be heard on high, (Isa. xiii. 4.) vox et praetera nihil—mere sound, yet when the earnestness of the voice comes from the fervency of the heart, it shall be taken notice of, in the account, that we cried unto God with our voice. 2. That we are answerable to God for the answers to our prayers; He heard me out of his holy hill, from heaven, the high and holy place; from the ark on mount Zion, whence he used to give answers to those that sought to him. David had ordered Zadok to carry back the ark into the city, when he was flying from Absalom, (2 Sam. xv. 25.) knowing that God was not tied, no, not to the ark of his presence, and that, notwithstanding the distance of place, he could hear the prayers;—He shall hear us, when we cry to him, the unanswerable prayers of the communications of God’s grace towards us, and the operations of his grace in us; between his favour and our faith. The ark of the covenant was in mount Zion, and all the answers to our prayers come from the promises of that covenant; Christ was set King upon the holy hill of Zion; (li. 6.) and it is through him whom the Father hears always, that our prayers are heard.

3. That he has been very safe, and very easy, under the divine protection; (v. 5.) “I laid me down and slept, composed and quiet; and awaked refreshed, for the Lord sustained me;” (1.) This is applicable to the common mercies of every night, which we ought to give thanks for alone, and with our families, every morning. Many have not where to lay their head, (but wander in deserts,) or, if they have, dare not lie down, for fear of the enemy; but we have laid us down in peace. Many lie down, and cannot sleep, but are full of tossings to and fro till the dawns of the day, through pain of body, or anguish of mind, or the continual alarms of fear in the night; but we lie down, and sleep in safety, though incapable of doing anything then for our own preservation. Many lie down, and sleep, and never wake again, they sleep the sleep of death, as the first-born of the Egyptians; but we lie down, and sleep, and awake again to the light and comfort of another day; and whence is it, but because the Lord has sustained us with sleep as with food? We have been safe under his protection, and easy in the arms of his good providence. (2.) It seems here to be meant of the wonderful quietness and calmness of David’s spirit, in the midst of his dangers. Having by prayer committed himself and his cause to God, and being sure of his protection, his heart was fixed, and he was easy. The undutifulness of his son, the disloyalty of his subjects, the treachery of many of his friends, the hazard of his person, the fatigues of his march, and the uncertainty of the event, never deprived him of an hour's sleep, nor gave any disturbance to his repose; for the Lord, by his grace and the consolations of his Spirit, powerfully sustained him, and made him easy. It is a great mercy, when we are in trouble, to have our minds stayed upon God, so as never either to eat or sleep with trembling and astonishment. (3) Some of the ancients apply it to the resurrection of Christ; in his sufferings, he offered up strong cries, and was heard; and therefore, was given him, and slept the sleep of death, yet he awaked the third day, for the Lord sustained him, that he should not see corruption.

4. That God had often broken the power, and restrained the malice, of his enemies; had smitten them upon the cheek-bone, (v. 7.) had silenced them and spoiled their speaking, blemished them and put them to shame, smitten them on the cheek reproachfully; had seized the mouth of his adversaries; for he had broken their teeth. Saul and the Philistines, who were sometimes ready to swallow him up, could not effect what they designed. The teeth that are gnashed or sharpened against God's people, shall be broken. When, at any time, the power of the church's enemies seems threatening, it is good to remember how often God has broken it; and we are sure that his arm is not shortened. He can stop their mouths, and tie their hands.

II. See with what confidence he looks forward to the dangers he had yet in prospect. Having put himself under God's protection, and often found the benefit of it,

1. His fears were all stilled and silenced, v. 6. With what a holy bravery does he bid defiance to the impotent menaces and attempts of his enemies! "I will not be afraid of ten thousands of people, that either in a foreign invasion, or in an intestine rebellion, set themselves, encamp, against me round about." No man seemed less safe; (his enemies are numerous, ten thousands; they are spiteful and resolute) "They have set themselves against me; nay, they have prevailed far, and seem to have gained their point; for they are against me round about on every side, thousands against one;" and yet no man was more secure; "I will not be afraid, for all this; they cannot hurt me, and therefore they shall not hurt me," a prudent method I take for my own preservation, I will not disquiet myself, distrust my God, nor doubt of a good issue at last." When David, in his flight from Absalom, bade Zadok carry back the ark, he spake doubtfully of the issue of his present troubles, and concluded, like an humble penitent, Here I am, let him do to me what seemeth him good, 2 Sam. xv. 26. But now, like a strong believer, he speaks confidently, and has no fear concerning the event. Note, A cheerful resignation to God is the way to obtain a cheerful satisfaction and confidence in God.

2. His prayers were quickened and encouraged, v. 7. He believed God was his Saviour, and yet prays; nay, he therefore prays, Arise, O Lord, save me, O my God. Promises of salvation do not supersede, but engage, our petitions for it. He will for this be inquired of.

3. His faith became triumphant. He began the psalm with complaints of the strength and malice of his enemies; but concludes it with exultation in the power and grace of his God, and now sees more with him than against him, v. 8. Two great truths he here builds his confidence upon, and fetches comfort from. (1.) That salvation belongeth unto the Lord; he has power to save, be the danger ever so great; it is his prerogative to save, when all other helps and succours fail; it is his property, it is his promise to those that are his, whose salvation is not of themselves, but of the Lord. Therefore all that have the Lord for their God, according to the tenor of the new covenant, are sure of salvation; for he is the God of salvation. (2.) That his blessing is upon his people; he not only has power to save them, but he has assured them of his kind and gracious intentions toward them. He has, in his word, pronounced a blessing upon his people; and we are bound to believe that that blessing does accordingly rest upon them, though there are not the visible effects thereof. Hence we may conclude, that God's people, though they may lie under the reproaches and censures of men, are surely blessed of him, who blesses indeed, and therefore can command a blessing.

In singing this, and praying it over, we must own the satisfaction we have had in depending upon God, and committing ourselves to him, and encourage ourselves, and one another, to continue still hoping, and quietly waiting for, the salvation of the Lord.

PSALM IV.

David was a preacher, a royal preacher, as well as Solomon; many of his psalms are doctrinal and practical as well as devotional; the greatest part of this psalm is so, in which he addresses the men of God, to the sons of men, (as Prov. viii. 4, 5.) to receive instruction. The title does not tell us, as that of the former did, that it was penned on any particular occasion, nor are we to think that all the psalms were occasional; though some were; but that many others were designed in general, for the instruction of the people of God, who attended in the courts of his house, the assisting of their devotions, and the directing of their conversations: such a one I take this psalm to be. Let us not make the prophecy of scripture to be of more private interpretation than needs must, 2 Pet. i. 20. Here, I. David begins with a short prayer; (v. 1.) and that prayer preaches. II. He directs his speech to the children of men, and, 1. In God's name, reproves them for the day of wrath, the day of the Lord, that they do to their own souls, v. 2. 2. He sets before them the happiness of godly people, for their encouragement to be religious, v. 3. He calls upon them to consider their ways, v. 4. 3. He exhorts them to serve God, and trust to him, v. 5. IV. He gives an account of his own experiences of the grace of God working in him, 1. Enabling him to choose God's favour for his strength, v. 6. 2. Filling his heart with confidence, v. 7. 3. Quieting his spirit in the assurance of the divine protection he was under, night and day, v. 8.

To the chief musician on Neginoth. A psalm of David.

1. H E A R me when I call, O God of my righteousness: thou hast enlarged me when I was in distress; have mercy upon me, and hear my prayer. 2. O ye sons of men, how long will ye turn my glory into shame? how long will ye love vanity, and seek after leasing? Selah. 3. But know that the Lord hath set apart him that is godly for himself: the Lord will hear when I call unto him. 4. Stand in awe, and sin not: commune with your own heart upon your bed, and be still. Selah. 5. Offer the sacrifices of righteousness; and put your trust in the Lord.

The title of the psalm acquaints us, that David, having penned it by divine inspiration for the use of the church, delivered it to the chief musician, or master of the song, who, according to that and some appointment of psalmody made in this time, which he was chiefly instrumental in the establishment of, presided in that service. We have a particular account of the constitution, the modelling of the several classes of singers, each with a chief, and the share each bore in the work, 1 Chron. xxv. Some prophesied according to the order of the king, v. 2. Others prophesied with the harp, to give thanks, and to praise the Lord, v. 3. Of others, it is said, that they were to lift up the horn, v. 5. But of them all, that they were for song in the house of the Lord, (v. 6,) and were instructed in the songs of the Lord, v. 7. This psalm was committed to one of David's harpists when he was a child, 2 Sam. viii. 19. It is laid in the semi- lyrical style, (Hab. iii. 19,) which were played on with the hand; with music of that kind the chorists were to sing this psalm: and it should seem that then they only sung, not the people; but the New Testament appoints all Christians to sing, [Eph. v. 19. Col. iii. 16.] from whom it is expected that they do it decently, not artfully; and therefore there is not now so much occasion for musical instruments as there was then; the melody is to be made in the heart.

In these verses, I. David addresses himself to God, v. 1. Whether the sons of men, to whom he is about to speak, will hear, or whether they will forbear, he hopes and prays that God will give him a gracious audience, and an answer of peace; "Hear me when I call, and accept my petitions, grant my requests; and judge upon my adversaries; hear me, and answer me." All the advice God is giving is founded upon his taking of our prayers, and all the returns he is pleased to make to them, must be ascribed, not to our merit, but purely to his mercy. "Hear me for thy mercy-sake," is our best plea. Two things David here pleads further, 1. "Thou art the God of my righteousness; not only a righteous God thyself, but the Author of my righteous dispositions, who hast by thy grace wrought that good that is in me, hast made me a righteous man; therefore hear me, and so attest thine own work in me; thou art also the Patron of my righteous cause, the Protector of my wronged innocency, to whom I commit my way, and whom I trust to bring forth my righteousness as the light." When men condemn us unjustly, this is our comfort, It is God that justifies; he is the God of a believer's righteousness. 2. "Thou hast formerly enlarged me when I was in distress, enlarged my heart, and opened my mouth for the sake of my distresses; therefore now, Lord, have mercy upon me, and hear me." The experience we have had of God's goodness to us in enlarging us when we have been in distress, is not only a great encouragement to our faith and hope for the future, but a good plea with God in prayer; "Thou hast; wilt thou not? For thou art God, and changest not; thy work is perfect." II. He addresses himself to the children of men, for the conviction and conversion of those that are yet strangers to God, and that will not have the Messiah, the Son of David, to reign over them. 1. He endeavours to convince them of the folly of their impurity; (v. 2.) "O ye sons of men," (of great men, so some; men of high degree, understanding it of the partisans of Saul or Absalom,) "how long shall you oppose me and my government, and continue disaffected to me, while the influence of the false and groundless suggestions of those that wish evil to me?" Or, it may be taken more generally; God, by the psalmist, here reasons with sinners to bring them to repentance. "You that go on in the neglect of God and his worship, and in contempt of the kingdom of Christ and his government, consider what you do;" (1.) "You debase yourselves, for you are sons of men." (The word signifies man as a noble creature; ) "Consider the dignity of your nature, and the excellency of those powers of reason with which you are endowed, and do not act thus iniquitiously, and unbecoming yourselves." Let the sons of men consider and show themselves men. (2.) "You honour your Maker, and turn his glory into shame." They may well be taken as God's own words, charging sinners with the wrong they do him in his honour: or, if David's words, glory may be understood of God, whom he called his Glory, iii. 3. Idolaters are charged with changing the glory of God into shame, Rom. i. 23. Sinners do so by disobeying the commands of his law, despising the offers of his grace, and giving that affection and service to the creature, which are due to God only. Those that profane God's holy name, that ridicule his word and ordinances, and, while they profess to know him, in works deny him, do what in them lies to turn his glory into shame. (3.) "You put a cheat upon yourselves, you love vanity, and seek after learning, or lying, or that which is a lie. You are yourselves a prey, and lying, and you love so." Or, "You set your hearts upon that which will prove, at last, but vanity and a lie!" they that love the world, and seek the things that are beneath, love vanity, and seek lies; as they also do that please themselves with the delights of sense, and portion themselves with the wealth of this world; for these will deceive them, and so ruin them. "How long will you do this? Will you never be wise for yourselves, or consider the last, your duty and interest? When shall it once be?" Jer. xiii. 27. The God of heaven thinks the time long that sinners persist indishonouring him, and in deceiving and ruining themselves.

2. He shows them the peculiar favour which God has for good people, the special protection they are under, and the singular privileges to which they are entitled, v. 3. This comes in here, (1.) As a reason why they should not oppose or persecute him that is godly, or think to run him down. It is at their peril, if they offend one of these little ones, whom God has set apart for himself, Matth. xviii. 6. God reckons that those who touch them touch the apple of his eye; and he will make their persecutors to know it sooner or later. They have an interest in heaven, God will hear them, and therefore let none dare to do them any hurt, for God will hear their cry, and plead their cause. Exod. xxiii. 31. It is always taken for granted that David speaks of his own designation to the throne; he is the godly man, whom the Lord has set apart for that honour, and who does not usurp it, or assume it to himself; "The opposition, therefore, you give to him and to his advancement, is very criminal, for therein you fight against God, and it will be vain and ineffectual." God has, in like manner, set apart the Lord Jesus for himself, that Merciful One; and those that attempt to hinder his advancement will certainly be baffled, for the Father hears him always. Or, (2.) As a reason why they should themselves be good, and walk no longer in the counsel of the ungodly; "You have hitherto sought vanity; be truly religious, and you will be truly happy, here and for ever; for," [1.] "God will secure to himself his interest in you."

The Lord has set apart him that is godly, every particular act of his mercy, his especial choice, his eternal calling, in the most active dispensations of his providence, and operations of his grace; they are purified unto him a peculiar people. Godly men are God's separated, sealed, ones; he knows them that are his, has set his image and superscription upon them; he distinguishes them with uncommon favours; They shall be mine, saith the Lord, in that day when I make up my jewels. Know this; let godly people know it, and let them never alienate themselves from him to whom they are thus appropriated; let wicked people know it, and take heed how they hurt those whom God protects. [2.] "God will secure to you an interest in himself," this David speaks with application; The Lord will hear when I call unto him. We should think ourselves happy, if we had the ear of the earthly prince; and is it not worth while, upon any terms, especially such easy ones, to gain the ear of the King of kings? Let us know this, and forsake lying vanities for our own mercies.

3. He warns them against sin, and exhorts them both to frighten and to reason themselves out of it; (v. 4.) "Stand in awe and sin not;" (Be angry and sin not, so the LXX, and some thanksgiving.) The apostle takes that exhortation up, Eph. iv. 28. and says, "Be not conformed to your own hearts." Be converted; and, in order thereunto, consider and fear." Note, (1.) We must not sin, nor miss our way, and so miss our aim. (2.) One good remedy against sin is to stand in awe. "Be moved," so some, in opposition to carelessness and carnal security. "Always keep up a holy reverence of the glory and majesty of God, and a holy dread of his wrath and curse, and dare not to provoke him." (3.) One good method of preventing and removing sin, is, to be frequent and serious in communing with our own hearts; "Talk with your hearts; you have a great deal to say to them, they may be spoken with at any time, let it not be unsaid." A thinking man is in a fair way to be a wise and a good man. "Commune with your hearts; examine them by serious self-reflection, that you may acquaint yourselves with them, and amend what is amiss in them; employ them in solemn pious meditation, and ask your conscience what is written upon them, which is good, and keep close to it. Consider your ways, and observe the directions here given, in order to the doing of this work well and to good purpose." [1.] "Choose a solitary time; do it when you lie awake upon your beds. Before you turn, you go to sleep at night," (as some of the heathen moralists have directed,) "examine your consciences with respect to what you have done that day, particularly what you have done amiss, that you may make amends of it. When you awake in the night, meditate upon God, and the things that belong to your peace." David himself practised what he here counsels others to do; (xiii. 6.) I remember thee on my bed; upon a sick-bed particularly we should consider our ways, and commune with our own hearts about them. [2.] "Compose yourselves into a serious frame; be still. When you have asked conscience a question, be silent, and wait for an answer; even in unquiet times, keep your spirits calm and quiet."

4. He counsels them to make conscience of their duty; (v. 5.) Offer to God the sacrifice of righteousness. We must not only cease to do evil, but learn to do well. They that were disaffected to David and his government, would soon come to a better temper, and return to their allegiance, if they would but worship God aright; and those that know the situation, let your thoughts have dominion in your heart; and God will be glad of the Mediator, the Son of David. It is required here from every one of us, (1.) That we serve him; "Offer sacrifices to him, your own selves first, and your best sacrifices." But they must be sacrifices of righteousness, good works; all the fruits of the reigning love of God and our neighbour, and all the instances of a religious conversation, which are better than all burnt-offerings and sacrifices. "Let all your devotions come from an upright heart; let all your alms be sacrifices of righteousness." The sacrifices of the unrighteous, God will not accept, they are an abomination, Isa. i. 11, &c. (2.) That we confide in him. "First make conscience of offering the sacrifices of righteousness, and then you are welcome to put your trust in the Lord. Serve God without any difference of him, or any fear of losing by him. Honour him, by trusting in him only, and not in your wealth, or in the things that are true, in his providence, and lean not to your own understanding; trust in his grace, and go not about to establish your own righteousness or sufficiency."

In singing these verses, we must preach to ourselves the doctrine of the provoking nature of sin, the lying vanity of the world, and the unspeakable happiness of God's people; and we must press upon ourselves the duties of fearing God, conversing with our own hearts, and offering spiritual sacrifices; in praying over these verses, we must beg of God grace thus to think, and thus to do.

6. There be many that say, Who will show us any good? Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us. 7. Thou hast put gladness in my heart, more than in the time that their corn and their wine increased. 8. I will both lay me down in peace, and sleep; for thou, Lord, only makest me dwell in safety.

We have here, I. The foolish wish of worldly people; There be many that say, Who will show us any good? Who will make us to see good? What good they meant, is intimated, v. 7. It was the increase of their corn and wine; all they desired was plenty of the wealth of this world, that they might enjoy abundance of the delights of sense. Thus far they are right, that they are desirous of good, and solicitous about it; but there are these things amiss in this wish, 1. They inquire, in general, "Who will make us happy?" but do not apply themselves to God, who alone can; and so they expose themselves to be ill-advised, and show they would rather be helden to any thing to God, for they would willingly drink, eat, drink, take what is alone meet to be eaten and drunk. May we not see in this wish a consequence? We may see, seeming good, sensible good; and they show no concern for the good things that are out of sight, and are the objects of faith only. The source of idolatry was a desire of gods that they might see, therefore they worshipped the sun; but, as we must be taught to worship an unseen God, so to seek an unseen good, 2 Cor. iv. 18. We look, with an eye of faith, further than we can see with an eye of sense. 3. They inquire for any good, for the chief good; all they want is outward good, present good, partial good, good meat, good drink, a good trade, and a good estate; and what are all these worth, without a good God, and a good heart? Any good will serve the turn of most men, but a gracious soul will not be put off so. This way, this wish, of carnal worldlings is their folly, and yet many there be that join in it; their doom will be accordingly; Son, remember that thou in the days of thy youth hast made thy good things, the penny thou didst agree for.

II. The wise choice which godly people make. David, and the pious few that adhered to him, dissented from that wish, and joined in this prayer, Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us. 1. He disagrees from the vote of the many; God had set him apart for himself by distinguishing favours, and therefore he sets himself apart by a distinguishing character. "They are for any good, for worldly good, but so an not; I will not say as they say; any good will not serve my turn; the wealth of the world will never make a portion for my soul, and therefore I cannot take up with it." 2. He and his friends agree in their choice of God’s favour as their felicity, that is it which, in their account, is better life and all the comforts of life.

(1.) That is it which they most earnestly desire and seek after; this is the breathing of their souls, “Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us;” most are for other things, but we for that. God people, as they are distinguished by their practices, so they are by their prayers, not the length and language of them, but the faith and fervency of them; they whom God has set apart, have a prayer by themselves, which, though others may speak the words of it, they only offer up in sincerity; and this is a prayer which they all say. Amen to; “Lord, let us have thy favour, and let us know that we have it, and we desire no more; the peace of God which passes all understanding, let us have with us, accept of us, manifest thyself to us, let us be satisfied of thy loving-kindness, and we will be satisfied with it.” Observe, Though David speaks of himself only, in the 7th and 8th verses, he speaks, in this prayer, for others also, “upon us,” as Christ taught us to pray, “Our Father.” All the saints come to the throne of grace on the same errand, and in this they are one, they all desire God’s favour as their chief good. We should heat it as for ourselves, as well as for others, for God’s favour there is enough for us all, and we shall have never the less for others sharing in what we have.

(2.) That is it in which, above any thing, they rejoice; [v. 7.] “Thou hast hereby often put gladness into my heart; not only supported and refreshed me, but filled me with joy unspeakable; and therefore that is it which I will pursue, which I will seek after all the days of my life.” When God puts gladness in the heart, he puts gladness in the heart; nor is any joy comparable to that which gracious souls have in the communications of the divine favour, no, not the joy of harvest, of a plentiful harvest, when the corn and wine increase. This is gladness in the heart, inward, solid, substantial, joy. The mirth of worldly people is but a flash, a shadow; even in laughter their heart is sorrowful, Prov. xiv. 13.

(3.) That it is which they entirely confide in, and in that confidence they are always easy, v. 8. He had laid him down, and slept, (iii. 5.) so he will still; “I will lay me down (having the assurance of thy favour) in peace, and with as much pleasure as those whose corn and wine increase, and who lie down as Boaz did in his threshing-floor, at the end of the heap of corn, to sleep there when his heart was merry;” (Ruth iii. 7.) “for thou only makest me to dwell in safety.” Though I am alone, yet I am not alone, for God is with me; though I have no guards to attend me, the Lord alone is sufficient to protect me; he can do it himself when all other defences fail. If he have the light of God’s countenance, [1.] He can enjoy himself. His soul returns to God, and reposeth itself in him as its Rest, and so he lays him down, and sleeps in peace. He has what he would have, and is sure that nothing can come amiss to him. [2.] He fears no disturbance from his enemies, sleeps quiet, and is very secure, because God himself has undertaken to keep him safe. When he comes to sleep the sleep of death, and to lie down in the grave, to make his bed in the darkness, he will then, with good old Simeon, depart in peace, (Luke ii. 29.) being assured that God will receive his soul, to be safe with himself, and that his body also shall be made to dwell in safety in the grave. (3.) He commits all his affairs to God, and contentedly leaves the issue of them with him. It is said of the husbandman, that, having cast his seed into the ground, he sleeps and rises night and day, and the seed springs and grows up, he knows not how, Mark iv. 26, 27. So a good man, having, by faith and prayer, cast his care upon God, sleeps and rests night and day, and is very easy, leaving it to his God to perform all things for him, and prepared to welcome his holy will.

In singing these verses, and praying over them, let us, with a holy contempt of the wealth and pleasure of this world, be insufficient to make us happy, earnestly seek the favour of God, and pleasingly solace ourselves in that favour; and, with a holy indifference about the issue of all our worldly concerns, let us trust entirely to the conduct and custody of the Divine Providence, and be satisfied that all shall be made to work for good to us, if we keep ourselves in the love of God.

PSALM V.

This psalm is a prayer, a solemn address to God, at a time when the psalmist was brought into distress by the malice of his enemies; many such times passed over David, nay, there was scarcely any time of his life to which this psalm may not be accommodated; for in this he was a type of Christ, that he was continually beset with enemies; and his powerful and prevalent appeals to God, when he was so beset, prove the first, and best, discovery of all God’s faith and triumphs over the powers of darkness, in the midst of his sufferings. In this psalm, I. David settles a correspondence between his soul and God, and promising to pray, and promising that God will certainly hear him, v. 1-3. II. He gives to God the glory, and takes to himself the comfort, of God’s holiness, v. 4-6. III. He declares his resolution to keep close to the public worship of God, v. 7. IV. He prayed, I. For himself, that God would grant him to witness God himself, Ps. xlii. 8. that God would destroy them, v. 9, 10. III. For all the people of God, that God would give them joy, and keep them safe, v. 11, 12. And this is all of great use to direct us in prayer.

To the chief musician upon Nehiloth. A psalm of David.

1. Give ear to my words, O Lord; consider my meditation. 2. Hearker unto the voice of my cry, my King, and my God: for unto thee will I pray. 3. My voice shalt thou hear in the morning, O Lord; in the morning will I direct my prayer unto thee, and will look up. 4. For thou art not a God that hath pleasure in wickedness, neither shall evil dwell with thee. 5. The foolish shall not stand in thy sight: thou hastest all workers of iniquity. 6. Thou shalt destroy them that speak leas:ing: the Lord will abhor the bloody and deceitful man.

The title of this psalm has nothing in it peculiar, but that it is said to be upon Nehiloth, a word no where else used. It is conjectured, (and it is but a conjecture,) that it signifies wind instruments, with which this psalm was sung, as Neginoth was supposed to signify the stringed-instruments.

In these verses, David had an eye to God,

I. As a prayer-hearing God; such he has always been, ever since men began to call upon the name of the Lord, and yet is still as ready to hear prayer as ever. Observe how David here styles him, O Lord; (v. 1, 3.) Jehovah, a self-existent, self-sufficient, Being, whom we are bound to adore, and, "my King and my God, (v. 2.) whom I have avouched for my God, to whom I have sworn alleprayers to God as our Father in heaven; and let us always send them by the Lord Jesus, the great Mediator, and then they will be sure not to miscarry. All our prayers must be directed to God; his honour and glory must be aimed at as our highest end, if all prayers; let our first, and last prayer, be Hallowed. Glorified, be thy name; and then we may be sure of the same gracious answer to it that was given to Christ himself, I have glorified it, and I will glorify it yet again.

(4.) That he will patiently wait for an answer of peace; “I will look up; will look after my prayers, and hear what God the Lord will speak,” (Isa. 28: 8. Hab. ii. 1.) that, if he grant what I asked, I may expect that he will also answer such prayers as are not gainst his will. If I may have some hope, if I may continue to pray and wait, and may not faint.”

We must look up, or look out, as he that has shot an arrow looks to see how near it has come to the mark. We lose much of the comfort of our prayers, for want of observing the returns of them. Thus praying, thus waiting, as the lame man looked steadfastly on Peter and John, (Acts iii. 4.) we may expect that God will give ear to our words, and consider them, and to him we may refer ourselves, as David does, “I will not lift up mine eyes unto the stars, neither will I set mine hope on them; for the persecutors.”

II. As a sin-hating God, v. 4-6. David takes notice of this. 1. As a warning to himself, and all other praying people, to remember that, as the God with whom we have to do is gracious and merciful, so he is pure and holy; though he is ready to hear prayer, yet, if we regard iniquity in our heart, he will not hear our prayers, Ps. 51. 2. As an encouragement to his prayers against his enemies; they were wicked men, and therefore enemies to God, and such as he had no pleasure in. See here,

(1.) The holiness of God’s nature; when he says, “Thou art not a God that has pleasure in wickedness,” he means, “Thou art a God that hates it, as directly contrary to thine infinite purity and rectitude, and holy will.” Though the workers of iniquity prosper, yet none thence infer, that God has pleasure in wickedness, no not in that by which men pretend to honour him, as those do that hate their brethren, and cast them out, and say, “Let the Lord be glorified.” God has no pleasure in wickedness, though covered with a cloak of religion. Let those, therefore, who delight in sin, know that God has no delight in them; nor let any say, when he is tempted, “I am tempted of God,” for God is not the Author of sin, neither shall evil dwell with him; it shall not always be countenanced, and suffered to prosper.

Dr. Hammond thinks this refers to that law of Moses, which would not permit strangers, who persisted in their idolatry, to dwell in the land of Israel.

(2.) The justice of his government; “The foolish shall not stand in his sight,” shall not be smiled upon by him, nor admitted to attend upon him, nor shall they be acquitted in the judgment of the great day. Though the workers of iniquity should rise up for fools, and the hypocrites be the greatest of all fools; not fools of God’s making, those are to be pitied, he hates nothing that he has made, but fools of their own making, and those he hates. Wicked people hate God, justly therefore are they hated of him, and it will be their endless misery and ruin. “Those whom thou hatest, thou shalt destroy; and particularly two sorts of sinners, who are here marked for destruction.”[1] Those that are fools, that speak lying or lying, and those that are hypocrites. There is a particular emphasis laid on these sinners, (Rev. xxii. 8.) “All liars, and (ch. xxii. 15.) Whosoever loves and makes a lie; nothing is more contrary than this, and therefore nothing more hateful to the God of truth. [2] Those that are cruel,
Thou wilt abhor the bloody man; for inhumanity is no less contrary, no less hateful, to the God of mercy, whom mercy pleases. Liars and murderers are in a particular manner said to resemble the Devil, and to be his children, and therefore it may well be expected that God should abhor them. These were the characters of David's enemies; and such as these are still the enemies of Christ and his church, men perfectly lost to all virtue and honour; the worse they are, the surer we may be of their ruin in due time.

In soliciting these verses, and praying them over, we must engage and stir up ourselves to the duty of prayer, and encourage ourselves in it, because we shall not seek the Lord in vain; and must express our detestation of sin, and our awful expectation of that day of Christ's appearing, which will be the day of the perdition of ungodly men.

7. But as for me, I will come into thy house in the multitude of thy mercy; and in thy fear will I worship toward thy holy temple. 8. Lead me, O Lord, in thy righteousness, because of mine enemies; make thy way straight before my face. 9. For there is no faithfulness in their mouth; their inward part is very wickedness; their throat is an open sepulchre; they flatter with their tongue. 10. Destroy thou them, O God; let them fall by their own counsels: cast them out in the multitude of their transgressions; for they have rebelled against thee. 11. But let all those that put their trust in thee rejoice: let them ever shout for joy, because thou defendest them: let them also that love thy name be joyful in thee. 12. For thou, Lord, wilt be the righteousness: with favour wilt thou compass him as with a shield.

In these verses, David gives three characters; of himself, of his enemies, and of all the people of God; and subjoins a prayer to each of them.

1. He gives an account of himself, and prays for himself, v. 7, 8. 1. He is steadfastly resolved to keep close to God and to his worship. Sinners go away from God, and so make themselves odious to his holiness, and obnoxious to his justice; "But as for me, that shall not keep me from thee." God's holiness and justice are so far from being a terror to the upright in heart, to drive them from God, that they are rather by them invited to cleave to him. David resolves, (1.) To worship God, to pay his homage to him, and give unto God the glory due unto his name. (2.) To worship him publicly; "I will come into thy house, the courts of thy house, to worship thee, with all thy faithful worshippers." David was much in secret worship, prayed often alone, (v. 2, 3.) and yet was very constant and devout in his attendance on the public worship. The duties of the closet are designed to prepare us for, not excuse us from, public ordinances. (3.) To worship him reverently, and with a due sense of the infinite distance there is between God and man; "In thy fear will I worship, with a holy awe of God upon my spirit." Heb. xi. 28. God is greatly to be feared by prayers. (4.) To thank God for his encouragement, in worship, from God himself only. [1.] From his infinite mercy: it is in the multitude of God's mercy, the inexhaustible treasures of mercy that are in God, and the innumerable proofs and instances of it which we receive from God, that David confides, and not in any merit of righteousness of his own, in his approaches to God. The mercy of God should ever be the foundation both of our hopes, and of our joy, in every thing wherein we have to do with him. [2.] From the instituted medium of worship, which was the temple, here called the temple of his holiness, as a type of Christ, the great and only Mediator, who sanctifies the service, as the temple sanctified the gold, and to whom we must have an eye in all our devotions, as they then had to the temple. 2. He earnestly prays that God, by his grace, would guide and preserve him always in the way of his duty; (v. 8.) Lead me in the right ways, because of mine enemies, Hebr. "because of the fear of mine enemies, which watch for my halting, and seek occasion against me." See here, (1.) The good use which David made of the malice of his enemies against him; the more curious they were in spying faults in him, that they might have whereof to accuse him, the more cautious he was to avoid sin and all appearances of it, and the more solicitous to be always found in the good way of God and duty. Thus, we may know the wisdom, and the wisdom of our enemies, or the way of our duty is here called God's way and his righteousness, because he subjoins to us by his just and holy laws, which if we sincerely set before us as our rule, we may in faith beg of God to direct us in all particular cases. How this prayer of David's was answered to him, see 1 Sam. viii. 14, 15.

II. He gives an account of his enemies, and prays against them, v. 9, 10. 1. If his account of them be true, as, no doubt, it is, they have a very bad character; and if they had not been bad men indeed, they could not have been enemies to a man after God's own heart. He had spoken (v. 6.) of God's hatting the bloody and deceitful man; "Now, Lord," says he, "that is the character of my enemies: they are deceitful, there is no trusting them, for there is no faithfulness in their mouth." They thought it was no sin to tell a deliberate lie, if it might but blemish David, and make him odious; "Lord, let me," says he, (v. 8.) "for such as these, are the men I have to do with, against whose slanders innocency itself is no security. Do they speak fair? Do they talk of peace and friendship? They flatter with their tongues; it is designed to cover their malice, and to gain their point the more secretly. Whatever they pretend of religion or friendship, two sacred things, they are true to neither, their inward part is wickedness itself, it is very wickedness. They are likewise bloody, for they through and through, cruel as the grave, gaping to devour and to swallow down, as insoluble as the grave, which never says, "It is enough," Prov. xxx. 15, 16. This is quoted, (Rom. iii. 13.) to show the general corruption of mankind, for they are all naturally prone to malice, Tit. iii. 3. The grave is opened for them all, and yet they are as open graves to one another. 2. If his prayer against them be heard, as, no doubt, it is, they are in a bad condition. As they are, and do, so they must expect to fare. He prays to God to destroy them, according to what he had said, (v. 6.) "Thee shall destroy men of this character." So let them fall; and sinners would soon throw themselves into ruin, if they were let alone. The psalmist prays that God would cast them out of his protection and favour, out of the heritage of the Lord, out of the land of the living; and woe to those whom God casts out. They have by their sins deserved destruction; therefore is it enough to justify God in their utter rejection: "Cast them out in the multitude of their transgressions by which they have filled up the measure of their iniquity, and are become ripe for ruin." Persecuting God's servants, fills the measure as soon as any thing, 1 Thess. ii. 15, 16. Nay, they may be easily made to fall by their own counsels; that which they do, to secure themselves, and do mischief to others, by the over-ruling providence of God, may be made the means of their destruction. Thus says 2 Samuel, x. 18, 19. "They have rebelled against thee; had they been only mine enemies, I could safely have forgiven them; but they are rebels against God, he's crown and dignity; they oppose his government, and will not repent, to give him glory, and therefore I plainly foresee their ruin." His prayer for their destruction comes not from a spirit of revenge, but from a spirit of prophecy, by which he foretold, That all who rebel against God will not only be destroyed by their own conversion, but if it be a righteous thing with God to recompense tribulation to them that trouble his people, as we are told it is, (2 Thess. i. 6) we pray it may be done, whenever we pray, Father, thy will be done.

III. He gives an account of the people of God, and prays for them, concluding with an assurance of their bliss, which he doubted not of his own interest in. Observer.

The description he gives of God's people. They are the righteous; (v. 12) for they put their trust in God, are well assured of his power and all-sufficiency, venture their all upon his promise, and are confident of his protection in the way of their duty; and they love his name, are well-pleased with all that by which God has made himself known, and take delight in their acquaintance with him. This is true and pure religion, to live a life of complacency in God, and dependence on him.

His prayer for them; "Let them rejoice; let them have cause to rejoice, and hearts to rejoice; fill them with joy, with great joy and unspeakable; let them shout for joy, with constant joy and perpetual, let them ever shout for joy, with holy joy, and that which terminates in God; let them be joyful in thee, in thy favour, in thy salvation; not in any creature. Let them rejoice because thou coverest them, or overshadowest them, dwelllest among them." Perhaps it is an allusion to the pillar of cloud and fire, which was to Israel a visible token of God's special presence with them, and the special protection they were under. Let us learn of David to pray, not for ourselves only, but for others; for all good people, for all that trust in God, and love his name, though not in every thing of our mind, or in our interest. Let all that are entitled to God's promises, have a share in our prayers; grace, mercy, power, will, love Christ in sincerity. This is to concur with God.

3. His comfort concerning them, v. 12. Therefore he takes them into his prayers, because they are God's peculiar people; therefore he doubts not but his prayers shall be heard, and they shall always rejoice; for, (1.) They are happy in the assurance of God's blessing; Thou, Lord, wilt bless the righteous; wilt command a blessing upon them. This is certain, and that which we may and with satisfaction expect; and therefore will make them truly so. Those whom thou blessest, they are blessed indeed. (2.) "They are safe under the protection of thy favour; with that thou wilt crown him," so some read it; "it is his honour, it will be to him a diadem of beauty, and make him truly great: with that thou wilt compass him, wilt surround him on every side as with a shield." A shield, in war, guards only one side but the favour of God is to the saints a defence on every side; like the hedge about Job, round about, so that, while they keep themselves under the divine protection, they are entirely safe, and ought to be entirely satisfied.

In singing these verses, and praying them over, we must by faith put ourselves under God's guidance and care, and then please ourselves with his mercy and grace, and with the prospect of God's triumphs, at last, over all his enemies, and his people's triumphs in him and in his salvation.

PSALM VI.

David was a weeping prophet as well as Jeremiah, and this psalm is one of his lamentations: either it was penned in a time, or, at least, calculated for a time, of great trouble, both outward and inward. Is any afflicted? Is any sick? Let him sing this psalm. The method of this psalm is very observable, and what we shall often meet with. He begins with doleful complaints, but ends with joyful praises; like Hannah, who went to prayer with a sorrowful spirit, but, when she had prayed, went her way, and her countenance was no more sad. Three things the psalmist is here complaining of; 1. Sickness of body. 2. Trouble of mind, arising from the sense of sin, the meritorious cause of pain and sickness. 3. The terrors of his enemies, upon occasion of both. Now here, 1. He pours out his complaints before God, deprecates his wrath, and begs earnestly for the return of his favour, v. 1-7. 2. He assures himself of an answer and prosperity, Lord, and, most importantly, to his full satisfaction, v. 8-10. This psalm is like the book of Job.

To the chief musician on Neginath upon Sheminith. A psalm of David.

1. O LORD, rebuke me not in thine anger, neither chasten me in thy hot displeasure. 2. Have mercy upon me, O LORD; for I am weak: O LORD, heal me; for my bones are vexed. 3. My soul is also sore vexed: but thou, O LORD, how long? 4. Return, O LORD, deliver my soul: O save me for thy mercies' sake. 5. For in death there is no remembrance of thee: in the grave who shall give thee thanks? 6. I am weary with groaning; all the night will make I my bed to swim: I water my couch with tears. 7. Mine eye is consumed because of grief; it waxeth old because of all mine enemies.

These verses speak the language of a heart truly humbled under humbling providences, of a broken and contrite spirit under great afflictions, sent on purpose to awaken conscience, and mortify corruption. These heap up wrath, who cry not when God binds them; but those are getting more for mercy, and less for God's rebukes, sow their tears, as David does here.

Let us observe here,

1. The representation he makes to God of his grievances; he pours out his complaint before him; whither else should a child go with his complaints, but to his father? 1. He complains of bodily pain and sickness; (v. 2.) My bones are vexed: his bones and his flesh, like Job's, were touched. Though David was a king, yet he was sick and pained; his imperial crown would not keep his head from aching. Great men are men, and subject to the common calamities of human life. Though David was a stout man, a man of war from his youth, yet that will not secure him from distempers, which will soon make even the strong men to bow themselves. Though David was a good man, yet neither will his goodness keep him in health; Lord, behold, he wor-thou lovest is sick. Let this help to reconcile us to pain and sickness, that it has been the lot of some of the best saints, and that we are directed and encouraged, by their example, to show before God our trouble in that case, who is for the body, and takes cognizance of its ailments. 2. He complains of inward trouble: My soul is also sore vexed; and that is much more grievous than the vexation of the bones. The spirit of a man will sustain his infirmity, if that be in good plight; but, if that be wounded, the grievance is intolerable. David's sickness brought his soul to his remembrance, he looked upon it as a token of God's displeasure against him; that was the vexation of his soul, that made him cry, I am weak, heal me. It is a sad thing for a man to have his bones and his soul vexed at the same time; but this has been sometimes the lot of God's own people: nay, and this completed this complicated trouble, that it was continued upon them a great while, which is here intimated in that exposition, (v. 3.) Thou, O Lord, how long? To the living God we must, at such a time, apply ourselves, who is the only Physician both of body and mind, and not to the Assyrans, not to the god of Ekron.

II. The impression which his troubles made upon him. They lay very heavy; he groaned till he was weary, wept till he made his bed to win, and watered his couch; (v. 6.) wept till he had almost wept his eyes out; (v. 7.) Mine eye is consumed because of grief. David had more courage and consideration than to mourn thus for any outward affliction; but, when sin sat heavy upon his conscience, and he was made to possess his iniquities, when his soul was wounded with the sense of God's wrath, and his withdrawals from him, then he takes on thus, and mourns in secret, and even his soul refuses to be comforted. This not only kept his eyes waking, but kept his eyes weeping. Note 1. It has often been the lot of the best men to be men of sorrows; our Lord Jesus himself was so; our way lies through a sea of tears, and we must accommodate ourselves to the temper of the climate. 2. It well becomes the greatest spirits to be tender and to relent, under the tokens of God's displeasure. David, who could face Goliath himself, and many another threatening enemy, with an undaunted bravery, yet melts into tears at the remembrance of sin, and under the apprehensions of divine wrath; and it is no diminution at all of his courage, but a further and a deeper token of true courage; "The Lord will move me to do that which I know not, but he proceeds, and with their retirements. The Pharisees disguised their faces, that they might appear unto men to mourn; but David mourns in the night upon the bed where he lay, communing with his own heart, and no eye was a witness to his grief, but the eye of Him who is all eye. Peter went out, covered his face, and wept. 4. Sorrow for sin ought to be great sorrow; so David's was; he wept so bitterly, so abundantly, that it watered his couch. The tears of wicked men are sweats of the soul, aches and pains, much to their grief. David's eye waxed old, because of his enemies, who rejoiced in his afflictions, and put bad constructions upon his tears. In this great sorrow, David was a type of Christ, who often wept, and who cried out, My soul is exceeding grievously vexed, Heb. v. 7.

III. The petitions which he offers up to God, in this sorrowful and distressed state. 1. That which he directs to God, whom he takes for the God of God. This was the wormwood and the gall in the affliction and the misery; it was the infusion of that made it indeed a bitter cup; and therefore he prays, (v. 1.) O Lord, rebuke me not in thine anger, though I have deserved it, neither chasten me in thy hot displeasure. He does not pray, "Lord, rebuke me not; Lord, chasten me not," for, as many as God loves, he rebukes and chastens, as a father the son in whom he delights. He can bear the rebuke and chastening well enough, if God, at the same time, little his hands on the heads of all who are convicted of their sins, and by his Spirit make him to hear the joy and gladness of his loving-kindness; the affliction of his body will be tolerable, if he have but comfort in his soul. No matter what sickness make his bones ache, if God's wrath do not make his heart ache; therefore his prayer is, "Lord, rebuke me not in thy wrath; let me not lie under the impressions of that, for that will sink me." Herein David was a type of Christ, who, under most complaint, in his sufferings, was, of the trouble of his soul, and of the suspension of his Father's smiles. He never so much as whispered a complaint of the rage of his enemies, "Why do they crucify me?" or the unkindness of his friends, "Why do you desert me?" But he cried with a loud voice, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? Let us thus depurate the wrath of God more than any outward trouble whatsoever, and always take heed of treasuring up wrath against a day of affliction. 2. That which he desires as the greatest good, and which would be to him the restoration of all good, is, the favour and grace of God. He prays, (1.) That God would pity him, and look upon him with compassion; he thinks himself very miserable, and misery is the proper object of mercy. Hence he prays, "Have mercy upon me, O Lord; in wrath, remember mercy; and deal not with me in strict justice." (2.) That God would abate his sins, for it is the principal cause of God's displeasure; but he is willing to confess himself faulty, and have the necessary type of the pure and perfect mercy, and is often chiefly intended in that petition, Have mercy upon me. (3.) That God would put forth his power for his relief: Lord, heal me, (v. 2.) Save me, (v. 4.) speak the word, and I shall be whole, and all will be well. (4.) That he would be at peace with him; "Return, O Lord, receive me into thy favour again, and be reconciled to me. Thou hast seemed to depart from me, and neglect me, nay, to set thyself at a distance, as one angry; but now, Lord, return, and show thyself nigh to me." (5.) That he would especially preserve the inward man, and the interests of that, whatever becomes of the body; "O Lord, deliver my soul from sinning, from sinking, from perishing for ever." It is an unspeakable privilege, that we have a God to go to in our afflictions, and it is our duty to go to him, and thus to wrestle with him, and we shall not seek in vain.

IV. This whole petition enforces his petitions; not to move God, (he knows our cause, and the true merits of it, better than we can state it,) but to move himself. 1. He pleads his own misery, and that his misery had continued long; "I am weak, I am troubled, sore troubled; O Lord, how long shall I be so?" 2 He pleads God's mercy; thence we take some of our best encouragements in prayer; Save me, for thy mercies sake. 3. He pleads God's glory; (v. 5.) For in death there is no remembrance of thee; and when I shall return and comfort me, I will not only give thee thanks for my deliverance, and stir up others to join with me in these thanksgivings, but I will spend the new life thou shalt intrust me with, in thy service, and to thy glory; and, all the remainder of my days, I will preserve a grateful remembrance of thy favours to me, and be quickened thereby in all instances of service to thee; but if I die, I shall be cut short of thy comforting thee, and doing good to others; for in the very way, we will give thee thanks." Not but that separate souls live and act, and the souls of the faithful joyfully remember God, and give thanks to him. But, (1.) In the second death, (which, perhaps, David, being now troubled in soul under the wrath of God, had some dreadful apprehensions of,) there is no pleasing remembrance of God; devils and damned spirits.
he had wherewith to answer them that reproached him, for God was about to return in mercy to him, had now comforted his spirit, and would shortly complete his deliverance. (3.) Perhaps they had tempted him to do as they did, to quit his religion, and betake himself for ease to the pleasures of sin. But now, "Depart from me, I will never lend an ear to thee; for thou hast cursed God and die, but I will bless him and live." This good use we should make of God's mercies to us, we should thereby have our resolution strengthened never to have anything more to do with sin and sinners. David was a king, and he takes this occasion to renew his purpose of using his power for the suppression of sin, and the reformation of manners, lxxxv. 4.—ci. 3. When God has done great things for us, that should put us upon studying what we shall do for him. Our Lord Jesus seems to borrow these words from the mouth of his father David, when, having all judgment committed to him, he shall say, Depart from me, all ye workers of iniquity, (Luke xiii. 27.) and so teaches us to say now, cxix. 115.

2. He assures himself that God was, and would be, propitious to him, notwithstanding the present intimations of wrath which he was under. (1.) He is confident of the promises of grace as certain as ever he is of the present torment which he is now making. While he is yet speaking, he is aware that God is good, (as Isa. lxv. 24. Dan. ix. 20.) and therefore speaks of it as a thing done, and repeats it with an air of triumph, "The Lord hath heard," and again, "The Lord hath heard." By the workings of God's grace upon his heart, he knew his prayer was graciously accepted, and therefore did not doubt but it would, in due time, be effectually answered. His tears had a voice, a loud voice, in the ears of the God of mercy; The Lord hath heard the voice of my weeping; silent tears are not speechless ones: his prayers were cries to God; The Lord hath heard the voice of my supplication, has put his Fiat—Let it be done, to my petitions, and so it will appear shortly. (2.) Thence he infers the like favourable audience of all his other prayers; "He has heard the voice of my supplication, and therefore he will receive my prayer for you, give, and does not upbraid with forerunners."

3. He either prays for the conversion, or predicts the destruction, of his enemies and persecutors, v. 10. (1.) It may very well be taken as a prayer for their conversion; "Let them all be ashamed of the opposition they have given me, and the censures they have passed upon me. Let them be (as those penitents are) vexed at themselves for their own folly; let them return to a better temper and disposition of mind, and let them be ashamed of what they have done against me, and take shame to themselves." (2.) If they be not converted, it is a prediction of their confusion and ruin. They shall be ashamed and sore-vexed, (so it may be read,) and that justly; they rejoiced that David was vexed, (v. 2, 3.) and therefore, as usually, it returns upon themselves, they also shall be sore-vexed. They that will not give glory to God, shall have the most cutting of wounds, filled with everlasting shame.

In singing this, and praying over it, we must give glory to God, as a God ready to hear prayer, must own his goodness to us in hearing our prayers, and must encourage ourselves to wait upon him, and to trust in him, in the greatest straits and difficulties.

PSALM VII.

It appears by the title, that this psalm was penned with reference to the malicious imputations that David was held under by some of his enemies. Being thus wronged, 1. He applies himself to God for favour, v. 1, 2. He appeals to God concerning his innocency as to those things whereof he was accused, v. 3. 5. III. He prayed to God to plead his cause, and judge for him against his persecutors, v. 6. 9. IV. He expresses his confidence in God, that he would do it, and would execute it. He puts the mischief upon the head of those that设计 it against him, v. 10. 16. V. He promises to give God the glory of his deliverance, v. 17. In this, David was a type of Christ, who was himself, and still is, in his members, thus injured, but will certainly be righted at last.

Shiggaion of David, which he sang unto the Lord, concerning the words of Cush the Benjamite.

1. O LORD my God, in thee do I put my trust: save me from all them that persecute me, and deliver me; 2. Lest he tear my soul like a lion, rending it in pieces, while there is none to deliver. 3. O LORD my God, if I have done this, if there be iniquity in my hands; 4. If I have rewarded evil unto him that was at peace with me; (yea, I have delivered him that without cause is mine enemy;) 5. Let the enemy persecute my soul, and take it; yea, let him tread down my life upon the earth, and lay mine honour in the dust. Selah. 6. Arise, O LORD, in thine anger; lift up thyself, because of the rage of mine enemies; and awake for me to the judgment that thou hast commanded. 7. So shall the congregation of the people compass thee about: for their sakes, therefore, return thou on high. 8. The LORD shall judge the people: judge me, O LORD, according to my righteousness, and according to mine integrity that is in me. 9. O let the wickedness of the wicked come to an end; but establish the just: for the righteous God trieth the hearts and reins.

Shiggaion is a song or psalm; the word is used so only here and Hab. iii. 1. A wandering song, so sauc.: the matter and composition of the several parts being different, but artificially put together. A charming song, soothers; very delightful. David not only penned it, but sang it himself in a devout religious manner unto the Lord, concerning the words or affairs of Cush the Benjamite, that is, of Saul himself, whose barbarous usage of David despised him rather a Cushite, or Ethiopian, than a true born Israelite. Or, more likely, it was some kinsman of Saul, named Cush, who was an invertebrate enemy to David, misrepresented him to Saul as a traitor, and (which was unnecessary) exasperated Saul against him; one of those children of men, children of Belial indeed, whom David complains of, (1 Sam. xxvi. 19.) that made mischief between him and Saul. David, thus basely abused, has recourse to the Lord: the injuries men do us, should drive us to God, for to him we may commit our cause. Nay, he sings to the Lord, his spirit was not ruffled by it, nor cast down, but so composed and cheerful, that he was still in tune for sacred songs, and it did not occasion one jarring string in his harp. Thus let the injuries we receive from men, instead of provoking our passions, kindle and excite our devotions. In these verses, (1) He prays for God's protection, and cries to him for succour and shelter; (v. 1.) "Lord, save me, and deliver me from the power and malice of all them that persecute me, that they may not have their will against me." He pleads, (1) His relation to God. "Thou art my God, and, thencefore, whither else should I go but to thee? Thou art my God, and therefore my Shield; (Gen. xv. 1.) my God, and therefore I am one of thy servants, who may expect to be protected." (2) His confidence in God; "Lord, save me, for I depend upon thee; in thee do I put my trust, and not in any arm of flesh." (3) Men of honour will not fail those that repose a trust in them: especially, when they themselves have encouraged them to do so: which is our case. 3. The rage and malice of his enemies, and the imminent danger he was in of being swallowed up by them; "Lord, save me, or I am gone; he will tear my soul like a lion tearing his prey;" with so much pride, and pleasure, and power, so easily, so cruelly. St. Paul compares Nero to a lion, (2 Tim. iv. 17.) as David here compares Saul. 4. The failure of all other helpers; "Lord, be thou pleased to deliver me, for otherwise there is none to deliver," v. 2. It is the glory of God to help the helpless.

II. He makes a solemn protestation of his innocency, as to those things whereof he was accused, and by a dreadful imprecation appeals to God, the Searcher of hearts, concerning it, v. 3. 5. Observe, in general, 1. When we are falsely accused by men, it is a great comfort, if our own consciences acquit us.

—Heuxurum sabuenest esto,
Nil conscire sibi—
Be this thy brazen bulwark of defence,
Still to preserve thy conscious innocence.

Happy indeed, when not only they cannot prove their calumnies, (Acts xxiv. 13.) but when our hearts can disprove them, to our own satisfaction. 2. God is the Patron of wronged innocency. David had no cause to repine, nor to accuse, his prince, who should have righted him, was his sworn enemy; but he had the court of heaven to fly to, and a righteous Judge there, whom he could call his God. And here see,

(1.) What the indictment is, which he pleads not guilty to. He was charged with a truculent design against Saul's crown and life, that he compassed and imagined to depose and murder him, and, in order to that, conspired with him against him. This he utterly denies: he never did this, there was no iniquity of this kind in his hand, (v. 3.) he abhorred the thought of it. He never rewarded evil to Saul, when he was at peace with him, nor to any other, v. 4. Nay, as some think it should be rendered, he never rendered evil for evil, never did them mischief that had injured him.

(2.) What evidence he produces of his innocency: it is hard to prove a negative, and yet this was a negative which David could produce very good proof of; (v. 4.) I have delivered him that without cause is mine enemy. By this it appeared, beyond contradiction, that David had no design against Saul's life—that, once and again, Providence so ordered it, that Saul lay at his mercy, and there were those about him, that would soon have dispatched him, but David generously and conscientiously prevented it, when he cut off his skirt, (1 Sam. xxxiv. 4.) and afterward, when he took away his spear, (1 Sam. xxxvi. 12.) to attest for him what he could have done. Saul himself owned both these to be undeniable proofs of David's integrity and good affection to him. If we render good for evil, and deny ourselves the gratifications of our passion, it may turn to us for a testimony, more than we think of, another day.

(3.) What doom he would submit to, if he were guilty; (v. 5.) Let the enemy persecute my soul to the death; and my good name when I am gone, let him lay my honour in the dust. This intimates, [1.] That, if he had been indeed injurious to others, he had reason to expect that they would repay him in the same coin. He that has his hand against every man, must count upon it that every man's hand will be against him. [2.] That, in that case, he could not with any confidence go to God, and have of him, or plead his cause, as a presumptuous, dangerous thing for any that are guilty, and suffer justly, to appeal to God, as if they were innocent, and suffered wrongfully; such must humble themselves, and accept the punishment of their iniquity, and not expect that the righteous God will patronize their unrighteousness. [3.] That he was abundantly satisfied in himself, concerning his innocence; it is natural to us to wish well to those we regard, and therefore, a curse to ourselves, if we swear falsely, has been thought as awful a form of swearing as any other. With such an oath, or imprecation, David here ratifies the protestation of his innocence, which yet will not justify us in doing the like for every light and trivial cause; for the occasion here was important.

III. Having this testimony of his conscience concerning his innocence, he humbly prays to God to appear for him against his persecutors, and backs himself, not only with the proper persons, but one that knew how to order his cause before God.

1. He prays that God would manifest his wrath against his enemies, and plead their wrath against him; "Lord, they are unjustly angry at me, be thou justly angry with them, and let them know that thou art so," v. 6. In thine anger lift up thyself to the seat of judgment, and make thy power and justice conspicuous, because of the rage, the fury, the outbursts, (the word is plural,) of mine enemies. Thou needest not fear men's wrath against them, who have God's wrath for them. Who knows the power of his anger? 2. He prays that God would plead his cause; Awake for me to judgment; let my cause have a hearing to the judgment which thou hast commanded. That speaks, (1.) The divine power; as he blesses effectually, and is therefore said to command the blessing, so he judges effectually, and is therefore said to command the judgment, which is such as none can countermand; for it certainly carries execution along with it. (2.) The divine purpose and promise; It is the judgment which thou hast determined to pass upon all the enemies of thy people. Thou hast commanded the princes and judges of the earth to right the injured, and vindicate the oppressed; Lord, awake thyself to that judgment. He that loves righteousness, and requires it in others, will, no doubt, execute it himself. Though he seems to connive at wrong, as one asleep, he will awake in due time, (lxxxviii. 65.) and will make it to appear that the delays were no neglects. He prays, (v. 7.) Return thou on high, maintain thine own authority, resume thy royal throne of which they have despised the sovereignty, and the judgment-seat of which they have despised the sentence. Return on high, visibly, and in the sight of all, that they may be universally acknowledged that Heaven itself owns and proclaims, and thine own power make this to point at the resurrection and ascension of Jesus Christ, who, when he returned to heaven, (returned on high in his exalted state,) had all judgment committed to him. Or, it may refer to his second coming, when he shall return on high to this world, to execute judgment upon all. This return his injured people wait for, and pray for, and to it they appeal from the unjust censures of men. He prays again, (v. 8.) Judge me, judge for me, give sentence on my side.

To enforce this suit, [1.] He pleads that his cause was now brought into the proper court; The Lord shall judge the people, v. 8. It is his place; it is his promise. God is the judge; "Therefore, Lord, judge me." He is the Judge of all the earth, and therefore, no doubt, he shall do right, and all will be obliged to acquiesce in his judgment. [2.] He insists upon his integrity as to all the matters in variance between him and Saul, and desires only to be judged according to his integrity, or to have his integrity, and the sincerity of his heart in all the steps he had taken toward his preferment. [3.] He foretells that it would be much for the glory of God, and the edification and comfort of his people, if God would appear for him; So shall the congregation of the people compass thee about; therefore do it for their sakes, that they may attend thee with their praises and services in the courts of thine house.

The period of sin; that it may be brought to an end in ourselves and others. When corruption is mortified, when every wicked way and thought are forsaken, and the stream which ran violently toward the world and the flesh, is driven back, and runs toward God and heaven, then the wickedness of the wicked comes to an end. When there is a general reformation of manners, when atheists and profane are convinced and converted, when a stop is put to the spreading of the infection of sin, so that evil men proceed no further, their folly being made manifest; when the wicked designs of the church's enemies are baffled, and their power broken, and the man of sin is destroyed; then the wickedness of the wicked comes to an end. And this is that which all that love God, and, for his sake, hate evil, desire and pray for. (2.) The perpetuity of righteousness; but establish the just. As we pray that the bad may be made good, so we pray that the good may be made better, that they may not be seduced by the wiles of the wicked, nor shocked by their malice; that they may be confirmed in their choice of the ways of God, and in their resolution to persevere therein; may be firm to the interests of God and religion, and zealous in their endeavours to bring the wickedness of the wicked to an end. His plea to enforce this: And let the wicked be put to confusion before the Lord, and the reins; and therefore he knows the secret wickedness of the wicked, and knows how to bring it to an end; and the secret sincerity of the just he is witness to, and has secret ways of establishing. As far as we have the testimony of an unbiased conscience for us, that in any instance we are wronged and injuriously reflected on us, we may, in singing these verses, lodge our appeal with the righteous God, and be assured that he will own our righteous cause, and will one day, in the last day at furthest, bring forth our integrity as the light.

10. My defence is of God, which saveth the upright in heart. 11. God judgeth the righteous, and God is angry with the wicked every day. 12. If he turn not, he will whet his sword; he hath bent his bow, and made it ready. 13. He hath also prepared for him the instruments of death; he ordaineth his arrows against the persecutors. 14. Behold, he travaileth with iniquity, and hath conceived mischief, and brought forth falsehood. 15. He made a pit, and digged it, and is fallen into the ditch which he made. 16. His mischief shall return upon his own head, and his violent dealing shall come down upon his own pate. 17. I will praise the Lord according to his righteousness; and will sing praise to the name of the Lord most high.

David, having lodged his appeal with God by prayer and a solemn profession of his integrity, in the former part of the psalm, in this latter part does, as it were, take out judgment upon the appeal, by faith in the word of God, and the assurance it gives of the happiness and safety of the righteous, and the certain destruction of wicked people that continue in iniquity.

1. David is confident that he shall find God his powerful Protector and Saviour, and the Patron of his oppressed innocency; (v. 10.) "My defence is of God. Not only, God is my Defender, and I shall find him so, but I look for defence and safety in no other; my hope for shelter in a time of danger is placed in God alone; if I have defence, it must be of God." My shield is upon God, so some read it; there is that in God which gives an assurance of protection to all that are his. His name is a strong tower, Ps. lxxviii. 10. Two things David builds this confidence upon. 1. The particular favour God has for all that are sincere; He saves the upright in heart, saves them with an everlasting salvation, and therefore will preserve them to his heavenly kingdom; he saves them out of their present troubles, as far as is good for them; their integrity and uprightness will preserve them. The upright in heart are safe, and ought to think themselves so, under the divine protection. 2. The general respect he has for justice and equity; God judgeth the righteous; he owns every righteous cause, and will maintain it in every righteous man, and will protect him. God is a righteous Judge, so some read it, who not only doeth righteousness himself, but will take care that righteousness be done by the children of men, and will avenge and punish all unrighteousness.

II. He is no less confident of the destruction of all his wicked persecutors, even as many of them as would not repent, to give glory to God. He reads their doom here, for their good, if possible, that they might cease from their enmity; or, however, for his own comfort, that he might not be afraid of them, nor aggrieved at their prosperity and success for a time. He goes into the sanctuary of God, and there understands, 1. That they are children of wrath; they are wicked, and are enemies. 2. The general respect which he has for justice and equity; God judgeth the righteous; he owns every righteous cause, and will maintain it in every righteous man, and will protect him. God is a righteous Judge, who not only doeth righteousness himself, but will take care that righteousness be done by the children of men, and will avenge and punish all unrighteousness. They are every day doing that which is provoking to him, and he resents it, and treasures it up against the day of wrath. As his mercies are new every morning toward his people, so his anger is new every morning against the wicked, upon the fresh occasions given for it by their renewed transgressions. God is angry with the wicked, even in the merriest and most prosperous of their days, even in the days of their devotion: for if they be suffered to prosper, it is in wrath; if they pray, their very prayers are turned into prayer against them. God abides upon them, (John iii. 36.) and continual additions are made to it. 2. That they are children of death, as all the children of wrath are; sons of perdition, marked out for ruin. See their destruction:

1. God will destroy them; the destruction they are reserved for is, destruction from the Almighty, which ought to be a terror to every one of us, for it comes from the wrath of God, (v. 15.) and is here intimated, [1.] That the destruction of sinners may be prevented by their conversion, for it is threatened, with that proviso; If he turn not from his evil way, if he do not let fall his enmity against the people of God, then let him expect it will be his ruin; but if he turn, it is implied that his sins shall be pardoned, and all shall be well. Thus even the threatenings of wrath are introduced with a gracious implication of mercy, enough to justify God for ever in the destruction of them that perish; they might have turned and lived, but they chose rather to go on and die, and their blood is therefore upon their own heads. [2.] That if it be not thus prevented by the conversion of the sinner, it will be prepared for him by the justice of God. In general, (v. 13.) He has prepared for him the instruments of death, of all that death which is the wages of sin. If God will slay, he will not want instruments of death for any creature; he has not the less and weakest may be made so when he pleases. First, Here is a variety of instruments, all which breathe threatenings and slaughter. Here is a sword which wounds and kills at hand, a bow and arrows which wound and kill at a distance, those who think to get out of the reach of God's vindictive justice. If the sinner flies from the iron weapon, yet the bow of steel shall strike him through, Job xxv. 24. Secondly, These instruments of death are all said to be made ready; God has them not to seek, but always at hand; judgments are prepared for scorners; Tothet is prepared of old. Thirdly, While God is preparing his instruments of death, he gives the sinners timely warning of their danger, and space to repent and prevent it. He is slow to punish, and long-suffering to us-ward, not willing that any should perish. Fourthly, The longer the destruction is delayed to give time for repentance, the sorer will it be, and the heavier will it fall, and lie for ever, if that time be not so improved, while God is waiting; the sword is in the whetting, and the bow in the drawing. Fifthly, The destruction of impenitent sinners, though it come slowly, yet comes surely; for it is ordained, they are of old ordained to it. Sixthly, Of all sinners, persecutors are set up as the fairest marks of divine wrath; against them, more than any other, God has ordained his arrows. They set God at defiance, but cannot set themselves out of the way of his arrows. (2.) They will destroy themselves, v. 14–16. The sinner is here described as taking a great deal of pains to ruin himself, more pains to damn his soul than, if directed aright, would save it. [1.] It is described by the pains of a labouring woman that brings forth a false conception, v. 14. The sinner's head with its politics concieves mischief, contrives it with a great deal of art, lays the plot deep, and keeps it close; the womb is her heart, for it is in her heart; its passions travails with iniquity, and is in pain to bring forth the malicious projects it is hatching against the people of God. But what does it come to when it comes to the birth? It is falsehood, it is a cheat upon himself, it is a lie in his right hand; he cannot compass what he intended; nor, if he gain his point, will he gain the satisfaction he promised himself; he brings forth wind; (Isa. xxxvi. 18.) stubble; (Isa. xxxvii. 11.) death, (James i. 15.) that is, falsehood. [2.] By the pangs of a labouring man, that works hard to dig a pit, and then falls into it, and perishes in it.
First, This is true, in a sense, of all sinners; they prepare destruction for themselves, by preparing themselves for destruction; loading themselves with guilt, and submitting themselves to their corruptions. Secondly. It is justly true of those, who, in cartvise mischief against the people of God, or against their neighbours; by the righteous hand of God it is made to return upon their own heads;
what they designed for the shame and destruction of others proves to be their own confusion.

Nor let us jest; forthis is true:

There is no a juster law than, That the author of a murderous contrivance should perish by it. Some apply it to Saul, who fell upon his sword.

In singing this psalm, we must do as David here does; (v. 17.) Praise the Lord according to his righteousness; give him the glory of that gracious protection under which he takes his afflicted people, and of that just vengeance with which he will pursue them that afflict them; thus we must sing to the praise of the Lord most high, who, when his enemies deal proudly, shows that he is above them.

PSALM VIII.
This psalm is a solemn meditation on, and adoration of,
the glory and greatness of God, of which we are all concerned to think highly and honourably. It begins and ends with the same acknowledgment of the transcendent excellency of God's name. It is proposed for proof, (v. v. 3, 4, 5.) for making known himself, and his great name to us, v. 1. II. For making use of the weakest of the children of men, by them to serve his own purposes, v. 2. III. For making even the heavenly bodies useful to man, v. 3, 4. IV. For making him to have dominion over the creatures in this lower world,
and thereby placing him but little lower than the angels,
v. 5-8. This psalm is, in the New Testament, applied to Christ, and the work of God in him. (1. Rom. xii.)
written over the doctrine given by the children of men to him, (v. 2. Matt. xxi. 16.) and the honour put upon the children of men by him, both in his humiliation, when he was made little lower than the angels, and in his exaltation, when he was crowned with glory and honour, v. 5. Heb. ii. 6-8. 1 Cor. xv. 27. When we are observing the glory of God in the kingdom of nature and Providence, we should be led by that, and through that, to the contemplation of his glory in the kingdom of grace.

To the chief musician upon Gittith. A psalm of David.

1. O LORD our Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth! who hast set thy glory above the heavens. 2. Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings hast thou ordained strength, because of thine enemies; that thou mightest cast all the enemy and the averger.

The psalmist here sets himself to give to God the glory due to his name. Dr. Hammond grounds a conjecture upon the title of this psalm, concerning the occasion of penning it. It is said to be upon Gittith, which is generally taken for the tune, or musical contents of which this psalm was to be sung;
but he renders it upon the Gittith, that is,
Goliath the Gittite, whom he vanquished and slew;
(1 Sam. xvii.) that enemy was stilled by him who was, in comparison, but a babe and a suckling.
The conjecture would be probable enough, but that we find two other psalms with the same title, lxxxi.
and lxxiv.

Two things David here admires,
1. How plainly God displays his glory himself,
v. 1. He addresses himself to God with all humility and reverence, as the Lord, and his people's Lord; O Lord, our Lord. If we believe that God is the Lord, we must approach and acknowledge him to be ours. He is ours, for he made us, protects us, and takes special care of us. He must be ours, for we are bound to obey him, and submit to him; we must own the relation, not only when we come to pray to God, as a plea with him to show us mercy, but when we come to praise him, as an argument with ourselves to give him glory: and we shall never think we can do that with affection enough, if we consider,

1. How bright God's glory shines even in this lower world; How excellent is his name in all the earth! The works of creation and Providence evince and proclaim to all the world, that there is an infinitive Being, the Fountain of all being, power, and perfection, the sovereign Ruler, powerful Protector, and bountiful Benefactor, of all the creatures. How great, how illustrious, how magnificent, is his name therein! This might and this glory is his name every where; (Rom. i. 20.) if they shut their eyes against it, that is their fault. There is no speech or language, but the voice of God's name either is heard in it, or may be. But this looks further, to the gospel of Christ, by which the name of God, as it is notified by divine revelation, which, before, was great in Israel only, came to be so in all the earth, the utmost ends of which have thus been made to see God's great salvation, Mark xv. 15, 16.

How much brighter it shines in the upper world; Thou hast set thy glory above the heavens.
(1.) God is infinitely more glorious and excellent than the noblest of creatures, and those that shine brightest. (2.) Whereas we on this earth only hear God's excellent name, and praise that, the angels and blessed spirits above see his glory, and praise that,
and yet he is exalted far above even their blessing and praise. (3) In the exaltation of the Lord Jesus Christ, God is stunningly bright. He is the Brightness of his Father's glory, and the express Image of his person, God set his glory above the heavens, far above all principalities and powers.

II. How powerfully he discovers it by the weak est of his creatures; (v. 2.) Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings hast thou ordained strength, or perfected praise, the praise of thy strength, Matth.
xxi. 16. This bespeaks the glory of God, 1. In the kingdom of nature. The care God takes of little children, (when they first come into the world, the most helpless of all animals,) the special protection they are under, and the provision nature has made for them, ought to be acknowledged by every one of us, to the glory of God, as a great instance of his power and goodness; and the more sensibly, because we have all had the benefit of it, for to this we owe it, that we died not from the womb, that the knees then prevented us, and the breasts, that we should suck. "This is such an instance of thy goodness, as may for ever put to silence the enemies of thy glory, who say, There is no God." 2. In the kingdom of Providence; in the government of this lower world he makes use of the children of men, some that know him, and others that do not, (Isa. xlv. 4.)
and these such as have been babes and sucklings;
now, sometimes he is pleased to serve his own purposes
by the ministry of such as are still, in wisdom and strength, little better than babes and sucklings. 3.
In the kingdom of grace, the kingdom of the Messiah. It is here foretold, that, by the apostles, who were looked upon but as babes, unlearned and ignorant men, (Acts iv. 13.) mean and despicable, and by the foolishness of their preaching, the Devil's kingdom should be thrown down, as Jericho's walls were thrown down by the vulgar populace, who, after the battle, called the arm of the Lord, and the rod of his strength; this was ordained to work wonders, not out of the mouth of philosophers or orators, politicians or statesmen, but of a company of poor fishermen, who lay under the greatest external disadvantages; yea, we hear children crying, Howanna to the Son of David, when the chief priests and Pharisees owned him not, but despised and rejected him, as a sinner; (Matt. xxvi. 16.) and by it still the enemy. Sometimes the grace of God appears wonderfully in young children, and he teaches them knowledge, and makes them to understand doctrine, who are but newly weaned from the milk, and drawn from the breasts, Isa. xxviii. 9. Sometimes the power of God brings to pass great things in his church by very weak and unlikely instruments, and confounds the wise and mighty, by the base, and weak, and foolish, things of the world, that no flesh might glory in his presence, but the excellency of the power might the more evidently appear to be of God, and not of man, 1 Cor. i. 27, 28. This he does, because of his enemies, because they are insolent and haughty, that he may still them, may put them to silence, and put them to shame, and so be justly avenged on the avengers; see Acts iv. 14.—v. 16. The Devil is the great enemy and avenger, and by the preaching of the gospel he was, in a great measure, still, his oracles were silenced, the advocates of his cause were confounded, and unclean spirits themselves not suffered to speak.

In singing this, let us give God the glory of his great name, and of the great things he has done by the power of his gospel, in the chariot of which the exalted Redeemer rides forth, conquering and to conquer, and ought to be attended, not only with our praises, but with our best wishes. Praise is perfected, God is in the highest degree glorified, when strength is ordained out of the mouth of babes and sucklings.

3. When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers; the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained; 4. What is man, that thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that thou visitest him? 5. For thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honour. 6. Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands: thou hast put all things under his feet: 7. All sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field; 8. The fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas. 9. O Lord our Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth!

David here goes on to magnify the honour of God, by recounting the honours he has put upon man, especially the man Christ Jesus. The condescension of God, in deeming himself fit to dwell among the elevations of the divine glory; how God has condescended in favour to man, the psalmist here observes with wonder and thankfulness, and recommends it to our thoughts. See here,

I. What it is that leads him to admire the condescending favour of God to man; it is his consideration of the lustre and influence of the heavenly bodies, which are within the view of sense; (v. 3.) I consider thy heavens, and there, particularly, the moon and the stars; why does he not take me, tice of the sun, which much excels them all? Probably because it was in a night-walk, by moonlight that the psalmist was moved to sing this psalm, and to make these considerations, with this meditation, when the sun was not within view, but only the moon and the stars, which, though they are not altogether so serviceable to man as the sun is, yet are no less demonstrations of the wisdom, power, and goodness, of the Creator. Observe, 1. It is our duty to consider the heavens. We see them, we cannot but see them; by this, among other things, man is distinguished from the rest of the creation. When the world was in its first state, that, while they are so framed as to look downward to the earth, man is made erect to look upward toward heaven; Or homini sublime dedit, calumque tuerti jussit.—To man he gave an erect countenance, and bade him gaze on the heavens, that thus he may be directed to set his affections on things above; for what we see has not its due influence upon us, unless we consider it. 2. We must always consider the heavens as God's heavens; not only as all the world is his, even the earth and the fulness thereof, but in a more peculiar manner; The heavens, even the heavens, are the Lord's, (cvxvi.) they are the place of the residence of his glory, and we are taught to call him Our Father in heaven. 3. They are therefore his, because they are the work of his fingers; he made them, he made them easily; the stretching out of the heavens needed not any outstretched arm, it was done with a word; he made them with very great curiosity and fineness, like a nice piece of work which the artist makes with his fingers. 4. Even the lesser lights, the moon and stars, show the glory and power of the Father of lights, and furnish us with matter for praise. 5. The heavenly bodies are not only the creatures of the divine power, but subject to the divine government; God not only made them, but ordained them; and the ordinances of heaven can never be altered. But how does this come in here, to magnify God's favour to man? (1.) When we consider how the glory of God shines in the upper world, we may well wonder that he should take cognizance of such a mean creature as man; that he who resides in that bright and blessed part of the creation, and governs it, should humble himself to behold the things done upon this earth; see cxiii. 5, 6. (2.) When we consider of what great use the heavens are to men on earth, and how the lights of heaven are divided among them, we may well say, "Lord, what is man, that thou shouldst settle the ordinances of heaven, with an eye to him and to his benefit, and that his comfort and convenience should be so much consulted in the making of the lights of heaven, and directing their motions?"

II. How he expresses this admiration; v. 4. "Lord, what is man! (Enoeh, sinful, weak, miserable, a creature not forgetful of his duty to thee, that thou art that great and full of honour, (so sinful a creature,) that he should be thus countenanced and favoured!"

Now this refers, 1. To mankind in general. Though man is a worm, and the son of man is a worm, (Job xxv. 6.) yet God puts a respect upon him, and shows him abundance of kindness; man is, above all the creatures in this lower world, the favourite and darling of Providence. For,

(1.) He is in a very honourable rank of beings.
We may be sure he takes place of all the inhabitants of this lower world, for he is made but a little lower than the angels, (v. 5.) lower indeed, because by his body he is allied to the earth, and to the beasts that perish, and yet by his soul, which is spiritual and immortal, he is superior to the highest angels, that he may be truly said to be but a little lower than they, and is in order next to them. He is but for a little while lower than the angels, while his great soul is cooped up in a house of clay, but the children of the resurrection shall be

PSALMS, IX.

(2.) He is endued with noble faculties and capacities; he that crowned him with glory and honour, he that gave him his being has distinguished him, and qualified him for a dominion over the inferior creatures; for, having made him wiser than the beasts of the earth, and the fowls of heaven, (Job xxxv. 11.) he has made him fit to rule them, and it is fit that they should be ruled by him. Man's reason is his crown of glory; let him not profane that crown by disturbing the use of it, nor forfeit that crown by acting contrary to its dictates.

(3.) He is exalted to a sovereign dominion over the inferior creatures, under God, and is constituted their lord. He that made them, and knows them, and whose own they are, has made man to have dominion over them, v. 6. His charter, by which he holds this royalty, bears equal date with his creation, (Gen. i. 28.) and was renewed after the flood, Gen. ix. 2. God has put all things under man's feet, that he might serve himself; not only of the labour, but of the productions and lives, of the inferior creatures; they are all delivered into his hand, nay, they are all put under his feet. He specifies some of the inferior animals; (v. 7. 8.) not only sheep and oxen, which man takes care of and provides for, but the beasts of the field, as well as those of the fowl, yea, and those creatures which are most at a distance from man, as the fowl of the air, yea, and the fish of the sea, which live in another element, and pass unseen through the paths of the seas. Man's arts to take these; much more the use of them are much stronger, and many of them are much swifter, than he, yet, one way or other, he is too hard for them, Jam. iii. 7. Every kind of beasts, and birds, and things in the sea, is tamed, and has been tamed; he has likewise liberty to use them as he has occasion; Rise, Peter, kill and eat, Acts x. 15. Every time we partake of fish or of fowl, we realize this dominion which man has over the works of God's hands; and it is a reason for our subjection to God, our chief Lord, and to his dominion over us.

2. But this refers, in a particular manner, to Jesus Christ; of him we are taught to expound it, (Heb. ii. 6-8.) where the apostle, to prove the sovereign dominion of Christ, both in heaven and in earth, shows that he is that man, that son of man, here spoken of, whom God has crowned with glory and honour, and made to have dominion over the works of his hands. And it was much more that the greatest favours that showed to the human race, and the greatest honour that ever was put upon the human nature, were exemplified in the incarnation and exaltation of the Lord Jesus; these far exceed the favours and honours done us by creation and providence, though they also are great, and far more than we deserve.

We have reason humbly to value ourselves by it, and thankfully to admire the grace of God in it.

(1.) That Jesus Christ assumed the nature of man, and in that nature humbled himself. He became the Son of man, a partaker of flesh and blood; being so, God visited him; which some apply to his sufferings for us, for it is said, (Heb. ii. 5.) For the suffering of death, a visitation in wrath, he was crowned with glory and honour. God visited him; having laid upon him the iniquity of us all, he reckoned with him for it, visited him with a rod and with stripes, that we by them might be healed. He was, for a little while, (so the apostle interprets it, much lower than the angels, when he took upon him the form of a servant, and made himself of no reputation.

(2.) That, in that nature, he is exalted to be Lord of all. God the Father exalted him, because he had humbled himself; crowned him with glory and honour, the glory which he had with him before the worlds were; set him at his own right hand; constituted him not only the Head of the church, but Head over all things to the church; and gave all things into his hand, intrusted him with the administration of the kingdom of providence, in conjunction with, and subserviency to, the kingdom of grace. All the creatures are put under his feet; and, even in the days of his flesh, he gave some specimen of his power over them, as when he commanded the winds and the seas, and appointed a fish to pay his tribute. With good reason, therefore, does the psalmist conclude as he began, Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth, which has been honoured with the presence of the Redeemer, and is still enlight ened by his gospel, and governed by his wisdom and power! In singing this, and praying it over, though we must not forget to acknowledge, with suitable affections, God's common favours to mankind, particularly in the serviceableness of the inferior creatures to us, we yet must especially set ourselves to give glory to our Lord Jesus, by confessing that he is Lord, submitting to him as our Lord, and waiting to see all these things put under him, and all his enemies made his footstool.

PSALM IX.

In this psalm, I. David praises God for pleading his cause, and giving him victory over his enemies and the enemies of his country, (v. 1. 6.) and calls upon others to join with him in his songs of praise, v. 11. II. He prays to God, that he might have still further occasion to praise him, for his own deliverances and the confusion of his enemies, v. 13. 14. 19. 20. III. He triumphs in the assurance he had of God's judging the world, (v. 7. 8.) protecting his oppressed people, (v. 9. 10. 16.) and bringing his and their implacable enemies to ruin, v. 15. 17. This is very applicable to the kingdom of the Messiah, the enemies of which have been, in part, destroyed already, and shall be yet more and more, till they all be made his footstool; which we are to assure ourselves of; that God may have the glory, and we may take the comfort.

To the chief musician upon Math-labben. A Psalm of David.

I WILL praise thee, O Lord, with my whole heart. I will show forth all thy marvellous works. 2. I will be glad and rejoice in thee: I will sing praise to thy name, O thou Most High. 3. When mine enemies are turned back, they shall fall and perish at thy presence. 4. For thou hast maintained my right and my cause, thou sattest in the throne judging right. 5. Thou hast rebuked the heathen, thou hast destroyed the wicked; thou hast put out their name for ever and ever. 6. O thou enemy! destructions are come to a perpetual end; and thou hast destroyed cities; their memorial is perished with them. 7. But the Lord shall endure for ever: he hath prepared his throne for judgment; 8. And he shall judge the world in righteousness, he shall minister judgment to the people in uprightness. 9. The Lord also will be a refuge for the oppressed, a refuge in times of trouble. 10. And they that know thy name will put their trust in thee: for thou, Lord, hast not forsaken them that seek thee.

The title of this psalm gives a very uncertain sound concerning the occasion of penning it. It is upon Muth-labben, which some make to refer to the death of Goliath, others of Nabai, others of Absalom; but I incline to think it signifies only some tune, or musical instrument, to which this psalm was intended to be sung; and that the enemies he is here triumphing in the defeat of, are the Philistines, and the other neighbouring nations that opposed his father in the throne, whom he contested with, and subdued, in the beginning of his reign, 2 Sam. vi. 8.

In these verses,

I. David excites and engages himself to praise God for his mercies, and the great things he had of late done for him and his government, v. 1, 2.

Note. 1. God expects suitable returns of praise from those for whom he has done marvellous works. 2. If we would praise God really, we must praise him in sincerity, with our hearts, and not only with our lips, and be lively and fervent in the duty, with our whole heart. 3. When we give thanks for some one particular mercy, we should take occasion thence to remember former mercies, and so to show forth all his marvellous works. 4. Holy joy is the life of thankful praise, as thankful praise is the language of holy joy; I will be glad and rejoice in thee. 5. If we mean to be glad in God only; I will be glad and rejoice in thee, not in the gift so much as in the Giver. 6. Joy and praise are properly expressed by singing psalms. 7. When God has showed himself to be above the proud enemies of the church, we must take occasion thence to give glory to him as the Most High.

8. The triumphs of the Redeemer ought to be the triumphs of the redeemed; see Rev. xii. 10.—xix. 5.

II. He acknowledges the almighty power of God, as that which the strongest and stoutest of his enemies were no way able to contest with, or stand before, v. 3. But, 1. They are forced to turn back; their policy and their courage fail them, so that they cannot, they dare not, push forward in their enterprises, but retire with precipitation. 2. When once they turn back, they fall and perish; even their retreat will be their ruin, and they will save themselves no more by flying than by fighting. If Haman begin to fall before Mor-decai, he is a lost man, and shall prevail no more; see Esth. vi. 13. 3. The presence of the Lord, and the glory of his power, are sufficient for the destruction of his and his people's enemies. That is easily done, which a man does with his very presence; with that, God confounds his enemies, such a presence is. This verse sets forth, when our Lord Jesus, with one word, I am he, made his enemies to fall back at his presence; (John xviii. 6.) he could, at the same time, have made them perish. 4. When the enemies of God's church are put to confusion, we must ascribe it to the power, not of instruments, but of his presence, and give him all the glory.

III. He gives to God the glory of his righteousness, in his appearing on his behalf; (v. 4.) Thou hast maintained my right and my cause, my righteous cause: when that came on, thou satest in the throne, judging right. Observe, 1. God sits in the throne of judgment; to him belongs to decide controversies, to determine appeals, to right the injured, and to punish the injuries; for he has said, Vengeance is mine. 2. We are sure that the judgment of God is according to truth, and that with him there is no unrighteousness. Far be it from God, that he should pervert justice. If there seems to us to be some irregularity in the present decisions of Providence, yet these, instead of shaking our belief of God's truthfulness, tend to strengthen the belief of the judgment to come, which will set all to rights. 3. Whoever disown and desert a just and injured cause, we may be sure that the righteous God will maintain it, and plead it with jealousy, and will never suffer it to be run down.

IV. He records, with joy, the triumphs of the God of heaven over all the powers of hell, and attends these triumphs with his praises, v. 5. By three steps the power and justice of God had proceeded against the heathen, and wicked people, who were enemies to the king God had lately set up upon his holy hill of Zion. 1. He had checked them; Thou hast rebuked the heathen; hast given them real proofs of thy displeasure against them. This he did, before he destroyed them, that they might have taken warning by the rebukes of Providence, and so have prevented their own destruction. (2.) He had cut them off; Thou hast destroyed cities, and rescued our nation from this great and strong nation, and some are made monuments of God's vindictive justice, and destructive power, in this world. (3.) He has buried them in oblivion and perpetual infamy; had put out their name for ever, that they should never be remembered with any respect.

V. He exults over the enemy whom God thus appears against; (v. 6.) Thou hast destroyed cities. Either, 1. Thou, O enemy, hast destroyed our cities, and all in them, in intention and imagination, that is, so far as the destination of them brought upon their country. It may be taken either way; for the psalmist will have the enemy to know. 1. That their destruction is just; and that God was but reckoning with them for all the mischief which they had done, and designed against his people. The malicious and vexatious neighbours of Israel, as the Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and Syrians, had made incursions upon them, and wrought destruction and slaughter, and forced them to fight their battles, and destroyed their cities, and done what they could to make their memorial perish with them; but now the wheel was turned upon them, their destructions of Israel were come to a perpetual end, they shall now cease to spoil, and must themselves be spoiled, Isa. xxxiii. 1. 2. That it is total and final, such a destruction as should make a perpetual end of them, so that the very memorial of their cities should perish with them. So devouring a time is, and much more, such desolations do the righteous judgments of God make upon sinners, that great and populous cities have been reduced to such ruins, that their very memorial is perished, and those who have sought them could not find where they stood; but we look for a city that has stronger foundations.

VI. He comforts himself, and others, in God, and pleases himself in God. 1. With the thoughts of his eternity. On this earth we see nothing durable, even strong cities are buried in rubbish, and forgotten; but the Lord shall endure for ever, v. 7. There is no change of his being; his felicity, power, and perfection, are out of the reach of all the combined forces of hell and earth; they may put an end to our liberties, our privileges, our lives, but our God is still the same, and sits even upon the floods, unshaken, undisturbed, xxxi. 10.—vii. 2. 2. With the thoughts of his sovereignty both in
14. He has prepared his throne, has fixed it by his infinite wisdom, has fixed it by his infinite counsel. It is the great support and solace of good people, when the power of the church's enemies is threatening, and the posture of its affairs melancholy and perplexed, that God now rules the world, and will shortly judge the world.

3. With the thoughts of his justice and righteousness in all the administrations of his government. He does all, every day, he will do all; at the last day, according to the eternal, unalterable, rules of equity; (v. 8.) He shall judge the world, all persons and all controversies, shall minister judgment to the people, shall determine their lot both in this and in the future state, in righteousness and in uprightness, so that there shall not be the least colour of exception against it.

4. With the thoughts of that peculiar favour which God bears to his own people, and the special protection which he takes them under. The Lord, who endures for ever, is their everlasting Strength and Protection; he that judges the world, will be sure to judge for them, when at any time they are injured or distressed; (v. 9.) He will be a refuge for the oppressed; a high place, a strong place, for the oppressed, in time of trouble. It is the lot of God's people to be oppressed in this world, and to have troublesome times appointed to them; perhaps God may not immediately appear for them as their Deliverer and Avenger; but, in the midst of their distresses, they may by faith fly to him as their Refuge, and may depend upon his power and promise for their safety, so that no real hurt shall be done them.

5. With the thoughts of that sweet satisfaction and repose of mind which they have, that make God their Refuge; (v. 10.) "They that know thy name, will put their trust in thee, as I have done;" (for the grace of God is the same in all the saints,) "and then they will find, as I have found, that thou dost not forsake them that seek thee;" for the glory of God is the same towards all the saints.

Note, (1.) The better God is known, the more he is trusted. Those who know him to be a God of infinite wisdom, will trust him farther than they can see him: (Job xxxv. 14.) Those who know him to be a God of all mighty power, will trust him when creature-confidence fails, and they have nothing else to trust to, (2 Chron. xx. 12.) and those who know him to be a God of infinite grace and goodness, will trust him, though he slay them; (Job xiv. 14.) Those who know him to be a God of inviolable truth and faithfulness, will rejoice in his word of promise, and rest upon that, though the performance be deferred, and intermediate providences seem to contradict it. Those who know him to be the Father of spirits, and an everlasting Father, will trust him with their souls as their main care, and trust in him at all times, even to the end. (2.) The more God is trusted, the more he is sought unto prayer, shall be with him by faithful and fervent prayer, and by a constant care to approve ourselves to him in the whole course of our conversation. (3.) God never did, nor ever will, disown or desert any that duly seek to him, and trust in him. Though he afflict them, he does not leave them comfortless; though he seem to forsake them for a while, yet he will gather them with everlasting mercies.

11. Sing praises to the Lord, which dwelleth in Zion: declare among the people his doings. 12. When he maketh inquisition for blood, he remembereth them: he forgettest not the cry of the humble. 13. Have mercy upon me, O Lord; consider my trouble which I suffer of them that hate me, thou that liestest me up from the gates of death: 14. That I may show forth all thy praise in the gates of the daughter of Zion: I will rejoice in thy salvation. 15. The heathen are sunk down in the pit that they made; in the net which they hid is their own foot taken. 16. The Lord is known by the judgment which he executeth: the wicked is snared in the work of his own hands. Higgaion. Selah. 17. The wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the nations that forget God. 18. For the needy shall not always be forgotten: the expectation of the poor shall not perish for ever. 19. Arise, O Lord: let not man prevail; let the heathen be judged in thy sight. 20. Put them in fear, O Lord; that the nations may know themselves to be but men. Selah.

In these verses, I. David, having praised God himself, calls upon and inquires others to praise him likewise, v. 11. Those who believe God is ready to be praised, not only desire to do that work better themselves, but desire that others also may join with them in it, and would gladly be instrumental to bring them to it; Sing praises to the Lord which dwelleth in Zion. As the special residence of his glory is in heaven, so the special residence of his grace is in his church, of which Zion was a type: there he meets his people with his promises and graces, and there he expects they should meet him with their praises and services. In all our praises, we should have an eye to God as dwelling in Zion, in a special manner present in the assemblies of his people, as their Protector and Patron. He resolved himself to show forth God's marvellous works, (v. 1.) and here he calls upon others to declare among the people his doings: he commands his own subjects to do it, for the honour of God, of their country, and of their holy religion; he courts his neighbours to do it; to sing praises, not, as hitherto, to their false gods, but to Jehovah who dwelleth in Zion, to the God of Israel, and to own among the heathen, that the Lord has done great things for his people Israel, xxxvi. 3, 4. Let them particularly take notice of the justice of God in avenging the blood of his people Israel on the Philistines, and their other wicked neighbours, who had, in making war upon them, used them barbarously, and given them no quarter, v. 12. When God comes to make inquisition for blood by his judgments on earth, before he comes to do it by the judgment of the great day, he remembers them, remembers every drop of the innocent blood which they have shed, and will return it sevenfold upon the head of the blood-thirsty; he will give them blood to drink, for they are worthy. This assurance he might well build upon that word, (Deut. xxxii. 43.) He will avenge the blood of his servants, and the blood of his martyrs. There is a day of blood; God will make inquisition for blood, when he will discover what has been shed secretly, and avenge what it has been shed unjustly; see Isa. xxvi. 21. Jer. li. 35. In that day, it will appear how precious the blood of God's people is to him, (xxxii. 14.) when it must all be accounted for. It will then appear that he has not forgotten the cry of the humble, neither the cry of their blood, nor the cry of their prayers, but that both are sealed up among his treasures.
II. David, having praised God for former mercies and deliverances, earnestly prays that God would still appear for him; for he sees not yet all things put under him. He prays, (1.) That God would be compassionate to him; (v. 13.) Have mercy upon me, O Lord, for I am in trouble; and he makes thus a general and general prayer for mercy, to be spoken for me, must depend upon mere mercy for relief." 2. That he would be concerned for him; he is not particular in his request, lest he should seem to prescribe to God; but refers himself to the wisdom and will of God, in this modest request; "Lord, consider my trouble, and do for me as thou thinkest fit." He pleads, (1.) The malice of his enemies, the trouble which he suffered of them that hated him, and those that envied his prosperity. (2.) That experience he had of divine succors, and the expectation he now had of the continuance of them, as the necessity of his case required; "O thou that liestest me up, that canst do it, that hast done it, that wilt do it, whose prerogative it is to lift up thy people from the gates of death." We are never brought so low, so near to death, but God can raise us up. If he has saved us from spiritual and eternal death, we may hence take encouragement of the power and grace of God, and have all other occasion of good cheer and very pleasant help to us. (3.) His sincere purpose to praise God, when his victories should be completed; (v. 14.) "Lord, save me; not that I may have the comfort and credit of it, but that thou mayest have the glory, that I may show forth all thy praise, and that publicly, in the gates of the daughter of Zion;" there God was said to dwell, (v. 11.) and there David would attend him, with joy in God's salvation, typical of the great salvation which was to be wrought out by the Son of David.

III. David by faith foresees and foretells the certain ruin of all wicked people, both in this world and in that to come. 1. In this world, v. 15, 16. God executes judgment upon them, when the measure of their iniquities is full, and does it so, as, (1.) To put shame upon them, and make their fall inglorious; for they sink into the pit which they themselves dugged, (viii. 15.) they are taken in the net which they themselves laid for the entangling of God's people, and they are snared in the work of their own hands. In all the struggles David had with the Philistines, they were the aggressors, 2 Sam. v. 17, 22. And other nations were subdued by those wars in which they embroiled themselves. The overruling providence of God frequently so orders it, that their persecutors and oppressors are brought to ruin by those very projects which they intended to be destructive to the people of God. Drunkards kill themselves; prodigals beggar themselves; the contentious bring mischief upon themselves; and thus men's sins may be read in their punishment, and it becomes visible to all, that the destruction of sinners is not only meritoriously, but efficiently, of themselves, which will fill them with the utmost confusion. (2.) So as to get honour to himself; "The Lord is known, he makes himself known to them that hate him, and is feared by them that hate him;" which is known that there is a God who judges in the earth; that he is a righteous God, and one that hates sin, and will punish it. In these judgments, the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men. The psalmist, therefore, adds here, a note extraordinary, commanding special regard, Heighson; it is a thing to be carefully observed and meditated upon. What we see of the judgments and what we believe of the judgment to come, ought to be the subject of our frequent and serious meditations. 2. In the other world; (v. 17.) The wicked shall be turned into hell, as captives into the prison-house, even all the nations that forget God. Note, (1.) Forgetfulness of God is the cause of all the wickedness of the wicked. (2.) There are nations of those that forget God, multitudes that live without God in the world, many great and many mighty nations, that never regard him, nor desire the knowledge of his ways. (3.) Hell will, at last, be the portion of these, and their portion is to be tormented and tormented; *Sheol, a pit of destruction, in which they and all their comforts will be for ever lost and buried. Though there be nations of them, yet they shall be turned into hell, like sheep into the slaughter-house; (xlii. 14.) and their being so numerous, will neither be any security or ease to them, nor any loss to God, or the least impeachment of his goodness.

IV. David prays that the righteous people of God may wait for his salvation, though it should be long deferred, v. 18. The needy may think themselves, and others may think them, forgotten for a while, and their expectation of help from God may seem to have perished, and to have been for ever frustrated; but he that believes does not make haste; the vision is for an appointed time, and at the end it shall speak: we may build upon it as undeniably true, that God's people, God's elect shall not always be neglected by him, and shall not be without hopes from the promise. God will not only remember them, at last, but will make it appear that he never did forget them; it is impossible he should, though a woman may forget her sucking child.

V. He concludes with prayer, that God would humble the pride, break the power, and blast the projects, of all the wicked enemies of his church; "Arise, O Lord, (v. 19.) stir up thyself, exert thy power, take thy seat, and deal with all these proud and daring enemies of thy people, and cause, and people." 1. "Lord, restrain them, and set bounds to their malice. Let not man prevail, consult thine own honour, and let not weak and mortal men prevail against the kingdom and interest of the almighty and immortal God. Shall mortal man be too hard for God, too strong for his Maker?" 2. "Lord, reckon with them, let the heathen be judged in thy sight, let them be plainly called to an account for all the dishonour done to thee, and the mischief done to thy people." Impenitent sinners will be punished in God's sight; and, when their day of grace is over, the bowels even of infinite mercy will not relent toward them, Rev. xiv. 10. 3. *"Put them in fear, O Lord; (v. 20.) strike a terror upon them, make them afraid with thy judgments. God knows how to make the strongest and stoutest of men to tremble, and to flee when none pursues; and thereby he makes them know and own that they are but men, and God is the most weak men, unable to stand before the holy God; sinful men, the guilt of whose consciences makes them subject to alarms. Note, It is a very desirable thing, much for the glory of God, and the peace and welfare of the universe, that men should know, and consider, themselves to be but men, depending creatures, mutable, mortal, and accountable. In singing this, we must give to God the glory of his justice; in pleading by man, we must turn his and their enemies, and encourage ourselves to wait for the year of the redeemed and the year of recompenses for the controversy of Zion, even the final destruction of all anti-Christian powers and factions, to which many of the ancients apply this psalm.

PSALM X.

The Septuagint translation joins this psalm with the ninth, and makes them but one; but the Hebrew makes it a distinct psalm; the scope and style are certainly different. In this psalm, David complains of the wickedness of the wicked, describes the dreadful wrath of God against sin, and what his and their enemies, and encourage ourselves to wait for the year of the redeemed and the year of recompenses for the controversy of Zion, even the final destruction of all anti-Christian powers and factions, to which many of the ancients apply this psalm.
people) and notices the delay of God's appearing against them, v. 1.-11. 11. He prays to God to appear against them for the relief of his people, and comforts himself with the hopes that he would do so in due time, v. 12.-18.

1. Wh
dy standest thou afar off, O Lord? why hidest thou thyself in times of trouble? 2. The wicked in his pride doth persecute the poor: let them be taken in the devices that they have imagined. 3. For the wicked boasteth of his heart's desire, and blesseth the covetous, whom the Lord abhorreth. 4. The wicked, through the pride of his countenance, will not seek after God: God is not in all his thoughts. 5. His ways are always grievous; thy judgments are far above out of his sight: as for all his enemies, he puffeth at them. 6. He hath said in his heart, I shall not be moved: for I shall never be in adversity. 7. His mouth is full of cursing and deceitful fraud; under his tongue is mischief and vanity. 8. He sitteth in the lurking-places of the villages; in the secret places doth he murder the innocent: his eyes are privily set against the poor. 9. He lieth in wait secretly, as a lion in his den: he lieth in wait to catch the poor: he doth catch the poor, when he draweth him into his net. 10. He crougeth, and humbleth himself, that the poor may fall by his strong ones. 11. He hath said in his heart, God hath forgotten: he hideth his face; he will never see it.

David, in these verses, discovers,

I. A very great affection to God and his favour; for, in the time of trouble, that which he complains of most feelingly, is, God's withdrawing his gracious presence; (v. 1.) "Why standest thou afar off, as one unconcerned in the indignities done to thy name, and the injuries done to thy people?" Note, God's withdrawals are very grievous to his people at any time, but especially in times of trouble. Outward deliverance is afar off, and is hidden from us, and then we think God is afar off, and we therefore want inward comfort; but that is our own fault, it is because we judge by outward appearance, we stand afar off from God by our unbelief, and then we complain that God stands afar off from us.

II. A very great indignation against sin, the sins that made the time perilous, 2 Tim. iii. 1. He beholds the transgressors, and is grieved, is amazed, and brings to his heavenly Father their evil report: not in a way of vain-glory, boasting before God that he was not as these publicans, (Luke xviii. 11.) nor in the sense of any personal resentments, piques, or passions, of his own; but as one that laid to heart that which is offensive to God, and all good men, and earnestly desired a reformation of manners. Passionate and satirical invectives against bad men do more hurt than good; if we will speak of their badness, let it be to God in prayer, for he alone can make them better.

This long representation of the wickedness of the wicked, is here summed up in the first words of it, (v. 2.) The wicked in his pride doth persecute the poor; where two things are laid to their charge, pride and persecution; the former the cause of the latter. Proud men will have all about them to be of their mind, of their religion, to say as they say, to submit to their dominion, and acquiesce in their dictates; and those that either eclipse them, or will not yield to them, they malign, and hate with an inveterate hatred. Tyranny, both in state and church, owes its original to pride. The psalmist, having thus described a short prayer, a prayer in a parenthesis; which is an advantage, and no prejudice to the sense; Let them be taken, as proud people often are, in the devices that they have imagined, v. 2. Let their counsels be turned headlong, and let them fall headlong by them.

These two heads of the charge are here enlarged upon.

1. They are proud, very proud, and extremely conceited of themselves; justly, therefore, did he wonder that God did not speedily appear against them, for he hates pride, and resists the proud. (1.) The sinner proudly glories in his power and success. He boasts of his heart's desire, boasts that he can do all he pleases, (as if God himself could not control him,) and that he has all he wished for, and has carried his point. Ephraim said, I am become rich, I have found me out substance, Hos. xi. 8. "Now, Lord, is it for thy glory to suffer a sinful man thus to pretend to the sovereignty and felicity of a God?"

(2.) He proudly contradicts the judgment of God, which, we are sure, is according to truth; for he blesses the covetous, whom the Lord abhors. See how God and men differ in their sentiments of persons; God abhors covetous worldlings, who make money their god, and idolize it; he looks upon them as his enemies, and will have no communion with them; The love of money is the root of all evil. But proud persecutors bless them, and approve their sayings, xliv. 13. They applaud them as wise, whom God pronounces foolish; (Luke xii. 20.) they justify them as innocent, whom God condemns as deeply guilty before him; and they admire them as happy in having their portion in this life, whom God declares, upon that account, truly miserable; Thou, in thy lifetime, receivedst what good things doth God.

(3.) He proudly casts off the thoughts of God, and all dependence upon him, and devotion to him; (v. 4.) the wicked, through the pride of his countenance, that pride of his heart which appears in his very countenance, (Prov. vi. 17.) will not seek after God; nor entertain the thoughts of him; God is not in all his thoughts, not in any of them. All his thoughts are, that there is no God. See here, [1.] The nature of impiety and irreligion; it is, not seeking after God, and not having him in our thoughts. No inquiry is made after him, (Job xxxv. 10. Jer. ii. 6.) there is no desire toward him, no communion with him, and a secret wish to have no dependence upon him, and not to be beholden to him. Wicked people will not seek after God, that is, will not call upon him; they live without prayer, and that is living without God. They have many thoughts, many projects and devices, but no thoughts about God, no dependence on God; they are not pious, they are not religious.

[2.] The cause of this impiety and irreligion; and that is pride. Men will not seek after God, because they think they have no need of him, their own hands are sufficient for them; they think it a thing below them to be religious, because religious people are few, and mean, and despised, and the restraints of religion will be a disparagement to them.

(4.) He proudly makes light of God's commandments and judgments; (v. 5.) His ways are always grievous; he is very daring and resolute in his sinful courses, he will have his way, though ever so tiresome to himself, and vexatious to others; he travails with pain in his wicked courses, and yet his pride makes him wilful and obstinate in them. God's judgments (what he commands, and what he threatens for the breach of his commands) are above of his sight; he is not sensible of his duty by the law of God, nor of his danger by the wrath and curse of God. Tell him of God's authority over him, he turns it off with this, that he never saw God, and therefore does not know that there is a God; he is in the height of heaven, and Quære supra nos nihil ad nos—We have nothing to do with them. 2. He turns the name of God's judgments, will be executed upon those that persist on still in their trespasses, and he will not be convinced that there is any reality in them; they are far above of his sight, and therefore he thinks they are mere bugbears.

(5.) He proudly despises all his enemies, and looks upon them with the utmost disdain; he puffs at them whom God is preparing to be a scourge and ruin to him, as if he couldûttle them all, and was able to make them of no great worth to him. But as it is impolitic to despise an enemy, so it is impious to despise any instrument of God's wrath.

(6.) He proudly sets trouble at defiance, and is confident of the continuance of his own prosperity; (v. 6.) He hath said in his heart, and pleased himself with the thought, I shall not be moved; my goods are laid up for many years, and I shall never be in adversity: like Babylon, that said, I shall be a lady for ever, Isa. xlvii. 7. Rev. xviii. 7. Those are nearest ruin, who thus set it furthest from them. 2. They are persecutors, cruel persecutors: for the gratifying of their pride and covetousness, and, in opposition to God and religion, they are very oppressive to all within their reach. Observe, concerning these persecutors:

(1.) That they are very bitter and malicious; (v. 7.) His mouth is full of cursing. Those he cannot do a real mischief to, yet he will spit his venom at, and breathe out the slaughter which he cannot execute. Thus have God's faithful worshippers been anathematized, and cursed, with bell, book, and candle. Where there is a heart full of malice, there is commonly a mouth full of curses.

(2.) That they are very false and treacherous. There is mischief designed, but it is hid under the tongue, not to be discerned, for his mouth is full of deceit and vanity; he has learned of the Devil to deceive, and so to destroy; with this his hatred is covered, Prov. xxvi. 26. He cares not what lies he tells, nor what oaths he breaks, nor what arts of dissimulation he uses to compass his ends.

(3.) That they are very cunning and crafty in carrying on their designs. They have ways and means that they intend, that they may the more effectually accomplish it. Like Esau, that cunning hunter, he sits in the lurking places, in the secret places, and his eyes are privy set to do mischief; (v. 8.) not because he is ashamed of what he does, (if he blushed, there were some hopes he would repent,) nor because he is afraid of the wrath of God, for he imagines God will never call him to an account, (v. 11.) but because his heart is afraid, lest the discovery of his designs should be the breaking of his head. Perhaps he refers particularly to robbers and highwaymen, who lie in wait for honest travellers, to make a prey of them and what they have.

(4.) That they are very cruel and barbarous. Their malice is against the innocent, who never provoked them; against the poor, who cannot resist them; and over whom it will be no glor'y to triumph. Those are perfectly lost to all honesty and honour, against whose mischievous designs neither innocence nor poverty will be any man's security. Those that have power, ought to protect the innocent, and provide for the poor; yet he will be the destroyer of them when God shall have occasion to be. And what do they aim at? It is to catch the poor, and draw them into their net, get them into their power only, to strip them only, but to murder them; they hunt for the precious life. They are God's poor people that they are persecuting, against whom they bear a mortal hatred, for his sake whose they are, and whose image they bear, and therefore they lie in wait to murder them; he lies in wait as a lion that thirsts after blood, and feeds with pleasure upon the prey. The Devil, whose agent he is, is compared to a roaring lion, that seeks not what, but whom, he may devour.

(5.) That they are base and hypocritical; (v. 10.) He crouches, and humbles himself, as beasts of prey do, that they may get their prey within their reach. This intimates, that the sordid spirits of persecutors and oppressors will stoop to any thing, though ever so mean, for the compassing of their wicked designs; witness the scandalous practices of Saul, when he hunted David. It intimates, besides, that they cover their malicious designs with the appearance of meekness and humility, and kindness to those they design the greatest mischief to; they seem to humble themselves, as if to take cognizance of the poor, and concern themselves in their concerns, when it is in order to make them fail, to make a prey of them.

(6.) That they are very impious and atheistical. v. 11. They could not thus break through all the laws of justice and goodness toward man, if they had not first shaken off all sense of religion, and risen up in rebellion against the light of its most sacred and self-evident principles; He hath said in his heart, God has forgotten. When his own conscience rebuked him for his wickedness, and threatened him with the consequences of it, and asked, how he would answer it to the righteous Judge of heaven and earth, he turned it off with this, God has forsaken the earth, Ezek. viii. 12.—ix. 9. This is a blasphemous reproach. [1.] Upon God's omniscience and providence, as if he could not, or did not, see what men do in this lower world. [2.] Upon his holiness and the rectitude of his nature, as if, though he did see, yet he did not dislike, but was willing to connive at, the most unnatural and inhuman villanies. [3.] Upon his justice and the equity of his government, as if, though he did see and dislike the wickedness of the wicked, yet he would never reckon with them, nor punish them for it, either because he could not, or durst not, or was not inclined to it. Let those that suffer by proud oppressors, hope that God will, in due time, appear for them; for those that are abusive to them, are abusive to God Almighty too.

In singing this, and praying it over, we should have our hearts much affected with a holy indignation at the wickedness of those that cast into their power compassion for the oppressed, and a pious zeal for the glory and honour of God, with a firm belief that he will, in due time, right the injured, and reckon with the injurious.

12. Arise, O Lord; O God, lift up thy hand: forget not the humble. 13. Wherefore doth the wicked contemn God? he hath said in his heart, Thou wilt not require it. 14. Thou hast seen it; for thou beheld est mischief and spite, to requite it with thy hand: the poor committed himself unto
15. Break thou the arm of the wicked and the evil man: seek out his wickedness till thou find none. 16. The Lord is King for ever and ever: the heathen are perished out of his land. 17. Lord, thou hast heard the desire of the humble: thou wilt prepare their heart; thou wilt cause thine ear to hear; 18. To judge the fatherless and the oppressor, that the man of the earth may no more oppress.

David here, upon the foregoing representation of the inhumanity and impiety of the oppressors, gives an address to God: Wherein observe 1. What he cries for; 1. That God would himself appear; (v. 12.) "Arise, O Lord; O God, lift up thine hand, manifest thy presence and providence in the affairs of this lower world. Arise, O Lord, to the confusion of those who say that thou hiddest thy face. Manifest thy power, exert it for the maintaining of thine own cause, lift up thine hand to give a fatal blow to these oppressors; let thine everlasting arm be made bare. 2. That he would appear for his people; "Forget not the humble, the afflicted, that are poor, that are made poorer, and are poor in spirit. Their oppressors, in their presumption, say that thou hast forgotten them; and they, in their despair, are ready to say the same; Lord, make it to appear that they are both mistaken." 3. That he would appear against their persecutors, v. 15. (1.) That he would disable them to do any further mischief, Break thou the arm of the wicked, take away his sport, and his delights. 4. That he would design and ordain the people to be ensnared, Job xxxiv. 30. We read of oppressors whose dominion was taken away, but their lives were prolonged, (Dan. vii. 12.) that they might have time to repent. (2.) That he would deal with them for the mischief they had done; "Seek out his wickedness; let that be all brought to light, which he thought should for ever lie undiscovered; let that be all brought to account, which he thought should for ever go unpunished. 5. That all the fruits of his evil deeds remain unreckoned for, none of his designs undeceived, and none of his partisans indestructed.

II. What he pleads, for the encouraging of his own faith in these petitions.

1. He pleads the great affronts which these proud oppressors put upon God himself; "Lord, it is thine own cause that we beg thou wouldest appear in, the enemies have made it so, and therefore it is not for thy glory to let them go unpunished;" (v. 13.) Wherefore do the wicked contends God? He does so; for he says, "Thou wilt not require it; thou wilt never call us to an account for what we do;" than which they could not put a greater indignity upon the righteous God. The psalmist here speaks with astonishment, (1.) At the wickedness of the wicked; "Why do they speak so impiously, why so abominably? It is a great trouble to good men, to think what contempt the wicked cast by the sin of sinners, upon his precepts, his promises, his threatenings, his favours, his judgments; all are despised and made light of. Wherefore do the wicked thus contend God? It is because they do not know him. (2.) At the patience and forbearance of God toward them; "Why are they suffered thus to contend God? Why does he not immediately vindicate himself, and take vengeance upon them?" It is because the day of reckoning is yet to come, when the measure of their iniquity is full.

2. He pleads the notice God took of the impiety and iniquity of these oppressors; (v. 14.) "Do the persecutors encourage themselves with a groundless fancy, that thou wilt never see it? Let the persecuted encourage themselves with a well-grounded faith, not only that thou hast seen it, but that thou dost behold it, even all the mischief that is done by the hands, and all the spite and malice that lurk in the hearts of these oppressors; it is all known to thee. 15. Thy hand is cast upon the Lord's adversaries, they have seen it, and dest behold it, but thou wilt require it, wilt recompense it into their bosoms, by thy just and avenging hand."

3. He pleads the dependence which the oppressor had upon him; "The poor commits himself unto thee, each of them does so, I among the rest. They rely on thee, as their Patron and Protector, they refer themselves to thee as their Judge, in whose determination they acquiesce, and at whose disposal they are entire. He that beareth his cause to thee," (so some read it,) "not prescribing, but subscribing, to thy wisdom and will. They thus give thee honour, as much as their oppressors dishonour thee. They are thy willing subjects, and put themselves under thy protection; therefore protect them."

4. He pleads the relation in which God is pleased to stand to us. (1.) As a great God, he is King for ever and ever. (2.) He is the Helper of the fatherless, he is the Judge, he is to administer justice for the restraint and terror of evil-doers, and the protection and praise of them that do well. To whom should the injured subjects appeal, but to the sovereign? Help, my Lord, O King; Avenger me of mine adversary. "Lord, let all that pay homage and tribute to thee as their King, have the benefit of thy government, and find thee their Refuge. Thou art an everlasting King, which no earthly prince is, and therefore canst and oughtest to be respected, and to be obeyed, and judged in all matters; to be a Father to the fatherless, (lxvii. 5.) a Helper of the helpless."

5. He pleads the experience which God's church and people had of God's readiness to appear for them. (1.) He had dispersed and extirpated their enemies; (v. 16.) The heathen are perished out of his land; the remainder of the Canaanites, the seven devoted nations, which have long been as thorns in the eyes, and goads in the sides, of Israel, are now, at length, utterly rooted out; and that is an encouragement to us to hope that God will, in like manner, break the arm of the oppressive Israelites, that were, in some respects, worse than heathens. (2.) He had heard and answered their prayers; (v. 17.) "Lord, thou hast many a time heard the desire of the humble, and never saidst to a distressed suppliant, Seek, in vain. Why may not we hope for the continuance and repetition of the wonders, the favours, which our fathers told us of?"

6. He pleads their expectations from God, pursuant to their experience of him, "Thou hast heard, therefore thou wilt cause thine ear to hear, as vi. 9. Thou art the same, and thy power, and promise, and relation, to thy people the same; and the work and workings of grace are the same in them; why therefore may we not hope that he who has been, will still be, will ever be, a God hearing prayer? They observe, (1.) In what method God hears prayer. He first prepares the heart of his people, and then gives them an answer of peace; or may we expect his gracious answer, but in this way; so that God's working upon us, is the best earnest of his working for us. He prepares the heart for prayer, by kindling holy desires, and strengthening our most holy faith, fixing the thoughts, and raising the affections, and then he graciously accepts the prayer; he prepares the heart for the mercy itself that is wanting and prayed for; makes us fit to receive it, and use it well, and then gives it unto us. The preparation of the heart is from the Lord, and we must seek unto him for it, (Prov. xvi. 1.) and take that as a leading favour. (2.) What he will do, in answer to prayer, v. 18. [1.] He will plead the cause of the persecuted; will judge the fatherless and oppressed, will judge for them, clear up their innocency, restore their comforts, and recompense them for all the loss and damage they have sustained. [2.] He will put an end to the fury of the persecutors. Hitherto they shall come, but no further; here shall the proud waves of their malice be stayed; an effectual course shall be taken that the man of the earth may no more oppress. See how light the psalmist now makes of the power of that proud persecutor, whom he had been describing in this psalm, and how slightly he speaks of him, now that he had been considering God's sovereignty. First, He is but a man of the earth, a man out of the earth, so the word is; sprung out of the earth, and therefore mean, and weak, and hastening to the earth again. Why then should we be afraid of the fury of the oppressor, when he is but man that shall die, a son of man that shall be as grass? Isa. li. 12. He that protects us, is the Lord of heaven; he that persecuteth us, but a man of the earth. Secondly, God has him in a chain, and can easily restrain the remainder of his wrath, so that he cannot do what he would. When God speaks the javelin shall be his instruments, no more deceptive, (Rev. xx. 2.) no more oppressive. In singing these verses, we must commit religion's just, but injured, cause to God, as those that are heartily concerned for its honour and interests, believing that he will, in due time, plead it with jealousy.

PSALMS XI.

In this psalm we have David's struggle with, and triumph over, a strong temptation to distrust God, and betake himself to indirect means for his own safety in a time of danger. It is supposed to have been penned when he began to feel the resentments of Saul's envy, and had had the javelin in his hand, and the throne of Saul on his mind. He was then advised to run his country. "No," says he, "I trust in God, and therefore will keep my ground." Observe, I. How he represents the temptation, and perhaps parleys with it, v. 1. 3. If. How he answers it, and puts it to silence, with the consideration of God's dominion and providence, (v. 4.) his favour to the righteous, and the wrath which the wicked are reserved for, v. 5. 6. 7. In time of public fears, when the insults of the church's enemies were directly threatening, it will be profitable to meditate on this psalm.

To the chief musician. A psalm of David.

1. In the Lord put I my trust: how say ye to my soul, Fly as a bird to your mountain? 2. For, lo, the wicked bend their bow, they make ready their arrow upon the string, that they may privily shoot at the upright in heart. 3. If the foundations be destroyed, what can the righteous do?

Here is,

1. David's fixed resolution to make God his confidence; In the Lord put I my trust, v. 1. Those that truly fear God, and serve him, are welcome to put their trust in him, and shall not be made ashamed of their doing so. And it is the character of the saints, who have taken God for their God, that they make him their Hope: even when they have other things to stay themselves upon, yet they do not, they dare not, stay upon them, but on God only; gold is not their hope, nor horses and chariots their confidence, but God and his help. He speaks of a time when second causes frown, yet their hopes do not fail them, because the First Cause is still the same, is ever so. The psalmist, before he gives an account of the temptation he was in to distrust God records his resolution to trust in him, as that which he was resolved to live and die by.

2. His resentment of a temptation to the contrary; "How say ye to my soul, which has thus returned to God as its Rest, and reposes in him, Fly as a bird to your mountain? to be safe there out of the reach of the fowler." This may be taken, either,

(1.) As the serious advice of his timorous friends, so many understand it, and with great probability. Some, that were hearty well-wishers to David, when they saw how much Saul was exasperated against him, and how maliciously he sought his life, pressed him by all means to flee for the same to some place of shelter, and not depend on much of the divine help, which, if the psalmist's thought, was more likely to occasion the loss of his head than to save it. That which grieved him in this motion, was not that to flee now would savour of cowardice, and ill become a soldier, but that it would savour of unbelief, and would ill become a saint, who had so often said, In the Lord put I my trust. Taking it thus, the two following verses contain the reason with which these faint-hearted friends of David bucked this advice. They would have him flee. [1.] Because he could not be safe where he was; (v. 2.) "Observe," say they, "how the wicked bend their bow; Saul and his instruments aim at thy life, and the uprightness of thine heart will not be thy security." See what an entity there is in the wicked against the upright, in the seed of the serpent against the seed of the woman; what pains they take, what preparations they make, to do them a mischief; they firmly stick at nothing; they may not see the evil designed, to avoid it, nor others, to prevent it; no, nor God himself, to punish it. [2.] Because he could be no longer useful where he was; "For," say they, "if the foundations be destroyed," (as they were by Saul's mal-administration,) "if the civil state and government be unhinged and all out of course, (Ixxv. iii.—Ixxxxii. 5.) "what canst thou do with thy righteousness to redress the grievances?" Alas, it is to no purpose to attempt the saving of a kingdom so wretchedly shattered; whatever the righteous can do, signifies nothing. Abi in cellam, et die, Miserere mei, Domine—Away to thy cell, and there cry, Pity me, O Lord. Many are hindered from doing the service they might do to the public, in difficult times, by a despair of success.

(2.) It may be taken as a taunt wherewith his enemies bantered him, upbraiding him with the professions he used to make of confidence in God, and scornfully bidding him try what stead that would stand him in now. "You say, God is your Mountain; flee to him now, and see what the better you will be." Thus they endeavoured to shame the counsel of the poor, saying, There is no help for them in God, xiv. 6.—iii. 2. The confidence and comfort which the saints have in God, when all the hopes and joys in the external world, are a riddle to a carnal world, and are ridiculed accordingly.

Taking it thus, the two following verses are David's answer to this sarcasm. In which, [1.] He.
complains of the malice of those who did thus abuse him; (v. 2.) They bend their bow, and make ready their arrows; and we are told, (lxxiv. 3.) what they are, even bitter words, such words as these, by which they endeavour to discourage hope in God, which David felt as a sword in his bones. [2.] He resists them with a great confidence, v. 3. He looks upon this suggestion as striking at the foundations which every Israelite builds upon; "If you destroy the foundations, if you take good people off from their hope in God, if you can persuade them that their religion is a cheat and a jest, and can banter them out of that, you ruin them, and break their hearts indeed, and make them of all men the most miserable. The principles of religion and the foundations on which the faith and hope of the righteous are built. These we are concerned, in interest, as well as duty, to hold fast against all temptations to infidelity; for if these be destroyed, if we let these go, What can the righteous do? Good people would be undone, if they had not a God to go to, a God to trust to, and a future bliss to hope for.

4. The Lord is in his holy temple, the Lord's throne is in heaven: his eyes behold, his eyelids try, the children of men. 5. The Lord trieth the righteous: but the wicked, and him that loveth violence, his soul hateth. 6. Upon the wicked he shall rain snares, fire and brimstone, and a horrible tempest: this shall be the portion of their cup. 7. For the righteous Lord loveth righteousness; his countenance doth behold the upright.

The shaking of a tree (they say) makes it take the deeper and faster root. The attempt of David's enemies to discourage his confidence in God, engages him to cleave so much the closer to his first principles, and to review them, which he here does, abundantly to his own satisfaction, and the silencing of all temptations to infidelity. That which was shocking to his faith, and has been so to the faith of many, has the effect of strengthening it in the hearts of the righteous, and the ways, and the straights and distresses which the best men are sometimes reduced to; hence such an evil thought as this, was apt to arise, Surely it is vain to serve God, and we may call the proud happy; but, in order to stifle and shame all such thoughts, we are here called to consider,

1. That there is a God, a God in heaven; The Lord is in his holy temple above; there he is out of our sight, but we are not out of his. [3.] We not the enemies of the saints insult over them, as if they were at a loss, and at their wit's end: no, they have a God, and they know where to find him, and how to direct their prayer unto him, as their Father in heaven. Or, He is in his holy temple, that is, in his church; he is a God in covenant and communion with his people, through a Mediator, of whom the temple was a type. We need not say, Who shall go up to heaven, to fetch us hence a God to trust in? No, the Word is nigh us, and God in the Word; his Spirit is in his saints, those living temples, and the Lord is that Spirit.

2. That this God governs the world; the Lord has not only his residence, but his throne, in heaven, and he has set the dominion thereof in the earth; (Job xxxviii. 33.) for, having prepared his throne in the heavens, his kingdom reigneth over all, ch. 19. Hence the heavens are said to rule, Dan. iv. 26. Let us by faith see God on his throne, on his throne of glory, infinitely transcending the splendour and majesty of earthly princes; on his throne of government, giving law, giving motion, and giving aim, to all the creatures; on his throne of judgment, rendering to every man according to his works; and on his throne of grace, to which his people may come boldly for mercy and grace; we shall then see no reason to be discouraged by the pride and power of oppressors, or any of the afflictions that attend the righteous.

3. That this God perfectly knows every man's true character; His eyes behold, his eye-lids try, the children of men; he not only sees them, but he sees through them; not only knows all they say and do, but knows what they think, what they design, and how they really stand affected, whatever they pretend. We may know what men seem to be, but he knows what they are, as the refiner knows what the value of the gold is, when he has tried it. God is said to try with his eyes, and his eye-lids, because he knows men, not as earthly princes know men, by report and representation, but by his own strict inspection, which cannot err, or be imposed upon. This may comfort us when we are deceived in men, even in men that we think we have tried, that God's judgment of men, we are sure, is according to truth.

4. That, if he afflict good people, it is for their trial, and therefore for their good, v. 5. The Lord tries all the children of men, that he may do them justice; but he tries the righteous, that he may do them good in their latter end, Deut. viii. 16. Let not that therefore shake our foundations, or discourage our hope and trust in God.

5. That, however persecutors and oppressors may prosper and prevail a while, they now lie under, and will for ever perish under, the wrath of God.

(1.) He is a holy God, and therefore hate them, and cannot endure to look upon them; The wicked, and him that loveth violence, his soul hateth; for nothing is more contrary to the rectitude and goodness of his nature. Their prosperity is so far from being an evidence of God's love, that their abuse of it does certainly make them the objects of his hatred. He that hates nothing that he has made, yet hates those who have thus ill-made themselves. Dr. Huet, of Bossuet, and others among the French, who profane the name of God; Lord trieth the righteous and the wicked; (distinguishes infallibly between them, which is more than we can do;) and he that loveth violence hateth his own soul, that is, persecutors bring certain ruin upon themselves, (Prov. viii. 36.) as follows here.

(2.) He is a righteous Judge, and therefore he will punish them, v. 6. Their punishment will be, [1.] Inevitable; Upon the wicked he shall rain snares. Here is a double metaphor, to denote the dreadful and unsparing punishment of wicked men. It shall be rained upon them from heaven, (Job xx. 23.) against which there is no fence, and from which there is no escape; see Josh. x. 11. Sam. ii. 10. It shall surprise them, as a sudden shower sometimes surprises the traveller in a summer's day. It shall be as snares upon them, to hold them fast, and keep them prisoners, till the day of reckoning comes. [2.] Very terrible; it is fire and brimstone, and a fiery tempest, which plagueth them, to the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, and very fitly, for that destruction was intended for a figure of the vengeance of eternal fire, Jude 7. The fire of God's wrath, fastening upon the brimstone of their own guilt, will burn certainly and furiously, will burn to the lowest hell, and to the utmost line of eternity. What a horrible tempest are the wicked hurried away in, at death!

What a lake of fire and brimstone must they make their bed in for ever, in the congregation of the dead and damned! That is it that is here meant:
PSALMS, XII.
that is it that shall be the portion of their cup, the heritage appointed them by the Almighty, and allotted to them, Job xx. 29. This is the cup trembling, which shall be put into their hands, which they must drink the dregs of, lxxv. 8.
Every man has the portion of his cup assigned him. They who choose the Lords for the Portion of their cup, shall receive what they choose, and be for ever happy in their choice, (xvi. 5.) but they who reject his grace, shall be made to drink the cup of his fury, Jer. xxxv. 15. Isa. li. 17. II.ii. li. 16.
6. That, though honest good people may be run down, and trampled upon, yet God does and will own them, and favour them, and smile upon them, and that is the reason why God will severely reckon with persecutors and oppressors, because those whom they oppress and persecuted, delivered to him, who never toucheth them, toucheth the apple of his eye, v. 7. (1.) He loves them, and the work of his own grace in them. He is himself a righteous God, and therefore loves righteousness wherever he finds it, and pleads the cause of the righteous that are injured and oppressed; he delights to execute judgment for them, cit. 6. We must herein be followers of God, must love righteousess as he does, that we may keep our ways always in his love. (2.) He looks graciously upon them:
His countenance doth behold the upright; he is not only at peace with them, but well-pleased in them, and he comforts them, and puts gladness into their hearts, by letting them know that he is so.
He, like a tender Father, looks upon them with pleasure, and they, like dutiful children, are pleased and abundantly satisfied with his smiles.
They walk in the light of the Lord.
In singing this psalm, we must encourage and courage; To trust in God at all times, must decline upon him, to protect our innocence, and make us happy, must dred his frowns as worse than death, and desire his favour as better than life.

PSALM XII.
It is supposed that David penned this psalm, in Saul's reign, when there was a general decay of honesty and piety both in court and country, which he here complains of to God, and very feelingly, for he himself sufered by the treachery of his false friends, and the insolcence of his sworn enemies. 1. He begins here, because there were none who showed him that which he desired, v. 1, 2. He foretells the destruction of his and threatening enemies, v. 3, 4. He assures himself and others, that, how ill soever things went now, (v. 5.) God would preserve and secure to himself his own people, (v. 5, 7,) and would certainly make good his promises to them, v. 6. Whether this psalm was penned in Saul's reign or no, it is certainly calculated for Saul's reign; and perhaps David, in spirit, foresaw that some of his successors would bring things to as bad
a pass as is here described, and treasured up this psalm for the use of the church then. O tempora, O mores!—
Oh the times and the manners!

To the chief musician upon Sheminith. A psalm of David.
1. HELP, Lord; for the godly man ceaseeth; for the faithful fall from among the children of men. 2. They speak vanity every one with his neighbour; with flattering lips, and with a double heart, do they speak. 3. The Lord shall cut off all flattering lips, and the tongue that speaketh proud things; 4. Who have said, With our tongue will we prevail; our lips are our own: who is lord over us? 5. For the oppression of the poor, for the sighing of the needy, now will I arise, saith the Lord; I will set him in safety from him that puffeth at him. 6. The words of the Lord are pure words; as silver tried in a furnace of corruption, purified seven times. 7. Thou shalt keep them, O Lord, thou shalt preserve them from this generation for ever. 8. The wicked walk on every side, when the vilest men are exalted.

This psalm furnishes us with good thoughts for bad times, in which, though the prudent will keep silent, (Amos v. 13.) because a man may be made an offender for a word, yet a man may comfort himself, in such a day, with such suitable meditations and prayers as are here got ready to our hand.
1. Let us see here, what it is that makes the times bad, and when they may be said to be so.
Ask the children of this world, what it is, in their account, that makes the times bad; they will tell you, Scarcity of money, decay of trade, and the desolations of war, make the times bad; but the scripture lays the badness of the times upon causes of another nature; (2 Tim. iii. 1.) Perilous times shall come, for iniquity shall abound; and that is the thing David here complains of.
1. When there is a general decay of piety and honesty among men, such times are then truly bad;
(v. 1.) When the godly man ceases, and the faithful fail. Observe how these two characters are here put together, the godly and the faithful. As there is no true policy, so there is no true piety, without honesty. Godly men are faithful men, fast men, so they have sometimes been called; their word is as confirming as their oath, as binding as their bond;
they make conscience of being true both to God and man. They are here said to cease and fail, either by death, or by desertion, or by both. Those that were godly and faithful were taken away, and those that were left were sadly degenerated, and were not what they had been; so that there were few or no good people, that were Israelites indeed, to be met with. Perhaps he means, that there were no godly faithful men among Saul's courtiers; if he means there were few or none in Israel, we hope he was under the same mistake that Elijah was; he thought he might alone speak, and not allow God had 7000 who kept their integrity; (Rom. xi. 3.) or he means that there were few in comparison; there was a general decay of religion and virtue: the times are bad, very bad, when it is so; not a man to be found, that executes judgment, Jer. v. 1.
2. When dissimulation and flattery have cor-ruped and debauched all conversation, then the times are very bad; (v. 2.) when men are generally so profligate, that they make no conscience of a lie, and are so spirituall to design against their neighbours
the worst of mischiefs, and yet so base as to cover the design with the most specious and plausible pretences, and professions of friendship. Thus they speak vanity, (falsehood and a lie,) every one to his neighbour; with flattering lips and a double heart they will kiss and kill, (as Job did Abner and Amasa in David's own time,) smile in your face, and cut your throat. This is the Devil's image ample of a complication of malice and falsehood.
Their times are bad indeed, when there is no such thing as sincerity to be met with; when an honest man knows not whom to believe, nor whom to trust, nor dares put confidence in a friend, in a guide, Mic. vii. 5, 6. Jer. ix. 4, 5. Woe to those who help to make the times thus perilous.
3. When the enemies of God, and religion, and religious people, are impudent and daring, and threaten to run down all that is just and sacred, then the times are very bad; when proud sinners are arrived at such a pitch of impiety as to say, "With our tongue will we prevail against the cause of virtue, our lips are our own, and we may say what we will." Who is lord over us, either to restrain us, or to call us to an account?" v. 4. This bespeaks, (1.) A proud conceit of themselves, and confidence in themselves, as if the point were indeed gained by eating forbidden fruit, and they were as god independent and self-sufficient; infallible in their know ledge of good and evil, and therefore fit to be oracles; irresistible in their power, and therefore fit to be lawyers, that could prevail with their tongues, and, like God himself, speak and see if it be done. (2.) Sins of ingratitude, as if he had no propriety in them; Our lips are our own—an unjust pretension, for who made man's mouth, in whose hand is his breath, and whose is the air he breathes in. Their language would intimate that he has no authority either to command them, or to judge them; Who is lord over us? Like Pharaoh, Exod. v. 2. This is absurd and unreasonable as the former, for He in whom we live, and move, and have our being, must needs have the indisputable title, Lord over us. 4. When the poor and needy are oppressed, and abused, and puffed at, then the times are very bad: this is implied, (v. 5.) where God himself takes notice of the oppression of the poor, and the sighing of the needy; they are oppressed because they are poor, have all manner of wrong done them, merely because they are not in a capacity to right themselves. Being thus oppressed, they dare not speak for themselves, lest their defence should be made their offence; but they sigh, secretly, bemoaning their calamities, and pouring out their souls in sighs before God. If their oppressors be spoken to on their behalf, they puff at them, make light of their own sin, and the misery of the poor, and lay neither to heart; see x. 5. 5. When wickedness aboundeth, and goes barefaced, under the protection and countenance of those in authority, then the times are very bad, v. 7. When the worst men are exalted to places of trust and power, who, instead of putting the laws in execution against vice and injustice, and punishing the wicked according to their merits, patronise and protect them, give them countenance, and support their reputation, by their own example; then the wicked walk on every side, they swarm in all places, and go up and down seeking to deceive, debauch, and destroy, others: they are neither afraid nor ashamed to discover themselves; they declare their sin is Sodom, and there is none to check or control them. Bad men are base men, the vilest of men, and they are so, though they are ever so highly exalted in this world. Antiochus the illustrious, the scripture calls a vile person, Dan. xi. 21. But it is bad with a kingdom, when such are preferred; no marvel if wickedness then grows impudent and insolent. When the wicked bear rule, the people mourn. He who would live in this world should be ware of many things he is here furnished with for such bad times; when what times we may yet be reserved for, we cannot tell. When times are thus bad, it is comfortable to think, 1. That we have a God to go to, from whom we may ask and expect the redress of all our grievances. This he begins with; (v. 1.) "Help, Lord, for the angry man causeth. All other helps and helpers fail, the man and all fail; and men helping hand to support the dying cause of religion, they are gone, and therefore whether shall we seek but to thee?" Note, When godly faithful people cease and fail, it is time to cry, Help, Lord! The abounding of iniquity threatens a deluge. "Help, Lord, help the virtuous; few seek to hold fast their integrity, and to stand in the gap; help to save thine own interest in the world from sinking. It is time for thee, Lord, to work." 2. That God will certainly reckon with false and proud men, and will prove God enough and restrain them and close their tendence. They are above the control of men, and set them at defiance. Men cannot discover the falsehood of flatterers, nor humble the haughtiness of those that speak proud things; but the righteous God will cut off all flattering lips, that give the traitor's kiss, and speak words softer than oil, when war is in the heart; he will pluck out the tongue that speaks proud things against God and religion, v. 5. We may translate it as a prayer, May God cut off those false and spirituous lips; "Let lying lips be put to silence. 3. That God will, in due time, work deliverance for his oppressed people, and shelter them from the malicious designs of their persecutors; (v. 5.) New will I arise, saith the Lord. This promise of God, which David here delivered by the spirit of prophecy, is an answer to that petition which he put up to God by the spirit of prayer, "Help, Lord," says he, "I will put on the ground, a firm and effectual help." (v. 1.) It is seasonable, in the fittest time. [1.] When the oppressors are in the height of their pride and insolence, when they say, Who is lord over us? then is God's time to let them know, to their cost, that he is above them. [2.] When the oppressed are in the depth of their distress and despondency; when they are sighing like Israel in Egypt, by reason of the cruel bondage, then is God's time to appear for them, as for Israel, when they were most deserted, and Pharaoh was most elevated; New will I arise. Note, There is a time fixed for the rescue of oppressed innocency; that time will come, and we may be sure it is of all others the fittest time, cii. 13. It is effectual; I will set him in safety, or in salvation; not only protect him, but restore him to his former prosperity, will bring him out into a wealthy place; (lvvi. 12.) so that, upon the whole, he shall lose nothing by his sufferings. 4. That though men are false, God is faithful; though they are not to be trusted, God is. They speak vanity and flattery, but the words of the Lord are pure words, (v. 6.) not only all true, but all pure, like silver tried in a furnace of earth, or a crucible. It denotes, (1.) The sincerity of God's word; every thing is really as it is there represented, and not otherwise; it does not jest with us, nor impose upon us, nor has it any other design toward us than our own good. (2.) The preciousness of God's word; it is of great intrinsic value, like silver refined to the highest degree; it has nothing in it to depreciate it. (3.) The many proofs that have been given of its power and truth; it has been often tried, all the saints in all ages have trusted it, and so, tried it and it never deceived them, or frustrated their expectations; but they have all set to their seal that God's word is true, with an Experto crede—Trust the presage. They have found it so. Probably, this refers especially to these promises of succouring and relieving the poor and oppressed. Their friends put them in hopes that they will do something for them, and yet prove a broken reed; but the words of God are what we may rely upon; the less confidence is to be put in men's words, let us with the more assurance trust in God's word. 5. That God must secure his chosen remnant to himself, how bad soever the times are; (v. 7.) Thou shalt preserve them from this generation for ever. This intimates, that, as long as the world stands, there shall be a generation of proud and wicked men in it, more or less, who will threaten with the wreathed arts to ruin religion, by wearing out the saints of the most High, Dan. vii. 25. But let God alone to maintain his own interest, and to preserve his own people. He will keep them from this generation, (1.) From being debauched by them and drawn away from God, from mingling with them and learning their works; in times of general apostasy, the Lord knows that are his, and they shall be enabled to keep their integrity. (2.) From being destroyed and rooted out by them; the church is built upon a rock, and so well fortified, that the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. In the worst of times, God has his remnant, and in every age will reserve to himself a holy seed, and preserve that to his heavenly kingdom.

In singing this psalm, and praying it over, we must bewail the general corruption of manners, thank God that things are not worse than they are, but pray and hope that they will be better in God's due time.

PSALM XIII.

This psalm is the deserted soul's case and cure. Whether it was penned upon any particular occasion, does not appear; but, in general, 1. David sadly complains that God had long withdrawn from him, and delayed to relieve him, v. 1, 2. 2. He earnestly prays to God to consider his case, and comfort him, v. 3, 4. 3. He assures his own mind of an answer of God, and therefore concludes the psalm with joy and triumph, because he concludes his deliverance to be as good as wrought, v. 5, 6.

To the chief musician. A psalm of David.

1. How long wilt thou hide thy face from me? How long wilt thou hide thy face from me? 2. How long shall I take counsel in my soul, having sorrow in my heart daily? how long shall mine enemy be exalted over me? 3. Consider and hear me, O Lord my God; lighten mine eyes, lest I sleep the sleep of death; 4. Lest mine enemy say, I have prevailed against him; and those that trouble me rejoice when I am moved. 5. But I have trusted in thy mercy; my heart shall rejoice in thy salvation. 6. I will sing unto the Lord, because he hath dealt bountifully with me.

David, in affliction, is here pouring out his soul before God; his address is short, but the method is very observable, and of use for direction and encouragement.

I. His troubles extort complaints; (v. 1, 2.) and the afflicted have liberty to pour out their complaint before the Lord, cit. title. It is some case to a troubled spirit, to resort to its griefs, especially to give vent to them at the throne of grace, where we are sure to find one who is afflicted in the afflictions of his people, and is troubled with the feeling of their infirmities; thither we have boldness of access by faith, and there we have freedom of speech, παραστασις. Observe here,

1. What David complains of. (1.) God's unkindness; so he construed it, and it was so too. So our conscience. He thought God had forgotten him, had forgotten his promises to him, his covenant with him, his former loving-kindness which he had showed him, and which he took to be an earnest of further mercy; had forgotten that there was such a man in the world, who needed and expected relief and succour from him. Thus Zedan said, My God has forgotten me; (Isa. xlii. 14.) Israel said, My way is hid from the Lord, Isa. xli. 27. Not that any good man can doubt the omniscience, goodness, and faithfulness, of God; but it is a peevish expression of prevailing fear, which yet, when it arises from a high esteem and earnest desire of God's favour, though it be indecent and culpable, shall be passed by and pardoned, for the second thought will retract it, and repent of it. God hid his face from him, so that he wanted that inward comfort in God which he used to have, and herein was a type of Christ upon the cross, crying out, My God, why hast thou forsaken me? God sometimes hides his face from his own children, and leaves them in the dark concerning their interest in him; and this they lay to heart more than any outward trouble whatsoever.

2. (His own uneasiness. [1.] He was racked with care that filled his head; I take counsel in my soul; "I am at a loss, and am inopea consiliis—have no friend to advise with, that I can put any confidence in, and therefore am myself continually projecting what-to-do to help myself; but the issue of my projects are likely to take effect, that I am at my wit's end, and in a continual agitation." Anxious cares are heavy burthens with which good people often load themselves more than they need. [2.] He was overwhelmed with sorrow that filled his heart; I have sorrow in my heart daily. He had a constant disposition to sorrow, and it preyed upon his spirits; not only in the night, when he was silent and solitary, but by day too, when lighter griefs are diverted and dissipate by conversation and business; yet, as it is the condition of most men, he is brought with it fresh occasions of grief; the clouds returned after the rain. The bread of sorrows is sometimes the saint's daily bread; our Master himself was a Man of sorrows. (3.) His enemies' insolence, which added to his grief. Saul, his great enemy, and others under him, were exalted over him, triumphed in his distress, pleased themselves with his grief, and promised themselves a complete victory over him. This he complained of, as reflecting dishonour upon God, and his power and promise.

2. How he expostulates with God hereupon; "How long shall it be thus?" And, "Shall it be thus for ever?" Long afflictions try our patience, and often tire it. It is a common temptation, when trouble lasts long, to think it will last always; depondency then turns into despair, and those that have long been without joy, begin, at last, to be without hope; "Lord, tell me, how long wilt thou hide thy face from me, that it shall not be for ever, but that thou wilt return, at length, in mercy to me, and then I shall the more easily bear my present troubles."
Nothing is more killing to a soul than the want of God's favour, nothing more reviving than the return of it (2.) That then his enemies would triumph, "Lest mine enemy say that I have it; lest Saul, lest Satan, be gratified in my fall." It would gratify the pride of his enemy; he will say, "I have prevailed, I have gotten the day, and been too hard for him and his God;" it would gratify the malice of his enemies; They will rejoice when I am moved. And will it be for God's honour to suffer them thus to trample upon all that is sacred both in heaven and earth? 11. But the prayers are soon turned into praises; (v. 5, 6.) But my heart shall rejoice, and I will sing to the Lord. What a surprising change is here in a few lines! In the beginning of the psalm, we have him drooping, trembling, and ready to sink into melancholy and despair; but, in the close of it, rejoicing in God, and elevated and enlarged in his praises. See the power of faith, the power of prayer, and how good it is to draw near to God. If we bring our cares and griefs to the throne of grace, and leave them there, we may go away like Hannah and our countenances will be no more sad, 1 Sam. i. 18. And here observe the method of his comfort.

1. God's mercy is the support of his faith. "My case is bad enough, and I am ready to think it deplorable, till I consider the infinite goodness of God; finding I have that to trust to, I am comforted, though I have no merit of my own. In former distresses I have trusted in the mercy of God, and I never found that it failed me; his mercy has in due time relieved me, and my confidence in it has in the mean time supported me. Even in the depth of this distress, when God hid his face from me, when without were fightings, and within were fears, yet I trusted in the mercy of God; and that was as an anchor in a storm, by the help of which, though I was tossed, I was not overset." And still I do trust in thy mercy; so some read it. "I refer myself to that, with an assurance that it will do for me at last." This he pleads with God, knowing what pleasure he takes in those that hope in his mercy, exilv. 11.

2. His faith in God's mercy filled his heart with joy in his salvation; for joy and peace come by believing, Rom. xvi. 13. Believing, ye rejoice, 1 Pet. i. 8. Having put his trust in the mercy of God, he is fully assured of salvation, and that his heart, which was now daily grieving, should rejoice in that salvation. Though weeping endure long, joy will return.

3. His joy in God's salvation would fill his mouth with songs of praise; (v. 6.) "I will sing unto the Lord, singing in remembrance of what he has done formerly; though I should never recover the peace I have had, I will die blessing God that ever I had it; he has dealt bountifully with me formerly, and he shall have the glory of this, however he is pleased to deal with me now. I will sing in hope of what he will do for me, though I am now in the midst of my troubles, so that all will end well, will end everlasting well. But he speaks of it as a thing past; He has dealt bountifully with me; because by faith he had received the earnest of the salvation, and he was confident of it as if it had been done already. In singing this psalm, and praying it over, if we have not the same complaints to make that David had, let us trust the God that we have not, dread and depriceive his work. Let us sympathize with those that are troubled in mind, and encourage ourselves in our most holy faith and joy.

PSALM XIV.

It does not appear upon what occasion this psalm was penned, nor whether it is upon any particular occasion. Some say, David penned it when Saul persecuted him; others, when Absalom rebelled against him. But they are mere conjectures, which have not certainty enough to warrant us in any opinion of them. The apostle, in quoting this part of this psalm, (Rom. x. 13, 14,) to prove that Jesus and Gentiles are all under sin, (v. 9,) and that all the world is guilty before God, (v. 19,) leads us to understand it, in general, as a description of the depravity of the human nature, the sinfulness of the sin we are conceived and born in, and the deplorable corruption of a great part of mankind, even of the world that lies in wickedness, 1 John v. 19. But as in those psalms which are designed to discover our nature, (in distress, and thus commonly an allusion to David himself, yes, and some passages that are to be understood primarily of him, as in ii. xvi, xxii, and others; so in this psalm, which is designed to discover our nature, the nature of David's enemies and persecutors, and the other oppressors of good men at that time, to whom some passages have an immediate reference. In all the psalms from the 5d to this, except the 8th, David had been complaining of those that hated and persecuted him, insulted him and abused him; now here he traces all those bitter streams to the fountain, the general corruption of nature, and sees that not his enemies only, but all the children of men, were thus corrupted. Here is 1. A charge exhibited against a wicked world, v. 1. II. The proof of the charge, v. 2. 3. III. A serious expostulation with sinners, especially with persecutors, upon it, v. 4. 5. 6. IV. A believing prayer for the salvation of Israel, and a joyful expectation of it, v. 7.

To the chief musician. A psalm of David.

1. THE fool hath said in his heart, There is no God. They are corrupt; they have done abominable works; there is none that doeth good. 2. The Lord looked down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if there were any that did understand, and seek God. 3. They are all gone aside, they are all together become filthy; there is none that doeth good, no, not one. If we apply our hearts, as Solomon did, (Eccl. vii. 25.) to search out the wickedness of folly, even of foolishness and madness, these verses will assist us in the search, and will show us that sin is exceeded beyond all measure. 4. The disease of mankind, and it appears here to be malignant and epidemic.

1. See how malignant it is, (v. 1.) in two things, (1.) The contempt it puts upon the honour of God; for there is something of practical atheism at the bottom of all sin; The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God. We are sometimes tempted to think, "Surely there never was so much atheism and profaneness as there is in our days;" but we see the former days were no better; even in David's time there were those who had arrived at such a height of impiety, as to deny the very being of a God, and the first and self-evident principles of religion. Observe, [1.] The sinner here described; he is one that saith in his heart, There is no God; he is an atheist. There is no Elohim, no Judge or Governor of the world, no Providence presiding over the affairs of men. They cannot doubt of the existence of God, but still situation; and do not call him to account. 2. He will quit the world, it, and says this in his heart; it is not his judgment, but his imagination. He cannot satisfy himself that there is none, but he wishes there were none, and pleases himself with the fancy, that it is possible there may be none; he cannot be sure there is one, and therefore he is willing to think there is none. He dares not speak it out, lest he be confuted, and so undeceived, but he whispers it secretly in his heart, for the occurrence of any of his enemies, or the immodestness of himself in evil ways. [2.] The character of this sinner; he is a fool, he is simple and unstable; and this is an evidence of it; he is wicked and profane; and this is the cause of it. Note, Atheistical thoughts are very foolish wicked thoughts, and they are at the bottom of a great deal of the wickedness that is in this world. The word of God is a dis-cerner of these thoughts, and puts a just brand on him. Thus it harboirs them. Numbers is his name, and folly is with him: for he thinks against the clearest light, against his own knowledge and convictions, and the common sentiments of all the wise and sober part of mankind. No man will say, There is no God, till he is so hardened in sin, that it is become his interest that there should be none to call him to account.

(2.) The disgrace and degradation it puts upon the nature of man. Sinners are corrupt, quite degraded. For what was in his innocent estate; They are become filthy, (v. 3.) putrid. All their faculties are so disorderly, that they are become odious to their Maker, and utterly incapable of answering the ends of their creation. They are corrupt indeed; for, [1.] They do no good, but are the unprofitable burtin of the earth; they do God no service, bringing him no honour, nor do themselves any real kindness. [2.] They do a great deal of hurt; they have done abominable works, for such all sinful works are; sin is an abomination to God, it is that abominable thing which he hates, (Jer. xlv. 4.) and, sooner or later, it will be to so the sinner, it will be found to be hateful, (xxxvi. 2.) an abomina-tion of desolation, making desolate, Matth. xxiv. 15. This follows upon their saying, There is no God: for that they profess they know God, but in works deny him, are abominable, and to every good work reprobate, Tit. i. 16.

2. See how epidemic this disease is; it has infected the whole race of mankind. To prove this, God himself is here brought in for a Witness, and he is an Eye-Witness, v. 2, 3. Observe, (1.) His inquiry; The Lord looked down from heaven, a place of prospect, which commands this lower world; thence, with an all-seeing eye, he took a view of all the children of men, and the question was, Whether there were any among them that did un-derstand themselves aright, their duty and God's will, and did seek God, and set him before them. He that made this search was not only one that could find out a good man, if he was to be found, though never so obscure; but one that would be glad to find out one, and would be sure to take notice of him, as of Noah in the old world. (2.) The result of this inquiry, v. 3. Upon search, upon his search, it appeared, They are all gone aside, the apostasy is universal; and perverted persons are become his enemies. Till the free and mighty grace of God has wrought a change, whatever good is in any of the children of men, or is done by them, it is not of themselves, it is God's work in them. When God had made the world, he looked upon his own work, and all was very good; (Gen. i. 31.) but, some time after, he looked upon man's work, and, behold, all was very bad, (Gen. vi. 5.) every operation of the three days' works, man was evil all the days of his life, and that continually. They are gone aside from the right way of their duty, the way that leads to happiness, and are turned into the paths of the destroyer. In singing this, let us lament the corruption of our own nature, and see what need we have of the grace of God; and since that which is born of the flesh is flesh, let us not marvel that we are told we must be born again.

4. Have all the workers of iniquity no knowledge? who eat up my people as they eat bread, and call not upon the Lord. 5. There were they in great fear: for God is in the generation of the righteous. 6. Ye have shamed the counsel of the poor; because the Lord is his refuge. 7. Oh that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion! When the Lord bringeth back the captivity of his people, Jacob shall rejoice, and Israel shall be glad.

In these verses, the psalmist endeavours,

1. To convince sinners of the evil and danger of the way they are in, how secure soever they are in that way. Three things he shows them, which, it may be, they are not very willing to see, their wickedness, their danger, while they are apt to believe themselves very wise, and, good, and safe. See here, (1.) Their wickedness; this is described in four instances. [1.] They are them-selves workers of iniquity; they design it, they practise it, and take as much pleasure in it as ever any man did in his business. [2.] They eat up God's people with as much greediness as they eat bread; such an innate and inveterate enmity they have to them, and so heartily do they desire their ruin, because they really hate God, whose people they are. It is meat and drink to persecutors, to be doing mischief; it is as agreeable to them as their necessary food. They eat up God's people easily, daily, securely, without either check of conscience when they do it, or remorse of conscience when they have done it; as Joseph's brethren cast him into a pit, and then eat down to eat bread, Gen. xxxvii. 24, 25. [3.] They call not upon the Lord. Note, Those that care not for God's people, for God's poor, care not for God himself, but live in contempt of him. The reason why people run into all manner of wickedness, even the worst, is, because they do not call upon God for his grace. What good can be expected from those that live without prayer? [4.] They shame the counsel of the poor, and upbraid them with making God their Refuge, as David's enemies upbraided, him, (1. Samuel.) 1. Note, Those are very wicked indeed, and have a great deal to answer for, who not only shake off religion, and live without it themselves, but say and do what they can to put others out of conceit with it, that are well-inclined; with the duties of it, as if they were mean, melancholy, and unprofitable; and with the privileges of it, as if they were insufficient to make a man safe and happy. Those that banter religion and religious people, will find, to their cost, it is ill jesting with edged-tools, and danger that is a snare, and a deep ditch for them to fall into, as they do with the refuge. Be ye not mockers, lest your bands be made strong. He shows them, (2.) Their folly; They have no knowledge; this is obvious, if for they had any knowledge of God, if they did rightly understand themselves, and would but consider things as men, they would not be so abusive and barbarous as they are to the people of God. (3.) Their danger; (v. 5.) There were they in great fear; there, where they were in the highest degree hardened, their consciences condemned what they did, and filled them with secret terrors: they sweetly sucked the blood of the saints, but in their bowels it is turned, and become the gull of asps. Many instances there have been of proud and cruel persecutors, who have been made like Pashur, Magor-missabib—that Terrors to themselves, and all about them. They that will not fear God, perhaps may be made to fear at the shak ing of a leaf, and from the smallest cause: 2. He endeavours to comfort the people of God, (1.) With what they have; have God's presence; (v. 5.) He is in the generation of the righte-ous; they have his protection; (v. 6.) The Lord is their Refuge. This is as much their security, as it is the terror of their enemies, who may jeer them for their confidence in God, but cannot jeer them out of it. In the judgment-day, it will add to the terror and confusion of sinners, to see God own the Psalm XV.

The scope of this short but excellent psalm, is to show us the way to heaven, and to convince us, that, if we would be happy, we must be holy and honest. Christ, who is himself the Way, and in whom we must walk as our Way, has also shown us the same way that is here prescribed. (Mat. xix. 17.) "If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments." In this psalm, I. By the question, (v. 1.) we are directed and excited to inquire the way. II. By the answer to that question, in the rest of the psalm, we are directed where to walk, v. 2. - 5. III. By the assurance given in the close of the psalm, of the safety and happiness of those who answer these characters, we are encouraged to walk in that way, v. 5.

A Psalm of David.

1 LORD, who shall abide in thy tabernacle? who shall dwell in thy holy hill? 2 He that walketh uprightly, and worketh righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart. 3 He that backbiteth not with his tongue, nor doeth evil to his neighbour, nor taketh up a reproach against his neighbour. 4 In whose eyes a vile person is contemned; but he honoureth them that fear the LORD. He that sweareth to his own hurt, and changeth not. 5 He that putteth not out his money to usury, nor taketh reward against the innocent. He that doeth these things shall never be moved.

Here is,

I. A very serious and weighty question concerning the characters of a citizen of Zion; (v. 1.) "Lord, who shall abide in thy tabernacle? Let me know who shall go to heaven." Not, who by name (in this way, the Lord only knows them that are his) but who by description; "What kind of people are they whom thou wilt own, and crown with distinguishing and everlasting favours?" This supposes that it is a great privilege to be a citizen of Zion, an unspeakable honour and advantage; that all are not thus privileged, but a remnant only; and that men are not entitled to this privilege by their birth and blood; all shall not abide in God's tabernacle, that have Abraham to their father, but, according as men's hearts and lives are, accordingly will their lot be. It concerns us all to put this question to ourselves, Lord, what shall I be, and do, that I may abide in thy tabernacle? Luke xviii.

2. How it is expressed in Old Testament language. (1.) By the tabernacle we may understand the church militant, typified by Moses's tabernacle, fitted to a wilderness-state, mean and moveable. There God manifests himself, and there he meets his people, as of old in the tabernacle of the testimony, the tabernacle of meeting. Who shall dwell in this tabernacle? Who shall be accounted a true living member of God's church, admitted among the spiritual priests to lodge in the courts of this tabernacle? We are concerned to inquire this, because many pretend to a place in this tabernacle, that is not warranted in the matter. (2.) By the holy hill we may understand the church triumphant, alluding to mount Zion, on which the temple was to be built by Solomon. It is the happiness of glorified saints, that they dwell in that holy hill; they are at home there, they shall be for ever there. It concerns us to know who shall dwell there, that we make it sure to ourselves, that we shall have a place among them, and may then take the comfort of it, and rejoice in prospect of that holy hill.

3. A very plain and particular answer to this question. Those that desire to know their duty, with a resolution to do it, will find the scripture a very faithful director, and conscience a faithful monitor. Let us see then the particular character of a citizen of Zion.

1. He is one that is sincere and entire in his religion; He walketh uprightly, according to the principles of the law, (Gen. xi. 4.) "Walk before me, and be thou perfect," (it is the same word that is here used,) "and then thou shalt find me a God all-sufficient." He is really what he professes to be, is sound at heart, and can approve himself to God, in his integrity, in all he does; his conversation is uniform, and he is of a piece with himself, and endeavours to stand complete in all the will of God. His eye perhaps is weak, but it is single; he has his spots indeed, but he does not paint; an Israelite indeed in whom is no guile, John i. 47.

2. He is one that is conscientiously honest and just in all his dealings, faithful and fair to all with whom he has to do. He worketh righteousness; he walks in all the ordinances and commandments of the Lord, and takes care to give all their due; is just both to God and man; and, in speaking to both, he speaks that which is the truth in his heart; his eyes, his ears, and his lips, are not out of feigned lips, nor dares he tell a lie, or so much as equivocate, in his converse or commerce with men. He walks by the rules of righteousness and truth, and scorns and abhors the gains of injustice and fraud; he reckons that that cannot be a good bargain, nor a saving one, which is made with a lie, and that he who wrongs his neighbour, though ever so plausibly, will prove, in the end, to have done the greatest injury to himself.

3. He is one that contrives to do all the good he can to his neighbours; but is very careful to do hurt to no man, and is, in a particular manner, tender of his his family, than wrong his neighbour by breaking his oath. An oath is a sacred thing, which we must not think to play fast and loose with.

5. He is one that will not increase his estate by any unjust practices, v. 5. (1.) Not by extortion; he

He putted not out his money to usury, that he may
v. 5. (2.) Not by bowlery; for he would not make money

the borrowers money, any more than for the owner of the land to demand rent from the occupant, money being, by art and labour, as improvable as land. But a citizen of Zion will freely lend to the poor, according to his ability, and not be content with usurious interest; and he will forbear to return those that are reduced by Providence.

(2.) Not by bribery; he will not take a reward against the innocent; if he be any way employed in the administration of public justice, he will not, for any gain, or hope of it, to himself, do any thing to the prejudice of a righteous cause.

III. The psalm concludes with a ratification of this character of the citizen of Zion; He is like Zion-hill itself, which can never be moved, but abides for ever, xxv. 1.

Every true living man will be one of the church, like the church itself, is built upon a Rock, which the gates of hell cannot prevail against. He that doeth these things, shall never be moved; shall not be moved for ever, so the word is. The grace of God shall always be sufficient for him, to preserve him safe and blameless to the heavenly kingdom; temptations shall not overcome him, trials shall not overwhelm him, nothing shall rob him of his present peace, or his future bliss.

In singing this psalm, we must teach and admonish ourselves, and one another, to answer the characters here given of the citizen of Zion, that we may never be moved from God's tabernacle on earth, and may arrive, at last, at that holy hill, where we shall be for ever out of the reach of temptation and danger.

PSALM XVI.

This psalm has something of David in it, but much more of Christ. It begins with such expressions of devotion as may be applied to Christ; but concludes with such confidence of his preservation (whether he be moved, or not, by the prevent corruption,) as must be applied to Christ, to him only, and cannot be understood of David, as both St. Peter and St. Paul have observed, Acts ii. 24.—xxiii. 36. For David died, and was buried, and saw corruption. I. David speaks of himself as a member of Christ, and so he speaks the language of all good Christians, professing his confidence in God; (v. 1.) his consent to him; (v. 2.) his affection to the people of God; (v. 3.) his adherence to the true worship of God; (v. 4.) and his entire complacency and satisfaction in God, and the interest he had in him, v. 5. - 7. II. He speaks of himself as a type of Christ, and so he speaks the language of Christ himself, who intimates, that all the blessings of the psalm is expressly, and at large, applied, Jer. ii. 25, &c. David speaks concerning him, (not concerning himself,) I foresaw the Lord always before my face, &e. And this he spake, being a prophet, v. 30, 31. He spake, 1. Of the special presence of God with him, his service and sufferings, v. 8. 2. Of the prospect which the Redeemer had of his own resurrection, and the glory that should follow, which carried him cheerfully through his undertaking, v. 9.-11.

Michtam of David.

1. P RESERVE me, O God : for in thee do I put my trust. 2. O my soul, thou hast said unto the Lord, Thou art my Lord; my goodness extendeth not to thee; 3. But to the saints that are in the earth, and to the excellent, in whom is all my delight. 4. Their sorrows shall be multliplied that hasten after another god: their drink-offerings of blood will I not offer, nor take up their names into my lips. 5. The Lord is the portion of mine inheritance, and of my cup: thou maintest my lot. 6. The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places; yea, I have a goodly heritage. 7. I will bless the Lord, who hath given me counsel; my reins also instruct me in the night-seasons.

This psalm is entitled Micha'am, which some translate a golden psalm, a very precious one, more to be valued by us than gold, yea than much fine gold; because it speaks so plainly of Christ and his resurrection, who is the true Treasure hid in the field of the Old Testament.

I. David here flies to God's protection with a cheerful believing confidence in it; (v. 1) "Preserve me, O God, from the deaths, and especially from the sins, to which I am continually exposed; for in thee, and in nothing else, do I put my trust. Trust in me, my faith commit themselves to the divine care, and submit themselves to the divine guidance, have reason to hope for the benefit of both. This is applicable to Christ, who prayed, Father, save me from this hour, and trusted in God that he would deliver him.

II. He recognizes his solemn dedication of himself to God, as his God; (v. 2.) "O my soul, thou hast said unto the Lord, Thou art my Lord, and the lot of my inheritance." (xvi. 6.)

III. He devotes himself to the honour of God, in the service of the saints; (v. 2, 3.) My goodness extends not to thee, but to the saints. Observe, 1. Those that have taken the Lord for their Lord, must, like him, be good, and do good; we do not expect happiness without goodness. 2. Whatever good there is in us, or is done by us, we must humbly acknowledge that it extends not to God; so that we cannot pretend to merit any thing by it. God has no need of our services, he is not benefitted by them, nor can they add any thing to his infinite perfection and blessedness. The wisest, and best, and most useful men in the world, cannot be profitable to God, Job xxii. 2. —xxxx. 7. God is infinitely above us, and happy without us, and whatsoever good we do, it is all from him; so that we are indebted to him, not he, to us: David owns it, (1 Chron. xxix. 14.) Of thine own have we given thee. 3. If God be ours, we must, for his sake, extend our goodness to those that are his, to the saints in the earth; for what is done to them, he is pleased to take as done to himself, having constituted them his receivers. Note, (1.) There are saints in the earth; and saints on earth we must all be, or we shall never be saints in heaven. Those that are renewed by the grace of God, and devoted to the glory of God, are saints on earth. (2.) The saints in the earth are excellent ones, great, mighty, magnificent, ones, and yet some of them so poor in the world, that they needed to have David's goodness extended to them; for he can be none the more excellent by the grace he gives them. The right is more excellent than his neighbour, and then he accounts them excellent; they are precious in his sight and honourable, they are his jewels, his peculiar treasure. Their God is their Glory, and a Diadem of beauty to them. (3.) All that have taken the Lord for their God, delight in his saints as excellent ones, because they bear his image, and because he loves them. David, though a king, was so grieved to see all the offenders against God, even the meanest, which was a sign that his delight was in them. (4.) It is not enough for us to delight in the saints, but, as there is occasion, our goodness must extend to them; we must be ready to show them the kindness they need, distribute to their necessities, and abound in the labour of love to them. This is applicable to Christ. The salvation he wrought out for us was no gain to God, for our ruin would have been no loss to him; but the ruin of his enemies, and to God, and thereby does him infinite service.

IV. He disclaims the worship of all false gods, and all communion with their worshippers, v. 4. Where, 1. He reads the doom of idolaters, who hasten after other gods, being made upon their sides, and turning them to whereby as if they were afraid they would escape from them; their sorrows shall be multiplied, both by the judgments they bring upon themselves from the true God whom they forsake, and by the disappointment they will meet with in the false gods they embrace. They that multiply gods, multiply griefs, to themselves, for whoever thinks one God too little, will find two too many, and yet hundreds not enough. 2. He declares that true and devout men, and all such men, nor with their unfruitful works of darkness; "Their drink-offerings of blood will I not offer, not only because the gods they are offered to, are a lie, but because the offerings themselves are barbarous. At God's altar, because the blood made atonement, the drinking of it was most strictly prohibited, and the drink-offerings were of wine; but the Devil prescribed to his worshippers to drink of the blood of the sacrifices, to teach them cruelty. "I will have nothing to do" (says David), "with those bloody deities, nor so much as take their names into my lips with any delight in them, or respect to them." Thus must we hate idols and idolatry with a perfect hatred. Some make this also applicable to Christ and his undertaking, showing the nature of the sacrifice he offered; it was not the blood of bulls and goats, which was offered according to the law, (that was never named and did not exist,) but his own blood; showing also the multiplied sorrows of the unbelieving Jews, who hastened after another king, Cæsar, and are still hastening after another Messiah, whom they in vain look for.

V. He repeats the solemn choice he had made of God for his Portion and Happiness, (v. 5.) takes to himself the comfort of the choice, (v. 6.) and gives God the glory of it, v. 7. This is very much the language of a devout and pious soul in its gracious exercises.

1. Choosing the Lord for his Portion and Happiness. "Most men take the world for their chief good, and place their felicity in the enjoyments of it; but this I say, the Lord is the Portion of mine inheritance, and of my cup; the Portion I make choice of, and will gladly take up with, how poor soever my condition is in this world. Let me have the love and favour of God, and be accepted of him; let me have the Lord's good communion with God, and satisfaction in the communications of his graces and comforts; let me have an interest in his promises, and a title by promise to everlasting life and happiness in the future state; and I have enough, I need no more, I desire no more, to complete my felicity. Would we do well and wisely for ourselves, we must take God, in Christ, to be, (1.) The Portion of our inheritance in the other world; heaven is an inheritance, God the Father himself, the saints; and those whose everlasting bliss is to enjoy him. We must take that for our inheritance, our home, our rest, our lasting, everlasting, good, and look upon this world to be no more ours, than the country through which our road lies, when we are in a journey. (2.) The Portion of our cup in this world, with which we are nourished and refreshed, and kept from fainting. Those have not God for theirs, who do not reckon his comforts the most reviving of all the blessings to themselves with the saints, and make use of them as sufficient to balance all the grievances of this present time, and to sweeten the most bitter cup of affliction.

2. Confiding in him for the securing of this portion; "Thou maintainest my lot. Thou that hast by promise made over thyself to me, to be mine, wilt graciously make good what thou hast promised, and never leave me to myself to forfeit this happiness, nor leave it in the power of my flesh, nor my own, or the world's, to rob it of it. Nothing shall pluck me out of thine hands, nor separate me from thy love, and the sure mercies of David." The saints and their bliss are kept by the power of God.

3. Rejoicing in this portion, and taking a complacency in it; (v. 6.) The lines are fallen to me in pleasant places; those have reason to say so, that have God for their Portion, they have a worthy Portion, a goodly Heritage. What can they have better? What can they desire more? Return unto thy Rest, O my soul, and look no further. Note, Gracious persons, though they still covet more of God, never covet more than God; but, being satisfied of his loving-kindness, are abundantly satisfied with it, and envy not any their carnal mirth, and sensual pleasures and delights, but account themselves truly happy in what they have, and doubt not but to be completely happy in what they hope for. Those whose lot is cast, as David's was, in a land of light, in a valley of vision, where God is known and worshipped, have, upon that account, reason to say, The lines are fallen to me in pleasant places; much more those who have not only the end, but the not, only Immanuel's land, but Immanuel's love.

4. Giving thanks to God for it, and for grace to make this wise and happy choice; (v. 7.) I will bless the Lord, and make me comfort; this comfort, to take him for my Portion and Happiness." So ignorant and foolish are we, that, if we be left to ourselves, our hearts will follow our eyes, and we shall choose our own delusions, and forsake our own mercies for lying vanities; and therefore, if we have indeed taken God for our Portion, and preferred spiritual and eternal blessings before those that are sensible and temporal, we must thankfully acknowledge, that we have been brought to a perfect rejecting and enabling us to make that choice. If we have the pleasure of it, let God have the praises of it.

5. Making a good use of it. God having given him counsel by his word and Spirit, his own reins also (his own thoughts) instructed him in the night-season; when he was silent and solitary, and retired from the world, then his own conscience (which is called the reins,) (Jer. xvii. 10.) not only reflected with comfort upon the choice he had made, but instructed concerning him concerning the duties arising out of this choice, catechized him, and engaged and quickened him to live as one that had God for his Portion, by faith to live upon him and to him. Those who have God for their Portion, and who will be faithful to him, must give their own consciences leave to deal thus faithfully and plainly with them.

All this may be applied to Christ, who made the Lord his Portion, and was pleased with that Portion, made his Father's glory his highest end, and made it his meat and drink to seek that, and to do his will, and delighted to prosecute his undertaking, pursuant to his Father's counsel, depending upon him to maintain his lot, and to carry him through his undertaking. We may also apply it to ourselves, in singing it, renewing our choice of God as ours, with a holy complacency and satisfaction.

8. I have set the Lord always before me: because he is at my right hand, I shall not be moved. 9. Therefore my heart is glad, and my glory rejoiceth; my flesh also shall rest in hope: 10. For thou wilt not leave me; nor in hell; neither wilt thou suffer thy Holy One to see corruption. 11. Thou wilt show me the path of life: in thy presence is fulness of joy; at thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore.

All these verses are quoted by St. Peter in his first sermon, after the pouring out of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost; (Acts ii. 25-28.) and he tells us expressly, that David in them speaks concerning Christ, and particularly of his resurrection. Something we may allow here of the workings of David's own pious and devout affections toward God, depending upon his grace to perfect every thing that concerned him, and looking for the blessed hope, and a happy state, on the other side death, in the enjoyment of God; but in these holy elevations toward God and heaven he was carried by the spirit of prophecy, quite beyond the consideration of himself and his own case, to foretell the glory of the Messiah, in such expressions as were peculiar to that, and could not be understood of himself. The New Testament furnishes us with a key to let us into the mystery of these lines.

I. These verses must certainly be applied to Christ; of him speaks the prophet this, as did many of the Old Testament prophets, who testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow, (1 Pet. i. 11.) and that is the subject of this prophecy: and it is known, as he himself so distinctly, concerning this, no doubt, among other prophecies in this psalm, Luke xxii. 44, 46.) that Christ should suffer, and rise from the dead, 1 Cor. xv. 3, 4.

1. That he should suffer and die. This is implied here, when he says, (v. 8.) I shall not be moved; he supposed that he should be struck at, and have a dreadful shock given him, as he had in his agony, when his soul was exceeding sorrowful, and he was at his last end. When he says, "My flesh shall rest," it is implied, that he must put off the body, and therefore must go through the pains of death. It is likewise plainly intimated, that his soul must go into a state of separation from the body, and that his body, so deserted, would be in imminent danger of seeing corruption; that he should not only die, but he buried, and abide for some time under the power of death.

3. That he should be wonderfully borne up by the divine power, in suffering and dying. (1.) That he should not be moved, not driven off, from his undertaking, nor sink under the weight of it; that he should not fail, nor be discouraged, (Isa. xlii. 4.) but should proceed and persevere in it, till he could say, It is finished. Though the service was hard, and the encounter hot, and he trod the wine-press alone, yet he was not moved, nor was his heart buried, and he the only, say, glorify me with thine own self. (2.) That he should be re cieved into the presence of God, to sit at his right hand. His being admitted into God’s presence, would be the acceptance of his service; and his being set at his right hand, the recompense of it. (3.) Thus, as a reward for the sorrows he underwent for our redemption, he should have a fulness of joy, and pleasures for evermore; not only the glory he had with God, as God, before all worlds, but the joy and pleasure of a Mediator, in seeing his seed, and the success and prosperity of his under	aking, Isa. liii. 10, 11.

II. Christ being the Head of the body, the church, these verses may, for the most part, be applied to all good Christians, who are guided and animated by the Spirit of Christ; and, in singing them, when we have first given glory to Christ, in whom, to our everlasting comfort, they have had their accomplishment, we may then encourage and edify ourselves and one another with them, and may hence learn,

1. That it is our wisdom and duty to set the Lord always before us, and to see him continually at our right hand, wherever we are, to eye him as our Chief Good and Highest End, our Owner, Ruler, and Judge, our gracious Benefactor, our sure Guide and strict Observer; and, while we do thus, we shall not be moved either from our duty or from our comfort. Blessed Paul set the Lord before him, when, though bounds and afflictions did abide him, he could bravely say, None of these things move me, Acts xx. 24.

2. That, if our eyes be ever toward God, our hearts and tongues may ever rejoice in him; it is our own fault if they do not. If the heart rejoice in God, out of the abundance of that let the mouth speak, to his glory, and the edification of others.

3. That dying Christians, as well as a dying Christ, may cheerfully put off the body, in a believing expectation of a joyful resurrection; My flesh also shall rest in hope. Our bodies have little rest in this world; but in the grave they shall rest as in their beds, Isa. liii. 8. We have little to hope for from this life, but we shall rest in hope of a better life; we may put off the body in that hope. Death destroys the hope of men, (Job xiv. 19.) but not the hope of a good Christian, Prov. xxxiv. 12.

He has hope in his death, living hopes in dying moments, hopes that the body shall not be left for ever in the grave, but, though it sees corruption for a time, it shall, at the end of the time, be raised to immortality; Christ’s resurrection is an earnest of ours, if we be his.

4. That those who live piously, with God in their eye, may die comfortably, with heaven in their eye. In this world, sorrow is our lot, but in heaven there is joy; all our joys here are empty and defective, but in heaven there is a fulness of joy; our pleasures here are transient and momentary, and such is the nature of them, that it is not fit they should be compared with the immortal pleasures that are pleasures for evermore; for they are the pleasures of immortal souls, in the immediate vision and fruition of an eternal God.

PSALM XVII.

David, being in great distress and danger by the malice of his enemies, does, in this psalm, by prayer address himself to God, his tried Refuge, and seeks shelter in him.

I. He appeals to God concerning his integrity, v. 1...
A Prayer of David.

HEAR the right, O Lord, attend unto my cry; give ear unto my prayer, that goeth not out of feigned lips. 2. Let my sentence come forth from thy presence; let thine eyes behold the things that are equal. 3. Thou hast proved my heart; thou hast visited me in the night; thou hast tried me, and shalt find nothing: I am purposed that my mouth shall not transgress. 4. Concerning the works of men, by the word of thy lips I have kept me from the paths of the destroyer. 5. Hold up my goings in thy paths, that my footsteps slip not. 6. I have called upon thee; for thou wilt hear me, O God: incline thine ear unto me, and hear my speech. 7. Show thy marvellous loving-kindness, O thou that savest by thy right hand them which put their trust in thee from those that rise up against them.

This psalm is a prayer. As there is a time to weep, and a time to rejoice, so there is a time for praise, and a time for prayer. David was now persecuted, probably, by Saul, who hunted him like a partridge on the mountains; without were fightings, within were fears, and both urged him as a suppliant to the throne of mercy.

He addresses himself to God in these verses, both by way of appeal, (Hear the right, O Lord; let my righteous cause have a hearing before thy tribunal, and give judgment upon it,) and by way of petition, Give ear unto my prayer, (v. 1) and again, (v. 6.) Incline thine ear unto me, and hear my speech; not that God needs to be thus pressed with our impertinency, but he gives us leave thus to express our earnest desire of his gracious answers to our prayers. These things he pleads with God, for audience. 1. That he was sincere, and did not disagree with God in his prayer; it goeth not out of feigned lips. He meant as he spake, and the feelings of his mind agreed with the expressions of his mouth. Feigned prayers are fruitless; but if our hearts lead our prayers, God will meet them with his favour. 2. That he had been used to pray at other times, and it was not his distress and danger that now first brought him to his duty; I have called upon thee formerly, (v. 6.) therefore, Lord, hear me now. It will be a great comfort to us, if trouble, when it comes, finds the wheels of prayer a-going, for then may we come with the more boldness to the throne of grace. Tradesmen are willing to oblige those that have been long their customers. 3. That he was encouraged by his faith to expect God would take notice of his prayer; I knew thou wilt hear me, and therefore, O God, incline thine ear to me. Our believing dependence upon God is a good plea to enforce our desires toward him.

Let us now see,

1. What his appeal is; and there observe,

1. What the court is, to the cognizance and determination of which he makes his appeal; it is the court of heaven. "Lord, do thou hear the right, for Saul is so passionate, so prejudiced, he will not hear it. Lord, let my sentence come forth from thy presence," v. 2. Men sentence me to be pursued and slain, and wherefore? I appeal from them to thee." This he did in a public remonstrance before Saul's face, (1 Sam. xxiv. 12.) The Lord judge between me and thee; and he repeats it here in his private devotions. Note, (1.) The equity and extent of God's government and judgment are a very great support to injured innocence. If we are blackened, and abused, and misrepresented, by unrighteous men, it is our comfort that we have a righteous God to address ourselves to. The Lord is the Patron of the oppressed, whose judgment is according to truth, by the discoveries of which, every person and every cause will appear in a true light, strip of all false colours, and by the decisions of which, all unrighteous doings will be reversed, and to every man will be rendered according to his work. (2.) Sincerity dreads no scrutiny, no not that of God himself, according to the tenor of the covenant of grace. Lord, I have purposed that my mouth shall not transgress; and it is the sincerity of God's omniscience as much the joy of the upright, as it is the terror of the hypocrites; and is particularly comfortable to those who are falsely accused, and in any wise have wrong done them.

2. What the evidence is, by which he hopes to make good his appeal; it is the trial God had made of him, (v. 3.) Thou hast proved mine heart. God's sentence is therefore right, because he always proceeds upon evidence. "I am purposed that my mouth shall not transgress; but, could find nothing of that which his enemies charged him with. (2.) By providence. God had tried him by the fair opportunity he had, once and again, to kill Saul; he had tried him by the malice of Saul, the treachery of his friends, and the many provocations that were given him; so that, if he had been the man he was represented to be, it would have appeared; but, upon all these trials, there was nothing found against him, no proof at all of the things whereof they accused him. God tried his heart, and could witness to the integrity of that; but, for the further proof of his integrity, he himself takes notice of two things, concerning which his conscience bare him record. (1.) That he had fixed a resolution against all sins of the tongue; "I am purposed and fully determined, in the strength of God's grace, that my mouth shall not transgress," v. 3. But he proceeds upon his knowledge, which is more certain and infallible than that which men attain to by the closest views and the strictest searches. He knew God had tried him. (1.) By his own conscience, which is God's deputy in the soul. The spirit of a man is the candle of the Lord, with this God had searched him, and visited him in the night, when he communed with his own heart upon his bed. He had submitted to the search, and had seriously reviewed the actions of his life, to discover what was good, but could find nothing of that which his enemies charged him with. (2.) By providence. God had tried him by the fair opportunity he had, once and again, to kill Saul; he had tried him by the malice of Saul, the treachery of his friends, and the many provocations that were given him; so that, if he had been the man he was represented to be, it would have appeared; but, upon all these trials, there was nothing found against him, no proof at all of the things whereof they accused him.
man life, I have, by the direction of thy word, kept me from the paths of the destroyer. Some understand it particularly, that he had not been himself a destroyer of Saul, when it lay in his power, nor had he permitted others to be so, but said to Abishai, Destroy him not, 1 Sam. xxvi. 9. But it may be taken more generally; he kept himself from all evil works, and endeavoured, according to the duty of his place, to keep others from them too.

Note, First, The ways of sin are paths of the destroyer, of the Devil, whose name is Abaddon, and Apollyon, as being in the hands of the Devil , by destroying them into the paths of sin. Secondly, It concerns us all to keep out of the paths of the destroyer, for if we walk in those ways that lead to destruction, we must thank ourselves if destruction and misery be our portion at last. Thirdly, It is by the word of God, as our guide and rule, that we must keep out of the paths of the destroyer, by observing its directions and admonitions, cxix. 9. Fourthly, If we carefully avoid all the paths of sin, it will be very comfortable in the reflection, when we are in trouble. If we keep ourselves, that the wicked one touch us not with his temptations, (1 John v. 18.) we may hope he shall not be able to touch us with his terrors.

II. What his petition is; it is, in short, this, That he might experience the good work of God in him, as an evidence of, and qualification for, the good will of God toward him: this is grace and peace from God the Father.

1. He prays for the work of God's grace in him; (v. 5.) "Hold up my goings in thy paths. Lord, I have, by thy grace, kept me from the paths of the destroyer; by the same grace, let me be kept in thy paths; let me not only be restrained from doing that which is evil, but quickened to abound always in that which is good. Let my goings be held in thy paths, that I may not turn back from them, nor turn aside out of them; let them be held up in thy paths, that I may not stumble, and fall into sin, that I may not trifle, and neglect my duty. Lord, as thou hast kept me hitherto, so keep me still." Those that are, through grace, going in God's paths, have need to pray, and do pray, that their goings may be held up in those paths; for we stand no longer than he is pleased to hold us, we go no further than he is pleased to lead us, bear us up, and carry us. David had been kept in the way of his duty hitherto, and yet he prays that would be his lot for the future, and therefore prays, "Lord, still hold me up." Those that would proceed and persevere in the way of God, must, by faith and prayer, fetch in daily fresh supplies of grace and strength from him. David was sensible that his way was slippery, that he himself was weak, and not so well fixed and furnished as he should be; that there were those who watched for his halting, and would improve the least slip against him; yet he prays, "Lord, keep my steps, that my foot slip not; that I may never say or do any thing that looks either dishonest, or distrustful of thee, and thy providence, and promise."

2. He prays for the tokens of God's favour to him, v. 7. Observe here, (1.) How he eyes God, as the Protector and Saviour of his people, so he calls him, and thence he takes his encouragement in prayer; O thou that savest by thy right hand thy people, that keepest in the shadow of thy wings those that put their trust in thee. It is the character of God's people, that they trust in him; he is pleased to make them confidants, for his secret is with the righteous; and they make them their Trust, for to him they commit themselves. Those that trust in God, have many enemies, many that rise up against them, and seek their ruin; but they have one friend that is able to deal with them all, and if he be for them, no matter who is against them. He reckons it his honour to be their Saviour. His almighty power is engaged for them, and they have all found him ready to save them. The margin reads it, O thou that savest them which trust in thee, from those that rise up against thy right hand. Those that are enemies to the saints, are rebels against God and his right hand, and therefore, no doubt, he will, in due time, appear against them. (2.) What he expects and desires from God; Show thy marvellous loving-kindness. The word signifies, [1.] Distinguishing favours. "Set apart thy loving-kindnesses for me, put me not off with common mercies, but be gracious to me, as thou wertst to do to those who love thy name." [2.] Wonderful favours. "O make thy loving-kindness admirable; Lord, testify thy favour to me in such a way, that I and others may wonder at it." God's loving-kindness is marvellous, for the freedom and fulness of it; in some instances he shows it in a special manner, marvellous, (cxviii. 23.) and it will certainly appear so in the salvation of the saints, when Christ shall come to be glorified in the saints, and to be admired in all them that believe.

8. Keep me as the apple of the eye; hide me under the shadow of thy wings, 9. From the wicked that oppress me, from my deadly enemies who compass me about. 10. They are enclosed in their own fat: with their mouth they speak proudly. 11. They have now compassed us in our steps; they have set their eyes bowing down to the earth; 12. Like as a lion that is greedy of his prey, and as it were a young lion lurking in secret places. 13. Arise, O Lord, disappoint him, cast him down: deliver my soul from the wicked, which is thy sword: 14. From men which are thy hand, O Lord, from men of the world, which have their portion in this life, and whose belly thou fillest with thy hid treasure: they are full of children, and leave the rest of their substance to their babes. 15. As for me, I will behold thy face in righteousness: I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness.

We may observe, in these verses, I. What David prays for. Being compassed about with enemies that sought his life, he prays to God to preserve him safe through all. His almighty power was engaged for him, to the crown to which he was anointed. This prayer is both a prediction of the preservation of Christ, through all the hardships and difficulties of his humiliation, to the glories and joys of his exalted state, and a pattern to Christians to commit the keeping of their souls to God, trusting him to preserve them to his heavenly kingdom. He prays, That he himself might be protected; (v. 8.) "Keep me safe, hide me close, where I may not be found, where I may not be come at. Deliver my soul, not only my mortal life from death, but my immortal spirit from sin." Those who put themselves under God's protection, may in faith implore the benefit of it. He prays that God would keep him, (1.) With as much care as a man keeps the apple of his eye with, which nature has wonderfully fenced, and teaches us to guard. If we keep God's law as the apple of our eye, (Prov. vii. 2.) we may expect that God will so keep us; for it is said concerning his people, that whose touches them, touches the apple of his eye, Zech. ii. 8. (2.) With as much tenderness as the hen gathers her young ones under her wings, Christ uses the similitude, Matth. xxiii. 37. "Hide me under the shadow of thy wings, where I may be both safe and warm." Or, perhaps, it rather alludes to the wise man's cherubines shadowing the throne of majesty; "Let me be also under the protection of that glorious grace which is peculiar to God's Israel." What David here prays for, was performed to the Son of David our Lord Jesus, of whom it is said, (Isa. xliv. 2.) that God hid him in the shadow of his hand, hid him as a polished shaft in his quiver. David further prays, "Lord, keep me from the wicked, from men of the world." (1.) From being and doing, like them, from walking in their counsel, and standing in their paths, and sitting in their dainties. [2.] From being destroyed and run down by them. Let them not have their will against me, let them not triumph over me.

2. That all the designs of his enemies, to bring him either into sin or into trouble, might be defeated; (v. 13.) "Arise, O Lord, appear for me, dis-appoint him, and cast him down in his own eyes by the disappointment." While Saul persecuted Da-vid, (Luke xvi. 13.) he could not destroy him, he could not kill him, he could not cast him down, he could not do to him as he thought he had it in his power. And therefore Christ's enemies disappointed by his resurrection, who thought they had gained their point when they had put him to death!

II. What he pleads, for the encouraging of his own faith in these petitions, and his hope of speed-ing. He pleads,

1. The malice and wickedness of his enemies; "they are such as are not fit to be countenanced, such as, if I be not delivered from them by the special care of God himself, will be my ruin. Lord, see what wicked men they are that oppress me, and waste me, and run me down." (1.) They are very spiteful and malicious; they are our deadly enemies, that thirst after my blood, my heart's blood; enemies against the soul, so the word is. David's enemies did what they could to drive him to sin, and drive him away from God, they made him to hate his God, his other gods; (1 Sam. xxviii. 14.) I will therefore he had no comfort in them. Note, Those are our worst enemies, and we ought so to account them, that are enemies to our souls.

2. They are very secure and sensual, insolent and haughty, v. 10. They are inclined in their own fat, wrap themselves, hug themselves, in their own honour, and power, and plenty, and then make light of God, and set his judgments at defiance, (see, xxii. 7. Job iv. 27.) They wallow in pleasure, and proud themselves that to-morrow shall be as this day. And therefore with their mouth they speak proudly, glorifying in themselves, blaspheming God, trampling upon his people, and in-sulting him." See Rev. xiii. 5, 6. "Lord, are not such men as these fit to be mortified and humbled, and made to know themselves! Will it not be for thy glory to look upon these proud men and abase them?" (3.) They are restless and unwearyed in their attempts against me; they are ever seeking something else; or, (as some think,) "They are watchful and intent upon it, to do us a mischief; they are down-looked, and never slip an opportunity of compassing their design." (1.) The chief leader of them, (that was Saul,) is in a special manner bloody and barbarous, politic, and projecting, (v. 12.) like a lion that lives by prey, and is therefore greedy of it. It is as much the meat and drink of a wicked man to do mischief, as it is of a good man to do good. He is like a young lion lurking in secret places, disguising his cruel designs. This is fitly applied to Saul, who sought David on the rocks of the wild goats, (1 Sam. xxviii. 3.) and in the wilderness of Ziph, (ch. xxvi. 2.) where lions used to lurk for their prey.

2. The power God had over them, to control and restrain them. He pleads, (1.) "Lord, they are thy sword; and will any father suffer his sword to be drawn against his own children?" As this is a reason why we should patiently bear the injuries of others, that they are but the instruments of the trouble, (it comes directly from God, to whose will we are bound to submit,) it is an encouragement to us to hope both that their wrath shall be raised, and that the remainder thereof he will re- strain, that they are God's sword, which he can manage as he pleases, which cannot move without him, and which he will sheathe when he has done his work with it. (2.) "They are thy hand, by which thou dost chastise thy people, and make them feel the weight of thy judgments. He therefore expects deliverance from God's hand, because from God's hand the trouble came. Una eademque manus vulnus opemque tuli—The same hand wounds and heals. There is no flying from God's hand, but by flying to it. It is very comfortable, when we are in fear of the power of man, to see it dependent upon, and in subjection to, the power of God; see Isa. x. 6, 7, 15.

3. Their outward prosperity; (v. 14.) "Lord, appear against them, for." (1.) "They are entirely devoted to the world, and care not for that which is the favour. They are men of the world, actuated by the spirit of the world, walking according to the course of this world, in love with the wealth and pleasure of this world, eager in the pursuits of it, making them their business, and at ease in the en-joyments of it, making them their bliss. They have a share or portion in this life; they look upon the good things of this world as the chief things, and sufficient to make them happy, and they choose themselves agreeably, place their felicity in them, and aim at them as their chief good; they rest satisfied with them, their souls take ease in them, and they look no further, nor are in any care to provide for another life. These things are their consolation, (Luke vi. 24.) their good things, (Luke xvi. 25.) their re-sources, (Matth. xx. 13.) "Now, Lord, shall men of this character be supported and countenanced against those who honour the Lord, prevailing for thy favour before all the wealth in this world, and taking thee for their portion?" xvi. 5. (2.) They have abundance of the world, [1.] They have en-larged appetites, and a great deal wherewith to satisfy them; their bellies thou fillest with hid treas-ures. The things of this world are called treas-ures, because they are so accounted; otherwise, to apply them in comparison with eternal blessings, they are but small. They are hid in the several parts of the creation, and hid in the very propo-sals of Providence. They are God's hid treasures, for the earth is his, and the fulness thereof, though the men of the world think it is their own, and forget God's property in it. They that fare deliciously every day, have their bellies filled with these hid treasures; and they will but fill the belly, (1 Cor. vi. 13.) they will not fill the soul, they are not bred for that, nor can they satisfy, Isa. lv. 2.
1. I WILL love thee, O Lord, my strength.
2. The Lord is my rock, and my fortress, and my deliverer; my God, my strength, in whom I will trust; my buckler, and the horn of my salvation, and my high tower.
3. I will call upon the Lord, who is worthy to be praised: so shall I be saved from mine enemies.
4. The sorrows of death compassed me, and the floods of ungodly men made me afraid.
5. The sorrows of hell compassed me about; the snares of death prevented me. In my distress I called upon the Lord, and cried unto my God: he heard my voice out of his temple, and my cry came before him, even into his ears.
6. Then the earth shook and trembled; the foundations also of the hills moved and were shaken, because he was wroth. There went up a smoke out of his nostrils, and fire out of his mouth devoured: coals were kindled by it. He bowed the heavens also, and came down: and darkness was under his feet. And he rode upon a cherub, and did fly; yea, he did fly upon the wings of the wind. He made darkness his secret place: his pavilion round about him were dark waters and thick clouds of the skies. At the brightness that was before him his thick clouds passed; hailstones and coals of fire.
7. The Lord also thundered in the heavens, and the Highest gave his voice; hailstones and coals of fire. Yea, he sent out his arrows, and scattered them; and he shot out lightnings, and discomfited them. Then the channels of waters were seen, and the foundations of the world were discovered at thy rebuke, O Lord, at the blast of the breath of thy nostrils. He sent from above, he took me, he drew me out of many waters; he delivered me from my strong enemy, and from them which hated me: for they were too strong for me. They prevented me in the day of my calamity: but the Lord was my stay. He brought me forth also into a large place: he delivered me, because he delighted in me.

The title gives us the occasion of penning this psalm; we had it before, (2 Sam. xxii. 1.) only here we are told, that the psalm was delivered To the chief musician, or precentor, in the temple-songs. Note: The private compositions of good men, designed by them for their own use, may be service-

PSALM XVIII.

This psalm we read before in the history of David's life, 2 Sam. xxii. This was the first edition of it, here we have it revived, altered a little, and fitted for the service of the church. It is David's thanksgiving for the many deliverances God had wrought for him; these he desired always to preserve fresh in his own memory, and to diffuse and entail the knowledge of them. It is an admirable composition. The poetry is very fine, the images bold, the expressions lofty, and every word proper and significant. In this the poetry of faith, love, and joy, and praise, and hope, are here lively, active, and upon the wing. I. He triumphs in God, v. 1. 3. II. He magnifies the deliverances God had wrought for him, v. 4. 19. 31. He takes the comfort of his integrity, which God had thereby cleared up, v. 20. 58. IV. He gives to God the glory of all his achievements, v. 29. 42. V. He encourages himself with the expectation of what God would further do for him, and his, v. 43. 50.

To the chief musician. A psalm of David, the servant of the Lord, who speak unto the Lord the words of this song in the day that the Lord delivered him from the hand of all his enemies, and from the hand of Saul: and he said,
able to the public, that others may not only borrow light from their candle, but heat from their fire. Examples sometimes teach better than rules. And David is here called the servant of the Lord, as Moses was, not only as every good man is God's servant, but because, with his sceptre, with his sword, and with his pen, he greatly promoted the interests of God's kingdom in Israel. It was more his honour, that he was a servant of the Lord, than that he was king of a great kingdom; and so he himself accounted it, (cxxvi. 16.) "O Lord, truly I am thy servant." In these verses, 1. He triumphs in God and his relation to him. The first words of the psalm, I will love thee, O Lord, my Strength, are here prefixed as the scope and contents of the whole. Love to God is the first and great commandment of the law, because it is the principle of all our acceptable praise and obedience; and this use we should make of all the mercies God bestows upon us, our hearts should thereby be enlarged in love to him. This he requires, and will accept; and we are very ungrateful if we grudge him so poor a return. An interest in the person loved, is the lover's delight; this string, therefore, he touches, and on this he harps with much pleasure; (v. 2.) "The Lord, Jehovah, is my God," and then, "I am his Rock, his Fortress, all that I need, and can desire in my present distress." For there is that in God, which is suited to all the exigencies and occasions of his people that trust in him, "He is my Rock and Strength, and Fortress," that is, (1.) "I have found him so in the greatest dangers and difficulties." (2.) "I have chosen him to be so, disclaiming all others, and depending upon him alone to protect me." Those that truly love God, may thus triumph in him as theirs, and may with confidence call upon him, v. 3. This further use we should make of our deliverances, we must not only love God the better, but love prayer the better; call upon him as long as we live, especially in time of trouble, with an assurance, that so we shall be saved; for thus it is written, Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved, Acts i. 21.

II. He sets himself to magnify the deliverances God had wrought for him, that he might be the more affected in his returns of praise. It is good for us to observe all the circumstances of a mercy, which magnify the power of God and his goodness to us.

1. The more imminent and threatening the danger was, out of which we were delivered, the greater is the mercy of the deliverance. David saw remembered how the forces of his enemies poured in upon him, which he calls the floods of Belial, shoals of the children of Belial, likely to overpower him with numbers; they surrounded him, compassed him about; they surprised him, and their means were very near seizing him, their snares prevented him; and when wounds were fightings, within were fears and sorrows, v. 4, 5. His spirit was overwhelmed, and he looked upon himself as a lost man; see cxxvi. 3.

2. The more earnest we have been with God for deliverance, and the more direct answer it is to our prayers, the more we are obliged to be thankful. David's deliverances were so, v. 6. David was found, and was saved, and was brought a praying-hearing God. If we pray as he did, we shall have as speed as he did. Though distress drives us to prayer, God will not therefore be deaf to us; nay, being a God of pity, he will be the more ready to succour us.

3. The more wonderful God's appearances are in any deliverance, the greater it is: such were the deliverance wrought for David, in which God's manifestation of his presence and glorious attributes is most magnificently described, v. 7, &c. Little appeared of man, but much of God, in these deliverances. (1.) He appeared a God of almightiness; for God made the earth to tremble, and moved even the foundations of the hills, v. 7, as of old at mount Sinai. When the men of the earth were struck with fear, then the earth might be said to tremble; when the great men of the earth were put into confusion, then the hills moved. (2.) He showed his anger and displeasure against the enemies and persecutors of his people. He was wrath, v. 7. His wrath smoked, it burned, it was fire, it was devouring fire, v. 8. It was a sore and grievous thing to them. (3.) He showed his anger and displeasure against himself; that is, against his distressed servants, v. 10. No opposition, no obstruction, can be given to him, who rides upon the wings of the wind, who rides on the heavens, for the help of his people, and, in his excellency, on the skies. (4.) He showed his condescension, in taking cognizance of David's case; he bowed the heavens and came down; (v. 9.) did not send an angel, but came himself, as one affected in the afflictions of his people. (5.) He wrapped himself in darkness, and yet commanded light to shine out of darkness for his people, Isa. xlv. 1. He is a God that hideth himself; for he made darkness his pavilion, v. 11. His glory is invisible, his counsels are unsearchable, and his proceedings unaccountable, and so, as to us, clouds and darkness are round about him; we know not the way that he takes, even when he is coming towards us in ways of mercy; but when his designs are secret, they are dark; for though he hide himself, he is the God of Israel, the Saviour, and, at his brightness, the thick clouds pass; (v. 12.) comfort returns, the face of affairs is changed, and that which was gloomy and threatening becomes serene and pleasant.

4. The greater the difficulties are that lie in the way of deliverance, the more glorious the deliverance is. For the rescuing of David, the waters were to be divided till the very channels were seen; the earth was to be cloven till the very foundations of it were disturbed, v. 15. Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved, and deep and many, waters out of which he was to be drawn, (v. 16.) as Moses, who had his name from being drawn out of the water literally, as David was figuratively. His enemies were strong, and they hated him; had he been left to himself, they had been too strong for him, v. 17. And they were too quick for him; for they prevented him in the day of his calamity, v. 18. But, in the midst of his troubles, he felt himself made hid under the throne, v. 19. Note, God will not only deliver his people out of their troubles in due time, but he will sustain them and bear them up under their troubles, in the mean time.

5. That which especially magnified the deliverance, was, that his comfort was the fruit of it, and God's favour was the root and fountain of it. (1.) It was an introduction to his preferment, v. 19. It brought him to a large place, where I had room, not only to turn, but to thrive in." (2.) It was a token of God's favour to him, and that made it doubly sweet; "He delivered me, because he delighted in me, not for my merit, but for his own grace and good-will." Compare this with 2 Sam. xv. 26. If he thus say, I have no delight in thee, here I am. We owe our salvation, that great deliverance, to the delight G had in the Son of David, in whom he has declared himself to be well-pleased.

In singing this, we must triumph in God, and trust in him; and we may apply it to Christ the Son of David; the sorrows of death surrounded him, in his distress he prayed, (Heb. v. 7.) God made him to grow up to sit as a prince upon the throne before the sun; and the rocks to cleave, and brought him out, in his resurrection, into a large place, because he delighted in him and in his undertaking.

20. The Lord rewarded me according to my righteousness; according to the cleanliness of my hands hath he recompensed me.

21. For I have kept the ways of the Lord, and have not wickedly departed from my God. 22. For all his judgments were before me, and I did not put away his statutes from me. 23. I was also upright before him, and I kept myself from mine iniquity.

24. Therefore hath the Lord recompensed me according to my righteousness, according to the cleanness of my hands in his eyesight. 25. With the merciful thou wilt show thyself merciful; with an upright man thou wilt show thyself upright; 26. With the pure thou wilt show thyself pure; and with the froward thou wilt show thyself froward. 27. For thou wilt save the afflicted people; but wilt bring down high looks. 28. For thou wilt light my candle; the Lord my God will enlighten my darkness.

Here

1. David reflects, with comfort, upon his own integrity, and rejoices in the testimony of his conscience, that he had had his conversation in godly sincerity, and with not fleshly wisdom, 2 Cor. i. 12. His deliveries were an evidence of this, and this was the great comfort of his deliverances. His enemies had misrepresented him, and perhaps, when his troubles continued long, he began to suspect himself; but, when God visibly took his part, he had both the credit and the comfort of his righteousness. (1.) His deliveries cleared his innocence before men, and acquitted him from those crimes which he was falsely accused of. This he calls "rewarding him according to his righteousness, (v. 20, 24.)" determining the controversy between him and his enemies, according to the justice of his cause, and the cleanness of his hands, from that sedition, treason, and rebellion, with which he was charged. He had often appealed to God concerning his innocence; and now God had given judgment upon the appeal, (as he always will,) according to equity. (2.) They confirmed the testimony of his own conscience for him, which he here reviews with a great deal of pleasure, v. 21-23. His own heart knew him ready to attest it, [1.] That he had kept firm to his duty, and had not departed, not wickedly, not wilfully departed, from his God. They that forsake the ways of the Lord do, in effect, depart from their God, and it is a wicked thing to do so. But though we are conscious to ourselves of many a stumble, and many a false step taken, yet, if we recover ourselves by repentance, and go on in the way of our duty, it shall not be construed into a departure, for it is not a wicked departure, from our God. [2.] That he had kept his eye upon the rule of God's commands; (v. 22.) "All his judgments were before me; and I had a respect to them all, despised none as little, disliked none as hard; but made it my care and business to conform to them all. His statutes I did not put away from me, out of my sight, out of my mind, but kept my eye always upon them, and did not as those who, because they would quit the ways of the Lord, desire not the knowledge of those ways." [3.] That he had kept himself from his iniquity, and thereby had approved himself upright before God. Constant care to abstain from that sin, whatever it be, which most easily betrays us, and to mortify the habit of it, will be a good evidence for us, that we are upright before God. As David's deliveries cleared his integrity, so did the explanation of Christ clear his, and for ever roll away the approach that was cast upon him; and therefore he is said to be "justified in the Spirit," 1 Tim. iii. 16.

2. He takes occasion thence to lay down the rules of God's government and judgment, that we may know not only what God expects from us, but what we may expect from him, v. 25, 26. (1.) Those that show mercy to others, (even they need mercy, and cannot depend upon the merit, no not upon their works of mercy,) shall find mercy with God. Matt. v. 44. (2.) Those that misrepresent their covenants with God, and the relations wherein they stand to him, shall find him all that to them which he has promised to be. Wherever God finds an upright man, he will be found an upright God. (3.) Those that serve God with a pure conscience, shall find that the words of the Lord are pure words, very sure to be depended on, and very sweet to be delighted in. (4.) Those that resist God, and walk contrary to him, shall find that he will resist them, and walk contrary to them, Lev. xxvi. 21, 24.

3. Hence he speaks comfort to the humble; "Thou wilt save the afflicted people, that are wronged and bear it patiently;" but he speaks terror to the proud; "Thou wilt bring down high looks, that aim high, and expect great things for themselves, and look with scorn and disdain upon the poor and pious;" and he speaks encouragement to himself; "Thou wilt light my candle; thou wilt revive and comfort my sorrowful spirit, and not leave me melancholy; thou wilt recover me out of my troubles, and restore me to peace and prosperity; thou wilt make my honour bright, which is now eclipsed; thou wilt guide my way, and make it plain before me, that I may avoid the snares laid for me; thou wilt light my candle to work by, and give me an opportunity of serving thee, and the interests of thy kingdom among men." Let those that walk in darkness, and labour under many discouragements, in singing these verses, encourage themselves, that God himself will be a Light to them.

29. For by thee I have run through a troop; and by my God have I leaped over a wall. 30. As for God, his way is perfect: the word of the Lord is tried; he is a buckler to all those that trust in him. 31. For who is God that save the Lord? or who is a rock save our God? 32. It is God that girdeth me with strength, and maketh my way perfect. 33. He maketh my feet like hinds' feet, and setteth me upon my high places. 34. He teacheth my hands to war, so that a bow of steel is broken by mine arms. 35. Thou hast also given me the shield of thy salvation: and thy right hand hath holden me up, and thy gentleness hath made me great. 36. Thou hast enlarged my steps under me, that my feet did not slip. 37. I have pursued mine enemies, and overtaken them: neither did I turn again till they were consumed. 38. I have wounded them that they were not able to rise: they are fallen under my feet. 39. For thou hast girded me with strength unto the battle: thou hast subdued under me those that rose up against me. 40. Thou hast also given me the necks of mine enemies, that I might destroy them that hate me. 41. They cried, but there was none to save them: even unto the Lord, but he answered them not. 42. Then did I beat them small as the dust before the wind; I did cast them out as the dirt in the streets. 43. Thou hast delivered me from the strivings of the people; and thou hast made me the head of the heathen: a people whom I have not known shall serve me. 44. As soon as they hear of me, they shall obey me: the strangers shall submit themselves unto me. 45. The strangers shall fade away, and be afraid out of their close places. 46. The Lord liveth; and blessed be my rock; and let the God of my salvation be exalted. 47. It is God that avengeth me, and subdueth the people under me. 48. He delivereth me from mine enemies; yea, thou liftest me up above those that rise up against me: thou hast delivered me from the violent man. 49. Therefore will I give thanks unto thee, O Lord, among the heathen, and sing praises unto thy name. 50. Great deliverance giveth he to his king; and showeth mercy to his anointed, to David, and to his seed for evermore.

In these verses,
I. David looks back, with thankfulness, upon the great things which God had done for him; he had not only wrought deliverance for him, but had given him victory and success, and made him triumph over those who thought to have triumphed over him. When we set ourselves to praise God for one mercy, we must be led by that to observe the many more with which we have been compassed about, and followed, all our days. Many things had contributed to David's advancement, and he owns the hand of God in them all, to teach us to do likewise, in reviewing the several steps by which we have risen to our prosperity. 1. God has given him all his skill and understanding in military affairs, which he was not bred up to, nor designed for; his genius leading him more to music and poetry, and a contemplative life; He teaches my hands to war, v. 34. 2. God had given him bodily strength to go through the business and fatigue of war; God girded him with strength, (v. 32, 39,) to that degree, that he could break even a bow of steel, v. 34. What service God designs men for, he will be sure to fit them for. 3. God had likewise given him great swiftness, not to flee from the enemies, but to fly upon them; (v. 33.)

He makes my feet like hind's feet, v. 36. "Thou hast enlarged my steps under me; but" (whereas those that take large steps, are apt to tread awry) "my feet did not slip." He was so swift that he pursued his enemies and overtook them, v. 37. 4. God had made him very bold and daring in his enterprises, and given him spirit proportionable to his strength. If a troop stood in his way, he made nothing of wading through them; if a wall, he made nothing of leaping over it. (v. 38.) If ram parts and bulwarks, he soon mounted them; and, by divine assistance, set his feet upon the high places of the enemy, v. 33. 5. God had protected him, and kept him safe, in the midst of the greatest perils; many a time he put his life in his hand, and yet it was wonderfully preserved; "Thou hast given me the shield of thy salvation, (v. 35.) and that has compassed me on every side: that I have been delivered from the strivings of the people who aimed at my destruction, I give my honour largely from the violent man," (v. 48.) Saul, who more than once threw a javelin at him. 6. God had prospered and succeeded him in his designs; he it was that made his way perfect, (v. 32.) and it was his right hand, that held him up, v. 33. 7. God had given him victory over his enemies, the Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites, and all that fought against Israel: those especially he means, (v. 39.) not excluding the Philistines, before his coming to the crown, and the partitions of Ab-salom and Sheba, who would have deposed him. He enlarges much upon the goodness of God to him in defeating his enemies, attributing his victories, not to his own sword or bow, or the valour of his mighty men, but to the favour of God; I pursued them, (v. 37.) I wounded them, (v. 38.) for thou hast girded me with strength, (v. 39.) else I could not bring the praise that is ascribed to God; Thou hast subdued them under me, v. 39.

Thou hast given me their necks, (v. 40.) not only to trample upon them, (as Josh. x. 24,) but to cut them off. Even those who hated David whom God loved, and were enemies to the Israel of God, in their distress, cried unto the Lord, but in vain, he answered them not. How could they expect he should, when it was he whom they fought against? And when he disowned them, (as he will all those that fight against him,) those who could succours could stand in stead; There was none to save them, v. 41. Those whom God has aban-doned are easily vanquished; They did I beat them small as the dust, v. 42. But those whose cause is just he avenges, (v. 47.) and those whom he favours will certainly be lifted up above those that rise up against them, v. 48. 8. God had raised him to the throne, and not only delivered him and kept him alive, but dignified him and made him great; (v. 35.) Thy gentleness has increased my discipline and instruction; so some. The good lessons David learned in his affliction prepared him for the dignity and power that were intended him; and the lessening of him helped very much to greater him. God made him not only a great conqueror, but a great ruler; Thou hast made me the head of the heathen; (v. 43.) all the neighbour- ing nations brought him to. See 2 Sam. viii. 6, 11. In all this, David was just, whom the Father brought safely through his conflicts with the powers of darkness, and made victo-rious over them, and gave to be Head over all things to his church, which is his body.

II. David looks up, with humble and reverent adorations of the divine glory and perfection; when God had, by his providence, magnified him, he endeavours, with his praises, to magnify God, to bless him and exalt him, v. 46. He gives honour to him, 1. As a living God, The Lord liveth, v. 44.
We had our lives at first from, and owe the continuance of them to, that God who has life in himself, and is therefore fitly called the living God. The gods of the heathen were dead gods; the best friends we have among men are dying friends; but God lives, lives for ever, and will not fail those that trust in him, but, because he lives, they shall live also; for he is their Life. 2. As a finishing God; As for him, he is not only perfect himself, but his way is perfect, (v. 30.) He is known by his name Jehovah, (Exod. 3. 1.) a name ful of perfections, and perfection, when he begins, in providence as well as creation, Gen. ii. 1. If it was God that made David's way perfect, (v. 32.) much more is his own so. There is no flaw in God's works, nor any fault to be found with what he does, Escl. iii.
14. And what he undertakes he will go through with, whatever difficulties lie in the way; what God begins to build, he is able to finish. 3. As a faithful God; The word of the Lord is tried. "I have thought upon it," (says David,) "and it has not failed me." All the saints, in all ages, have tried it, and it never failed any that trusted in it. It is tried as silver is tried, refined from all such mixture and alloy as lessen the value of men's words.
David, in God's providences concerning him, takes notice of the performance of his promises to him,
which, as it puts sweetness into the providence, so it puts honour upon the promise. 4. As the Protector and Deliverer of his people, v. 31. David was made a Buckler to all those that trust in him; (v. 30.) he shelters and protects them all, is both able and ready to do so. 5. As a non-such in all this; (v.
31.) There is a God, and who is God, save Jehovah? That God is a Rock, for the support and shelter of his faithful worshippers; and who is a Rock, save our God? Thus he not only gives us to God, but encourages his own faith in him.
Note, (1.) Whoever pretend to be deities, it is certain that there is no God, save the Lord; all others are counterfeiters. Isa. xlv. 8. Jer. x. 10.
(2.) Whoever pretend to be our felicities, there is no Rock, save our God; none that we can depend upon to make us happy.

III. David looks forward, with a believing hope that God would still do him good. He promises himself, and the Church, that he should be completely subdued, and that those of him that yet remained should be made his footstool. That his government should be extensive, so that even a people whom he had not known should serve him, v. 43.
That his conquests, and, consequently, his accretions, should be easy; As soon as they hear of me, they shall obey me, v. 44. And that his enemies should be convinced that it was to no purpose to oppose him when he was armed, and therefore they shall not trust to them, but be afraid out of their close places, having seen so much of David's wisdom, courage, and success. Thus the Son of David, though he sees not yet all things put under him, yet knows he shall reign till all opposing rule, principality, and power, shall be quite put down. 2.
That his seed should be for ever continued in the Messiah, who, he foresaw, should come from him, v. 7. He shows mean to his ancient, Messiah, to David himself, the God of Jacob in the type, and to his seed for evermore. He saith not unto seeds, as of many, but to his Seed, as of one, that is Christ, Gal. iii. 16. It is he only that shall reign for ever, and of the increase of whose government and peace there shall be no end. Christ is called David, Hos. iii. 5.
God has called him his King, ii. 6. Great deliberation God does give, and will give, to him, and to his church and people, here called his seed for evermore.

In singing these verses, we must give God the glory of the victories of Christ and his church hitherto, and of all the deliverances and advancements of the gospel-kingdom; and encourage our selves and one another with an assurance, that the church militant will be shortly triumphant, will be eternally so.

PSALM XIX.

There are two excellent books which the great God has published for the instruction and edification of the children of men; this psalm treats of them both, and recom-mands them both to our diligent study. 1. The book of the creatures, in which we may easily read the power and Godhead of the Creator; v. 1-6. II. The book of the scriptures, which makes known to us the will of God concerning our duty. He shows the excellency and usefulness of that book, (v. 7-11.) and then teaches us how to improve it, v. 12-14.

To the chief musician. A psalm of David.

1. The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament showeth his handy-work. 2. Day unto day utter-speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge. 3. There is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard. 4. Their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world. In them hath he set a tabernacle for the sun;

5. Which is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, and rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race. 6. His going forth is from the end of the heaven, and his circuit unto the ends of it; and there is nothing hid from the heat thereof.

From the things that are seen every day by all the world, the psalmist, in these verses, leads us to the consideration of the invisible things of God, whose being appears incontestably evident, and whose glory shines transcendently bright, in the visible heavens, the structure and beauty of them, and the order and influence of the heavenly bodies.
This instance of the divine power serves not only to show the folly of atheists, who see there is a heaven, and yet say, "There is no God;" who see the effect, and yet say, "There is no cause;" but to show the glow of idolaters also, and the vanity of their imagination, who, though the heavens declare the glory of God, yet gave that glory to the lights of heaven, which those very lights directed them to give to God only, the Father of lights. Now observe here,
1. What is that which the creatures notify to us:
they are many ways useful and serviceable to us, but in nothing so much as in this, that they declare the glory of God, by showing his handy-works,
v. 1. They plainly speak themselves to be God's handy-works; for they could not exist from eternity,
all succession and motion must have had a beginning;
they could not make themselves, that is a contradiction; they could not be produced by a casual hit of atoms, that is an absurdity, fit rather to be bantioned than reasoned with; therefore they must have a Creator, who can be no other than an Eternal Mind, infinitely wise, powerful, and good. Thus it appears they are God's works, the work of his fingers, (viii. 3.) and therefore they declare his glory. From the excellency of the work, we may easily infer the infinite perfection of its great Author. From the brightness of the heavens, we may collect that the Creator is Light; their vastness of extent bespeaks his immensity; their height his transcendency and sovereignty; their influence upon this earth, his dominion and providence, and universal beneficence: and all declare his almighty power, by which they were at first made, and continue to this day, according to the ordinances that were then settled.

II. What are some of those things which notify this?

1. The heavens and the firmament: the vast expanse of air and ether, and the spheres of the planets, and fixed stars. Man has this advantage above the beasts, in the structure of his body, that, whereas they are made to look downward, as their spirits must go, he is made erect, to look upward, because upward his spirit must shortly go, and his thoughts should now rise.

2. The constant and regular succession of day and night; (v. 2.) Day unto day, and night unto night, speak the glory of that God who first divided between the light and the darkness, and has, from the beginning to this day, preserved that established order without variation, according to God's covenant with Noah, (Gen. viii. 22.) that, while the earth remains, day and night shall not cease; to which covenant of providence, the covenant of grace is compared for its stability, Jer. xxxiii. 20. xxxi 35. The counterchanging of day and night, in so exact a method, is a great instance of the power which controls the earth. It is the kingdom of nature, so in that of providence, he forms the light, and creates the darkness, (Isa. xlv. 7.) and sets the one over-against the other. It is likewise an instance of his goodness to man; for he makes the outgoings of the morning and evening to rejoice, lxv. 8. He not only glorifies himself, but gratifies us, by this constant revolution; for, as the light of the morning befriended the business of the day, so the shadows of the evening befriended the repose of the night; every day and every night speak the goodness of God, and when they have finished their testimony, leave it to the next day, to the next night, to say the same.

3. The light and influence of the sun, do, in a special manner, declare the glory of God; for, of all the heavenly bodies, that is the most conspicuous in itself, and most useful to this lower world, which would be all dungeon, and all desert, without it. It is a very improbable conjecture, that David penned this psalm when he had the rising sun to view, and from the brightness of it took occasion to declare the glory of God. Concerning the sun, observe here, (1.) The place appointed him: in the heavens God has set a tabernacle for the sun. The heavenly bodies are called hosts of heaven, and therefore are fitly said to dwell in tents, as soldiers in their encampments: the sun is said to have a tabernacle set him, not only because he is in continual motion, and ne'er can be at rest, but because the mansion he has will, at the end of time, be taken down like a tent, when the heavens shall be rolled together like a scroll, and the sun shall be turned into darkness. (2.) The course assigned him: that glorious creature was not made to be idle, but his going forth (at least, as it appears to our eye) is from one point of the heavens, and his circuit thence to the opposite point, and thence (to complete his diurnal revolution) to the same point again; and this with such steadiness and constancy, that he can certainly tell the hour and the minute at which the sun will rise at such a place, any day to come. (3.) The brightness wherein he appears: he is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, richly dressed up and adorned, as fine as hands can make him, looking pleasantly himself, and making all about him pleasant; for the friend of the bridegroom rejoices greatly to hear the bridegroom's voice, John iii 29. (4.) The cheerfulness wherewith he makes his tour: though it seems a vast round which he has to walk, and he has not a moment's rest, yet, in obedience to the law of his creation, and for the service of man, he not only does it, but does it with a great deal of pleasure, and rejoices as a strong man to run a race. With such satisfaction did Christ, the Sun of righteousness, finish the work that was given him to do. (5.) His universal influence on this earth: there is a thing hid from the heat thereof. You must look among the bowels of the earth, which the sun has an influence upon.

III. To whom this declaration is made of the glory of God; it is made to all parts of the world; (v. 3, 4.) There is no speech nor language, (no nation, for the nations were divided after their tongues, Gen. x. 31, 32.) where their voice is not heard. Their line is gone through all the earth, (the equinoctial line suppose,) and with it, their words to the end of the world, proclaiming the eternal power of the God of nature, v. 4. The apostle uses this as a reason why the Jews should not be angry with him and others for preaching the gospel to the Gentiles, because God had already made himself known to the Gentile world by the works of creation, and left not himself without witness among them, (Rom. x. 18.) so that they were without excuse, if they were idolaters, Rom. i. 20, 21. And those were without blame, who, by preaching the gospel to them, endeavoured to turn them from their idolatry. If God used these means to prevent their apostasy, and they proved ineffectual, the apostles did well to use other means to recover them from it. They have no speech or language, (so some read it,) and yet their voice is heard. All people may hear these natural immortal preachers speak to them, in their own tongue, the wonderful works of God.

In singing these verses, we must give God the glory of all the comfort and benefit we have by the lights of heaven, still looking above and beyond them to the Sun of righteousness.

7. The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul: the testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple: 8. The statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart: the commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes: 9. The fear of the Lord is clean, enduring for ever: the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether. 10. More to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold; sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb. 11. Moreover, by them is thy servant warned: and in keeping of them there is great reward. 12. Who can understand his errors? cleanse thou me from secret faults. 13. Keep back thy servant also from presumptuous sins; let them not have dominion over me: then shall I be upright, and I shall be innocent from the great transgression. 14. Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart, be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, my strength and my redeemer.

God's glory, that is, his goodness to man, appears much in the works of creation, but much more in and by divine revelation. The holy scripture, as it is a rule both of our duty to God and of our expectation from him, is of much greater use and benefit to us than day or night, than the air we breathe in, or the light of the sun. The discoveries made of God by his works might have served, if man had retained his integrity; but, to recover him out of his fallen state, this other course must be taken; that must be done by the word of God. And here,

I. The psalmist gives an account of the excellent properties and uses of the word of God, in six sentences, (v. 7-9.) in each of which the name Jehovah is repeated; and no vain repetition, for the law has its authority and all its excellency from the Law-Maker. Here are six several titles of the word of God, to take in the whole of divine revelation, precepts, and promises, and especially the gospel. Here are several good properties of it, which prove its divine original, which recommend it to our affection, and which extol it above all other laws whatsoever; and here are several good effects of the law upon the minds of men, which show what it is designed for, what use we are to make of it, and how wonderful the efficacy of divine grace is, going along with it, and working by it.

1. The law of the Lord is perfect; it is perfectly free from that which is unsuitable, filled with all good and perfectly fitted for the end for which it is designed; it will make the man of God perfect, 2 Tim. iii. 17. Nothing is to be added to it, or taken from it. It is of use to convert the soul, to bring us back to ourselves, to our God, to our duty; for it shows us our sinfulness and misery in our departures from God, and the indispensible necessity of our return to him.

2. The testimony of the Lord (which witnesses for him to us sure, incontestably and inviolably sure, what we may give credit to, may rely upon, and may be confident it will not deceive us. It is a sure discovery of divine truth, a sure direction in the way of duty. It is a sure fountain of living comforts, and a sure foundation of lasting hopes. It is of use to make us wise, wise to salvation, 2 Tim. iii. 15. It will give us an insight into things divine, and a foresight of things to come. It will employ us in the best work, and secure to us our true interests. It may be in the hand of men, who are simple, poor contrivers as they may be for the present world, wise for their souls and eternities. Those that are humbly simple, sensible of their own folly, and willing to be taught, those shall be made wise by the word of God, xxv. 9.

3. The statutes of the Lord (enacted by his authority, and binding on all wherever they come) are right, exactly agreeing with the eternal rules and principles of good and evil, that is, with the right reason of man, and the right counsels of God. All God's precepts, concerning all things, are right, (cxxx. 128.) just as they should be; and they will set us to rights, if we receive them, and submit to them; and, because they are right, they rejoice the heart. The law, as we see it in the hands of Christ, gives cause for joy; and, when it is written in our hearts, it lays a foundation for lasting joy, by restoring us to right and peace.

The commandment of the Lord is pure; it is clear without darkness, it is clear, without dross and defilement. It is itself purified from all alloy, and is purifying to those that receive and embrace it. It is the ordinary means which the Spirit uses in enlightening the eyes; it brings us to a sight and sense of our sin and misery, and directs us in the way of duty.

4. The fear of the Lord (true religion and godliness, prescribed in the word, reigning in the heart, and practised in the life) is clean, clean itself, and will make us clean; (John xv. 3.) it will cleanse our way, cxxvi. 9. And it endures for ever; it is of perpetual obligation, and can never be repealed; the ceremonial law is long since done away, but the law concerning the fear of God is ever the same. Time will not alter the nature of moral good and evil.

5. The judgments of the Lord (all his precepts, which are founded in infinite wisdom) are true; they are grounded upon the most sacred and unquestionable truths; they are righteous, all consonant to natural equity; and they are so altogether, there is no unrighteousness in any of them, but they are all of a piece.

II. He expresses the great value he had for the word of God, and the great advantage he had, and hoped to have, from it, v. 10, 11.

How highly he prized the commandments of God: it is written, they are good for men, that they prefer their religion and the word of God, (1.) Far before all the wealth of the world; it is more desirable than gold, than fine gold, than much fine gold. Gold is of the earth, earthly; but grace is the image of the heavenly. Gold is only for the body, and the concerns of time; but grace is for the soul, and the concerns of eternity. (2.) Far before all the pleasures and delights of sense. The word of God, received by faith, is sweeter than honey, and the honey-comb. The pleasures of sense are the delight of brutes, and therefore desbase the great soul of man; the pleasures of religion are the delight of angels, and exalt the soul. The pleasures of sense are deceitful, will soon surfeit, and yet never satisfy; but those of religion are substantial and satisfying, and there is no danger of exceeding in them.

6. See what use he made of the precepts of God's word. By them is my soul warned. The word of God is a word of warning to the children of men; it warns us of the duty we are to do, the dangers we are to avoid, and the deluge we are to prepare for, Ezek. iii. 17.—xxxvii. 7. It warns the wicked not to go on in his wicked way, and warns the righteous not to turn from his good way. All that are indeed God's servants take this warning.

7. See what advantage he promised himself by his obedience to God's precepts; In keeping of them there is great reward. Those who make conscience of their duty, will not only be no losers by it, but unspeakable gainers. There is a reward, not only after keeping, but in keeping, God's commandments; a present great reward of obedience in obedience. Religion is health and honour, it is peace and pleasure; it will make our comforts sweet, and our crosses easy, life truly valuable, and death itself truly desirable.

8. He draw some good inferences from this pious meditation upon the excellency of the word of God. Such thoughts as these should excite in us devout affections, and then they are to good purpose.

1. He takes occasion hence to make a penitent reflection upon his sins; for by the law is the knowledge of sin. Is the commandment thus holy, just, and good? Then who can understand his errours? By them is thy servant... From the provisions of the divine law he learns to call his sins his errors; if the commandment be true and righteous, every transgression of the commandment is an error, as grounded upon a mistake; every wicked practice takes rise from some corrupt principle; it is a deviation from the rule we are to work by, the way we are to walk in. From the extent, and strictness, and spiritual nature, of the divine law, he learns that his sins are so many, that he utterly despairs of the number of them, and so exceeding sinful, that he cannot understand the heinousness and malignity of them. We are guilty of many sins, which, through our carelessness and partiality to ourselves, we are not aware of: many we have been guilty of, which we have forgotten; so that when we have been ever so particular in the confession of sin, we must conclude with an acknowledgment that God knows a great deal more evil of us, than we do of ourselves. In many things we all offend, and who can tell how often he offends? It is well that we are under grace, and not under the law, else we were undone.

2. He takes occasion hence to pray against sin; all the discoveries of sin made us by the law, should drive us to the throne of grace, there to pray, as David does here.

(1.) For mercy to pardon; finding himself unable to specify all the particulars of his transgressions, he cries out, Lord, cleanse me from my secret faults; not secret to God, so none are, nor only such as are secret to the world, but such as were hid from his own observation of himself. The best of men have reason to suspect themselves guilty of many secret faults, and to pray to God to cleanse them from that guilt, and not to lay it to their charge; for even our sins of infirmity and inadvertency, and our secret sins, would be our ruin, if God should deal with us according to the desert of them. Even secret faults are deluding, and render us unfit for communion with God; but when they are pardoned, we are cleansed from them, 1 John, i. 7.

(2.) For grace to help in time of need; having prayed that his sins of infirmity might be pardoned, he prays that presumptuous sins might be prevented,
v. 13. All that truly repent of their sins, and have them pardoned, are in care not to relapse into sin, nor to return again to folly, as appears by their prayers, which concur with David's here. Where observe, [1.] His petition; "Keep me from ever being guilty of a wilful presumptuous sin." We ought to pray that we may be kept from sins of infirmity, but especially from presumptuous sins, which most offend God, and wound conscience, which wither our comforts, and shock our hopes, "However, let none such have dominion over me, let me not be at the command of any such sin, nor be enslaved by it." [2.] His plea; "So shall I be upright; I shall appear upright; I shall preserve the evidence and comfort of my uprightness; and I shall be innocent from the great transgression;" so he calls a presumptuous sin, because no sacrifice was accepted for it, Numb. xv. 28.-30. Note, First, Presumptuous sins are very heinous and dan-gersous; those that sin against the habitual convictions and actual admonitions of their own consciences, in contempt and defiance of the law and its sanctions, that sin with a high hand, sin presumptuously, and it is a great transgression. Seccondly, Even good men ought to be jealous of themselves, and afraid of sinning presumptuously, yea, though through the grace of God they have hitherto been kept from them. Let none be high-minded, but fear; for as much as they have great need to pray to God, when we are pushing forward toward a presumptuous sin, to keep us back from it, either by his providence preventing the temptation, or by his grace giving us victory over it.

3. He takes occasion humbly to beg the divine acceptance of those his pious thoughts and affections, v. 14. Observe the connexion of this with what he before said, that God knows a great deal more evil of us, than we do of ourselves. In many things we all offend, and who can tell how often he offends? It is well that we are under grace, and not under the law, else we were undone.

(1.) What his services were; the words of his mouth, and the meditations of his heart, his holy affections offered up to God. The pious meditations of the heart must not be smothered, but expressed in the words of our mouth, for God's glory, and the edification of others; and the words of our mouth in prayer and praise must not be formal, but araising from the meditation of the heart, xliv. 1.

(2.) What was his care concerning these services; that they might be acceptable with God—else what do they avail us? Gracious souls must have all they aim at, if they be excepted of God, for that is their bliss. (3.) What encouragement he had to hope for this; because God was his Strength and his Redeemer. If we seek assistance from God as our Strength in our religious duties, we may hope to find acceptance with God of our duties; for by his strength we have power with him.

In singing this, we should get our hearts much affected with the excellency of the word of God, and deliered into it; we should be much affected with the evil of sin, the danger we are in of it, and the danger we are in by it, and we should fetch in help from heaven against it.

PSALM XXX.

It is the will of God that prayers, intercessions, and thankgivings, should be made, in a special manner, for kings, and all in authority. This is a prayer, and the next a thanksgiving, for the king. David was a martial prince, much in war. Either this psalm was penned upon occasion of some particular expedition of his, or, in general, they were to be used in the daily service of the church for him. In this psalm, we may observe, I. What it is they beg of God for the king, v. 1.-. 4. II. With what assurance they beg it. The people triumph; (v. 5.) The prince; (v. 6.) Both together; (v. 7, 8.) and so he concludes with a prayer to God for audiences, v. 9. In this, David may well be looked upon as a type of Christ, to whose kingdom, and its interests among men, the church was, in every age, a hearty well-wisher.

To the chief musician. A psalm of David.

1. The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble; the name of the God of Jacob defend thee. 2. Send thee help from the sanctuary, and strengthen thee out of Zion. 3. Remember all thy offerings, and accept thy burnt-sacrifice. Selah. 4. Grant thee according to thine own heart, and fulfill all thy counsel. 5. We will rejoice in thy salvation, and in the name of our God we will set up our banners: the Lord fulfill all thy petitions.

This prayer for David is entitled, a psalm of Davil; nor was it any absurdity at all for him, who was divinely inspired, to draw up a directory, or form of prayer, to be used in the congregation for himself, and those in authority under him; nay, it is very proper for those who desire the prayers of their friends, to tell them particularly what they would have to be asked of God for them. Note, Even great and good men, and those that know well how to pray for themselves, must not despise, but earnestly desire, the prayers of others for them, even those that are their inferiors in all respects. Paul often begged of his friends to pray for him. Magistrates, and those in power, ought to esteem praying people, and encourage them to reckon them their strength, (Zech. xii. 5, 10.) and to do them what they can for them, that they may have an interest in their prayers, and may do nothing to forfeit it. Now observe here.

I. What it is that they are taught to ask of God for the king.

1. That God would answer his prayers; The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble, (v. 1.) and the Lord fulfill all thy petitions, v. 5. Note, (1.) Even the greatest of men may be much in trouble. It was often a day of trouble with David himself, of disappointment and distress, of treading down, and of perplexity. Neither the crown on his head, nor the grace in his heart, would exempt him from trouble. (2.) Even the greatest of men must be much in prayer. David, though a man of business, a man of war, was constant to his devotions; though he had prophets, and priests, and other good people, to pray for him, he did not think that excused him from praying for himself. Let none expect benefit by the prayers of the church, or of their ministers, or friends for them, who are capable of praying for themselves, and yet neglect it. The prayers of others for us must be desired, not to supersede, but to second, our own for ourselves. Happy the people that have praying princes, to whose prayers they may thus say, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." (2.) That God would protect his person, and preserve his life, in the perils of war; "The name of the God of Jacob defend thee, and set thee out of the reach of thine enemies." (1.) "Let God by his providence keep thee safe, even the God who preserved Jacob in the days of his trouble." David had mighty men for his guards, but he commits himself, and his people commit him, to the care of the almighty God. (2.) "Let God by his grace keep thee easy from any fear of outward danger." Prov. 3:5-6. "The name of the Lord is a strong tower, into which the righteous run by faith, and are safe; let David be enabled to shelter himself in that strong tower, as he has done many a time."

3. That God would enable him to go on in his undertakings for the public good; that, in the day of battle, he would send him help out of the sanctuary, and strength out of Zion, not from common providence, but from the ark of the covenant, and the peculiar favour he bears to his chosen people Israel. That he would help him, in performance of the promises, and in answer to the prayers, made in the sanctuary. Mercies out of the sanctuary are the sweetest mercies, such as are the tokens of God's peculiar love; the blessing of God, even our own God. Strength out of Zion is spiritual strength, strength in the soul, in the inward man, and that it is we should most desire, both for ourselves and others, in services and sufferings.

4. That God would testify his gracious acceptance of the sacrifices he offered with his prayers, according to the law of that time, before he went out on this dangerous expedition; The Lord remember all thy offerings, and accept thy burnt-sacrifices, (v. 3.) or turn them to ashes; that is, "The Lord give thee the victory and success which thou didst by prayer with sacrifices ask of him, and thereby give as full proof of his acceptance of the sacrifice, as ever he did by kindling it with fire from heaven. By this we may now know that God accepts our spiritual sacrifices, if by his Spirit he kindles in our souls a holy fire of pious and divine affection, and with that makes our hearts burn within us.

5. That God would crown all his enterprises and noble designs for the public welfare with the desired success; (v. 4.) The Lord grant thee according to thine own heart. This they might in faith pray for, because they knew David was a man after God's own heart, and a man whose designs were pleasing to him. Those who make it their business to glorify God, may expect that God will, one way or other, gratify them; and they who walk in his counsel may promise themselves that he will fulfil their's; Thou shalt devise a thing, and it shall be established unto thee.

II. What confidence they had of an answer of peace to these petitions for themselves and their good King; (v. 5.) "He will rejoice in thy salvation. We, that are subjects, will rejoice in the preservation and prosperity of our prince;" or rather, "In thy salvation, O God, in thy power and promise to save, will we rejoice, that is it which we depend upon now, and which, in the issue, we shall have occasion greatly to rejoice in." Those that have their eye still upon the salvation of the Lord, shall have their hearts filled with the joy of that salvation; In the name of our God will we set up our banners. We rejoice in his name; we will see that our cause be good, and make his glory our end in every expedition; we will ask counsel at his mouth, and take him along with us; we will follow his direction, implore his aid, and depend upon it, and refer the issue to him." David went against Goliath in the name of the Lord of hosts, 1 Sam. xvii. 45. (2.) We will celebrate our victories in his name. When we lift up our banners in triumph, and set up our trophies, it shall be in the name of our God; he shall have all the glory of our success, and no instrument shall have any part of the honour that is due to him.

In singing this, we ought to offer up to God our hearty good wishes to the good government we are under, and to the prosperity of it. But we may look further; these prayers for David are prophecies concerning Christ the son of David, and in him they were abundantly answered; he undertook the cause of God's people, and made war upon the powers of darkness; in the day of trouble, when his soul was exceeding sorrowful, the Lord heard him in that he feared; (Heb. v. 7.) sent him help out of the sanctuary, sent an angel from heaven to strengthen him, took cognizance of his offering, when he made his soul an offering for sin, and accepted his burnt-sacrifice, turned it to ashes; the fire that should have fastened upon the sinner, fastening upon the sacrifices, with which God was well-pleased, and he glorified him according to his own heart, made him to see of the travail of his soul, to his satisfaction, prospered his good pleasure in his hand, fulfilled all his petitions for himself and us; for, him the Father heareth always, and his intercession is ever prevailing.

6. Now know I that the Lord saveth his anointed: he will hear him from his holy heaven with the saving strength of his right hand. 7. "Some trust in chariots, and some in horses: but we will remember the name of the Lord our God. 8. They are brought down and fallen; but we are risen, and stand upright. 9. Save, Lord: let the King hear us as we call. Here is...

1. Holy David himself triumphing in the interest he had in the prayers of good people; (v. 6.) "Now know I (I, that pen the psalm, know it) that the Lord saveth his anointed, because he hath stirred up the hearts of the seed of Jacob to pray for him." Note, It bodes well to any prince and people, and may justly be taken as a happy presage, when God pours upon them a spirit of prayer. If he see us seeking him, he will be found of us; if he cause us to hope in his word, he will establish his word to us. No power is so mighty with God, no power, not even the heavenly, are praying for him, he doubts not but that God will hear him, and grant him an answer of peace; which will, 1. Take its rise from above; he will hear him from his holy heaven, of which the sanctuary was a type, (Heb. ix. 23.) from the throne he hath prepared in heaven, of which the mercy-seat was a type. 2. It shall take its effect here below. He will hear him with the saving strength of his right hand he will give a real answer to his prayers, and the prayers of his friends for him, not by letter, or by word of mouth, but, which is much better, by his right hand, by the PSALMS, XXI.

The king shall joy in thy strength, O Lord; and in thy salvation how greatly shall he rejoice! 2. Thou hast given him his heart's desire, and hast not withholden the request of his lips. Selah. 3. For thou preventest him with the blessings of goodness: thou settest a crown of pure gold on his head. 4. He asked life of thee, and thou gavest it him, even length of days for ever and ever. 5. His glory is great in thy salvation: honour and majesty hath thou laid upon him. 6. For thou hast made him most blessed for ever: thou hast made him exceeding glad with thy countenance.

David here speaks for himself in the first place, professing that his joy was in God's strength, and in his salvation, and not in the strength or success of his armies: He also directs his subjects hereby to rejoice with him, and to give God all the glory of the victories he had obtained; and all, with an eye to Christ, of whose triumphs over the powers of darkness David's victories were but shadows.

1. They here congratulate the king on his joys, and concur with him in them; (v. 1.) "The king rejoices, he uses to rejoice in thy strength, and so do we; what pleases the king, pleases us," 2Sam. iii. 36. Happy the people, the character of whose king it is, that he makes God's strength his confidence, and God's salvation his joy; that is pleased with all the advancements of God's kingdom, and trusts God to bear him out in all he does for the service of it. Our Lord Jesus, in his great undertaking, relied upon help from Heaven, and pleased himself with the prospect of that great salvation which he was thereby to work out.

2. They give God all the praise of these things, which were the matter of their king's rejoicing.

(1.) That God had heard his prayers; (v. 2.) Thou hast given him his heart's desire, (and there is no prayer accepted, but what is the heart's desire,) the very thing they begged of God for him, xx. 4. Note, God's gracious returns of prayer do, in a special manner, require our humble returns of praise. When God gives to Christ the heathen for his inheritance, gives him to see his seed, and accepts his intercession for all believers, he gives him his heart's desire.

(2.) That God had surprised him with favours, and much outdone his expectations; (v. 3.) Thou preventest him with the blessings of goodness. All our blessings are blessings of goodness, and are owing, not at all to any merit of ours, but purely, and only, to God's goodness. But the psalmist here reckons it, in a special manner, obliging, that these blessings were given in a preventing way: this fixed God's eye, enlarged his soul, and endeared his God, as one expresses it. When God's blessings come sooner, and prove richer, than we imagine, when they are given before we prayed for them, before we were ready for them, nay, when we feared the contrary; then it may be truly said, that he prevented us with them. Nothing, indeed, prevented for the success God had blessed him with. Those whom we have prayed for, we ought to give thanks for, and particularly for kings, in whose prosperity we share. They are here taught, 1. To congratulate him on his victories, and the honour he had achieved, v. 1-6. 2. To consider the power of God for the completion of the victory, the enemies of his kingdom, v. 7-13. In this, there is an eye to the Messiah, the Prince, and the Glory of his kingdom; for to him divers passages in this psalm are more applicable than to David himself.

To the chief musician. A psalm of David.

as the foregoing psalm was a prayer for the king, that God would protect and prosper him; so this is a thanksgiving saving strength of his right hand. He will make it to appear that he hears him, by what he does for him.

II. His people triumphing in God and their relation to him, and his revelation of himself to them, by which they distinguish themselves from those that live without God in the world. 1. See the difference between worldly people and godly people, in their confidences, v. 7. The children of this world trust in secret causes, and think all is well, if those do but smile upon them; they trust in chariots and horses, and the more of them they bring into the field, the more sure they are of success in their wars; probably, David has here eye to the Syrians, whose forces consisted much of chariots and horses, as we find in the history of David's victories over them, 2 Sam. viii. 4.—x. 18. "But," say the Israelites, "we neither have chariots and horses to trust to, nor do we want them, nor, if we had them, would we build our hopes of success upon that; but we will remember, and rely upon, the name of the Lord our God, upon the relation we stand in to him as the Lord our God, and the knowledge we have of him by his name," that is, all that whereby he makes himself known; this we will remember, and upon every remembrance of it will be encouraged. Note, Those who make God and his name their praise, may make God and his name their trust. 2. See the difference in the issue of their confidences, and by that we are to judge of the wisdom of the choice; things are as they prove; see who will be ashamed of their confidence, and who not, v. 8. "They that trust in their chariots and horses are brought down and fallen, and their chariots and horses were so far from saving them, that they helped to sink them, and made them the easier and the richer prey to the conqueror, 2 Sam. viii. 4. But we that trust in the name of the Lord our God, not only stand upright, and keep our ground, but are risen, and have got ground against the enemy, and have triumphed over them." Note, A believing obedient trust in God, and his name, is the surest way both to prevent and to establish, to rise and to stand upright, and this will stand us in stead, when creature-confidences fail those that depend upon them. III. They conclude their prayer for the king with a Hosanna, "Save now, we beseech thee, O Lord!" v. 9. As we read this verse, it may be taken as a prayer in God's eye, God might only not bless the king, "Save, Lord, give him success;" but that he would make him a blessing to them, "Let the king hear us, when we call to him for justice and mercy." Those that would have good of their magistrates, must thus pray for them, for they, as all other creatures, are that to us, (and no more,) that God makes them to be. Or, it may refer to the Messiah, that King, that King of kings; let him hear us when we call; let him come to us, according to the promise, in the time appointed; let him, as the great Master of requests, receive all our petitions, and present them to his Father. But many interpreters give another reading of this verse, by altering the pause, Lord, save the king, and hear us when we call; and so it is a summary of the whole psalm, and is taken into our English Liturgy. O Lord, save the king, and mercifully hear us, when we call upon thee.

When using these verses, we should encourage ourselves to trust in God, and stir up ourselves to pray earnestly, as we are in duty bound, for those in authority over us, that, under them, we may lead quiet and peaceable lives in all godliness and honesty.

PSALM XXI.

as the foregoing psalm was a prayer for the king, that God would protect and prosper him; so this is a thanksgiving
Christ, but to mankind never was any favour more preventing than our redemption by Christ, and all the blessed fruits of his mediation.

(3.) That God had advanced him to the highest honour and the most extensive power; "Thou hast set a crown of pure gold upon his head, and kept it there, when his enemies attempted to throw it off." Note, Crowns are at God's disposal; no head wears them but God sets them there; whether in judgment to his land, or for mercy, the event will show. On the head of Christ God never set a crown of gold, but of thorns first, and then of glory.

(4.) That God had assured him of the perpetuity of his kingdom, and made him more for him than he was able either to ask or think; (v. 4.) "When he went forth upon a perious expedition, he asked his life of thee, which he then put into his hand, and thou not only gavest him that, but withal gavest him length of days for ever and ever; didst not only prolong his life far beyond his expectation, but didst assure him of a blessed immortality in a future state, and of the continuance of his kingdom in the Messiah that should come of his loins." See how God's grants often exceed our petitions and hopes, and infer thence, how rich he is in mercy to those that call upon him. See also, and rejoice in, the length of the days of Christ's kingdom. He was dead indeed, that we might live through him; but he is alive, and lives for evermore, and of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end; and because he thus lives, we shall thus live also.

(5.) That God had advanced him to the highest honour and dignity; (v. 5.) "His glory is great, far transcending that of all the neighbouring princes, in the salvation thou hast wrought for him and by him." The glory which every good man is ambitious of, is to see the salvation of the Lord; honour and majesty hast thou laid upon him, as a burthen which he must bear, as a charge which he must account for. Jesus Christ received from God the Father honour and glory, (2 Pet. 1. 17.) the glory which he had with him before the worlds were, John xvii. 5. And on him is laid the charge of universal government, and to him all power in heaven and earth is committed.

(6.) That God had given him the satisfaction of being the channel of all bliss to mankind; (v. 6.) "Thou hast set him to be blessings for ever, " (so the margin reads it.) "thou hast made him to be a universal, everlasting blessing to the world, in whom the families of the earth are, and shall be, blessed; and so thou hast made him exceeding glad with the countenance thou hast given to his undertaking, and to him in the prosecution of it." See how the spirit of prophecy gradually rises here to that which is peculiar to Christ, for none besides is blessed for ever, much less a blessing for ever to that eminency that the expression denotes: and of him it is said, the Lord made him full of joy with his countenance. In singing this, we should rejoice in his joy, and triumph in his exaltation.

7. For the king trusteth in the Lord; and, through the mercy of the Most High, he shall not be moved. 8. Thy hand shall find out all thine enemies; thy right hand shall find out those that hate thee. 9. Thou shalt make them as a fiery oven in the time of thine anger: the Lord shall swallow them up in his wrath, and the fire shall devour them. 10. Their fruit shalt thou destroy from the earth, and their seed from among the children of men. 11. For they intended evil against thee; they imagined a mischievous device, which they are not able to perform: 12. Therefore shalt thou make them turn their back, when thou shalt make ready thine arrows upon thy strings against the face of them. 13. Be thou exalted, Lord, in thine own strength: so will we sing and praise thy power.

The psalmist, having taught his people to look back with joy and praise on what God had done for him and them, here teaches them to look forward with faith, and hope, and prayer, upon what God would further do for them; The king rejoices in God, (v. 1.) and therefore we will be thankful; the king trusteth in God, (v. 7.) therefore will we be encouraged. The joy and confidence of Christ our King, is the ground of all our joy and confidence.

1. They are confident of the stability of David's kingdom; Through the mercy of the Most High, and not through his own merit or strength, it shall not be moved. His prosperous state shall not be disturbed, his faith and hope in God, who is the Stay of his spirit, shall not be shaken. The mercy of the Most High, the divine goodness, power and dominion, is enough to secure our happiness, and therefore our trust in that mercy should be enough to silence all our fears. God being at Christ's right hand, in his sufferings, (xvi. 6.) and he being at God's right hand in his glory, we may be sure he shall not, he cannot, be moved, but continues ever.

2. They are confident of the destruction of all the impenitent, implacable, enemies of David's kingdom. The success with which God had blessed David's arms hitherto, was an earnest of the rest which God would give him from all his enemies round about; and a type of the total overthrow of all Christ's enemies, that would not have him to reign over them. Observe, (1.) The description of his enemies. They are such as hate him, v. 8. They hated David, because God had set him apart for himself; hated Christ, because they hated the light; but both were hated without any just cause, and in both God was hated, John xv. 23, 25. (2.) The designs of his enemies; (v. 11.) They intended evil against thee, and imagined a mischievous device; they pretended to fight against David only, but their design was to fight against God in him. They that aimed to unking David, aimed, in effect, to unking Jehovah. What is devised and designed against religion, and against the instruments God raises up to support and advance it, is very evil and mischievous, and God takes it as devised and designed against himself, and will so reckon for it. (3.) The disappointment of them; "They devise what they are not able to perform," v. 11. Their malice is impotent, and the instruments God raises up to support his people, to destroy his enemies, do so against their will. (4.) The destruction of them; (v. 8.) "Thy hand shall find them out, though ever so artfully disguised by the pretences and professions of friendship; though mingled with the faithful subjects of this kingdom, and hardly to be distinguished from them; though flying from justice, and abasing in their close places; yet thy hand shall find them out wherever they are. There is no escaping God's avenging power, and no going out of the reach of it. The seas and mountains will be no better shelter at last, than fig-leaves were at first. (5.) The destruction of them; it will be an utter destruction, (Luke xix. 27.) they shall be swallowed up and devoured, v. 9. Hell, the portion of all Christ's enemies, is the complete misery both of body and soul. Their fruit and their seed shall be destroyed, v. 10. The enemies of God's kingdom, in every age, shall fall under the same doom, and the whole generation of them will
4. Our fathers trusted in thee: they trusted, and thou didst deliver them. 5. They cried unto thee, and were delivered; they trusted in thee, and were not confounded. 6. But I am a worm, and no man; a reproach of men, and despised of the people. 7. All they that see me laugh me to scorn: they shoot out the lip, they shake the head, saying, 8. He trusted on the Lord that he would deliver him: let him deliver him, seeing he delighted in him. 9. But thou art he that took me out of the womb; thou didst make me hope when I was upon my mother's breasts. 10. I was cast upon thee from the womb; thou art my God from my mother's belly.

Some think they find Christ in the title of the psalm upon Ajeleth Shabar—The hind of the morning; Christ is as the swift hind upon the mountains of spices, (Cant. viii. 14.) as the loving hind and the pleasant roe, to all believers; (Prov. v. 19.) he giveth goodly words like Naphtali, who is compared to a hind let loose, Gen. xxix. 21. He is the hind of the morning, marked out by the counsels of God from eternity, to be run down by those dogs that compassed him, v. 16. But others think it denotes only the time to which the Psalm was set.

In these verses, we have,
1. A sad complaint of God's withdrawals, v. 1, 2. This may be applied to David, or any other child of God, in the want of the tokens of his favour, pressed with the burden of his displeasure, roaring under it, as one overwhelmed with grief and terror, crying earnestly for relief, and, in this case, apprehending himself forsaken of God, unhelped, unheard, yet calling him, again and again, "My God," and continuing to cry day and night to him, and earnestly desiring his gracious returns. Note, 1. Spiritual desertsions are the saints' sorest afflictions; when their evidences are clouded, divine consolations suspended, their communion with God interrupted, and the powers of God set in array against them, how sad are their spirits, and how sapless all their comforts! 2. Even their complaint of these.bartens is a good signal of their little and spiritual sensibilities. To cry out, "My God, why am I sick? why am I poor?" would give cause to suspect discontent and worldliness. But, Why hast thou forsaken me? is the language of a heart binding up its happiness in God's favour. 3. When we are lamenting God's withdrawals, yet still we must call him our God, and continue to call upon him as ours. When we want the faith of assurance, we must live by a faith of adherence; "Howbeit it be, yet doth God reign," Tit. ii. 12, verse, though he slay me, yet will I trust in him; though he do not answer me immediately, I will continue praying and waiting; though he be silent, I will not be silent. But it must be applied to Christ; for, in the first words of this complaint, he poured out his soul before God when he was upon the cross; (Matth. xxvii. 46.) probably he proceeded to the following words, and, some think, repeated the whole psalm, if not aloud, yet to himself, v. 26, 27, yet to himself. Note, (1.) Christ, in his sufferings, cried earnestly to his Father, for his favour and presence with him; he cried in the day-time upon the cross, and in the night-season when he was in his agony in the garden; he offered up strong crying and tears to him that was able to save him, and with some fear too, Heb. v. 7. (2.) Yet God forsook him, was far from helping him, and did not hear him, and this was it which he complains of more than all his sufferings. God delivered him into the hands of his enemies; it was by his determinate counsel that he was crucified and slain, and he did not give insensible comforts; but Christ having made himself sin, for us, in conformity thereto, the Father laid him under the present impressions of his wrath and displeasure against sin. It pleased the Lord to bruise him, and put him to grief, Isa. lii. 10. But even then he kept fast hold of his relation to his Father as his God, by whom he was made a reasonable being, and with whom he should shortly be glorified.

II. Encouragement taken, in reference hereunto, v. 3-5. Though God did not hear him, did not help him, yet, 1. He will think well of God; "But thou art holy, not unjust, untrue, or unkind, in any of thy dispensations; though thou dost not immediately come in to the relief of those afflicted people, yet thou lovest them, art true to thy covenant with them, and dost not countenance the iniquity of their persons," Hab. l.3. And as thou art infinitely pure and upright, thyself, so thou delightest in the services of thine uplifted people; Thou inhabitest the praises of Israel, thou art pleased to manifest thy glory, and grace, and special presence with thy people, in the sanctuary where they attend thee with their praises; there thou art always ready to receive their hommage, and of the tabernacle of meeting hast said, This is my rest for ever." This bespeaks God's wonderful condescension to his worshippers—that, though he is attended with the praises of angels, yet he is pleased to inhabit the praises of Israel. And it may comfort us in all our complaints—that, though God seen, for a while, to turn a deaf ear to them, yet he is so pleased with his people's praises, that he will, in due time, give them cause to change their note; Hope in God, for I shall yet praise him. Our Lord Jesus, in his sufferings, had an eye to the holiness of God, to preserve and advance the honour of that, and of his grace in inhabiting the praises of Israel, notwithstanding the irritations of their holy things. 2. He will take comfort from the experiences which the saints in former ages had of the benefit of faith and prayer; (v. 4, 5.) "Our fathers trusted in thee, cried unto thee, and thou didst deliver them; therefore thou wilt, in due time, deliver me, for never any that hoped in thee were made ashamed of their hope; never any that sought thee, sought thee in vain; for thou art a help to the helpless, and the same to thy people, that ever thou wast. They were our fathers, and thy people are beloved for the fathers' sake," Rom. xi. 28. The entail of the covenant is designed for the support of the seed of the faithful. He that was our fathers' God must be ours, and therefore will be ours. Our Lord Jesus, in his sufferings, supported himself with this—that all the fathers who were types of him in his sufferings, Noah, Joseph, David, Jonah, and others, were, in due time, delivered; and through them he supported himself, and the same to thy people, that ever thou wast. They were our fathers, and thy people are beloved for the fathers' sake," Rom. xi. 28. The entail of the covenant is designed for the support of the seed of the faithful. He that was our fathers' God must be ours, and therefore will be ours. Our Lord Jesus, in his sufferings, supported himself with this—that all the fathers who were types of him in his sufferings, Noah, Joseph, David, Jonah, and others, were, in due time, delivered; and through them he supported himself, and the same to thy people, that ever thou wast. They were our fathers, and thy people are beloved for the fathers' sake, Isa. l. 7.

III. The complaint renewed of another grievance, and that is, the contempt and reproach of men. This complaint is by no means so bitter as that before of God's withdrawals; but as that touches a gracious soul, so this a generous soul, in a very tender part, v. 6-8. Our fathers were honourable, the patriarchs, of whom it was said, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the same, in the eye of the world, Abraham, Moses, David; but Christ is a worm, and no man. It was great condescension that he became man, a step downward, that is, and will be, the wonder of angels; yet, as if it were too much, too great, to be a man, he becomes a worm, and no man. He was Adam—a mean man, and Enosh—a man of sorrows, but Is— not a considerable man; for he took upon him the form of a servant, and his visage was marred more than any man's, Isa. lii. 14. Man, at the best, is a worm; but he became a worm, and no man. If he had not made himself a worm, he could not have been trampeled upon as he was. The word signifies such a worm as was used in dying scarlet or purple; whence some make it as an allusion to his bloody sufferings. See what abuses were put upon him; 1. He was reproached as a bad man, as a blasphemer, a sabbath-breaker, a wine-bibber, a false prophet, an enemy to Caesar, a confederate with the Gentiles, and an inhabitant of the house of bondage, and with whom he should shortly be glorified.
from my coming into the world, unto this day. And if, as soon as we became capable of exercising reason, we put our confidence in God, and committed ourselves and our way to him, we need not doubt but he will always remember the kindness of our youth, and the love of our enmity, Jer. ii. 2. This is applicable to our Lord Jesus, over whose incarnation and birth the Divine Providence watched with a peculiar care, when he was born in a stable, laid in a manger, and immediately exposed to the malice of Herod, and forced to flee into Egypt:
when he was a child, God loved him, and called him
ten. (Hos. xi. 1.) and the remembrance of this comforted him in his sufferings; men reproached him and reviled him, and were incensed against him.
Yet, but God had honoured him, and encouraged his con-

11. Be not far from me, for trouble is near;
for there is none to help. 12. Many bulls have com-passed me: strong bulls of Bashan have beset me round. 13. They gaped upon me with their mouths, as a ravening and a roaring lion. 14. I am poured out like water, and all my bones are out of joint:
my heart is like wax; it is melted in the midst of my bowels. 15. My strength is dried up like a potsher'd; and my tongue cleaveth to my jaws; and thou hast brought me into the dust of death. 16. For dogs have com-passed me; the assembly of the wicked have enclosed me: they pierced my hands and my feet. 17. I may tell all my bones:
they look and stare upon me. 18. They part my garments among them, and cast lots upon my vesture. 19. But be not thou far from me, O Lord; O my strength, haste thee to help me. 20. Deliver my soul from the sword; my darling from the power of the dog.
21. Save me from the lion's mouth: for thou hast heard me from the horns of the unicorns.

In these verses, we have Christ suffering, and Christ praying: by which we are directed to look for crosses, and to look up to God under them.
1. Here is Christ suffering: David indeed was often in trouble, and beset with enemies; but many of the particulars here specified are such as were never true of David, and therefore must be appropriated to Christ in the depths of his humiliation.
1. He is here deserted by his friends; trouble and distress are near, and there is none to help, none to uphold, v. 11. He trod the wine-press alone; for all his disciples forsook him, and fled. It is God's honour to help, when all other helps and succours fail.
2. He is here insulted and surrounded by his eneemies, such as were of a higher rank, who, for their strength and fury, are compared to bulls, strong bulls of Bashan, (v. 12.) fat and fed to the full, aughty and sour; such were the chief priests and calders that persecuted Christ; and others of a lower rank, who are compared to dogs, (v. 16.) filthy and greedy, and unwearied in running him down.
There is an assembly of the wicked pitting against him; (v. 16.) for the chief priests sat in council, to consult of ways and means to take Christ. These enemies were numerous and strong, and those of diff'erent and clashing interests among themselves, as Herod and Pilate, have agreed to compass me. They have carried their plot far, and seem to have gained their point, for they have beset me round, v. 12. They have enclosed me, v. 16.
They are formidable, and threatening: (v. 13.)
They gazed upon me with their mouths, to show me that they would swallow me up; and this, with as much strength and fierceness as a roaring ravening lions upon a lamb.
3. He is here crucified; the very manner of his death is described, though never in use among the Jews; They pierced my hands and my feet, (v. 16.)
which were nailed to the accursed tree, and the whole body left so to hang, the effect of which must needs be the most exquisite pain and torture. There is no one passage, in all the Old Testament, which the Jews have so industriously corrupted as this, becoming it is such an eminent prediction of the death of Christ, and so expressly expressed.
4. He is here dying, (v. 14, 15.) dying in pain and anguish, because he was to satisfy for sin, which brought in pain, and for which we must otherwise have lain in everlasting anguish. Here is, (1.) The dissolution of the whole frame of his body: I am poured out like water, weak as water, and yielding to the power of death, emptying himself of all the supports of his human nature. (2.) The dislocation of his bones; care was taken that not one of them should be broken. (3.) His bosom was rent open out of joint by the violent stretching of his body upon the cross as upon a rack. Or it may denote the fear that seized him in his agony in the garden, when he began to be sore amazed; the effect of which perhaps was, (as sometimes it has been of great fear, Dan. v. 6.) that the joints of his bones were loosened, and his knees smote one against another.
His bones were put out of joint, that he might put the whole creation into joint again, which sin had put out of joint, and might make our broken bones to rejoice. (3.) The colliquation of his spirits; My heart is like wax, melted to receive the impressions of God's wrath against the sins he undertook to satu-ify for; melting away like the vitals of a dying man; as this satisfied for the hardness of our hearts,
so the consideration of it should help to soften them.
When Job speaks of his inward trouble, he says,
The Almighty makes my heart soft; (Job xxiii. 16.)
and see Ps. lxvii. 2. (4.) The failing of his natural force; My strength is dried up; so that he became parched and brittle like a potsher'd, the radical moisture being wasted by the fire of divine wrath preying upon his spirits. Who then can stand before God's anger? or who knows the power of it? If this were done in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry? (5.) The clamminess of his mouth, a usual symptom of approaching death; My jaw cleaveth to my jaws; this was fulfilled by him in his thirst upon the cross, (John xix. 28.) and in his silence under his sufferings; for, as a sheep before the shearsers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth, nor objected against any thing done to him.
(6.) His giving up the ghost; Thou hast brought me to the dust of death; I am just ready to drop into the grave; for nothing less would satisfy divine justice. The life of the sinner was forfeited, and there-dere the life of the sacrifice must be the ransom for it. The sentence of death passed upon Adam was thus expressed: Unto dust thou shalt return. And therefore Christ, having an eye to that sentence in his obedience to death, here uses a like expression;
Thou hast brought me to the dust of death.
He was stripped; the shame of nakedness was the immediate consequence of sin; and therefore our Lord Jesus was stripped of his clothes when he was crucified, that he might clothe us with the robe of righteousness, and that the shame of nakedness might not appear. Now here we are told, (1.) How his body looked when it was thus stripped;
I may tell all my bones, v. 17. His blessed body was lean and emaciated with labour, grief, and

PSALMS, XXII. 255
be meant of Satan, that old enemy who bruised the heel of the seed of the woman, the prince of this world, with whom he was to engage in close combat, and whom he saw coming, John xiv. 30. "Lord, save me from being overpowered by his terrors." He pleads, "Thou hast formerly heared me from the horns of the unicorn," that is, "saved me from him, in answer to my prayer." This may refer to the victory Christ had obtained over Satan and his temptations. (Matt. iv.) when the Devil left him for a season, (Luke iv. 13.) but now returned in another manner to attack him with his terrors. "Lord, thou gavest me the victory then, give it me now, that I may spoil principalities and powers, and cast out the prince of this world." Has God delivered us from the horns of the unicorn, that we be not tossed? Let that encourage us to hope that we shall be delivered from the lion's mouth, that we be not torn. He that has delivered, behold, and you. This prayer of Christ, no doubt, was answered, for the Father heard him always. And though he did not deliver him from death, yet he suffered him not to see corruption, but, the third day, raised him out of the dust of death, which was a greater instance of God's favour to him than if he had helped him down from the cross; for that would have hindered his undertaking, whereas his resurrection crowned it.

In singing this, we should meditate on the suffering and resurrection of Christ, till we experience in our own souls the power of his resurrection and the fellowship of his suffering.

22. I will declare thy name unto my brethren: in the midst of the congregation will I praise thee. 23. Ye that fear the Lord, praise him: all ye the seed of Jacob, glorify him; and fear him, all ye the seed of Israel. 24. For he hath not despised nor abhorred the affliction of the afflicted, neither hath he hid his face from him; but when he cried unto him, he heard. 25. My praise shall be of thee in the great congregation: I will pay my vows before them that fear him. 26. The meek shall eat and be satisfied; they shall praise the Lord that seek him: your heart shall live for ever. 27. All the ends of the world shall remember, and turn unto the Lord; and all the kindred of the nations shall worship before thee. 28. For the kingdom is the Lord's; and he is the governor among the nations. 29. All they that be fat upon earth shall eat and worship: all they that go down to the dust shall bow before him and none can keep alive his own soul.

A seed shall serve him; it shall be accounted to the Lord for a generation. 31. They shall come, and shall declare his righteousness unto a people that shall be born, that he hath done this.

The same that began the psalm complaining, who was no other than Christ in his humiliation, ends it here triumphing, and it can be no other than Christ in his exaltation. And as the first words of the complaint were used by Christ himself upon the cross, so the first words of the triumph are expressly applied to him, (Heb. ii. 12.) and are made his own words; I will declare thy name unto my brethorn, in the midst of the church will I sing praise unto thee. The certain prospect which Christ had of the joy set before him, not only gave him a satisfactory answer to his prayers, but turned his complaints into praises; he saw of the travail of his soul, and was well satisfied: witness that triumphant word wherewith he breathed his last; It is finished.

Five things are here spoken of, the view of which were the satisfaction and triumph of Christ in his sufferings:

1. That he should have a church in the world, and that those that were given from eternity should, in the fulness of time, be gathered in to him. This is implied here; that he should see his seed, Isa. iii. 10. It pleased him to think, 1. That by the declaring of God's name, by the preaching of the everlasting gospel in its plainness and purity, many should seek to him, called to him, and to God by him. And, for this end, ministers should be employed to publish this doctrine to the world, who should be so much his messengers and his voice, that their doing it should be accounted his doing it; their word is his, and by them he declares God's name. 2. That those who are thus called in, should be brought into a very near and dear relation to him as his brethren; for he is not only not ashamed, but greatly well pleased, to call them so; not to his church, but to himself. They are of the Gentiles also, who became fellow-heirs, and of the same body, Heb. ii. 11. Christ is our elder Brother, who takes care of us, and makes provision for us, and expects that our desire should be toward him, and that we should be willing that he should rule over us. 3. That these his brethren should be incorporated into a congregation, a great congregation; such is the universal church, the whole family of Israel, the whole body of men, which all the children of God that were scattered abroad, are collected, and in which they are united; (John xi. 52. Eph. i. 10.) and that they should also be incorporated into lesser societies, members of that great body, many religious assemblies for divine worship, on which the face of Christianity should appear, and in which the interests of it should be supported and advanced. 4. That these should be accounted the seed of Jacob and Israel, them 1. The blessing of Abraham might come, (Gal. iii. 14.) and to them might pertain the adoption, the glory, the covenant, and the service of God, as much as ever it did to Israel according to the flesh, Rom. ix. 4. Heb. viii. 10. The gospel-church is called the Israel of God, Gal. vi. 16.

II. That God should be greatly honoured and glorified in him by that church. His Father's glory was that which he had in his eye throughout the whole undertaking, (John xvii. 4.) particularly in his sufferings, which he entered upon with this solemn request, Father, glorify thy name, John xii. 27, 28. He foresees with pleasure,

1. That God would be glorified by the church that should be gathered to him; and that for this end they should be called and gathered in, that they might be unto God for a name and a praise. Christ by his ministers will declare God's name to his brethren, as God's mouth to them, and then by them, as the mouth of the congregation to God, will God's name be praised. All that fear the Lord, will praise him, (v. 23.) even every Israelite indeed. See cxviii. 2-4. -xxxv. 19, 20. The business of Christians, particularly in their solemn religious assemblies, is, to praise and glorify God, with a holy awe and reverence of his majesty; and therefore they are here called upon to praise God, are called upon to praise; it is their duty, to praise God, to give God the glory that is due to his name, to hallow his name, and magnify his name, and be a tree of praise in the land, Ps. cx. 14. And so it is here, verse 12, 13.

2. That God would be glorified in the Redeemer and in his undertaking. Therefore Christ is said to praise God in the church, not only because he is the Master of the assemblies in which God is praised, and the Mediator of all the praises that are offered up to God, but because he is the Matter of the church's praise. See Eph. iii. 21. All our praises must centre in the work of redemption, and a great deal of reason we have to be thankful, (1.) That Jesus Christ was owned by his Father in his undertaking, notwithstanding the apprehension he sometimes under that his Father had forsaken him; (v. 24.) he hath not despised nor abhorred the affliction of the afflicted One, or despised the suffering Redeemer; but has graciously accepted it as a full satisfaction for sin, and a valuable consideration on which to ground the grant of eternal life to all believers. Though it was offered for us poor sinners, he did not despise or abhor it for our sakes, nor did he turn his face from him that offered it, as he was angry with his own son, because he interceded for David, he looked upon him as his enemy. But when he cried, Father, why hast thou forsaken me, when his blood cried for peace and pardon for us, he heard him. This, as it is the matter of our rejoicing, ought to be the matter of our thanksgiving. Those who have thought their prayers slighted and unheard, if they continue to pray and wait, will find they have not sought in vain. (2.) That he himself will go on with his undertaking, and complete it, as the Father has promised. Thus the Father says, I will pay my vows, v. 25. Having engaged to bring many sons to glory, he will perform his engagement to the utmost, and will lose none.

III. That all humble gracious souls should have a full satisfaction and happiness in him, v. 26. It comforted the Lord Jesus in his sufferings, that in and through him all true believers should have everlasting consolation. 1. The poor in spirit shall be rich in blessings, spiritual blessings; the hungry shall be filled, and have pabulum. Christ's sacrifice being accepted, the saints shall feast upon the sacrifice, as, under the law, upon the peace-offerings, and so partake of the altar; The meek shall eat and be satisfied; eat of the bread of life, feed with an appetite upon the doctrine of Christ's mediation, which is meat and drink to the soul that knows its own nature and case. They that hunger and thirst after righteousness in Christ, shall have all they can desire to satisfy them and make them easy, and shall not labour, as they have done, for that which satisfies not. 2. They that are much in praying, shall be much in thanksgiving; They shall praise the Lord, that seek him, because through Christ they are sure of finding him; in the hopes of which they have reason to praise him, even while they are seeking him; and the more earnest they are in seeking him, the more will their hearts be enlarged in his praises when they have found him. 3. The souls that are devoted to him shall be for ever happy with him; "Your heart shall labour for ever. Yours that are meek, that are satisfied in Christ, that continue to seek God; whatever becomes of your bodies, your hearts shall live for ever; the graces and comforts you have shall be perfected in everlasting life. Christ has said, Because I live, ye shall live also; (John xiv. 19.) and, therefore, that life shall be as sure, and as long, as his."

IV. That the church of Christ, and with it the kingdom of God among men, should extend itself to all corners of the earth, and should take in all sorts of people. 1. That it should reach far, v. 27, 28. That, whereas the Jews had long been the only professing people of God, now, all the ends of the world should come into the church, and, the partition wall being taken down, the Gentiles should be taken in. It is here prophesied, (1.) That they should be converted, they shall remember, and turn to the Lord. Note, Serious reflection is the first step, and a good step it is, toward true conversion. We must consider, and turn. The prodigal came first to himself, and then to his father. (2.) That then they should be admitted into communion with God, and with the assemblies that serve him; They shall worship before him, for God is a fire, Jer. 7. 11. Consider, they that turn to God shall make conscience of worshipping before him. And good reason there is why all the kindreds of the nations should do homage to God, for, (v. 28.) The kingdom is the Lord's; his, and his only, is the universal monarchy: [1.] The kingdom of nature is the Lord Jehovah's, and his providence rules among the nations, and upon that account we are bound to worship him. So that the gift of the Christian religion is received from the general and universal law, and its principles and laws. Christ died to bring us to God, the God that made us, from whom we had revolted, and to reduce us to our native allegiance. [2.] The kingdom of grace is the Lord Christ's, and he, as Mediator, is appointed Governor among the nations; Head over all things to his church. Let every tongue therefore confess that he is Lord. 2. That it should be given to many of different ranks, v. 29. rich and poor, rich and poor, bond and free, meet in Christ. (1.) Christ shall have the homage of many of the great ones, they that be fat upon the earth, that live in pomp and power, they shall eat and worship; even they that fare deliciously, when they have eaten and are full, shall bless the Lord their God for their plenty and prosperity. (2.) The poor also shall receive his gospel. Those that go down to the dust, that sit in the dust, (exil. 7.) that can scarcely do so, shall be blest, Christ the Lord, as he reckons it his honour to be the poor man's King, (lxii. 12.) and whose protection does, in a special manner, draw their allegiance. Or this may be understood, in general, of dying men, whether poor or rich. See then what is our condition—we are going down to the dust to which we are sentenced, and where shortly we must make our bed. Nor can we keep alive our own souls; we cannot save our own, but we are the authors of our own spiritual and eternal life. It is therefore our great interest, as well as duty, to bow before the Lord Jesus, to give up ourselves to him to be his subjects and worshippers; for this is the only way, and it is a sure way, to secure our happiness when we go down to the dust. Seeing we cannot keep alive our own souls, it is our wisdom, by an obedient faith, to commit our souls to Jesus Christ, who is able to save them, and keep them alive, for ever. V. That the church of Christ, and with it the kingdom of God among men, shall continue to the end, through all the ages of time. Mankind is kept up in a succession of generations; so that there is always a generation passing away, and a generation coming up. Now, as Christ shall have honour from that which is passing away and leaving the world, (v. 29. they that go down to the dust shall bow before him, and it is good to die bowing before Christ himself, and not need to fear, as he that dies in the Lord,) so he shall have honour from that which is rising up, and setting out, in the world, v. 30. Observe, 1. Their application to Christ; A seed shall serve him, shall keep up the solemn worship of him, and profess and practise obedience to him as their Master and Lord. Note, God will have a church in the world, to the end of time; and, in order to that, there shall be a succession of professing Christians and gospel ministers, from generation to generation. A seed shall serve him; there shall be a remnant, more or less, to whom shall pertain the service of God, and to whom God will give grace to serve him: perhaps not the seed of the same persons, for grace does not run in a blood; he does not say their seed, but a seed; perhaps but few, yet enough to preserve the entail. 2. Christ's acknowledgment of them; They shall be accounted to him for a generation; he will be the same to them that used him, as he was to those who went before them; his kindess to his friends shall not die with them, but shall be drawn out to their heirs and successors, and instead of the fathers shall be the children, whom all shall acknowledge to be a seed that the Lord hath blessed, Isa. xvi. 9.—ixv. 23. The generation of the righteous, God will graciously own as his treasure, his children. 3. Their agency for him; (v. 3l.) They shall come, shall rise up in God's name, and shall declare to the virtue of the generation that is past, and to do the work of their own generation, but to serve the honour of Christ, and the welfare of souls, in the generations to come; they shall transmit to them the gospel of Christ (that sacred deposit) pure and entire, even to a people that shall be born hereafter; to them they shall declare two things, (1.) That there is an everlasting righteousness, which Jesus Christ has brought in. This righteousness of his, and not an other, he has done; he shall declare to be the foundation of all our hopes, and the fountain of all our joys. See Rom. i. 16, 17. (2.) That the work of our redemption, by Christ, is the Lord's own doing, (cxxxvii. 23.) and no contrivance of our's. We must declare to our children, that God has done this; it is his wisdom in a mystery, it is his arm revealed. In singing this, we must triumph in the name of Christ, as above every name; must give him honour and glory for ever and ever. Besides, though we should be in the assurance we have that there shall be a people praising him on earth, when we are praising him in heaven.

PSALM XXIII.

Many of David's psalms are full of complaints, but this is full of comforts, and the expressions of delight in God's great goodness, and dependence upon him. It is a psalm which has been sung by good Christians, and will be while the world stands, with a great deal of pleasure and satisfaction. I. The psalmist here claims relation to God as a Shepherd, v. 1, II. He recounts his experience of the kind things God had done for him as his Shepherd, v. 2, 3, 5. III. Hence he infers, That he should want no good; (v. 1.) That he needed to fear no evil; (v. 4.) That God would feed him in a way of mercy; and therefore he resolves never to leave or forsake him in a way of duty, v. 6. In this, he has certainly an eye, not only to the blessings of God's providence, which made his outward condition prosperous, but to the communications of God's grace, received by a lively faith, and returned in a warm devotion, which filled his soul with joy unspeakable. And as in the foregoing psalm he represented Christ dying for his sheep, so here he represents Christians receiving the benefit of all the care and tenderness of that great and good Shepherd.

A Psalm of David.

1. THE Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want. 2. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters. 3. He restoreth my soul: he leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake. 4. Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me. 5. Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies: thou anointest my head with oil.
my cup runneth over. 6. Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life, and I will dwell in the house of the Lord for ever.

From three very comfortable premises, David, in this psalm, draws three very comfortable conclusions, and teaches us to do so too. We are saved by hope, and therefore that hope will not make us ashamed, because it is well-grounded. It is the duty of Christians to encourage themselves in the Lord their God; and we are here directed to take that encouragement both from the relation wherein he has been preserved, and from the experience we have had of his goodness, according to that relation.

I. From God's being his Shepherd, he infers that he shall not want any thing that is good for him, v. 1. See here,

1. The great care that God takes of believers; he is their Shepherd, and they may call him so. Time was, when David was himself a shepherd; he was taken from following the ewes great with young, (lxxxviii. 1.) to the care and tender affections of a good shepherd, toward his flock. He remembered what need they had of a shepherd, and what a kindness it was to them, to have one that was skillful and faithful; he once ventured his life to rescue a lamb. By this therefore he illustrates God's care of his people; and to this our Saviour seems to refer, when he says, I am the Shepherd of the sheep; the good Shepherd, John x. 11. He that is the Shepherd of Israel, of the whole church in general, (lxxx. 1.) is the Shepherd of every particular believer; the meanest is not below his cognizance, Isa. xi. 11. He takes them into his fold, and then takes care of them, protects them, and provides for them, with more care and constancy than a shepherd can, that makes it his business to keep the flock. If God be as a Shepherd to us, we must be as sheep, inoffensive, meek, and quiet, silent before the shearsers, nay, and before the butcher too, useful and sociable; we must know the Shepherd's voice, and follow him.

2. The great confidence which believers have in God; "If the Lord is my Shepherd, my Feeder, I may conclude I shall not want any thing that is really necessary and good for me." If David penned this psalm before his coming to the crown, though destined to it, he had as much reason to fear wanting as any man. Once he sent his men a-begging for him to Nahal, and another time went himself a-begging to Ahimelech; and yet, when he considers that God is his Shepherd, he boldly say, I shall not want. Let not those fear starving that are at God's finding, and have him for their Feeder. More is implied than is expressed; not only, I shall not want, but, "I shall be supplied with whatever I need; and if I have not everything I desire, I may conclude it is either not fit for me, or not good for me, or I shall have it in due time."

II. From his performing the office of a good Shepherd to him, he infers that he needs not fear any evil in the greatest dangers and difficulties he could be in, v. 2-4. He experiences the benefit of God's presence with him, and care of him now, and therefore expects the benefit of them when he most needs it. See here,

1. The comforts of a living saint: God is his Shepherd, and his God; all-sufficient to all intents and purpures, and in all the flowers and good things of this world, and so have we. See the happiness of the saints, as the sheep of God's pasture.

(1.) They are well-pleased, well-laid; He maketh me to lie down in green pastures. We have the supports and comforts of this life from God's good hand, our daily bread from him as our Father. The greatest abundance is but a dry pasture to a wicked man, who relishes that only in it which pleases the senses; but to a godly man, who tastes the goodness of God in all his enjoyments, and by faith relishes that, though he has but little of the world, it is a green pasture to his soul. 16. Prov. 6. 16, 17. God's ordinances are the green pastures in which food is provided for all believers; the word of life is the nourishment of the new man. It is milk for babes, pasture for the sheep, never barren, never eaten bare, never parched, but always a green pasture for faith to feed in. God makes his saints to lie down; he gives them quiet and contentment in their own minds, whatever their lot is; they are disposed and enabled to enjoy what passes every pasture green. Are we blessed with the green pastures of the ordinances? Let us not think it enough to pass through them, but let us lie down in them, abide in them: this is my rest for ever. It is by a constancy of the means of grace that the soul is fed.

(2.) They are well-guided, well-led; the Shepherd of Israel guides Joseph like a flock; and every believer is under the same guidance. He leadeth me beside the still water. The good shepherd must guide his flock himself, and by his providence, by his word, by his Spirit; disposes their affairs for the best, according to his counsel; disposes their affections and actions according to his command; directs their eye, their way, and their heart, into his love. The still waters, by which he leads them, yield them, not only a pleasant prospect, but many a cooling draught, many a reviving cordial, when they are thirsty and weary. God provides for his people, not only their food and rest, but refreshment also and pleasure. The consolations of God, the joys of the Holy Ghost, are these still waters by which the saints are led; streams which flow from the fountain of living waters, and make glad the city of our God. God leads his people, not to the standing waters which corrupt and gather filth, nor to the troubled sea, nor to the rapid rolling floods, but to the silent purling waters; for the still, but running, waters, agree best with those spirits that flow out toward God, and yet do it silently. The divine guidance they are under is stripped of its metaphor, (v. 3.) He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness, in the way of my duty; in that he instructs me by his word, and directs me by conscience and providence. These are the paths in which all the saints desire to be led and kept, and never to turn aside out of them. And those only are led by the still waters of comfort that walk in the paths of righteousness. The way of duty is the truly pleasant way. It is the work of righteousness that is peace. In these paths we cannot walk, unless God both lead us into them, and lead us in them.

(3.) They are well-helped when any thing ails them; He restoreth my soul. [1.] He reduces me when I wander. No creature will lose itself sooner than a sheep, so apt it is to straying, and thus so unapt to find the way back. The best saints are sensible of their proneness to go astray like lost sheep; (cix. 176.) they miss their way, and turn aside into by-paths; but when God shows them their error, gives them repentance, and brings them back to their duty again, he restores the soul; and if he did not do so, they would wander endlessly, and be undone. When, after one sin, David's heart smote him sore, and he cried, O Lord, why hast thou done this unto me? God tells him, Thou art the man. God restored his soul. Though God may suffer his people to fall into sin, he will not suffer them to lie still in it. [2.] He recovers me when I am sick, and revives me when I am faint, and so restores the soul which was ready to depart. He is the Lord our God that heals us, Exod. xvi. 26. Many a time we had fainted, unof a dying saint; (v. 4.)

1. How highly he magnifies God's gracious vouchsafements to him; (v. 5.) “Thou preparest a table before me; thou hast provided for me all things pertaining both to life and godliness, all things requisite both for body and soul, for time and eternity;” such a bountiful Benefactor is God to all his people; and it becomes them abundantly to utter his great goodness, as David here, who acknowledges, (1.) That he had food convenient; a table spread, a cup filled, meat for his hunger, drink for his thirst. (2.) That he had it carefully and readily provided for him; his table was not spread with any thing that came next to hand; but prepared, and prepared before him. (3.) That he was not stinted, but had abundance; “My cup runs over; enough for myself, and my friends too.” (4.) That he had not only for necessity, but for ornament and delight; Thou anointedst my head with oil. Samuel anointed him king, which was a certain pledge of further favour; but this is rather an instance of the plenty with which God had blessed him, or an allusion to the extraordinary entertainment of special friends, whose heads they anointed with oil, Luke vii. 46. Nay, some think, he still looks upon himself as a sheep, but such a one as the poor man’s ewe-lamb, (2 Sam. xil. 3.) that did eat of his own meat, and drink of his own cup, and lay in his bosom; not only thus nobly, but thus tenderly, are the children of God looked after. Plentiful provision is made for their bodies, for their souls; for the life that now is, and for that which is to come. If Providence do not bestow upon us thus plentifully for our natural life, it is our own fault if it be not made up to us in spiritual blessings.

2. How confidently he counts upon the continuance of God's favours; (v. 6.) he had said, (v. 1.) I shall want; but now he speaks more positively, more securely; “My cup runs over; and mercies in abundance shall follow me all the days of my life.” His hope rises, and his faith is strengthened, by being exercised. Observe, (1.) What he promises himself—goodness and mercy, all the streams of it, flowing from the fountain; parcelling mercy, protecting mercy, sustaining, supplying, mercy. (2.) The manner of the conveyance of it; It shall follow me, as the water out of the rock followed the camp of Israel through the wilderness; as the shade of the rocky places and all conditions, shall be always ready. (3.) The continuance of it; It shall follow me all my life long, even to the last; for whom God loves, he loves to the end. (4.) The constancy of it; All the days of my life, as duly as the day comes; it shall be new every morning, (Lam. iii. 22, 23.) like the manna that was given to the Israelites daily. (5.) The certainty of it; Surely it shall. It is as sure as the sun shall rise, as the lights shall thus make it; and we know whom we have believed. (6.) Here is a prospect of the perfection of bliss in the future state. So some take the latter clause: “Goodness and mercy having followed me all the days of my life on this earth, when that is ended, I shall remove to a better world, to dwell in the house of the Lord for ever, in our Father’s house above, where there are many mansions. With what I have, I am pleased much; with what I hope for, more." All this, and heaven too! Then we serve a good Master.

3. How resolutely he determines to cleave to God and to his duty. We read the last clause as David's covenant with God; "I will dwell in the house of the Lord for ever, (as long as I live,) and I will praise him while I have any being." We must dwell in his house as servants, that desired to have their ears bored to his door-post, to serve him for ever.

If God's goodness to us be, like the morning-light, which shineth and shone to the perfect day; let not ours to him be like the morning-cloud, and the early dew that passeth away. Those that would be satisfied with the fatness of God's house, must keep close to the duties of it.

PSALMS XXIV.

This psalm is concerning the kingdom of Jesus Christ; I. His providential kingdom, by which he rules the world, v. 1, 2. II. The kingdom of his grace, by which he rules in his church. 1. Concerning the subjects of that kingdom; their character, (v. 4, 6,) their charter, v. 5. 2. Concerning the King of that kingdom, and a summons to all to give him admission, v. 7, 10. It is supposed that the psalm was penned upon occasion of David's bringing up the ark to the place prepared for it; and that the intention of it, was, to lead the people above the pomp of external ceremonies to a holy life and faith in Christ, of whom the ark was a type.

A Psalm of David.

1. THE earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein; 2. For he hath founded it upon the seas, and established it upon the floods.

Here is, I. God's absolute propriety in this part of the creation, where our lot is cast, v. 1. We are not to think that the heavens, even the heavens only, are the Lord's, and the numerous and bright inhabitants of the upper world, and that this earth, being so small and inconsiderable a part of the creation, and at such a distance from the royal palace above, is neglected, and that he claims no interest in it. No, even the earth is his, and this lower world; and David, prepared to speak on the glories of his glory in the heavens, yet his kingdom rules over all, and even the worms of this earth are not below his cognizance, nor from under his dominion.

(1.) When God gave the earth to the children of men, he still reserved to himself the property, and only let it out to them as tenants, or usufructuaries; The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof; the mines that are lodged in the bowels of it, even the richest; the fruits it produces; all the beasts of the forest, and the cattle upon a thousand hills; our lands and houses, and all the improvements that are made of this earth by the skill and industry of man, are all his. These indeed, in the kingdom of grace, are justly looked upon as emptiness; for they are vanity of vanities, nothing to a soul; but, in the kingdom of providence, they are fulness. The earth is full of God's riches, so is the great and wide sea also. All the parts and regions of the earth are the Lord's, all under his eye, all in his hand; so that, wherever a child of God goes, he may confit himself with this, that he does not go off his Father's ground. That which falls to our share of the earth and its productions, is but lent to us, it is the Lord's; what is our own against all the world, is not so against his claims. That which is most remote from us, as that which passes through the paths of the sea, or lies hid in the bottom of it, is the Lord's and he knows where to find it.

(2.) The habitable part of this earth (Prov. viii. 31.) is his in a special manner; the world, and they that dwell therein. We ourselves are not our own, our bodies, our souls, are not. All souls are mine, says God; for he is the Former of our bodies, and the Father of our spirits. Our tongues are not our own, they are to be at his service. Even those of the children of men are his, that know him not, nor own their relation to him. Now this comes in here, to show that though God is graciously pleased to accept the devotions and services of his peculiar chosen people, (v. 5-7,) it is not because he needs them, or can be benefited by them, for the earth is the Lord's, and him, and all in it, Exod. xix. 5. Ps. 28. 2. It is likewise to be applied to the dominion Christ has, as Mediator, over the utmost parts of the earth, which are given him for his possession: the Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hand, power over all flesh. The apostle quotes this scripture twice together in his discourse about things offered to idols, 1 Cor. x. 26, 28. If it be so in the shambles, eat it, and ask no questions, for the earth is the Lord's, it is God's good creature, and you have a right to it; but if one tell you it was offered to an idol, forbear, for the earth is the Lord's, and there is enough besides. This is a good reason why we should be content with our allotment in this world, and not envy others their's; the earth is the Lord's, and may he not do what he will with his own, and give to some more of it, to others less, as it pleases him.

II. The ground of this propriety; the earth is his by an indisputable title, for he hath founded it upon the seas, and established it upon the floods, v. 2. It is his; for, (1.) He made it, formed it, founded it, and fitted it for the use of man. The matter is his, for he made it out of nothing; the form is his, for he made it according to the eternal counsels and ideas of his own mind. He made it himself, he made it for himself; so that he is sole, entire, and absolute. Over it, as over all he has made, he rules part, by part, from, and under, him; see lxxxix. 11, 12. (2.) He made it so as no one else could; it is the creature of Omnipotence, for it is founded upon the seas, upon the floods; a weak and unstable foundation (one would think) to build the earth upon, and yet, if Almighty power pleases, it shall serve to bear the weight of this earth. The waters which at first covered the earth, and rendered it void and desolate, shall, at the end of the week, be gathered together, and be no more, that the dry land might appear, and so they are as a foundation to it; see ciev. 8, 9. (3.) He continues it, he has established it, fixed it, so that, though one generation passes, and another comes, the earth abides, Eccl. i. 4. And his providence is a continued creation, cxix. 50. The founding of the earth upon the floods, should remind us how slippery and uncertain all earthly things are; their foundation is not only sand, but water; it is therefore our folly to build upon them.

3. Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord? and who shall stand in his holy place? 4. He that hath clean hands, and a pure heart; who hath not lifted up his soul unto vanity, nor sworn deceitfully.

5. He shall receive the blessing from the Lord, and righteousness from the God of his salvation. 6. This is the generation of them that seek him, that seek thy face, O Jacob. Selah.

From this world, and the fulness thereof, the psalmist's meditations rise, of a sudden, to the great things of another world, the foundation of which is not on the seas, nor on the floods. The things of this world God has given to the children of men, and we are much indebted to his provi dence for them; but they will not make a portion for us. And therefore,

1. Here is an inquiry after better things, v. 3. This earth is God's footstool; but, if we had ever so much of it, we must be here but awhile, must shortly go hence, and Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord? Who shall go to heaven hereafter, and, as an earnest of that, shall have communion with God in holy ordinances now? A soul that knows and considers its own nature, original, and immortality, when it has viewed the earth and the fulness thereof, will sit down unsatisfied; there is not found among all the creatures a help meet for man, and therefore no bank of God's town therein; will ask, What shall I do to rise to that high place, that hill, where the Lord dwells, and manifests himself, that I may be acquainted with him; and to abide in that happy, holy, place, where he meets his people, and makes them holy and happy? What shall I do that I may be of those whom God owns for his peculiar people, and who are his in another manner than the earth is his and its fulness? This question is as much the same with that, xv. 1. The hill of Zion, on which the temple was built, typified the church, both visible and invisible. When the people attended the ark to its holy place, David puts them in mind, that these were but patterns of heavenly things, and therefore that by them they should be led to consider the heavenly things themselves.

2. In answer to this inquiry; in which we have,

The properties of God's peculiar people, who shall have communion with him in grace and glory.

(1.) They are such as keep themselves from all the gross acts of sin. They have clean hands; not spotted with the pollutions of the world and the flesh. None that were ceremonially unclean might enter into the mountain of the temple, which signified that cleanness of conversation which is required in all those that have fellowship with God. The hands, lifted up in prayer, must be pure hands, no blot of unjust gain cleaving to them, nor any thing else that defiles the man, and is offensive to the holy God.

(2.) They are such as make conscience of being truly, that is, of being inwardly, as good as they seem to be outwardly; they have pure hearts. We make nothing of our religion, if we do not make heart-work of it. It is not enough that our hands be clean before men, but we must be so, and our hearts from wickedness, and not allow ourselves in any secret heart-impurities, which are open before the eye of God. Yet in vain do those pretend to have pure and good hearts, whose hands are defiled with the acts of sin. This is a pure heart, which is sincere and without guile in covenanting with God, which is carefully guarded, that the wicked one, the unclean spirit, touch it not, which is purified by faith, and conformed to the image and will of God, as we see here, ver. 1, and xi. 8.

(3.) They are such as do not set their affections upon the things of this world; as do not lift up their souls unto vanity, whose hearts are not carried out inordinately toward the wealth of the world, the praise of men, or the delights of sense; who do not choose these things for their portion, nor reach forth after them, because they believe them to be vanity, uncertain and unsatisfying.

8. They deal honestly both with God and man. In their covenant with God, and their contracts with men, they have not sworn deceitfully, nor broken their promises, violated their engagements, or taken any false oath. Those that have no regard to the obligations of truth, or the honour of God's name, are unfit for a place in God's holy hill.

5. They are a praying people; (v. 5.) The is the generation of them that seek him. In every age there is a remnant of such as these, men of this character, who are accounted to the Lord for a generation, xxiii. 30. And they are such as seek God, that they may give him his face. O Jacob, [v. 7.] They fly themselves to God, to seek him; not only in earnest prayer, but in serious endeavours to obtain his favour, and keep themselves in his love; who, having made it the top of their happiness, make it the top of their ambition, to be accepted of him, and therefore take care and pains to approve themselves to him. It is to the hill of the Lord that we must ascend, and, the way being up-hill, we must not only ascend it, but let ourselves be those that seek diligently. [2.] They join themselves to the people of God, to seek God with them; being brought into communion with God, they come into the communion of saints; conforming to the patterns of the saints that are gone before, some understand this; they seek God's face, as Jacob, (so some,) who was therefore summed Israel, because he wrestled with God and prevailed, and find him and found him; and, associating with the saints, and as their people, for a long time, they shall continue in the favour of God's church, (Rev. iii. 9.) shall be glad of an acquaintance with God's people, (Zech. viii. 23.) shall incorporate themselves with them, and, when they subscribe with their hands to the Lord, shall call themselves by the name of Jacob, Isa. xlv. 5. As soon as ever Paul was converted, he joined himself to the disciples, Acts, ix. 26. They shall seek God's face in Jacob, (so some,) in the assemblies of his people; Thy face, O Jacob; of Jacob; so our margin supplies it, and makes it easy. As all believers are the spiritual seed of Abraham, so all that strive in prayer are the spiritual seed of Jacob, to whom God never said, Seek ye me in vain. v. 2. The privileges of God's peculiar people, v. 5. They shall be made truly and for ever happy.

(1.) They shall be blessed: they shall receive the blessing from the Lord, all the fruits and gifts of God's favour, according to his promise; and those whom God blesses are blessed indeed, for it is his prerogative to command the blessing. (2.) They shall be justified, and sanctified. These are the spiritual blessings in heavenly things, which they shall receive, even righteousness, the very thing they hunger and thirst after, Matth. v. 6. Righteousness is blessedness, and it is from God only that we must expect it, for we have no righteousness of our own. They shall receive the reward of their righteousness, (so some,) the crown of righteousness which the righteous Judge shall give, 2 Tim. iv. 8. (3.) They shall be saved; for God himself will be the God of their salvation. Note, Where God gives righteousness, he certainly designs salvation. Those that are made meet for heaven, shall be brought safe to heaven, and then they will find what they have been seeking, to their endless satisfaction.

7. Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lifted up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in. 8. Who is this King of glory? The Lord strong and mighty, the Lord mighty in battle. 9. Lift up your heads, O ye gates; even lift them up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in. 10. Who is this King of glory? The Lord of hosts, he is the King of glory. Selah.
and have much beauty in them. Here is, 1. Entrance once and again demanded for the King of glory; the doors and gates are to be thrown open, thrown wide open, to give him admission, for behold, he stands at the door, and knocks, ready to come in. 2. Inquiry once and again made concerning this mighty Prince, in whose name entrance is demanded: Who is this King of glory? As, when any knock at our door, it is common to ask, Who is there? 3. Satisfaction once and again given concerning the royal Person that makes the demand: It is the Lord, strong and mighty, the Lord mighty in battle, the Lord of hosts, v. 8, 10. Now,

(1.) This splendid entry here described, it is probable, refers to the solemn bringing in of the ark into the tent David pitched for it, or the temple Solomon built for it; for when David prepared materials for the building of it, it was proper for him to prepare a psalm for the dedication of it. The porters are called upon to open the doors, and they are called everlasting doors, because much more durable than the door of the tabernacle, which was but a curtain. They are taught to ask, Who is this King of glory? And they that bear the ark are taught to answer, in the language before us, and very fitly, because the ark was a symbol or token of God's presence, Josh. iii. 11. Or, it may be taken as a poetical figure designed to represent the subject more affectingly: God, in his word and ordinances, is thus to be welcomed by us. [1.] With great readiness, he throw and gates must be thrown open to him. Let the word of the Lord come into the innermost and uppermost place in our souls; and, if we had 600 necks, we should bow them all to the authority of it. [2.] With all reverence, remembering how great a God he is, with whom we have to do, in all our approaches to him. (2.) Do butless it points at Christ, of whom the ark, with the mercy-seat, was a type. [1.] We may apply it to the ascension of Christ into heaven, and the welcome given to him there. When he had finished his work on earth, he ascended in the clouds of heaven, Dan. vii. 13, 14. The gates of heaven must then be opened to him, those doors that may be truly called everlasting, which had been shut against us, to keep the way of the tree of life, Gen. iii. 24. Our Redeemer found them shut, but, having by his blood made atonement for sin, he entered the holy place, (Heb. ix. 12,) as one having authority, he demanded entrance, not for himself only, but for us; for, as the Forerunner, he is for us entered, and has opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers. The keys not only of hell and death, but of heaven and life, must be put into his hand. His approach being very magnificent, the angels are brought in asking, Who is this King of glory? For angels keep the gates of the New Jerusalem, Rev. xxi. 13. When I, the First-begotten, was translated into the upper world, the angels were to worship him; (Heb. i. 6.) and, accordingly, they here ask, with wonder, "Who is he? This that cometh with dyed garments from Bozrah? (Isa. lxiii. 1-3.) for he appears in that word as a Lamb that had been slain." It is answered, that he is strong and mighty, mighty in battle to save his people, and subdue his and their enemies. [2.] We may apply it to Christ's entrance into all men by his word and Spirit, that they may be his temples. Christ's presence in them is like that of the ark in the temple, it sanctifies them. Behold, he stands at the door and knocks, Rev. iii. 20. It is required, that the gates and doors of the heart be opened to him; not only as admission is given to a guest, but as possession is delivered to the rightful owner, after the title has been contested. This is the gospel call and demand: that we let Jesus Christ, the King of glory, come into our souls, and welcome him with hosannas, Blessed is he that cometh. That we may do this, the right question is here concerned to ask, Who this King of glory is? To acquaint ourselves with him whom we are to believe in, and to love above all. And the answer is ready; He is Jehovah, and will be Jehovah our righteousness, an all-sufficient Saviour to us, if we give him entrance and entertainment. He is strong and mighty, and the Lord of hosts; and therefore it is at our peril if we deny him entrance; for he is able to avenge the affront: he can force his way, and can break those in pieces, with his iron rod, that will not submit to his golden sceptre. In singing this, let our hearts cheerfully answer to this call, as it is in the first words of the next psalm, Unto thee, O Lord, do I lift up my soul.

PSALM XXV.

This psalm is full of devout affection to God; the out-goings of holy desires toward his favour and grace, and the lively acting of faith in his promises. We may learn out of it, I. Why it is proper for us to pray, v. 5-15. II. What we must pray for; the pardon of sin; (v. 6, 7, 18,) direction in the way of duty; (v. 4, 5,) the favour of God; (v. 16,) deliverance out of our troubles; (v. 17, 18,) preservation from our enemies; (v. 19, 20, 21,) and the salvation of the church of God, v. 29, 30. III. What we may plead in prayer; our confidence in God; (v. 2, 3, 5, 20, 21,) our distress, and the malice of our enemies; (v. 17, 19,) our sincerity, v. 21. IV. What precious promises we have to encourage us in prayer; of guidance and instruction, (v. 8, 9, 12,) the benefit of the covenant; (v. 10,) and the pleasure of communion with God, v. 13, 14. It is easy to apply the several passages of this psalm to ourselves in the singing of it; for we have often troubles, and always sins, to complain of, at the throne of grace.

A psalm of David.

1. UNTO thee, O Lord, do I lift up my soul. 2. O my God, I trust in thee: let me not be ashamed; let not mine enemies triumph over me. 3. Yea, let none that wait on thee be ashamed: let them be ashamed which transgress without cause. 4. Show me thy ways, O Lord; teach me thy paths. 5. Lead me in thy truth, and teach me: for thou art the God of my salvation; on thee do I wait all the day. 6. Remember, O Lord, thy tender mercies, and thy loving-kindness; for they have been ever of old. 7. Remember not the sins of my youth, nor my transgressions: according to thy mercy remember thou me, for thy goodness' sake, O Lord.

Here we have David's professions of desire toward God, and dependence on him. He often begins his psalms with such professions; not to move God, but to move himself, and to engage himself to answer those professions.

1. He professes his desire towards God; Unto thee, O Lord, do I lift up my soul, v. 1. In the foregoing psalm, (v. 4,) it was made the character of a good man, that he has not lift up his soul to vanity; and a call was given to the everlasting gates to lift up their heads for the King of glory to come in, v. 1. To which character, to which call, David here answers, "Lord, I lift up my soul, not to vanity, but to thee." Note, In worshipping God, we must lift up our souls to him.
Prayer is the ascent of the soul to God; God must be ed, and the soul employed. Susurrant corda—
Up with your hearts, was anciently used as a call to devotion. With a holy contempt of the world and the things of it, by a fixed thought and act of faith, we set God before us, and let our desire toward him as the Fountain of our happiness.

2. He professes his dependence upon God, and seeks for the benefit and comfort of that dependence;
(v. 2.) O my God, I trust in thee. His conscience witnessed for him, that he had no confidence in himself or in any creature, and that he had no difficence of God, or of his power or promise. He pleases himself with this profession of faith in God.
Having put his trust in God, he was satisfied, and quiet from the fear of evil: and he pleads it with God, whose honour it is to help those that honour him by trusting in him. What men put a confidence in, is either their joy or their shame, according as it proves. Now David under the direction of faith, prays earnestly, (1.)
That shame might not be his lot; "Let me not be ashamed of my confidence in thee; let me not be shaken from it by any prevailing fears, and let not this thought of shame be an obstacle to me, which I depend upon thee for; but, Lord, keep what I have committed unto thee." Note, If we make our condence in God our stay, it shall not be our shame;
and if we triumph in him, our enemies shall not triumph over us, as they would, if we should now sink under our fears, or should, in the issue, come short of our hopes. (2.) That it might not be the lot of any that trusted in God. All the saints have obtained a like precious faith; and therefore, doubtless, it will be alike successful in the issue. Thus the communion of saints is kept up, even by their praying one for another. True saints will make suppliants for all saints. It is certain that none who, by a believing attendance, wait on God, and,
by a believing hope, wait for him, shall be made ashamed of it. (3.) That it might be the lot of the transgressors; Let them be ashamed, that transgress without cause, or vainly, as the word is. [1.] Upon none of their doings, from God, from David and his government, (so some,) without any occasion given them, not being able to pretend any iniquity they have found in God, or that in any thing he has wearied them. The weaker the temptation is, by which men are drawn to sin, the stronger the corruption is, by which they are driven to it. Those are the worst trans-gressors that sin for sinner’s-sake. [2.] To no purpose. They know their attempts against God are fruitsless; they imagine a vain thing, and therefore they will soon be ashamed of them.

3. He beggs direction from God in the way of his duty, (v. 4, 5.) Once again, he here prays to God to teach him. He was a knowing man himself, but the most intelligent, the most observant, both need and desire to be taught of God; from him we must be ever learning. Observe, (1.) What he desired to learn, the way of the Lord, his paths and his ways, his strong ways, his thoughts, his strong ways, his strong thoughts, his strong ways. The ways in which thou walkest toward me, which are all mercy and truth, (v. 10.) and the ways in which thou wouldst have me to walk toward
you. Those are best taught who understand their duty, and know the good things they should do, Eccl. ii. 3. The paths of the Lord, and his truth, are the same; divine laws are all founded on this principle, all the way of God is a path of righteousness, and the way of the Lord is a way of truth, cxix. 30. Christ is both the Way and the Truth, and therefore we must learn Christ. (2.) What he desires of God, in order to this. [1.] That he would enlighten his understanding concerning his duty; “Show me thy way, and so teach me.” In doubtful cases, we should pray earnestly, that God would make it plain to us what he would have us to do. [2.] That he would incite his will to it, and strengthen him in it; “Lead me, and so teach me.” Not only as we lead one another, but also to lead ourselves;
keep us from missing his way, but as we lead one that is weak and feeble, and faint, to help him forward in the way, and to keep him from fainting and falling.
We go no further in the way to heaven, than God is pleased to lead us, and to hold us up. (3.) What he prays, (1.) His great expectation from God; Thou art the God of my salvation. Note, Those that choose the salvation of God as their end, and that commit their cause to God, are to boldly to him for direction in the way that leads to that end. If God save us, he will teach us, and lead us. He that gives salvation, will give instruction. (2.) His constant attendance on God; On thee do I wait all the day. Whence should a servant expect direction what to do, but from his own master, on whom he waits all the day? If we sincerely desire to know our duty, with a resolution to do it, we need not question but that God will dictate it to us.

4. He appeals to God’s infinite mercy, and cast up himself upon that, not pretending to any merit of his own; (v. 6.) "Remember, O Lord, thy tender mercy, and, for the sake of those mercies, lead me, and teach me; for they have been ever of old;"
(1.) "Thou art always a merciful God; it is your nature, it is thy nature and property to show mercy.

(2.) Thy counsels and designs of mercy were from eternity, the vessels of mercy were, before all worlds, ordained to glory. (2.) "The instances of thy mercy to the church in general, and to me in particular, were early and ancient, and constant hitherto; they began of old, and never ceased. Thou hast taught me from my youth up, teach me now."

5. He is in a special manner earnest for the pardon of his sins; (v. 7.) "O remember not the sins of my youth. Lord, remember thy mercies,
(v. 6.) which speak for me, and not my sins, which speak against me." Here is, (1.) An implicit confession of sin; he specifies particularly the sins of his youth. Note, Our youthful faults and follies should be matter of our repentance and humiliation long after, because time does not wear out the guilt of sin. Old people should mourn for the sinful mirth, and be in pain for the sinful pleasures, of their youth. He aggravates his sins, calling them transgressions; and the more holy, just, and good, the law is, which sin is the transgression of, the more exceeding sinful it ought to appear to us.
(2.) An express petition for mercy; [1.] That he might be acquitted from guilt; "Remember not the sins of my youth; remember them not against me, lay them not to my charge, enter not into judgment with me for them. When God pardons sin, he is said to remember it no more, which denotes a permanent remission, he forgets, and I forget, [2.] That he might be accepted in God’s sight; "Remember thou me; think on me for good, and come in seasonably for my succour." We need desire no more to make us happy, than for God to remember us with favour. His plea is, “according to thy mercy, and for thy goodness-sake." Note, It is God’s goodness, and not ours; his mercy, and not our own merit, that must be our plea for the whole salvation of our souls, and all the glory of that salvation. This plea we must always rely upon, as those that are sensible of our poverty and unworthiness, and as those that are satisfied of the riches of God’s mercy and grace.

6. Good and upright is the Lord; therefore will he teach sinners in the way.
The meek will he guide in judgment, and the meek will he teach his way. 10. All the paths of the \textsc{Lord} are mercy and truth unto such as keep his covenant and his testimonies. 11. For thy name’s sake, O \textsc{Lord}, pardon mine iniquity; for it is great. 12. What man is he that feareth the \textsc{Lord}? him shall he teach in the way that he shall choose: 13. His soul shall dwell at ease; and his seed shall inherit the earth. 14. The secret of the \textsc{Lord} is with them that fear him; and he will show them his covenant.

God’s promises are here mixed with David’s prayers. Many petitions there were in the former part of the psalm, and many in the latter; and here, in the midst of the psalm, he meditates upon the promises, and by a lively faith sucks, and is satisfied, from these breasts of consolation; for the promises of God are not only the best foundation of prayer, telling us what to pray for, and encouraging our faith and hope in prayer; but they are a present answer to prayer. Let the prayer be made according to the promise, and then the promise may be read as a return to the prayer; and we are to believe the prayer is heard, because the promise will be performed. But, in the midst of the promises, we find one petition which seems to come in somewhat abruptly, and should have followed upon \textit{v.} 7. It is that, \textit{(v. 11.) Pardon mine iniquity.} But prayers for the pardon of sin are never intolerant; we mingle sin with all our actions, and therefore should mingle such prayers with all our devotions. He enforces this petition with a double plea. The former is very natural; “For thy name’s sake, pardon mine iniquity, because thou hast proclaimed thy name gracious and merciful, pardoning iniquity, for thy glory-sake, for thy promise-sake, for thine own sake.” Isa. xliii. 25. But the latter is very surprising; “Pardon mine iniquity, for it is great; and the greater it is, the more will divine mercy be magnified in the forgiveness of it.” It is the glory of a great God to forgive great sins, to forgive iniquity, transgression, and sin, Exod. xxxiv. 7. “It is great, and therefore I am undone, for even great, if my great mercy do not interpose for the pardon of it. It is great; I see it to be so.” The more we see of the heinousness of our sins, the better qualified we are to find mercy with God. When we confess sin, we must aggravate it.

Let us now take a view of the great and precious promises which we have in these verses, and observe them.

To whom these promises belong, and who may expect the benefit of them. We are all sinners; and can we hope for any advantage by them? Yes, \textit{(v. 8.) He will teach sinners, though they be sinners;} for Christ came into the world to save sinners, and, in order to that, to teach sinners, to call sinners to repentance.

These promises are sure to those who, though they have been sinners, have gone astray, yet now keep God’s word. To such, 1. As keep his covenant and his testimonies, he will teach them his paths, excepts for their rule, and his promises for their portion; as, having taken God to be them a God, live upon that, and, having given up themselves to be to him a people, live up to that. Though, through the infirmity of the flesh, they sometimes break the command, yet, by a sincere repentance, when at any time they do amiss, and a constant adherence by faith to God as their God, they keep the covenant, and do not break that. 2. To such as fear him, \textit{(v. 12.) and again, (v. 14.) as stand in awe of his majesty, and worship him in reverence, submit to his authority, and obey him with cheerfulness, dread his wrath, and are afraid of offending him.}

II. Upon what these promises are grounded, and what encouragement we have to build upon them. Here are too things which ratify and confirm all the promises.

1. The perfections of God’s nature. We value the promise by the character of him that makes it; we may therefore depend upon God’s promises, for good and upright is the \textsc{Lord}, and therefore he will be as good as his word. He is so kind that he cannot deceive us, so true that he cannot break his promise. \textit{Faithful is he who hath promised, who also will do it.} He was good in making the promise, and therefore will be upright in performing it.

2. The agreeableness of all he says and does, with the perfections of his nature; \textit{(v. 10.) All the paths of the \textsc{Lord} are mercy and truth, and all his providences, are mercy and truth; they are, like himself, good and upright.} All God’s dealings with his people are according to the mercy of his purposes, and the truth of his promises; all he does comes from love, covenant-love; and they may see in it his mercy displayed, and his word fulfilled. What a rich satisfaction may this be to good people, that, whatever afflictions they are exercised with, \textit{all the paths of the \textsc{Lord} are mercy and truth, and so it will appear when they come to their journey’s end.}

III. What these promises are.

1. That God will instruct and direct them in the way of their duty. This is most insisted upon, because it is an answer to David’s prayers; \textit{(v. 4, 5.) Show me thy ways, and lead me.} We should fix our thoughts, and act our faith, most on those promises which suit our present case. (1.) He will teach sinners in the way, because they are sinners, and therefore need teaching; when they see themselves sinners, and desire teaching, then he will teach them the way of reconciliation to God, the way to a well-grounded peace of conscience, and the way to eternal life. He does, by his gospel, make known this way to all, and, by his Spirit, open the understanding, and guide penitent sinners that inquire after it. The Devil leads men blindfold to hell, but God enables them thus to find the way of God, to see the true light, and so leads them to heaven. (2.) The meek will he guide, the meek will he teach; those that are humble and low in their own eyes, that are distrustful of themselves, desirous to be taught, and honestly resolved to follow the divine guidance; \textit{Speak, \textsc{Lord}, for thy servant hears.} These he will guide in judgment, that is, by the rule of the written word; he will guide them in that which is practical, which, and duty, and that so that they may keep conscience void of offence; and he will do it judiciously, (so some,) that is, he will suit his conduct to their case; he will teach sinners with wisdom, tenderness, and compassion, and as they are able to bear. He will teach them his way. All good people make God’s way their way, and desire to be taught that; and those that do so shall be taught and led in that way. (3.) \textit{Him that feareth the \textsc{Lord}, he will instruct in the way that he shall choose;} either in the way that God shall choose, or that the good man shall choose. It comes all to one, for he that fears the \textsc{Lord} choses the things that please him. If we choose the right way, he that directed our choice will direct our steps, and will lead us in it. If we choose wisely, God will give us grace to walk wisely.

2. That God will make them easy; \textit{(v. 13.) His soul shall dwell at ease, shall lodge in goodness, shall keep the cov-} selves to the fear of God, and give up themselves to be taught of God, it is their own fault, if they be not easy. "The soul that is sanctified by the grace of God, and much more, that is comforted by the peace of God, dwells at ease. Even when the body is sick, and lies in pain, yet the soul may dwell at ease in God, may return to him, and repose in him, as its rest. Many things occur to make us uneasy, but there is enough in the covenant of grace to balance them all, and to make us easy.

3. That he will give to them and their's as much of this world as is good for them; "His seed shall inherit the earth. Next to our care concerning our souls, is our care concerning our seed, and God has a blessing in store for the generation of the upright. They that fear God shall inherit the earth, shall have a competency in it, and the comfort of it; and their children shall fare the better for their prayers, when they are gone.

4. That God will admit them into the secret of communion with himself; (v. 14.) The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him. They understand his word, for if any man do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, John vii. 17. They that receive the truth in the love of it, and experience the power of it, best understand the mystery of it. They know the meaning of his providence, and what God is doing with them, better than others. "Shall I hide from Abraham the things that I do? Gen. xviii. 17. He calls them not servants, but friends, as he called Abraham. They know by experience the blessings of the covenant, and the pleasure of that fellowship which gracious souls have with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ. This honour have all his saints.

15. Mine eyes are ever toward the Lord; for he shall pluck my feet out of the net. 16. Turn thee unto me, and have mercy upon me; for I am desolate and afflicted. 17. The troubles of my heart are enlarged: O bring thou me out of my distresses. 18. Look upon mine affliction, and my pain: and forgive all my sins. 19. Consider mine enemies; for they are many; and they hate me with cruel hatred. 20. O keep my soul, and deliver me: let me not be ashamed: for I put my trust in thee. 21. Let integrity and uprightness preserve me; for I wait on thee. 22. Redeem Israel, O God, out of all his troubles.

David, encouraged by the promises he had been meditating upon, here renews his addresses to God, and concludes the psalm, as he began, with the professions of dependence upon God and desire toward him.

1. He lays before God the calamitous condition he was in. His feet were in the net, held fast and entangled, so that he could not extricate himself out of his difficulties, v. 15. He was desolate and afflicted, v. 16. It is common for those that are afflicted to be desolate; their friends desert them then, and they are themselves disposed to sit alone, and keep silence, Lam. iii. 28. David calls himself desolate and solitary, because he depended not upon his servants and soldiers, but relied as entirely upon God, as if he had no prospect that any help could come from any creature. Being in distress, in many distresses, the troubles of his heart were enlarged; (v. 17.) he grew more and more melancholy, and troubled in mind. Sense of sin afflicted him more than any thing else: that was that which broke and wounded his spirit, and made his outward troubles lie heavy upon him. He was in affliction and pain, v. 18. His enemies, that persecuted him, were malicious and malicious; and very barbarous, it was with a cruel hatred that they hated him, v. 19. Such were Christ's enemies, and the persecutors of his church.

2. He expressed the dependence he had upon God in these distresses; (v. 15.) Mine eyes are ever toward the Lord. Idolaters were for gods that they could see with their bodily eyes, and they had their eyes ever toward their idols, Isa. xvii. 7. 8. But it is an eye of faith that we must fix on God, with this Spirit, Zech. ix. 1. Our meditation of him must be sweet, and we must always set him before us: in all our ways, we must acknowledge him, and do all to his glory. Thus we must live a life of communion with God, not only in ordinances, but in providences, not only in the acts of devotion, but in the whole course of our conversation. David had the comfort of this, in his affliction; for, because his eyes were ever toward the Lord, he doubted not but he would pluck his feet out of the net; that he would deliver him from the corruptions of his own heart, (so some,) from the designs of his enemies against him, so others. Those that have their eye ever toward God, shall not have their feet long in the net. He repeats his profession of dependence upon God; (v. 20.) Let me not be ashamed; for I put my trust in thee; and of expectation from him, I wait on thee, v. 21. It is good thus to hope, and quietly to wait, for the salvation of the Lord.

3. He prays earnestly to God for relief and succour.

1. For himself; see how he begs, (1.) For the remission of sin; (v. 18.) Forgive all my sins. Those were his heaviest burthen, and which brought upon him all his other burthens. He had begged (v. 7.) for the pardon of the sins of his youth, and (v. 11.) for the pardon of some one particular iniquity that was remarkably great, which, more than any thing, was his sin in the matter of Uriah. But here he prays, Lord, forgive all, take away all iniquity. It is observable, that, as to his affliction, he asks for no more than God's regard to it; "Look upon my affliction and my pain, and do with it as thou pleasest." But, as to his sin, he asks for no less than a pardon, Forgive all my sins. When at any time we are in trouble, we should be more concerned about our sins, to get them pardoned, than about our afflictions, to get them removed. (2.) For the peace of his soul. For the peace of his soul. His mind was troubled for God's withdrawals from him, and under the sense he had of his displeasure against him for his sin; and therefore he prays, (v. 16.) Turn thee unto me. And if God turn to us, no matter who turns from us. His condition was troubled, and, in reference to that, he prays, "O bring thou me out of my distresses. I see no way of deliverance open; but thou canst either find one, or make it for me."

He prays earnestly in reference to that, he prays, "O keep my soul from falling into their hands, or else deliver me out of their hands.

Four things he mentions by way of plea, to enforce these petitions; and refers himself and them to God's consideration. (1.) He pleads God's mercy; Have mercy upon me. Men of the greatest merits were undone, if they had not to do with a God of infinite mercy. (2.) He pleads his own misery, "O strengthen the afflicted and the sick, especially the troubles of his heart; all which made him the proper object of divine mercy. (3.) He pleads the iniquity of his enemies; "Lord, consider them, how cruel they are, and deliver me out of their hands." (4.) He pleads his own integrity, v. 21. Though he had owned himself guilty before God and had confessed his sins against him; yet, as to his enemies, he had the testimony of his conscience, that he had done them no wrong; which was his comfort, when they hated him with cruel hatred; and he prays that this might preserve him. This intimates that he did not expect to be safe, any longer than he continued in his integrity and uprightness; and that, while he did continue in it, he did not doubt of being safe. Sincerity will be our best security in the worst of times. Integrity and uprightness will be a man’s preservation more than the wealth and honour of the world can be; they will preserve us in a heavenly kingdom. We should therefore pray to God to preserve us in our integrity, and then be assured that that will preserve us.

2. For the church of God; (v. 22.) Redeem Israel, O God, out of all his troubles. David was now in trouble himself, but he thinks it not strange, since trouble is the lot of all God’s Israel. Why should any one member fare better than the whole body? David’s troubles were enlarged, and very earnest he was with God to deliver him; yet he forgets not the distresses of God’s church; for when we have ever so much business of our own at the throne of grace, we must still remember to pray for the public. Good men have little comfort in their own safety, while the church is in distress and danger. This prayer is a prophecy, that God would, at length, give David rest, and therewith give Israel rest from all his enemies, his heart and his flesh. It is a prophecy of the setting of the Messiah in due time to redeem Israel from his iniquities, (xxx. 8.) and so to redeem them from their troubles. It refers also to the happiness of the future state. In heaven, and in heaven only, will God’s Israel be perfectly redeemed from all troubles.

PSALM XXVI.

Holy David is, in this psalm, putting himself upon a solemn trial, not by God and his country, but by God and his own conscience; to both which he appeals touching his integrity, (v. 1, 2.) for the proof of which, he alleges, 1. His constant regard to God and his grace, v. 3. 2. His rooted antipathy to sin and sinners, v. 4, 5. 3. His sincere affection to the ordinances of God, and his care about them, v. 6, 7. Having thus proved his integrity, 1. He deprecateth the doom of the wicked, v. 9, 10. 2. He exalseth himself upon the mercy and grace of God; with a resolution to hold fast his integrity, and his hope in God, v. 11, 12. In singing this psalm, we must teach and admonish ourselves, and one another, what we must be, and do, that we may have the favour of God, and comfort in our own consciences; and comfort ourselves with it, as David does, if we can say, that in any measure we have, through grace, answered to these characters. The learned Annyraeus, in his argument of this psalm, suggests, that David is here, by the spirit of prophecy, carried out to speak of himself as a type of Christ, of whom what he here says of his spotless innocence, was fully and eminently true, and of him only, and to him we may apply it in singing this psalm. We are complete in him.

A psalm of David.

I JUDGE me, O Lord; for I have walked in mine integrity: I have trusted at {o} in the Lord; therefore I shall not slide.

2. Examine me, O Lord, and prove me; try my reins and my heart. 3. For thy loving-kindness is before mine eyes; and I have walked in thy truth. 4. I have not sat with vain persons, neither will I go in with dissemblers. 5. I have hated the congregation of evil-doers; and will not set with the wicked.

It is probable that David penned this psalm when he was persecuted by Saul and his party, who, to give some colour to their unjust rage, represented him as a very bad man, and falsely accused him of many high crimes and misdeemors, dressed him up in the skins of wild beasts, that they might bait him. Innocency is no fence to the name, though it is to the bosom, against the darts of calumny. Herein he was a type of Christ, who was made a reproach of men, and foretold to his followers, that they also must have all manner of evil said against them falsely. Now see what David does in this case.

I. He appeals to God’s righteous sentence; (v. 1.) “Judge me, O God; be thou Judge between me and my accusers, between the persecutor and the poor prisoner; bring me off with honour, and put them to shame that falsely accuse me.” Saul, who was himself supreme judge in Israel, was his adversary, so that he was in a controversy with him, he could appeal to no other than to God himself. As to his offences against God, he prays, Lord, enter not into judgment with me; (cxliii. 2.) Remember not my transgressions; (xxv. 7.) there he appeals to God’s mercy; but as to his offences against Saul, he appeals to God’s justice, and begs of him to judge for him, as, xliii. 1. Or thus; he cannot justify himself against the charge of sin, he owns his iniquity is great, and he is undone if God, in his infinite justice, do but consider his past conduct, and himself against the charge of hypocrisy, and has reason to hope, that, according to the tenor of the covenant of grace, he is one of those that may expect to find favour with God. Thus holy Job often owns he has sinned, and yet he holds fast his integrity. Note, It is a comfort to those who are falsely accused, that there is a righteous God, who, sooner or later, will clear up their innocency, and a comfort to all who are sincere in religion, that God himself is a Witness to their sincerity.

II. He submits to his unerring search; (v. 2.) Examine me, O Lord, and prove me, as gold is proved, whether it be standard. God knows every man’s true character, for he knows the thoughts and intents of the heart, and sees through every disguise. David prays, Lord, examine me; which intimates that he was well pleased that God did know him, and truly desirous that he would discover him to himself, and plead his cause before the world. So sincere was he in his devotion to his God, and his loyalty to his prince, (in which he was suspected to be a pretender,) that he wished he had a window in his bosom, that whoever would, might look into his heart.

III. He solemnly protests his sincerity; (v. 1.) “I have walked in mine integrity; my conversation has agreed with my profession, and one part of it has been of a piece with another.” It is in vain to boast of our integrity, unless we can make it out, that by the grace of God, we have walked in our integrity, and that our conversation in the world has been in simplicity and godly sincerity.

He produces here several proofs of his integrity, which encouraged him to trust in the Lord as his righteous Judge, who would patronise and plead his righteous cause, with an assurance that he should come off with all reputation, (Therefore I shall not slide) and that they should not be suffered to cast him down from his excellency, to shake his faith, blemish his name, and prevent his coming to the crown, lxxi. 4. They that are sincere in religion may trust in God, that they shall not slide, that they shall not apostatize from their religion.

1. He had a constant regard to God and to his grace, v. 5. (1.) He aimed at God’s favour as his end, and chief good: Thy loving-kindness is before mine eyes. This will be a good evidence of our sincerity, if what we do in religion, we do from a principle of love to God, and good thoughts of him as the best of beings, and the best of friends and benefactors, and from a grateful sense of God's goodness to us in particular, which he hath been pleased to bestow on us. If we set God's loving-kindness before us as our pattern, to which we endeavour to conform ourselves, being followers of him that is good in his goodness; (1 Pet. iii. 13.) if we set it before us as our great engagement and encouragement to our duty, and are afraid of doing anything to forfeit God's favour, and in care by all means to keep ourselves in his love; this will not only be a good evidence of our integrity, but a sure, lasting, great and apparent preservation in it. (2.) He governed himself by the word of God as his rule. "I have walked in thy truth, according to thy law, for thy law is truth." Note, Those only may expect the benefit of God's loving-kindness, that live up to his truths, and his laws that are grounded upon them. Some understand it of his conforming himself to God's example in truth and faithfulness, as well as in goodness and loving-kindness: Those certainly walk well, that are followers of God as dear children.

2. He had no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, nor with the workers of those works, v. 4, 5. By this it appeared he was truly loyal to his prince, that he never associated with those that were disaffected to his government, with any of those sons of Belial that despised him, 1 Sam. x. 27. He was in none of their cabals, nor joined with them in any of their intrigues; he cursed not the king, no not in his heart. And this also was an evidence of his faithfulness to his God, that he never associated with those who, he had any reason to think, were disaffected to religion, or were open enemies, or false friends, to its interests. Note, Great care to avoid bad company, is both a good evidence of our integrity, and a good means to preserve us in it. Now observe here, (1.) That this part of his protestation looks both backward upon the care he had hitherto taken in this matter, and forward upon the care he would still take. "I have not sit with them, and I will not go in with them." Note, Our good practices hitherto, are then evidences of our integrity, when they are accompanied with resolutions, in God's strength, to preserve in them to the end, and not to draw back; and our good resolutions for the future we may then take the comfort of, when they are the continuation of our good practices hitherto. (2.) That David shunned the company, not only of wicked persons, but of vain persons, that were wholly addicted to mirth and gaiety, and had nothing solid or serious in them. The company of such may perhaps be the more parrimous of the two to a good man, because he will not be so ready to stand upon his guard against the contagion of vanity, as against that of downright wickedness. (3.) That the company of dissemblers is as dangerous company as any other, and as hurtful to a man in several ways: They are a bad example to vanity, and to piety. Evil-doers pretend friendship to those whom they would decoy into their snares, but they dissemble: when they speak fair, believe them not. (4.) Though sometimes he could not avoid being in the company of bad people, yet he would not go in with them, he would not choose such for his companions, nor seek an opportunity of acquaintance and converse with them; he might fall in with them, but he would not by enlying, nor dissembling, or going in with them; or, if he happened to be with them, he would not sit with them, he would not continue with them; he would be in their company no longer than his business made it necessary: he would not concur with them, not say as they said, nor do as they did, as they that sit in the seat of the scorners, i. 1. He would not sit in counsel with them, upon ways and means to do mischief, nor sit in judgment with them, to condemn the generation of the righteous. (3.) We must not only in our practice avoid bad company, but in our principles and opinions we must have an aversion to it. David here says, not only "I have shunned it," but "I have hated it." cxxxix. 21. (6.) The congregation of evil doers, the club, the confederacy of them, is in a special manner hateful to good people. I have hated ecelesiam malignantium—the church of the malignants; so the vulgar Latin reads it. As good men, in concert, make one another better, and are enabled to do more, and more good, so may men, in conjunction, make one another worse, and do so much the more mischief. In all this, David was a type of Christ, who, though he received sinners, and ate with them, to instruct them and do them good, yet, otherwise, was holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners, particularly from the Pharisees, those dissemblers; thus too David was an example to Christians, when they join themselves to Christ, to save themselves from this untoward generation, Acts ii. 40.

6. I will wash my hands in innocency: so will I compass thine altar, O Lord: 7. That I may publish with the voice of thanksgiving, and tell of all thy wondrous works. 8. Lord, I have loved the habitation of thy house, and the place where thine honour dwelleth. 9. Gather not my soul with sinners, nor my life with bloody men: 10. In whose hands is mischief, and their right hand is full of bribes. 11. But as for me, I will walk in mine integrity: redeem me, and be merciful unto me. 12. My foot standeth in an even place: in the congregations will I bless the Lord.

In these verses, I. David produces a further evidence of his integrity, which was the sincere affection he had to the ordinances of God, and the constant care he took about them, and the pleasure he took in them. Hypocrites and dissemblers may indeed be found attending on God's ordinances, as the proud Pharisee went up to the temple to pray with the penitent publican; but it is a good sign of sincerity, if we attend upon them, as David here tells us he did, v. 6-8.

1. He was very careful and conscientious in his preparation for holy ordinances. I will wash mine hands in innocency. He not only refrained from the society of sinners, but kept himself clean from the pollutions of sin, and this with an eye to the public service. To dear children, I. (1.) Habitual preparation; "I will wash my hands in innocency, I will carefully watch against all sin, and keep my conscience pure from those defilements which dishonour God's altar. "I will wash, and so will I compass the altar, knowing that otherwise I shall not be welcome." This is like that, (1 Cor. xii. 8.) Let a man examine himself, and so let him eat; so prepared. This denotes, (1.) Habitual preparation; "I will wash my hands in innocency, I will carefully watch against all sin, and keep my conscience pure from those defilements which dishonour God's altar. "I will wash, and so will I compass the altar, knowing that otherwise I shall not be welcome." This is like that, (1 Cor. xii. 8.) Let a man examine himself, and so let him eat; so prepared. This denotes, (1.) Habitual preparation; "I will wash my hands in innocency, I will carefully watch against all sin, and keep my conscience pure from those defilements which dishonour God's altar. "I will wash, and so will I compass the altar, knowing that otherwise I shall not be welcome." This is like that, (1 Cor. xii. 8.) Let a man examine himself, and so let him eat; so prepared. (2.) Actual preparation; it alludes to the ceremony of the priests' washing, when they went in to minister, Exod. xxx. 20, 21. Though David was no priest, yet, as every worshipper ought, he would look to the substance of that to which the priests were enjoined the shadow of. In our preparations for solemn ordinances, we must not only be able to clear ourselves from the charge of reneging fidelity and by our consent our inward and outward sins (which was signified by washing the hands, Deut. xxii. 6,) but we must take pains to cleanse ourselves from the spots of remaining iniquity, by renewing our repentance, and making a fresh application of the blood of Christ to our consciences, for the purifying and pacifying of them. He that is washed, that is, in a justified state, has need thus to wash his feet, (John xiii. 10.) to wash his hands, to wash them in innocency; he that is penitent, is reformed—almost innocent; and he that is pardoned, is so far innocent, that his sins shall not be mentioned against him.

2. He was very diligent and serious in his attendance upon them; I will compass thine altar; ad- luding to the custom of the priests, who, while the sacrifice was in offering, walked round the altar, and, probably, the offerers likewise did so at some distance, offering a diligent regard to what was done, and a dutiful attendance in the service. "I will compass it; I will be among the crowds that do compass it, among the thickest of them." David, a man of honour, a man of business, a man of war, thought it not below him to attend with the multitude on God's altars, and could find time for that attendance. Note, (1.) All God's people will be sure to wait on God's altar, in obedience to his commands, and in pursuance of his favour. Christ is our Altar, and the altar in the Jewish church, which was fed by them, but an altar that we eat of, and live upon, Heb. xii. 10. (2.) It is a pleasant sight to see God's altar compassed, and to see ourselves among them that compass it.

3. In all his attendance on God's ordinances, he aimed at the glory of God, and was much in the thankful praise and adoration of him. He had an eye to the place of worship, as the place where God's honour dwelt, (v. 8.) and therefore made it his business there to honour God, and to give him the glory due to his name; to publish with the voice of thanksgiving all God's wondrous works. God's gracious works, which call for our thanksgiving, are all wondrous works, which call for our admiration. We ought to publish them, and tell of them, for his glory, and the excitement of others to praise him; and we ought to do it with the voice of thanksgiving, as those that are sensible of our obligations, by all those people of God, who are happy, and grate- tude the favours we have received from God.

4. He did this with delight, and from a principle of true affection to God and his institutions. Touching this, he appeals to God, "Lord thou knowest how dearly I have loved the habitation of thy house, (v. 8.) the tabernacle where thou art pleased to manifest thy residence among thy people, and receive their homage, the place where thine honour dwelt." He, and the people, put upon a consecra- tion into the countries of idolaters, and was hindered from attending God's altars, which perhaps his persecutors, that laid him under that restraint, did themselves upbraid him with as his crime. See 1 Sam. xx. 27. "But, Lord," says he, "though I cannot come to the habitation of thin house, I love it, my heart is there, and it is my greatest trouble that I am not there." Note, All that truly love God, and love the interests of God, who love him, love them, because in them he manifests his honour, and they have an opportunity of honouring him. Our Lord Jesus loved his Father's honour, and made it his business to glorify him; he loved the habitation of his house, his church among men, loved it, and gave himself for it, that he might build and consecrate it. Those who love communion with God, and delight in approaching to him, find it to be a constant pleasure, a comfortable evidence of their integrity, and a comfortable earnest of their endless felicity.

II. David, having given proofs of his integrity, earnestly prays, with bashful confidence toward God, (such as they have who have heard them not,) that he might not fall under the doom of the wicked; (v. 9, 10.) Gather not my soul with sinners. Here, 1. David describes these sinners, whom he looked upon to be in a miserable condition, so miserable, that he could not wish the worst enemy he had in the world to be in a worse. "They are bloody men, that thirst after blood, and lie under a great deal of guilt of blood. They do mis- chief, and mischief is always in their hands. Though they get by their wickedness, (for their right hand is full of bribes which they have taken to pervert justice,) yet that will make their case never the better; for what is a man profited, if he gain the world, and lose his soul?" 2. He dreads having his lot with them; he never loved them, nor associated with them, in this world, and therefore could in faith pray that he might not have his lot with them in the other world. Our souls must shortly be gath- ered, to return to God that gave them, and we will call for them again. See Job xxxiv. 14. It con- cerns us to consider whether our souls will then be gathered with saints or with sinners; whether bound in the bundle of life with the Lord for ever, as the souls of the faithful are, (1 Sam. xxx. 29.) or bound in the bundle of tares for the fire, Mat. xiii. 30. Death gathers us to our people, to those that are our people while we live, whom we choose to associate with, and with whom we cast our lot, to those death will gather us, and with them we must take our lot, to eternity. Balaam desired to die the death of the righteous. David dreaded dying the wicked death; so that both sides are of that mind, if we be of, and will live up to it, we are happy for ever. Those that will not be companions with sinners in their mirth, nor cast off their deities, may in faith pray not to be compa- nions with them in their misery, nor to drink of their cup, their cup of trembling.

III. David, with a holy humble confidence, com- mits himself to the grace of God, v. 11, 12. 1. He promises that by the grace of God he would perse- vere in his duty: "As for me, whatever others do, I will walk in mine integrity." Note, When the testimony of our consciences for us, that we have walked in our integrity, is comfortable to us, that should confirm and console us to continue therein. 2. He prays for the divine grace, both to enable him to do so, and to give him the comfort of it; "Redeem me out of the hands of my enemies, and be merciful to me, living and dying." Be we ever so confident of our integrity, yet still we must rely upon God's mercy, and the great redemption Christ has wrought out, and pray for the benefit of them.

He pleases himself with his steadiness; "My foot stands in his holy place, which shall not fall." This speaks, as one that found his resolutions fixed for God and godliness, not to be shaken by the tempta- tions of the world; and his comforts firm in God and his grace, not to be disturbed by the crosses and troubles of the world. 4. He promises him- self that he should yet have occasion to praise the Lord; that he should be furnished with matter for praises, that he should have a heart for praises; and that though he may know he is punished from public ordinances, yet he should again have an op- portunity of blessing God in the congregation of his people. Those that hate the congregation of evill- doers shall be joined to the congregation of the righteous, and join with them in praising God; and it is pleasant doing that in good company; the more the better, it is the more like heaven.
PSALM XXVII.

Some think David penned this psalm, before his coming to the throne, when he was in the midst of his troubles, and, perhaps, upon occasion of the death of his parents; but the Jews think he penned it, when he was old, upon occasion of the wonderful deliverance he had from the hands of the giant, when Ahijah appeared to him, (2 Sam. xxi. 16, 17,) and his people, thereupon, resolved he should never venture his life again in battle, lest he should quench the light of Israel. Perhaps it was not penned upon any particular occasion; but it is very probable, of a general and devout affections with which gracious souls are carried out toward God at all times, especially in times of trouble. Here is, 1. The courage and holy bravery of his faith, v. 1-3. 2. The compleancy he took in communion with God, and the beneficence he experienced by it, v. 4-6. III. His desire toward God, and his favour and grace, v. 7-9, 11, 12. IV. His expectations from God, and the encouragement he gives to others to hope in him, v. 10, 13, 14. And let our hearts be thus affected in singing this psalm.

A psalm of David.

1. THE LORD is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear? the LORD is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid? 2. When the wicked, even mine enemies and mine foes, came upon me to eat up my flesh, they stumbled and fell. 3. Though a host should encamp against me, my heart shall not fear; though war should rise against me, in this will I be confident. 4. One thing have I desired of the LORD, that will I seek after; that I may dwell in the house of the LORD all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the LORD, and to inquire in his temple. 5. For in the time of trouble he shall hide me in his pavilion; in the secret of his tabernacle shall he hide me: he shall set me up upon a rock. 6. And now shall my head be lifted up above mine enemies round about me: therefore will I offer in his tabernacle sacrifices of joy; I will sing, yea, I will sing praises unto the LORD.

We may observe here,

I. With what a lively faith David triumphs in God, glories in his holy name, and in the interest he had in him. 1. The Lord is my light, David's subjects called him the light of Israel, 2 Sam. xxvi. 17. And he was indeed a burning and a shining Light: but he owns that he shone, as the moon does, with a borrowed light; what light God darted upon him, reflected upon them; The Lord is my Light. God is a Light to his people, to show them the way when they are in doubt, to comfort and rejoice their hearts when ten Abashins sorrowed. It is in his light that they now walk on in their way, and in his light they hope to see light for ever. 2. He is my Salvation, in whom I am safe, and by whom I shall be saved. 3. He is the Strength of my life; not only the Protector of my exposed life, who keeps me from being slain, but the Strength of my frail, weak, life, who keeps me from fainting, sinking, and dying away. God, who is a believer's Light, is the Strength of his life; not only by whom, but in whom, he lives and moves. In God therefore let us strengthen ourselves.

II. With what an unwavering courage he triumphs over his enemies; no fortitude like that of faith. If God be for him, who can be against him? Whom should I fear? Of whom shall I be afraid? If Omnipotence be his guard, he has no cause to fear; if he knows it to be so, he has no disposition to fear. If God be his Light, he fears no shades; if God be his Salvation, he fears no corpses. He triumphs over his enemies; for he shews that they were already routed. His enemies came upon him, to eat up his flesh; aiming at no less, and assured of that; but they fell; not, "He smote them, and they fell," but, "They stumbled and fell;" they were so confounded and weakened, that they could not go on with their enterprise. Thus they that came to take Christ, with a word's speaking, were made to stagger, and fall to the ground, John xviii. 6. The ruin of some of his enemies was, he says, as the ruin of others; and his complete conquest of them all. And therefore, these being fallen, he is fearless of the rest; "Though they be numerous, a host of them; though they be daring, and their attempts threatening; though they encamp against me, an army against one man; though they wage war upon me, yet my heart shall not fear. Hosts cannot hurt us, if the Lord of hosts protect us: nay, in this assurance that God is for me, I will be confident." (Jer. xxvii. 26.)

III. With what a gracious earnestness he prays for a constant communion with God in holy ordinances, v. 4. It greatly encouraged his confidence in God, that he was conscious to himself of an entire affection to God and to his ordinances, and that he was in his element, when in the way of his duty, and in the way of increasing his acquaintance with God. If we delight in God above any creature, that may encourage us to depend upon him; for it is a sign we are of those whom he protects as his own. Or it may be taken thus. He desired to dwell in the house of the Lord, that there he might be safe from the enemies that surrounded him. Finding himself surrounded by threatening hosts, he does not say, "One thing have I desired, in order to my safety, that I may have my arms equipped to such a number," or that I may be master of such a city or such a castle; but "that I may dwell in the house of the Lord, and then I am well." Observe, 1. What it is he desires; to dwell in the house of the Lord. In the courts of God's house the priests had their lodgings, and David wished he had been one of them. Disdainfully as some look upon God's ministers, one of the greatest and best of kings that ever was, would gladly have taken his lot, have taken his lodging among them. Or rather, he desires that he might duly and constantly attend on the public service of God, with other faithful Israelites, according as the duty of every day required. Therefore he longed to see an end of the wars in which he was now engaged; not that he might live at ease in his own palace, but that he might have leisure and liberty for that constant attendance in God's courts. Thus Hezekiah, a genuine son of David, wished for the recovery of his health, not that he might go up to the thrones of judgment, but that he might go up to the house of the Lord, Isa. xxxviii. 22. Note, All God's children desire to dwell in God's house; where should they dwell else? Not to sojourn there as a wayfaring man, that turns aside to tarry but for a night; or to dwell there for a time only, as the servant that abides not in the house for ever; but to dwell there all the days of their life; for we were made for it. Do you prize God's house? What will the praising of God be the blessedness of our eternity? Surely then we ought to make it the business of our time.

2. How earnestly he covets this; "This is the one thing I have desired of the Lord, and which I will seek after." If he were to ask but one thing of God, this should it be; for this he had at heart more than any thing. He desired it as a good thing; he desired it of the Lord as his gift, and a token of his favour. And, having fixed his desire upon it as the one thing needful, he sought after it; he continued to pray for it, and contrived his affairs so as that he might have this liberty and opportunity. Note, They that truly desire communion with God, will set themselves with all diligence to seek after it, Prov. xviii. 1.

3. What he had in his eye in it; he would dwell in God's house, not for the plenty of good entertainment that was there, in the feasts upon the sacrifices, nor for the music and good singing that were there, but to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to inquire in his temple. He desired to attend in God's courts, (1.) That he might have the pleasure of meditating upon God. He knew something of the beauty of the Lord, the infinite and transcendent amiableness of the Divine Being, and his perfections; his holiness is his beauty; (ex. 3.) his goodness is his beauty, Zech. ix. 17. The harmony of all his attributes is the beauty of his nature. With an eye of faith and holy love, we with pleasure bear this beauty, and observe more and more in it, that is amiable, that is admirable. When, with fixeness of thought, and a holy flame of devout affections, we contemplate God's glorious excellencies, and entertain ourselves with the tokens of his peculiar favour to us, this is that view of the beauty of the Lord which David here covets; and it is to be had in his ordinances, for there he manifests himself, and there he gives satisfaction of being instructed in his duty; for concerning this he would inquire in God's temple; Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? For the sake of these two things, he desired that one thing, to dwell in the house of the Lord, all the days of his life; for blessed are they that do so, they will be still praising him, (lxxiv. 4.) both in speaking to him, and in hearing from him. Mary's sitting at Christ's feet; (Luke x. 41.) to hear his word, Christ calls the one thing needful, and the good part.

4. What advantage he promised himself, could he but have a place in God's house; (1.) There he should be quiet and easy; their troubles would not find him, for he should be hid in secret; there troubles would not reach him, for he should be set on high, v. 5. Joash, one of David's seed, was hid in the house of the Lord six years, and there, not only preserved from the sword, but reserved to the crown, 2 Kings xii. 2. The temple was thought a safe place for Nehemiah to abscond in, Neh. vi. 10. But the safety of believers is not in the walls of the temple, but in the God of the temple, and their comfort in communion with him. (2.) There he should be pleasant and cheerful; there he would offer sacrifice of joy, v. 6. For God's work is its own wages; there he would sing, yea he would sing praises to the Lord. Note, Whatever is the matter of our joy, ought to be the matter of our praise. And when we attend upon God in holy ordinances, we ought to be much in joy and praises. It is for the glory of our God, that we should sing in his ways: and whenever God lifts us up above our enemies, we ought to exalt him in our praise. Thanks be to God, who always causeth us to triumph, 2 Cor. ii. 14.

7. Hear, O Lord, when I cry with my voice; have mercy also upon me, and answer me. 8. When thou saidst, Seek ye my face; my heart said unto thee, Thy face, Lord, will I seek. 9. Hide not thy face far from me; put not thy servant away in anger: thou hast been my help; leave me not, neither forsake me, O God of my salvation. 10. When my father and my mother forsook me, then the Lord will take me up. 11. Teach me thy way, O Lord, and lead me in a plain path, because of mine enemies. 12. Deliver me not over unto the will of mine enemies: for false witnesses are risen up against me, and such as breathe out cruelty. 13. I had fainted, unless I had believed to see the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living. 14. Wait on the Lord; be of good courage, and he shall strengthen thy heart: wait, I say, on the Lord.

David, in these verses, expresses,
1. His desire toward God, in many petitions. If he cannot now go up to the house of the Lord; yet, wherever he is, he can find a way to the throne of grace by prayer.
2. He humbly bespeaks, because he firmly believes he shall have, a gracious audience; "Hear, O Lord, when I cry, not only with my heart, but, as one in earnest, with my voice too." He bespeaks also an answer of peace, which he expects, not from his own merit, but God's goodness; Have mercy upon me, and answer me, v. 7. If we pray and believe, God will graciously hear and answer.
3. He takes hold of the kind invitation God had given him to this duty, v. 8. It is presumption for us to come into the presence of the King of kings, uncalled, nor can we draw near with any assurance, unless he hold forth to us the golden sceptre. David therefore, going to pray, fastens, in his thoughts, upon the call God had given him to the throne of his grace, and reverently touches, as it were, the top of the golden sceptre which was thereby held out to him. (Hear heart said unto thy heart, (so it begins in the original,) or of thee, Seek ye my face; he first revoked that, and preached that over again to himself; and that is the best preaching, it is hearing twice what God speaks once;) thou saidst, (so it may be supplied,) Seek ye my face; and then he returns what he had so meditated upon, in this pious resolution, Thy face, Lord, will I seek. Observe here, (1.) The true nature of religious worship, it is seeking the face of God; this it is in God's precept, to the three, Oh face. He would have me seek him for himself, and make his favour our chief good; and this it is in the saint's purpose and desire, "Thy face, Lord, will I seek; and nothing less will I take up with." The opening of his hand will satisfy the desire of other living things; (exlv. 16) but it is only the shining of his face, that will satisfy the desire of a living soul, iv. 6, 7. (2.) The kind invitation of a gracious God to this duty: Thou shalt seek my face; it is, not a precept, but a promise; and his commanding us to seek, implies a promise of finding; for he is too kind to say, Seek ye me, in vain. God calls us to seek his face, in our conversion to him, and in our converse with him. He calls us, by the whispers of his Spirit and with our spirits, to seek his face; he calls us, by his word, by the stated returns of opportunities for his worship, and by special providences, merciful and afflictive. When we are foolishly making our course to living vanities, God is, in love to us, calling us in him to seek our own mercies. (3.) The ready compliance of a gracious soul with this invitation; the call is immediately returned, My heart answered, Thy face, Lord, will I seek. The call was general, "Seek ye my face;" but, like David, we must apply it to ourselves, "I will seek it." The word does us no good, when we transfer it to others, and do not ourselves accept the exhortation. The call was, Seek ye my face; the soul is express, Thy face, Lord, will I seek; like that, (Jer. iii. 22.) Behold, we come unto thee. A gracious heart readily echoes to the call of a gracious God, being made willing in the day of his power.

3. He is very particular in his requests.

(1.) For the favour of God, that he might not be shut out from that, (v. 9.) "Thy face, Lord, will I seek, in obedience to thy command; therefore hide not thy face from me; let me never want the reviving sense of thy favour; love me, and let me know that thou lovest me; not but thy servant away in anger." He owns he had deserved God's displeasure, but begs that, however God might correct him, he would not cast him away from his presence; for what is hell, but that?

(2.) For the continuance of his presence with him; "Thou hast been my Helper formerly, and thou art the God of my salvation; and therefore whither shall I go from thy spirit? or where shall I flee from thy presence? withdraw not the operations of thy power from me, for then I am helpless; withdraw not the tokens of thy good-will to me, for then I am comfortless." (3.) For the benefit of a divine guidance; (v. 11.) "Teach me thy way, O Lord; give me to understand the meaning of thy providences toward me, and make them plain to me. And give me to know my duty in every doubtful case, that I may not mista..." (4.) For the benefit of a divine protection; (v. 12.) "Deliver me not over to the will of mine enemies. Lord, let them not gain their point, for it aims at my life, and no less, and in such a way as that I have no fence against them, but thy power over their con-
Lord; whatever you do, grow not remiss in your attendance upon God. (2.) Keep up your spirits in the midst of the greatest dangers and difficulties. Be of good courage for his soul be fixed, trusting in God, and your minds stayed upon him, and then let none of these things move you. They that wait upon the Lord have reason to be of good courage.

PSALM XXVIII.

The former part of this psalm is the prayer of a saint militant, and now in distress, (v. 1-3.) to which is added the doom of God's implacable enemies, v. 4, 5. The latter part of the psalm is the thanksgiving of a saint triumphant, and delivered out of his distresses, (v. 6-8.) to which is added a prophetic prayer for all God's faithful loyal subjects, v. 9. So that it is hard to say which of these two conditions David was in, when he penned it. Some think he was now in trouble seeking God, but, at the same time, preparing to praise him for his deliverance, and by faith giving him thanks for it, because it was wrought. Others think he was now in triumph, but remembered, and recorded for his own and others' benefit, the prayers he made when he was in affliction, that the mercy might relish the better, when it appeared to be an answer to them.

A Psalm of David.

1. Unto thee will I cry, O Lord, my rock; be not silent to me: lest, if thou be silent to me, I become like them that go down into the pit. 2. Hear the voice of my supplications, when I cry unto thee, when I lift up my hands toward thy holy oracle. 3. Draw me not away with the wicked, and with the workers of iniquity; which speak peace to their neighbours, but mischief is in their hearts. 4. Give them according to their deeds, and according to the wickedness of their endeavours: give them after the work of their hands; render to them their desert. 5. Because they regard not the works of the Lord, nor the operation of his hands, he shall destroy them, and not build them up.

In these verses, David is very earnest in prayer. I. He prays that God would graciously hear and answer him, now that, in his distress, he called upon him, v. 1, 2. Observe his faith in prayer; O Lord, my Rock; denoting his belief of God's power, "He is a Rock;" and his dependence upon that power, "He is my Rock, on whom I build my hope. Observe his fervency in prayer; To thee will I cry, as one in earnest, being ready to sink, unless thou come in with suitable succour." And observe how solicitous he is to obtain an answer; "Be not silent to me, as one angry at my prayers; (lxxx. 4.) Lord, speak to me, answer me with good words, and comfortable words; (Zech. i. 13.) though the thing I pray for be not given me, yet let God speak to me joy and gladness, and make me to hear it. Lord, speak to me, in answer to my prayers; plead my cause, command deliverances for me; let me hear and answer the voice of my supplications.

Two things he pleads; 1. The sad despair he should be in, if God slighted him; "If thou be silent to me, and I have not the tokens of thy favour, I am like them that go down into the pit—I am a dead man, lost and undone; if God be not my Friend, appear not to me, and appear not for me, my hope and my help are perished." Nothing can be so cutting, so killing, to a gracious soul, as the want of God's favour, and the sense of his displeasure. I shall be like them that go down to hell; (so some understand it;) for what is the misery of the damned, light this, this is never silent to them, and deaf to their cry? Those are in some measure qualified for God's favour, and may expect it, who are thus possessed with a dread of his wrath, and to whom his frowns are worse than death. 2. The good hopes he had, that God would favour him; I lift up my hands towards thy holy oracle; which denotes, not only an earnest desire, but an earnest expectation, thence to receive an answer of peace. The most holy place within the veil, is here, as elsewhere, called the oracle; there the ark and the mercy-seat were, there God was said to dwell between the cherubims, and thence he spake to his people, Numb. vii. 89. That was a type of Christ, and it is to him that we must lift up our eyes and hands, for through him all good comes from God to us. It was also a figure of heaven; (Heb. ix. 24.,) and from God, as our Father in heaven, we are taught to expect an answer to our prayers. The scriptures are called the oracles of God, and to them we must have an eye, in our prayers and expectations. There is the word on which God hath caused and encouraged us to hope.

II. He deprecates the doom of wicked people, as before; (xxvi. 9.) "Gather not my soul with sinners." Lord, I attend thy holy oracle, draw me not away from that, with the wicked, and with the workers of iniquity; (v. 10.) I am treading in the paths that are tumbled in the snares they have laid for me; they flatter and cajole me, and speak peace to me, but they have a design upon me, for mischief is in their heart, they aim to disturb me, may, to destroy me. Lord, suffer me not to be drawn away and ruined by their cursed plots; for they have, can have, no power, no success, against me, except it be given them from above. 2. "Save me from being infected with their sins, and from doing as they do. Let me not be drawn away by their false allurements, or their allurements, from thy holy oracle, (where I desire to dwell all the days of my life,) to practise any wicked works;" see cxxii. 4. Lord, never leave me to myself, to use such arts of deceit and treachery for my safety, as they use for my ruin. Let no event of providence be an invincible temptation to me, to draw me either into the imitation, or into the interest, of wicked people. Observe how David and men dread Perdition, when they are, and the best, the soundest, the safest, the most happy, the best in the world, they are in of being drawn aside into it; and therefore we should all pray earnestly to God for his grace to keep us in our integrity. 3. "Save me from being involved in their doom; let not me be led forth with the workers of iniquity, for I am none of them that speak peace, while war is in their hearts." Note, Those that are careful not to partake with sinners in their sins, have reason to hope that they shall not partake with them in their plagues, Rev. xviii. 4.

III. He imprecates the just judgments of God upon the workers of iniquity; (v. 4.) Give them according to their deeds. This is not the language of passion or revenge, nor is it inconsistent with the duty of praying for our enemies. But, 1. Thus he would show how far he was from complying with the workers of iniquity, and with what good reason he had been, and is, so greatly displeased at them; for otherwise he was convinced that they could not be made more miserable than they be to deal with according to their deeds. 2. Thus he would express his zeal for the honour of God's justice in governing the world; "Lord, they think all well that they do, and justify themselves in their wicked practices; Lord, give them after the work of their hands, and so make those about them, who think there is no harm in what they do, because it goes unpunished;" cxxiv.
1. 2. 3. This prayer is a prophecy, that God will, sooner or later, render to all impenitent sinners according to their deserts. If he has been done amiss be not undone by repentance, there will certainly come a reckoning day, when God will render to every man who persists in his evil deeds, according to them. It is a prophecy particularly of the destruction of destroyers; "They speak peace to their neighbours, but mischief is in their hearts; Lord, give them according to their deeds, let the spoilers be spoiled, and let them be treacherously dealt with. Behold, Lord, as we have done, so, and as we have dealt treacherously, so do; for they made not the Lord their strength, but their heart is turned to their wickedness."—Isa. xxxiii. 1. Rev. xviii. 6.—xiii. 10. Observe, He foretells that God will reward them, not only according to their deeds, but according to the wickedness of their endeavours; for sinners shall be reckoned with, not only for the mischief they have done, but for the mischief they would have done, which they designed, and did what they could to effect. And if God go by this rule, in dealing with the wicked, surely he will do so, in dealing with the righteous, and will reward them, not only for the good they have done, but for the good they have endeavoured to do, though they could not compass it.

IV. He foretells their destruction, for their contempt of God and his hand; (v. 5.) "Because they regard not the works of the Lord, and the operations of his hands, by which he manifests himself and speaks to the children of men; he shall destroy them in this world and in the other, and not built them up. ASUPREME REGARDSLESSNESS OF THE WORKS OF GOD IS THE CAUSE OF THE SIN OF SINNERS, AND SO BECOMES THE CAUSE OF THEIR RUIN. Why do men question the being or attributes of God, but because they do not duly regard his handy-works, which declare his glory, and in which the invisible things of him are clearly seen? Why do men forget God, and live without him, nay, affront God, and live in rebellion against him, but because they consider not the instances of the wrath of his which has never fallen heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men? Why do the enemies of God's people hate and persecute them, and devise mischief against them, but because they regard not the works God has wrought for his church, by which he has made it appear how dear it is to him? See Isa. v. 12.

In singing this, we must arm ourselves against all temptations to join with the workers of iniquity, and animate ourselves against all the troubles we may be threatened with by the workers of iniquity.

6. Blessed be the Lord, because he hath heard the voice of my supplications. 7. The Lord is my strength and my shield: my heart trusted in him, and I am helped; therefore my heart greatly rejoiceth, and with my song will I praise him. 8. The Lord is their strength, and he is the saving strength of his anointed. 9. Save thy people, and bless thine inheritance: feed them also, and lift them up for ever.

In these verses,
1. David gives God thanks for the answer given to his prayers, as affectionately as a father for a son; for reason, we.
6. Blessed be the Lord. How soon are the saints' sorrow turned into songs, and their prayers into praises! It was in faith that David prayed, (v. 2.) "Hear the voice of my supplications;" and by the same faith he gives thanks, (v. 6.) that God had heard the voice of his supplications. Note, 1. They that pray in faith may rejoice in hope. "He hath heard me, (graciously accepted me,) and I am as sure of a real answer as if I had it already." 2. What we win by prayer, we must wear with praise; has God heard our supplications? Let us then bless his name.

II. He encourages himself to hope in God for the perfecting of every thing that concerned him; having given to God the glory of his grace, (v. 6.) he is humbly bold to take the comfort of it, v. 7. This is the method of attaining peace; let it begin with praise that it is attainable. Let us first bless God, and then bless ourselves. Observe, 1. His dependence upon God; "The Lord is my Strength, and I will serve him, and carry me on, through all my services and sufferings. He is my Shield, to protect me from all the malice designs of my enemies against me. I have chosen him to be so, I have always found him so, and I expect he will still be so." 2. His experience of the benefit of that dependence; "My heart trusted in him, and in his power and promise; and it has not been in vain to do so, for I am helped, I have been often helped; not only God has given me, in his due time, the help I trusted to him for, but my very trust in him has heightened me in the mean time, and kept me from fainting." xviii. 13. The very actedings of faith are present aids to a dropping spirit, and often help it at a dead lift. 3. His improvement of this experience. He had the pleasure of it; therefore my heart greatly rejoiceth. The joy of a believer is seated in the heart, while, in the laughter of the fool, the heart is sorrowful. It is great joy, joy unspeakable, and full of glory. Note, A simple, unwearied regard to the means of grace, in due time greatly rejoice; it is joy and peace in believing that we are to expect. God shall have the praise of it; when my heart greatly rejoiceth, with my song will I praise him. Thus must we express our gratitude, it is the least we can do; and others will hereby be invited and encouraged to trust in him too.

III. He pleases himself with the interest which all good people, through Christ, have in God; (v. 8.) "The Lord is their Strength; not mine only, but the Strength of every believer." Note, The saints rejoice in their friends' comforts as well as their own; for as we have not the less benefit from the light of the sun, so neither from the light of God's countenance, for others' sharing therein; for we are sure there is enough for all, and enough for each. This is our communion with all saints, that God is their Strength and ours, Christ their Lord and ours, and for i. of them is as much in all Israel, because he is the saving Strength of his anointed, that is, 1. Of David in the type. God, in strengthening him that was their king, and fought their battles, strengthened the whole kingdom. He calls himself God's anointed, because it was the uction he had received, that exposed him to the envy of his enemies, and therefore entitled him to the divine protection. 2. Of Christ, his anointed, Messiah, in the anti-type. God was his saving Strength, qualified him for his undertaking, and carried him through it; see lxxxix. 21. Isa. xlix. 5.—l. 7, 9. And so he becomes their Strength, the Strength of all the saints; he strengthened them that is the church's Head, and from him diffuses strength to all the members; has commanded his strength, and so strengthened what he has wrought for us, lxviii. 28.—lxxxv. 17, 18.

3. He concludes with a short, but comprehensive, prayer for the church of God, v. 9. He prays for Israel, not as his people, "save my people, and bless mine inheritance," though they were so, but,

"thine." God's interest in them, lay nearer his heart than his own; We are they people, is a good plea, Isa. lxv. 9.—lxviii. 19. I am thine, save me, God's people are his inheritance, dear to him, and precious in his eyes; what little glory he has from this world, he has from them. The Lord's portion is his people. That which he begs of God for them, is. 1. That he would save them from their enemies, and the dangers they were exposed to. 2. That he would bless them with all good, flowing from his favour, in performance of his promise, and amounting to a happiness for them. 3. That he would feed them; bless them with plenty, and especially the plenty of his ordinances, which are food to the soul. Rule them; so the margin. "Direct their counsels and actions aright, and overrule their affairs for good. Feed them and rule them; set pastors, set rulers, over them, that shall do their office with wisdom and understanding." 4. That he would lift them up for ever; lift them up out of their troubles and distresses; and do this, not only for those of that age, but for his people in every age to come, even to the end. "Lift them up into thy glorious kingdom, lift them up as high as heaven." (b) There, and there only, will the saints be lifted up for ever, never more to sink, or be depressed. Observe, Those, and those only, whom God feeds and rules, who are willing to be taught, and guided, and governed, by him, shall be saved, and blessed, and lifted up for ever.

PSALM XXIX.

It is the probable conjecture of some very good interpreters, that David penned this psalm upon occasion, and just at the time, of the great storm of thunder, lightning, and rain; as the eighth psalm was his meditation in a moonshine night, and the nineteenth in a sun-shine morning. It is good to take occasion, from the sensible operations of God's power upon the world, to give glory to him. So composed was David, and so cheerful, even in a dreadful tempest, when others trembled, that then he penned this psalm; for though the earth be removed, yet will I not fear. I. He calls upon the great one of the wise to give glory to him, v. 1, 2. II. To convince them of the greatness of that God whom they were to adore, he takes notice of his power and terror in the thunder, and lightning, and thunder-showers; (v. 3-9,) his sovereign dominion over the world, (v. 10,) and his special favour to his church, v. 11. Great and high thoughts of God should fill us, in singing this psalm.

A psalm of David.

1. Give unto the Lord, O ye mighty, give unto the Lord glory and strength. 2. Give unto the Lord the glory due unto his name: worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness. 3. The voice of the Lord is upon the waters: the God of glory thundereth; the Lord is upon many waters. 4. The voice of the Lord is powerful; the voice of the Lord is full of majesty. 5. The voice of the Lord breaketh the cedars; yea, the Lord breaketh the cedars of Lebanon. 6. He maketh them also to skip like a calf; Lebanon and Sirion like a young unicorn. 7. The voice of the Lord divideth the flames of fire. 8. The voice of the Lord shaketh the wilderness; the Lord shaketh the wilderness of Kadesh. 9. The voice of the Lord maketh the hinds to calve, and discovereth the forests: and in his temple doth every one speak of his glory. 10. The Lord sitteth upon the flood; yea, the Lord sitteth King for ever. 11. The Lord will give strength unto his people; the Lord will bless his people with peace.

In this psalm we have,

I. A demand of the homage of the great men of the earth to be paid to the great God. Every clap of thunder David interpreted as a call to himself, and other princes, to give glory to the great God. Observe, I. Who they are, that are called to this duty; "O ye mighty, (v. 1,) ye sons of the mighty, who have power, and on whom that power is devolved by succession and inheritance, who have royal blood running in your veins." It is much for the honour of the great God, that the great men of the earth, who pay their homage to him; and they are bound to do it, not only because, high as they are, he is infinitely above them, and therefore they must vail to him, but because they have their power from him, and are to use it for him, and this tribute of acknowledgement they owe to him for it. 2. How often this call is repeated; Give unto the Lord, and again, and a third time, Give unto the Lord. This intimates, that the mighty men are backward to this duty, and are with difficulty persuaded to it; but that it is of great consequence to the interests of God's kingdom among men, that princes should heartily espouse them. Jerusalem flourisheth, when the kings of the earth bring their glory and honour into it, Rev. xx. 24. 3. What they are called to; to give unto the Lord: not as if he needed any thing, or could be benefited by any gifts of ours, or as if we had any thing to give him that is not his own already; Who hath first given to him? (v. 9.) God's kingdom and glory are his own; and when he beguilest his own people of their own, you may be sure it is not for their own good. 4. The Lord gives his power over all dominion over us, he is pleased to interpret as a gift to him; "Give unto the Lord your own selves, in the first place, and then your services; give unto the Lord glory and strength, acknowledge his glory and strength, and give praise to him as a God of infinite majesty, and irresistible power; and what glory and strength he has, by his providence, intrusted you with, offer it to him, to be used for his honour in his service. Give him your crowns, let him wear them in his head; break your swords, your keys; put all into his hand, that you, in the use of them, may be to him for a name and a praise." Princes value themselves by their glory and strength; these they must ascribe to God, owning him to be infinitely more glorious and powerful than they.

This demand of homage from the mighty, may be looked upon as directed either to the grandees of David's own kingdom, the heads of the ten tribes, (a) it is to excite them to a more diligent and constant attendance at God's altars, in which he had observed them very remiss,) or to the neighbouring kings, whom he by his sword had made tributaries to Israel, and now would persuade to become tributaries to the God of Israel. Crowned heads must bow before the King of kings. What is here said to the mighty, is said to all, Worship God; it is the sum and substance of the everlasting gospel, Rev. xiv. 6, 7. Now we have here, (1,) The nature of religious worship; it is giving to the Lord the glory due to his name, v. 2. God's name is that whereby he has made himself known. There is a glory due to his name; it is impossible that we should give him all the glory due to his name; when we have said and done our best for the honour of God's name, still we come infinitely short of the merit of the subject; but, when we answer that revelation in which all of itself, and all the affections and adorations, then we give him some of that glory which is due to his name. If we would, in hearing and praying, and other acts of devotion, receive grace from God, we must make it our business to give glory to God. (2,) The rule of the performance of religious exercises; Worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness; which denotes, [1.] The Object of our worship; the glorious Majesty of God is called the beauty of holiness, 2 Chron. xx. 21. In the worship of God, we must have an eye to his beauty, and adore him, not only as infinitely awful, and therefore to be feared above all, but as infinitely amiable, and therefore to be loved and delighted in above all; especially we must have an eye to the beauty of his holiness; this the angels fasten upon in their praises, Rev. iv. 8. Or, [2.] The place of worship. The sanctuary then was the beauty of holiness, xlviii. 1, 2. Jer. xvii. 12. The beauty of the sanctuary was, theconnecting and strengthening virtue, formed, with the divine appointment—the pattern in the mount. Now, under the gospel, solemn assemblies of Christians (which purity is the beauty of) are the places where God is to be worshipped. Or, [3.] The manner of worship. We must be holy in all our religious performances, devoted to God, and to his will and glory. There is a beauty in holiness, and it is that which puts an acceptable being upon all our acts.

II. Good reason given for this demand. We shall see ourselves bound to give glory to God, if we consider, 1. His sufficiency in himself, intimated in his name Jehovah, I am that I am; which is repeated here no less than eighteen times in this short psalm, twice in every verse but three, and once in two of those three; I do not recollect that there is the like in all the book of psalms. Let the mighty ones of the earth know him by this name, and sit in his presence with fear, for heroveth over all things. Let those that rule over men, know there is a God that rules over them, that rules over all. The psalmist here sets forth God’s dominion.

(1.) In the kingdom of nature. In the wonderful effects of natural causes, and the operations of the powers of nature, we ought to take notice of God’s glory and strength, which we are called upon to ascribe to him; in the thunder, and lightning, and all the works many.

[1.] His glory. In the Kingdom of nature. He is the God of glory that thunders, v. 3. It is God that thunders, it is the voice of his voice, (Job xxxvii. 2.) and it speaks him a God of glory; so awful is the sound of the thunder, and so bright the flash of its companion, the lightning; to the hearing and to the sight nothing is more affecting than these, as if by those two learning senses God would give such proofs of his glory to the minds of men, as should leave the most stupid indifferent. Some observe, there are some particular reasons why thunder should be called the voice of the Lord; not only because it comes from above, is not under the direction or foresight of any man, speaks loud, and reaches far, but because God often spake in thunder, particularly at mount Sinai, and by thunder discomfited the enemies of Israel. To speak it the voice of God of glory, it is here said to be upon the waters, upon many waters; v. 3. It reaches over the vast ocean, the waters under the firmament. It rattles among the thick clouds, the waters above the firmament. Every one that hears the thunder, (his ears being made to tingle with it,) will own that the voice of the Lord is full of majesty, (xxix. 4.) enough to make the highest humble—for none can thunder with a voice like him, and the proudest trembling—for if his voice be so terrible, what is his arm? Every time he speaks in thunder, let our hearts be thereby filled with godly fear, and love the thoughts of God, in the holy adorings and admiring of whom the power of godliness does so much consist. O Lord our God, thou art very great!

[2.] His power; (v. 4.) The voice of the Lord is powerful, as appears by the effects of it; for it works wonders; they that write natural histories relate the prodigious effects of thunder and lightning, even out of the ordinary course of natural causes, which must be resolved into the omnipotence of the God of nature. First, Trees have been rent and split by thunderbolts; (v. 5, 6.) The voice of the Lord, in the thunder, often brake the cedars, even those of Lebanon, the strongest, the stateliest. Some understand it of the violent winds which shook the cedars, and sometimes tore off their aspiring tops. Earthquakes also shook the ground itself, on which the trees grew, and made Lebanon and Sinion to dance; the wilderness of Kadesh also was in like manner shaken, (v. 8.) the trees by earthquake, and both by thunders, of which I incline to the latter terrifies the. The learned Dr. Hammond understands it of the consternation and conquest of the neighbouring kingdoms that warred with Israel, and opposed David; as the Syrians, whose country lay near the forest of Lebanon, the Amorites that bordered on mount Hermon, and the Moabites and Ammonites that lay about the wilderness of Kadesh. Secondly, Fires have been kindled by lightnings, and houses and villages consumed by them. Thirdly, The terror of thunder makes the hinds to calve sooner, and some think more easily, than otherwise they would. The wind is a timorous creature, and much affected with the noise of thunder and no movement, when sometimes proud and stout men have been presumptuous to fright it. The emperor Caligula would hide himself under his bed when it thundered. Horace the poet owns that he was reclaimed from atheism by the terror of thunder and lightning, which he describes somewhat like this here, lib. 1. ode 34. The thunder is said here to discover the forest, that is, it so terrifies the wild beasts of the forest, that they quit the dens and thickets in which they hid themselves, and so are discovered and dispossessed of their trees, and so discovers the ground that was shaded by them. Whenever it thunders, let us think of this psalm; and whenever we sing this psalm, let us think of the dreadful thunder-claps we have sometimes heard, and thus bring God’s word and his works together, that by both we may be directed and quickened to give unto him the glory due unto his name; and let us bless him that there is another voice of his beyond the natural voice, by which he now speaks to us, even the still small voice of his gospel, the terror of which shall not make us afraid.

(2.) In the kingdom of Providence, v. 10. God is to be praised as the Governor of the world of mankind. He sits upon the flood, he sits King for ever. He not only sits at rest in the enjoyment of himself, but he sits as King in the throne which he has prepared in the heavens, (ch. 19.) where he takes cognizance of, and gives orders about, all the affairs of the children of men, and does all according to his will, according to the counsel of his will. Observe, [1.] The power of his kingdom; He sits upon the flood. As he has founded the earth, so he has founded his own throne, upon the floods, xxiv. 2. The ebbings and flowings of this lower world, and the toses and revolutions of the affairs in it, give not the least shake to the repose or to the counsels of the Eternal Mind. The opposition of winds, and the floodings of the sea, are all overruled, but the Lord sits upon it; he crushes it, conquers it, and completes his own purposes, in despite of all the devices that are in men’s hearts. The word here translated the flood, is never used but concerning Noah’s flood, and therefore some think that is which is here spoken of. God did sit upon that flood, as a Judge executing the sentence of his justice upon the world of the ungodly, that was swept away by it. And he still sits upon the flood, restraining the waters of Noah, that they turn not again to cover the earth, according to his promise.
never to destroy the earth any more by a flood, Gen. ix. 11. Isa. liv. 9. {2.} The perpetuity of his kingdom; He sits King for ever; no period can, or shall, be put to his government. The administration of his kingdom is consonant to his counsels from eternity, and pursuant to his designs for eternity.

(3.) In the kingdom of grace; here his glory shines brightest. {1.} In the adoration he receives from the subjects of that kingdom, v. 9. In his temple, where his people attend his discoveries of himself and his mind, and to God's word and to his will there does every one speak of his glory; in the world, every man sees its, or, at least, may behold it after off; {Job xxxvi. 25.} but it is only in the temple, in the church, that it is spoken of to his honour. All his works do praise him, they minister matter for praise; but his saints only do bless him, and speak of his glory in his works, cxlv. 10. {2.} In the favours he bestows upon the subjects of that kingdom, v. 11. First, He will enable them for his service; He will give strength to his people, to fortify them against every evil work, and to furnish them for every good work; out of weakness they shall be made strong; nay, he will perfect strength in weakness. Secondly, He will encourage them in his service; He will bless his people with peace. Peace is a blessing of inestimable value, which God designs for all his people. The work of righteousness is peace; great peace have they that love thy law; but much more especially peace within the tribe of the righteouness is peace, it is endless peace. When the thunder of God's wrath shall make sinners tremble, the saints shall lift up their heads with joy.

PSALM XXX.

This is a psalm of thanksgiving for the great deliverances which God had wrought for David, penned upon occasion of the dedicating of his house of cedar, and sung in that pious solemnity, though there is not anything in it that has particular reference to that occasion. Some collect, from divers passages in the psalm itself, that it was penned upon his recovery from a dangerous fit of sickness, which might happen to be about the time of the dedication of his house. L. He here praises God for the deliverances he had wrought for him, v. 1. 3. II. He calls upon others to praise him too, and encourages them to trust in him, v. 4, 5. III. He blames himself for his former security, v. 6, 7. IV. He encourages the prayers and complaints he had made in his distress, v. 8. 10. With them he stirs up himself to be very thankful to God for the present comfortable change, v. 11, 12. In singing this psalm, we should not forget with thankfulness any like deliverances wrought for us, for which we must stir up ourselves to praise him, and by which we must be engaged to depend upon him.

A psalm and song, at the dedication of the house of David.

1. I WILL extol thee, O Lord; for thou hast lifted me up, and hast not made my foes to rejoice over me. 2. O Lord my God, I cried unto thee, and thou hast healed me. 3. O Lord, thou hast brought up my soul from the grave: thou hast kept me alive, that I should not go down to the pit. 4. Sing unto the Lord, O ye saints of his, and give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness. 5. For his anger endureth but a moment; in his favour is life: weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning.

It was the laudable practice of the pious Jews, and, though not expressly appointed, yet allowed and accepted, when they had built a new house, to dedicate it to God, Deut. xx. 5. David did so, when his house was built, and he took possession of it; (2 Sam. v. 11.) for royal palaces do as much need God's protection, and are as much bound to be at his service, as ordinary houses. Note, The houses we dwell in should, at our first entrance upon them, be dedicated to God, as little sanctuaries. We must solemnly commit ourselves, our families, and all our family affairs, to God's guidance and care; must pray for his presence and blessing, must take note of all our praiseworthy acts of his glory, and must resolve both that we will put away sin far from our tabernacles, and that we and our houses will serve the Lord, both in the duties of family worship, and in all instances of gospel obedience. Some conjecture that this psalm was sung at the re-dedication of David's house, after he had been driven out of it by Absalom, who had defiled it with his incest, and that it is a thanksgiving for the crushing of that dangerous rebellion.

In these verses,

1. David does himself give God thanks for the great deliverances he had wrought for him; (v. 1.)

"I will extol thee, O Lord; I will exalt thy name, and praise thee as One high and lifted up. I will do what I can to advance the interests of thy kingdom among men. I will extol thee, for thou hast lifted me up, not only up out of the pit in which I was sinking, but up to the throne of Israel. He restored me to the poor out of the dust. In consideration of the great things God has done to extol us, both by his providence and by his grace, we are bound, in gratitude, to do all we can to extol his name, though the most we can do is but little. Three things magnify David's deliverance:

1. That it was the defeat of his enemies. They were not suffered to triumph over him, as they should have done, (though it is a barbarous thing,) if he had died of this sickness, or perished in this distress: see xli. 11.

2. That it was an answer to his prayers; (v. 2.)

"I cried unto thee. All the expressions of the sense we have of our troubles should be directed to God, and every cry be a cry to him; giving way, in this manner, to our grief, will ease a burdened spirit. "I cried to thee, and thou hast not only heard me, but healed me, healed the disquieted body, healed the disturbed and disquieted mind, healed the disorder, distracted, affairs of the kingdom. It is what God glories in, I am the Lord that heal eth thee, (Exod. xxv. 26.) and we must give him the glory of it."

3. That it was the saving of his life; for he was brought to the last extremity, dropping into the grave, and ready to go down into the pit, and yet rescued, and kept alive, v. 3. The more imminent our danger has been, the more eminent our deliverances have been, the more comfortable are they to ourselves, and the more illustrous proofs of the power and goodness of God. A life from the dead ought to be spent in extolling the God of our life.

II. He calls upon others to join with him in praise, not only for the particular favours God had bestowed upon him, but for the general tokens of his goodness to all, to all his saints; (v. 4.)

"Sing unto the Lord, O ye saints of all that is round about him; there is a remnant of such in this world, and so, from the remnant there is expected that they sing unto him; for they are created, and sanctified, made, and made saints, that they be to him for a name and a praise. His saints in heaven sing to him; why should not those on earth be doing the same work, as well as they can, in concert with them?"

1. They believe him to be a God of unspotted purity; and therefore let them sing to him; "Let them give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness;"
let them praise his holy name, for holiness is his memorial throughout all generations." God is a holy God; his holiness is his glory; that is the attribute which the holy angels, in their praises, fasten never upon him. Isa. xl. 8. We ought to bear much in the mention and remembrance of God's holiness; and holy souls can give thanks at the mention of God's holiness. It is matter of joy to the saints, that God is a holy God; for then they hope he will make them holy, more holy. None of all God's perfections carries in it more terror to the wicked, or more comfort to the godly, than his holiness. It is a good sign that we are in some measure to this day, in our hearts, rejoice and give thanks at the remembrance of it.

2. They have experienced him to be a God gracious and merciful; and therefore let them sing to him.

(1.) We have found his frowns very short; though we have deserved they should have been everlasting, and that he should have been angry with us, till he had consumed us, and should never have been reconciled, yet his anger endureth but for a moment, v. 5. When we offend him, he is angry; but, as he is slow to anger, and not soon provoked, so, when he is angry, upon our repentance and humiliation, his anger is soon turned away, and he is willing to be at peace with us. If he hide his face from his own children, and suspend the wonted tokens of his favour, it is but in a little wrath, and for a small moment; but he will gather them with everlasting kindness, Isa. liv. 7, 8. If weeping endure for a night, and it be a wea-some night, yet, as sure as the light of the morning returns after the darkness of the night, so sure will joy and comfort return in a short time, in due time, to the people of God; for the covenant of grace is as firm as the covenant of the day. This word has often been fulfilled to us in the letter; weeping has endured for a night, but the grief has been soon over, and the grievance gone. Observe, As long as God's anger continues, so long the saints' weeping continues; but if that be but for a moment, the affliction is but for a moment, and when the light of God's countenance is restored, the affliction is easily pronounced light and momentary.

(2.) We have found his smiles very sweet; In his favour is life, all good. The return of his favour to an afflicted soul, is as life from the dead; nothing can be more reviving. Our happiness is bound up in God's favour; if we have that, we have enough, whatever else we want. It is the life of the soul, it is spiritual life, the earnest of life eternal.

6. And in my prosperity I said, I shall never be moved. 7. LORD, by thy favour thou hast made my mountain to stand strong: thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled. 8. I cried to thee, O LORD; and unto the LORD I made supplication. 9. What profit is there in my blood, when I go down to the pit? Shall the dust praise thee? shall it declare thy truth? 10. Hear, O LORD, and have mercy upon me: LORD, be thou my helper. 11. Thou hast turned for me my mourning into dancing: thou hast put off my sackcloth, and girded me with gladness; 12. To the end that my glory may sing praise to thee, and not be silent. O LORD my God, I will give thanks unto thee for ever.

We have, in these verses, an account of three several states that David was in successively, and of the workings of his heart toward God in each of those states—what he said and did, and how his heart stood affected; in the first of which we may certainly learn what it is to be put to the test, and what we ought to do, and in the other two what we should be.

I. He had long enjoyed prosperity, and then he grew secure, and over-confident of the continuance of it; (v. 6, 7.) "In my prosperity, when I was in health of body, and God had given me rest from all mine enemies, I said I shall never be moved; I never thought either of having my body distempered, or my government disturbed, nor had any apprehensions of danger upon any account. Such was the complacency he had in his prosperity, that they opposed him, and such a confirmed interest he had in the hearts of his people, such a firmness of mind, and such a strong constitution of body, that he thought his prosperity fixed like a mountain; yet this he ascribes, not to his own wisdom or fortitude, but to the divine goodness, Thou, through thy favour, hast made my mountain to stand strong, v. 7. He does not look upon it as his heaven, (as worldly people do,) who make their prosperity their felicity, but only his mountain; it is earth still, only raised a little higher than the common level; this he thought, by the favour of God, would be perpetuated to him; imagining, perhaps, that, having had so many troubles in the beginning of his days, he had had his whole share, and should have none in his latter end; or that God, who had given him such tokens of his favour, would never frown upon him. Note, 1. We are very apt to dream, when things are well with us, that they will always be so, and never otherwise; To-morrow shall be as this day. As if we should think, when the weather is once fair, that it will be ever fair; whereas nothing is more certain than that it will change. 2. When we see ourselves deceived in our expectations, it becomes us to reflect, with shame, upon our security, as our folly, as David does here, that we may be wiser another time, and may rejoice in our prosperity as though we rejoiced not, because the fashion of it passes away.

II. On a sudden, he fell into trouble, and then he prayed to God, and pleaded earnestly for relief and succour. 1. His mountain was shaken, and he with it; it proved, when he grew secure, that he was least safe; "Thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled, in mind, body, or estate." In every change of his condition, he still kept his face upon God, and as he ascribed his prosperity to God's favour, so, in his adversity, he observed the hiding of God's face to be the cause of it. If God hide his face, a good man is certainly troubled, though no other calamity befall him; when the sun sets, night certainly follows, and the moon and all the stars cannot make day. 2. When his mountain was shaken, he lifted up his eyes above the hills. Prayer is a salve for every sore; he made use of it accordingly. Is any afflicted? is any troubled? let him call upon the LORD in the evening. Thus in God's prosperity he prayed. If God, in wisdom and justice, turn from us, yet it will be in us the greatest folly and injustice imaginable, if we turn from him. No, let us learn to pray in the dark; (v. 8.) I tried to thee, O LORD. It seems, God's withdrawals made his prayers the more vehement. We are here told, for it seems he kept account of it, (1.) What he pleaded; (v. 9.) That God would be no gainer by his death; What profit is there in my blood? imply that he would willingly die, if he could thereby do any real service to God, or his country, (Phil. ii. 17.) but he saw not what good could be done by his dying in the bed of sickness, as might be, if he had died in the bed of honour. "LORD," says he, "will thou sell one of thine own people for nought,
It is probable that David penned this psalm when he was persecuted by Saul; some passages in it agree particularly to the narrow escape he had at Keilah, (1 Sam. xxvii., 13.) then in the wilderness of Maon, when Saul marched on one side of the hill, and he on the other, and, soon after, in the cave in the wilderness of En-gedi; but that it was penned upon any of those occasions we are not told. It is a mixture of prayers and praises, and professions of confidence in God, all which do well together, and are helpful to one another. 1. David professes his cheerful confidence in God, and, in that confidence, prays for deliverance out of his present troubles, v. 1-8. II. He complains of the very unpleasant condition he was in, and, in the sense of his calamities, still prays that God would graciously appear for him against his persecutors, v. 9-18. III. He concludes the psalm with prayers and thanksgiving, good things to him, encouragement to himself and others to trust in him, v. 19-24.

To the chief musician. A Psalm of David.

1. IN thee, O Lord, do I put my trust; let me never be ashamed: deliver me in thy righteousness.

2. Bow down thine ear to me; deliver me speedily: be thou my strong rock, for a house of defence to save me. 3. For thou art my rock and my fortress: therefore, for thy name's sake, lead me and guide me.

4. Pull me out of the net that they have laid privy for me; for thou art my strength.

5. Into thy hand I commit my spirit: thou hast redeemed me, O Lord God of truth.

6. I have hated them that regard lying vanities: but I trust in the Lord. 7. I will be glad and rejoice in thy mercy: for thou hast considered my trouble; thou hast known my soul in adversities; and hast not shut me up into the hand of the enemy: thou hast set my feet in a large room.

Faith and prayer must go together. He that believes, let him pray; I believe, therefore have I spoken: and he that prays, let him believe, for the prayer of faith is the prevailing prayer. We have both here.

1. David, in distress, is very earnest with God in prayer, for succour and relief. This cases a burdened soul. He cherishes in his heart a wish to be wonderfully supported and comforted the soul, in the expectation of them. He prays, 1. That God would deliver him, (v. 1.) that his life might be preserved from the malice of his enemies, and that an end might be put to their persecutions of him. That God, not only in mercy, but in righteousness, would deliver him, as a righteous Judge betwixt him and his unrighteous persecutors; that he would bow down his ear to his petitions, to his appeals, and deliver him, v. 2. It is a condescension in God to take cognizance of the case of the greatest and best of men; he humbles himself to do it. The psalmsist prays also that he would deliver him speedily, lest, if the deliverance were long deferred, his faith should fail. 2. That if he did not immediately deliver him out of his troubles, yet he would protect and shelter him in his troubles; "Be thou my strong Rock, invincible, impregnable, as a fastness framed by nature, and my House of defence, a fortress framed by art, and all to save me." Thus may we pray that God's providence would secure to us our lives and comforts, and that by his grace we may be enabled to think ourselves safe in him,Prov. xvii. 10. 3. That, his case having much in it of difficulty, both in respect of duty, and in respect of providence, he might be under the divine guidance; "Lord, lead me and guide me;" (v. 3.) so order my steps, so order my spirit, that I may never do any thing unlawful and unjustifiable, against my conscience; or unwise and indiscreet, against my interest." They that resolve to follow God's direction, may in faith pray for it. 4. That, his enemies being very crafty, as well as very spiteful, God would frustrate and baffle their designs against him; (v. 4.) "Pull me out of the net that they have laid privily for me, and keep me from the sin, the trouble, the death, they aim to entrap me in." 2.

In this prayer, he gives glory to God, by repeated profession of his confidence in him, and dependence on him. This encouraged his prayers, and qualified him for the mercies he prayed for; (v. 1.) "In thee, O Lord, do I put my trust, and not in myself, or any sufficiency of my own, or in any creature; let me never be ashamed, let me not be disappointed of any of that good which thou hast promised me, and which therefore I have promised myself in them.

1. He had chosen God for his Protector, and God had, by his promise, undertaken to be so; (v. 3.) "Thou art my Rock and my Fortress, by thy covenant with me, and my believing consent to that covenant; therefore be my strong Rock," v. 2. They that have in sincerity avouched the Lord for their's, may expect the benefit of his being so; for God's relations to us carry with them both name and thing. Thou art my Strength, v. 4. If God be our Strength, then it is evident that he will put his strength in us, and put forth his strength for us.

2. He gave up his soul in a special manner to him; (v. 5.) Into thine hands I commit my spirit. (1.) If David here looks upon himself as a dying man, by these words he resigns his departing soul to God, who gave it, and to whom, at death, the spirit returns. "Men can but kill the body, but I trust in God to redeem my soul from the power of the grave," ver. 15. He is willing, to die, if God will have it so; but let my soul fall into thine hands of the Lord, for his mercies are great. With these words, our Lord Jesus yielded up the ghost upon the cross, and made his soul an offering, a free-will offering, for sin, voluntarily laying down his life a ransom. By Stephen's example we are taught, in our dying moments, to eye Christ at God's right hand, and to commit our spirits to him; Lord Jesus, receive my spirit. But, (2.) David is here to be looked upon as a man in distress and trouble. And, (3.) His great care is about his soul, his spirit, his better part. Note, Our outward afflictions should increase our concern for our souls. Many think that while they are perplexed about their worldly affairs, and Providence multiplies their care about them, they may be excused if they neglect their souls; whereas the greater hazard our lives and secular interests lie at, the more we are concerned to look to our souls, that, though the outward man perish, the inward man may suffer no damage, (2 Cor. iv. 16.) and that we may keep possession of our souls, when we can keep possession of nothing else, Luke xxi. 19.

2.] He thinks the best he can do for his soul is, to commit it into the hand of God, and lodge that great trust with him. He had prayed, (v. 4.) to be plucked out of the net of outward trouble, but, as not despising upon that, God's will be done, he immediately let fall the net, and commits the spirit, the inward man, into God's hand; "Lord, however it goes with me, as to my body, let it go well with my soul." Note, It is the wisdom and duty of every one of us, solemnly to commit our spirits into the hands of God, to be sanctified by his grace, devoted to his honour, employed in his service, and fitted for his kingdom. That which encounters us without our spirits into the hand of God, is, that he has freely carried us there to redeem them; the particular redemptions of the Old Testament church, and the Old Testament saints, were typical of our redemption by Jesus Christ, Gen. xlvi. 16. The redemption of the soul is so precious, that it must have ceased for ever, if Christ had not undertaken it; but, by redeeming our souls, he has not only acquired an additional right and title to them, which obliges us to commit them to him as his own, but has showed the extraordinary kindness and concern he has for them, which encourages us to commit them to him, to be preserved to his heavenly kingdom; (2 Tim. i. 12.) "Thou hast redeemed me, O Lord God of truth; redeemed me according to a promise which thou wilt be true to."

III. He disclaimed all condescension with those that made an arm of flesh their confidence; (v. 6.) I have hated them that regard lying vanities; idolaters, (so some,) who expect aid from false gods, which are vanity and a lie; astrologers, and those that give heed to them, so others. David abhorred the use of enchantments and divinations; he consulted not, nor ever took notice of, the flight of birds, the entrails of beasts, good omens or bad omens; they are lying vanities, and he not only did not regard them himself, but hated the wickedness of those that did; he trusted in God only, and not in any creature; his interest in the court and country, his retreats or strongholds, even Goliath's word itself—these were lying vanities, which he could not depend upon, but trusted in the Lord only; v. 6. Jer. xvii. 5.

4. He committed himself, with his hope in God, and made himself, not only easy, but cheerful, with it, v. 7. Having relied on God's mercy, he will be glad and rejoice in it; and those know not how to value their hope in God, who cannot find joy enough in that hope to balance their grievances, and silence their griefs.

V. He encouraged himself in this hope, with the experiences he had had, of late, and formerly, of God's goodness to him, which he mentions to the glory of God; he that has delivered, doth, and will. 1. God had taken notice of his afflictions, and all the circumstances of them; "Thou hast considered my trouble, with wisdom to suit relief to it, with condescension and compassion regarding the low estate of thy servant." 2. He had observed the temper of his spirit, and the workings of his heart under his afflictions; "Thou hast known my soul in adversity, with a tender concern and care for it." God's heart is upon it when we are in trouble, to see whether they be humbled for sin, submissive to the will of God, and bettered by the affliction. If the soul, when cast down under affliction, has been lifted up in true devotion, he knows it. 3. He had rescued him out of the hands of Saul, when he had him safe enough in Keilah; (1 Sam. xxxiii. 7.) "Thou hast not shut me up into the hand of the enemy, but set me at liberty, in a large room, where I may shift for my own safety." v. 8. Christ's using these words, (v. 5.) upon the cross, may warrant us to apply all this to Christ, who trusted in his Father, and was supported and delivered by him, and (because he humbled himself) highly exalted, which it is proper to think of, when we sing these verses, as also therein to acknowledge the experience we have had of God's gracious presence with us in our troubles, and to encourage ourselves to trust in him for the future.

9. Have mercy upon me, O Lord, for I am in trouble; mine eye is consumed with grief, yea, my soul and my belly. 10. For my life is spent with grief, and my years with sighing: my strength faileth because of mine iniquity, and my bones are consumed.

11. I was a reproach among all mine enemies, but especially among my neighhours, and a fear to mine acquaintance: they that did see me without fled from me.
12. I am forgotten as a dead man out of mind: I am like a broken vessel. 13. For I have heard the slander of many: fear was on every side: while they took counsel together against me, they devised to take away my life. 14. But I trusted in thee, O Lord; I said, Thou art my God. 15. My times are in thy hand: deliver me from the hand of mine enemies, and from them that persecute me. 16. Make thy face to shine upon thy servant: save me for thy mercies’ sake. 17. Let me not be ashamed, O Lord; for I have called upon thee: let the wicked be ashamed, and let them be silent in the grave. 18. Let the lying lips be put to silence; which speak grievous things proudly and contemptuously against the righteous.

In the foregoing verses, David had appealed to God's righteousness, and pleaded his relation to him, and appealed to him here he appealed to his mercy, and pleads the greatness of his own misery, which made his case the proper object of that mercy. Observe,

1. The complaint he makes of his trouble and distress; (v. 9.) "Have mercy upon me, O Lord, for I am in trouble, and need thy mercy." The remembrance he makes of his condition is not much unlike some even of Job's complaints.

2. His troubles had fixed a very deep impression upon his mind, and made him a man of sorrows. So great was his grief, that his very soul was consumed with it, and his life spent with it, and he was continually sighing, v. 9, 10. Herein he was a type of Christ, who was intimately acquainted with grief, and often in tears. We may guess by David's complexion, which was ruddy and sanguine, by his genius for music, and by his daring enterprises in his early days, that his natural disposition was both cheerful and firm, that he was apt to be cheerful, and not to lay trouble to his heart; yet here we see what he is brought to: he has almost wept out his eyes, and sighed away his breath. Let those that are airy and gay take heed of running into extremes, and never set sorrow at defiance; God can find out ways to make them melancholy, if they will not otherwise learn to be serious.

3. His body was affected with the sorrows of his mind; (v. 10.) "My strength falias, my bones are consumed, and all because of mine iniquity." As to Saul, and the quarrel he had with him, he could confidently insist upon his righteousness; but as it was an affliction God laid upon him, he owns he had deserved it, and freely confesses his iniquity to have been the procuring cause of all his trouble; and the sense of sin touched him to the quick, and wasted him more than all his calamities.

4. His friends were unknown, and became shy of him; but fear to accept acquaintance, when they saw him, they fled from him, v. 11. They durst not harbour him, nor give him any assistance, nor show him any countenance, not so much as to be seen in his company, for fear of being brought into trouble by it, now that Saul had proclaimed him a traitor, and out-lawed him. They saw how dear Abimelech the priest had paid for aiding and abetting him, though ignorantly; and therefore, though they could not but own he had a great deal of wrong done him, yet they had not the courage to appear for him. He was forgotten by them, as a dead man out of mind, (v. 12.) and looked upon with contempt as a broken vessel. They that showed him all possible respect, when he was in honour at court, now that he was fallen into disgrace, though unjustly, were strange to him. Such swallow-friends the world is full of, that are gone in winter. Let those that fall on the losing side, not think it strange, if they be thus deserted, but make sure a Friend in heaven, that will not fail them, and make use of him too.

5. His enemies were unjust in their censures of him; they would not have persecuted him as they did, if they had not first represented him as a bad man; he was a refreshment among all his enemies, but especially among his neighbours, v. 11. Those that had been the witnesses of his integrity, and could not but be convinced in their consciences that he was an honest man, were the most forward to represent him quite otherwise, that they might make it all the more favourable to him, he had the slander of many; every one had a stone to throw at him, because fear was on every side; they durst not do otherwise, for he that would not join with his neighbours to abuse David, was looked upon as disaffected to Saul. Thus the best of men have been ranked with the worst characters by those that resolved to give them the worst treatment.

6. His life was aimed at, and he went in continual peril of it. But if he was on every side, and he knew that, whatever counsel his enemies took against him, the design was not to take away his liberty, but to take away his life, (v. 13.) a life so valuable, so useful, to the good services of which all Israel owed so much, and which was never forfeited. Thus, in all the plots of the Pharisees and Herodians against Christ, still the design was to take away his life; such are the enmity and cruelty of the serpent's seed.

II. His confidence in God, in the midst of these troubles; every thing looked black and dismal round about him, and threatened to drive him to despair; "But I trusted in thee, O Lord, and that kept me from sinking." His enemies robbed him of his reputation among men, but they could not rob him of his comfort in God, because they could not drive him from his confidence in God. Two things he comforted himself with in his straits, and he intreated God to do so with him; 1. "Thou art my God; I have chosen thee for mine, and thou hast promised to be mine;" and if he be ours, and we can by faith call him so, it is enough, when we can call nothing else ours. "Thou art my God; and therefore to whom shall I go for relief, but to thee?" They need not be straitened in their prayers, who can plead this; for if God undertake to be our God, he will do that for us, which will answer the compass and vast extent of that engagement.

My times are in thy hand. Join this with the former, and it makes the comfort complete. If God have our times in his hand, he can help us; and if he be our God, he will help us; and then what can discourage us? It is a great support to those who have God for their God, that their times are in his hand; and he will be sure to order and dispose of them for the best to all those who commit their spirits also in his hand, to his care, in their times, as David here, v. 5. The time of life is in God's hands, to lengthen or shorten, imbitter or sweeten, as he pleases, according to the counsel of his will. Our times, all events that concern us, and the timing of them, these are at God's disposal; they are not in our own hands, for the way of man is not in himself, nor in our friends' hands, nor in our enemies' hands, but in God's; every man's judgment freethed from him. David does not, in his prayers, prescribe to God, but subscribe to him; "Lord, my times are in thy hand, and I am well pleased that they are so, they could not be in a better hand; thy will be done."

III. His petitions to God; in this faith and confidence,
1. He prays that God would deliver him out of the hand of his enemies, (v. 15.) and save him; (v. 16.) and this, for his mercies sake, and not for any merit of his own. Our opportunities are in God's hand, (so some read it,) and therefore he knows how to choose the best and fittest time for our deliverance, and we must be willing to wait that time. When David had Saul at his mercy in the cave, those about him said, "This is the time in which God will deliver thee," 1 Sam. xxvii. 4. "No," says he, "the time is not come for my deliverance, till it can be wrought without sin; and I will wait for that time; for it is God's time, and that is the best time."

2. That God would give him the comfort of his favour in the mean time; (v. 16.) "Make thy face to shine upon thy servant;" let me have the comfortable tokens and evidences of thy favour to me, and that shall put gladness in my heart in the midst of all my griefs.

3. That his prayers to God might be answered, and his hopes in God accomplished; (v. 17.) "Let me not be ashamed of my hopes and prayers, for I have called upon thee, who never saith to thy people, Seek in vain, and hope in vain."

4. That shame and silence might be the portion of wicked people, and particularly of his enemies. They were confident of their success against David, and that they should run him down, and ruin him.

"Lord," says he, "let them be made ashamed of that confidence by the disappointment of their expectations." As those that opposed the building of the wall about Jerusalem, when it was finished, were much cast down in their own eyes, Neh. vi. 16. Let them be silent in the grave. Note, Death will silence the rage and clamour of cruel persecutors, whom reason would not silence. In the grave, the wicked cease from troubling. Particularly, he prays for, that is, he prophesies, the silencing of those that reproach and calumny the people of God; (v. 18.) Let lying lips be put to silence, that speak grievous things fraudily and contemptuously against the righteous. This is a very good prayer, (1.) Which we have often occasion to put to God; for they that set their mouth against the heavens, commonly revile the heirs of heaven. Religion, and the strict and serious professors of it, are everywhere spoken against. [1.] With a great deal of malice, they speak grievous things, on purpose to vex them, and hoping, with what they say, to do them a real mischief. They speak hard things, (so the word is,) which bear hard upon them, and by which they hope to fasten indelible characters of infamy upon them. [2.] With a great deal of falsehood; they are lying lips, taught by the father of lies, and serving his interest. [3.] With a great deal of scorn and disdain; they speak fraudily and contemptuously, as if the righteous, whom God has honoured, were the most despicable people in the world, and not worthy to be set with the dogs of their flock. One would think they thought it no sin to tell a deliberate lie, if it may but serve to expose a good man either to hatred or contempt. Hear, O our God, for we are despised. [2.] We may pray it in faith; for these lying lips are, as it were, put to silence by God's taking away of doing it. Sometimes he convinces the consciences of those that reproach his people, and turns their hearts; sometimes by his providence he visibly confutes their calumnies, and brings forth the righteousness of his people as the light. However, there is a day coming, when God will convince ungodly sinners of the falsehood of all the hard speeches they have spoken against his people, and will execute judgment upon them, Jude 14, 15. Then shall this prayer be fully answered, and to that day we should have an eye in the singing of it; engaging ourselves likewise, by well-doing, if possible, to silence the ignorance of foolish men, 1 Pet. iii. 15.

19. Oh how great is thy goodness, which thou hast laid up for them that fear thee which thou hast wrought for them that trust in thee before the sons of men! 20. Thou shalt hide them in the secret of thy presence from the pride of man; thou shalt keep them secretly in a pavilion from the strife of tongues. 21. Blessed be the Lord; for he hath showed me his marvellous kindness in a strong city. 22. For I said in my haste, I am cut off from before thine eyes; nevertheless thou hearest the voice of my supplications, when I cried unto thee. 23. O love the Lord, all ye his saints: for the Lord preserveth the faithful, and plenteously rewardeth the proud doer. 24. Be of good courage, and he shall strengthen your heart; all ye that hope in the Lord.

We have three things in these verses:
1. The believing acknowledgement which David makes of God's goodness to his people in general, v. 19, 20.

1. God is good to all, but he is, in a special manner, good to Israel. His goodness to them is wonderful, and will be, to eternity, matter of admiration; Oh how great is thy goodness! How profound are the counsels of it; how rich are the treasures of it; how free and extensive are the communications of it! Those very persons whom men load with slanders, God loads with benefits and honours. Those who are interested in this goodness, are described to be such as fear God, and trust in him, as stand in awe of his greatness, and rely on his grace. This goodness is said to be laid up for them, and wrought for them. (1.) There is goodness laid up for them in the other world, an inheritance reserved in heaven; (1 Pet. i. 4.) and there is a goodness wrought for them in this world, God's goodness wrought in them. There is enough in God's goodness, both for the portion and inheritance of all his children, when they come to their full age, and for their maintenance and education, during their minority. There is enough in bank, and enough in hand. (2.) This goodness is laid up in his promise for all that fear God, to whom assurance is given that they shall want no good thing. But it is wrought, in the actual performance of the promise, for those that trust in him—that by faith take hold of the promise, put it in suit, and draw out to themselves the benefit and comfort of it. If what is laid up for us in the treasures of the everlasting covenant, be not wrought for us, it is our own fault; because we do not believe. But those that trust in God, as they have the comfort of his goodness in their own bosoms, so they have the credit of it, (and the credit of an estate goes far with some,) it is wrought for them before the sons of men; God's goodness to them puts an honour upon them, and rolls away their reproach; for all that see them shall acknowledge them, that they are the seed which the Lord hath blessed, Isa. lxi. 9.

2. God preserves man and beast; but he is, in a special manner, the Protector of his own people; (v. 20.)
Thou shalt hide them. As his goodness is hid and reserved for them, so they are hid and preserved for it. The saints are God's hidden ones. See here, (1.) The danger they are in, which arises from the pride of man, and from the strife of tongues; proud men insult over them, and would trample on them, and tread them down; contentious men pick quarrels with them, and where there are tongues at strife, good people often go by the worst. The pride of men endangers their liberty; the strife of tongues, in perverse disputings, endangers truth. But, (2.) See the defence they are under; Thou shalt hide them in the secret of thy presence; in a pavilion. God's providence shall keep them safe from the malice of their enemies. He has many ways of sheltering them; when Baruch and Jeremiah were sought for, the Lord hid them, Jer. xxxvi. 26. God we shall keep them safe from the judgments that are abroad; to them they have no sting; they shall be hid in the day of the Lord's anger, for there is no anger at them. His comforts shall keep them easy and cheerful; his sanctuary, where they have communion with him, shelters them from the fiery darts of terror and temptation; and the mansions in his house above, shall be shortly, shall be eternally, their hiding place from all ages and fear.

II. The thankful returns which David makes for God's goodness to him in particular, (v. 21, 22.) Having admired God's goodness to all the saints, he here owns how good he had found him.

1. Without were fightings; but God had wonderfully preserved his life; "He has showed me his marvellous loving kindness, he has given me an instance of his care of me, and favour to me, beyond what I could have expected." God's loving-Kindness consider'd is wonderful; but some instances of it, even in this world, are, in a special manner, marvellous in their eyes; as this here, when God preserved David from the sword of Saul, in caves and woods, as safe as if it had been in a strong city. In Keilah, that strong city, God showed him great mercy, both in making him an instrument to rescue the inhabitants out of the hands of the Philistines, and then in rescuing him from the same men, who would have ungratefully delivered him to the hands of his enemies. Ps. xxi. 5, 12. This was marvellous loving kindness indeed, upon which he writes, with wonder and thankfulness, Blessed be the Lord. Special preserves call for particular thanksgivings.

2. Within were fears; but God was better to him than his fears, v. 22. He here keeps an account, (1.) Of his own folly, in distrusting God, which he acknowledges to his shame; though he had express promises to build upon, and great experience of God's care concerning him, in many straits, yet he had entertained this hard and jealous thought of God, and could not forbear telling it him to his face, "I am cut off from before thine eyes; thou hast quite forsaken me, and I must not expect to be looked upon or regarded by thee any more. I shall one day perish by the hand of Saul, and so be cut off from before thine eyes, be ruined while thou lookest on," I Sam. xxxvii. 1. This he said, in his flight; (so some read it,) which denotes the distress of his affairs. Saul was just at his back, and ready to seize him, which made the temptation strong; in my haste, (so we read it,) which denotes the disturbance and discomposure of his mind, which made the temptation surprising, so that it found him off his guard. Note, It is a common thing to speak amiss, when we speak in haste, and without consideration; but to speak amiss in haste, we must repent of it at leisure, particularly that which we have said distrustfully of God. (2.) Of God's wonderful goodness to him notwithstanding; though his faith failed, God's promise did not; Thou heardest the voice of my supplication, for all this. He mentions his own unbelief as a fill to God's fidelity, serving to make his loving kindness the more marvellous, the more illustrious. When we have thus distrusted God, he might justly have taken us at our word, and brought our fears upon us, as he did on Israel, Num. xiv. 28. Isa. lxvi. 4. But he has pitied and pardoned us, and our unbelief has not made his promise and grace of none effect, for he knows our frame.

III. The exhortation and encouragement which he, hereupon, gives to all the saints, v. 23, 24.

1. He would have them set their love on God; (v. 23.) O love the Lord, all ye his saints. Those that have their own hearts full of love to God, cannot but desire that others also may be in love with him; for in his favour there is no need to fear a rival. It is the character of the saints, that they do love God, and yet they must be still called upon to love him, to love him more, and love him better, and give proofs of their love. We must love him, not only for his goodness, because he preserves the faithful, but for his justice, because he plentifully rewards the proud doer, (who would ruin those whom he preserves,) according to their pride. Some take it in a good sense; he plentifully rewards the magnificent (or excellent) doer, that is daringly good, whose heart, like Jehoshaphat's, is lifted up in the ways of the Lord. He rewards him that does well, but plentifully rewards him that does excellently well.

2. He would have them set their hope in God; (v. 24.) "Be of good courage; have a good heart on it, whatever difficulties or dangers you may meet with, the God you trust in shall by that trust strengthen your heart." They that hope in God believe to be of good courage, and let their hearts be strong, for, as nothing truly evil can befal them, so nothing truly good for them shall be wanting to them.

In singing this, we should animate ourselves, and one another, to proceed and persevere in our Christian course, whatever threatens us, and whoever frowns upon us.

PSALM XXXII.

This psalm, though it speaks not of Christ, as many of the psalms hitherto have; yet with what he has done, has yet a great deal of gospel in it. The apostle Paul in 1 Cor. xvi. 22. in this psalm, describes the blessedness of the man unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works, Rom. iv. 6. We have here a summary, I. Of gospel-grace in the pardon of sin; (v. 1, 2.) in divine protection; (v. 3.) and divine guidance, v. 8. II. Of gospel-duty. To confess sin; (v. 3. v.) to pray; (v. 6.) to govern ourselves wellly (v. 9, 10.) and to rejoice in God, v. 11. The way to obtain these privileges, is, to make conscience of these duties, which we ought to think of; of the former for our comfort, of the latter for our quickening, when we sing this psalm. Grotius thinks it was designed to sung on the day of atonement.

A psalm of David, Maschil.

1. BLESSED is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered. 2. Blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity, and in whose spirit there is no guile. 3. When I kept silence, my bones waxed old: through my roaring all the day long. 4. (For day and night thy hand was heavy upon me) my moisture is turned into the drought of summer. Selah. 5. I acknowledged my sin unto thee, and mine iniquity have I not hid. I said, I will confess my transgressions unto the Lord; and thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin. Selah. 6. For this shall every one that is gaily pray unto thee in a time when thou mayest be found: surely in the floods of great waters they shall not come near unto him.

This psalm is entitled Maschil, which some take
"to be only the name of the tune to which it was set, and was to be sung. But others think it is significant;
our margin reads it, A psalm of David giving instruction; and there is nothing in which we have more need of instruction than in the nature of true blessedness, wherein it consists, and the way that leads us to it. We must be under a Laden on the stomach, without; there are divers things in which these verses instruct us. In general, we are here taught, that our happiness consists in the favour and grace of God, and not in the wealth of this world; in spiritual blessings, and not the good things of this world. When David says, (I. 1.) Blessed is the man that walks not in the counsel of the ungodly, and, (cxix. 1.) Blessed are the undefiled in the way;
the meaning is, "This is the character of the blessed man; and he that has not this character, cannot expect to be happy;" but when it is here said, Blessed is the man whose iniquity is forgiven, the meaning is, "This is the ground of his blessedness; this is that fundamental privilege from which all the other ingredients of his blessedness flow."

In particular, we are here instructed,
I. Concerning the nature of the pardon of sin;
this is that which we all need, and are undone without; we are therefore concerned to be very solicitous and inquisitive about it. 1. It is the forgivning of transgression. Sin is the transgression of the law; upon our repentance, the transgression is forgiven; the obligation to punishment, which we lay under, by virtue of the sentence of the law, is vacated and cancelled; it is lifted off, (so some read it,) that by the pardon of it we may be eased of a burthen, a heavy burthen, like a load on the back, that makes us sick, or a load on the spirits, that makes us sink. The remission of sins gives rest and relief to those that were weary and heavy-laden. Matth.
xi. 28. 2. It is the covering of sin, as nakedness is covered, that it may not appear to our shame, Rev.
iii. 18. One of the first symptoms of guilt in our first parents, was, blushing at their own nakedness.
Sin makes us loathsome in the sight of God, and utterly unfit for communion with him, and when conscience is awakened, it makes us loathsome to ourselves too; but when it is pardoned, it is covered with the robe of Christ's righteousness, like the coats of skins wherein God clothed Adam and Eve, (an emblem of the remission of sins,) so that God is no longer displeased with us, but perfectly reconciled. They are not covered from us; no, My sin is ever before me, nor covered from God's omiscience, but from his vindictive justice: when his pardons sin, he remembers it no more, he casts it behind his back, it shall be sought for, and not found. The sinner, being thus reconciled to God, begins to be reconciled to himself. 3. It is not imputing of iniquity, not laying it to the sinner's charge, not proceeding against him for it, according to the strictness of the law, not dealing with him as he deserves. The righteousness of Christ being imputed to us, and we being made the righteousness of God, while we have nothing in ourselves that is not mayed. God having laid upon him the iniquity of us all, and made him sin for us. Observe, Not to impute iniquity, is God's act, for he is the Judge. It is God that justifies.

II. Concerning the character of those whose sins are pardoned, in whose spirit there is no guile: he does not say, "There is no guile," (for who is there that lives, and sins not?) but no guile; that does not dissemble with God, in his professions of repentance and faith, and in his prayers for peace or pardon. For all that is sincere, is clear, and means as he says; that does not repent, nor ask a pardon, sin again, and then sin, with a purpose to repent again, as a learned interpreter glosses upon it.
Those that design honestly, that are really what they profess to be, those are the Israelites indeed, in whom is no guile.

III. Concerning the happiness of a justified state; Blessednesses are to the man whose iniquity is forgiven, all manner of blessings, sufficient to make him contented and happy. But he that incurred the curse, and obstructed the blessing; and then God will pour out blessings, till there be no room to receive them. The forgiveness of sin, is that article of the covenant, which is the reason and ground of all the rest; For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, Heb. vii. 12.

IV. Concerning the uncomfortable condition of an unhumbled sinner, that sees his guilt, but is not yet brought to feel its weight.
This David describes very pathetically, from his own sad experience; (v. 3, 4.) While I kept silence, my bones waxed old. Those may be said to keep silence, who stifle their convictions, who, when they cannot but see the evil of sin, and their danger by reason of it, ease themselves by not thinking of it, and diverting their minds to something else; as Cain to the building of a city; who rey not at all, God binds them; who will not unburden their consciences by a penitent confession, or seek for peace, as they ought, by faithful and fervent prayer; and who choose rather to pine away in their iniquities, than to take the method which God has appointed of finding rest for their souls; let such expect that their smothered convictions will be a fire in their bones, and the wounds of sin, not opened, will fester, and grow intolerably painful. If conscience be seared, the case is so much the more dangerous, if the sin be not made out, it will be heard. The hand of divine wrath will be felt lying heavy upon the soul, and the anguish of the spirit will affect the body; to that degree David experienced it, so that when he was young, his bones waxed old; and even his silence made him roar all the day long, as if he had been under some grievous pain and distemper of body;
when really the cause of all his uneasiness, was,
the struggle he felt in his own bosom between his convictions and his corruptions. Note, He that cover his sins shall not prosper; some inward trouble is required in repentance, but there is much worse in impenitency.

V. Concerning the true and only way to peace of conscience. We are here taught to confess our sins, that they may be forgiven; to declare them, that we may be justified. This course David took; I acknowledge my sin unto thee and no longer hid it from thee. If the man be really convinced of sin, and the comfort of the pardon of their sins, must take shame to themselves by a penitent confession of them. We must confess the fact of sin, and be particular in it; Thus, and thus have I done; confess the fault of sin, aggravate it, and lay a load upon ourselves for it; I have done very wickedly; confess the justice of the punishment we have been under for it; The Lord is just in all that is brought upon us; and then he adds, and that the man who has become more worthy to be called thy son. We must confess sin with shame and holy blushing, with fear and trembling.

VI. Concerning God's readiness to pardon sin to those who truly repent of it; I said, I will confess;
Be glad in the Lord, and rejoice, ye righteous; and shout for joy, all ye that are upright in heart.

David is here improving the experience he had had of the comfort of pardoning mercy.

I. He speaks to God, and professes his confidence in him, and expectation from him; (v. 7.) having tasted the sweetness of divine grace to a penitent sinner, he cannot doubt of the continuance of that grace to a praying saint, and that in that grace he should find both safety and joy. 1. I sing comfortably to the music of my sin, and engage me the comfort of the pardon in mine own conscience; immediately I found rest to my soul. Note, God is more ready to pardon sin, upon our repentance, than we are to repent, in order to the obtaining of pardon. It was with much ado, that David was here brought to confess his sins; he was put to the rack before he was brought to it; (v. 3, 4.) he held out long, and would not surrender till it came to the last extremity; but when he did offer to surrender, see how quickly how easily, he obtained good terms; I did but say, I will confess, and thou forgavest. Thus the father of the prodigal saw his returning son when he was yet afar off, and ran to meet him with the kiss that sealed his pardon. What an encouragement is this to poor penitents; and what an assurance does it give us, that, if we confess our sins, we shall find God, not only faithful and just, but gracious and kind, to forgive us our sins.

II. Concerning the good use that we are to make of the experience David had had of God's readiness to forgive his sins; (v. 6.) For this shall every one that is godly pray unto thee. Note, 1. All godly people are praying people. As soon as ever Paul was converted, Behold, he prays, Acts xix. 11. You may as soon find a living man without breath, as a living Christian without prayer. 2. The instructions given us concerning the happiness of those whose sins are pardoned, and the easiness of obtaining the pardon, should engage and encourage us to pray, and particularly to pray, God be merciful to us sinners. For this, shall every one that is well-inclined, be earnest with God in prayer, and come boldly to the throne of grace, with hopes to obtain mercy, Heb. iv. 16. 3. Those that would speed in prayer, must seek the Lord in a time when he will be found. When, by his providence, he calls them to seek him, and by his Spirit he stirs them up to seek him, they must go speedily to seek the Lord, (Zech. viii. 21.) and lose no time, lest death cut them off, and then it will be too late to seek him, Isa. lv. 6. Behold now is the accepted time, 2 Cor. vi. 2. 4. Those that are sincere and abundant in prayer, will find the benefit of it, when they are in trouble; Surely in the floods of great waters, they shall never come nigh them, to terrify them, or create them any uneasiness, much less shall they overwhelm them. Those that have God nigh unto them in all that which they call upon him for, as all upright, penitent, praying, people have, are so guarded, so advanced, that no waters, no great waters, no not floods of them, can come nigh them, to hurt them. As the temptations of the wicked one touch them not, so their sin doth not terrify them to evil world; these fiery darts, of both kinds, drop short of them.

7. Thou art my hiding-place; thou shalt preserve me from trouble; thou shalt compass me about with songs of deliverance. Selah. 8. I will instruct thee, and teach thee in the way which thou shalt go: I will guide thee with mine eye. 9. Behold not as the horse, or as the mule, which have no understanding; whose mouth must be held in with bit and bridle, lest they come near unto thee. 10. Many sorrows shall be to the wicked: but he that trusteth in the Lord, mercy shall compass him about. 11.

In this application of the foregoing doctrine concerning the blessedness of those whose sins are pardoned, here is a word to sinners, and a word to saints; and this is rightly dividing the word of truth, and giving to each their portion.

1. Here is a word of caution tc sinners, and a good reason given for it. (1.) The caution is, not to be unruly and ungovernmental; (v. 9.) Be ye not as the horse, or the mule, which have no understanding. When the psalmist would reproach himself for the sin he reproached of, he compared himself to a horse before God; so foolish have I been and ignorant, (lxviii. 22.) and therefore warns others not to be so. It is our honour and happiness, that we have understanding, that we are capable of being governed by reason, and of reasoning with ourselves. Let us therefore use the faculties we have, and act rationally. The horse and mule must be managed with bit and bridle, lest they come near us, to do us a mischief, (v. 10.) and that they come near us, to do us service, that they may obey us, Jer. iii. 3. Let us not be like them; let us not be hurried by appetite and passion, at any time, to go contrary to the dictates of right reason, and to our true interest. If sinners would be governed and determined by these, they would soon become saints, and would not go a step further in their sinful courses; where there is renewing grace, there is no need of the bit and bridle of restraining grace. (2.) Many are called to forsake every sin, because the way of sin which we would persuade you to forsake, will certainly end in sorrow; (v. 10.) Many sorrows shall be to the wicked, which will not only spoil their vein and carnal mirth, and put an end to it, but will make them pay dear for it. Sin will have sorrow, if not repented of, everlasting sorrow. It was part of the sentence, I will greatly multiply thy sorrows. "Be wise for yourselves, therefore, and turn from your wickedness, that you may prevent those sorrows, those many sorrows."

2. Here is a word of comfort to saints, and a good reason given for that too. (1.) They are assured that if they will but trust in the Lord, and keep close to him, mercy shall compass them about on every side, (v. 10.) so that they shall not depart from God, for that mercy shall keep them in, nor shall any real evil break in upon them, for that mercy shall keep it out. (2.) They are therefore commanded to be glad in the Lord, and to rejoice in him to that degree, as even to shout for joy, v. 11. Let them be so transported with this holy joy, as not to be able to contain themselves: and let them affect others with it, that they also may see that a life of communion with God is the most pleasant and comfortable life we can live, in this world. This is that present bliss which the upright in heart, and they only, are entitled to, and qualified for.

PSALM XXXIII.
This is a psalm of praise; it is probable that David was the penman of it, but we are not told so, because God would have us look above the merest writer, to that blessed Spirit that moved and guided them. The psalmist, in this psalm, I. Calls upon the righteous to praise God, v. 1. 3. It furnishes us with matter for praise. We may praise God, 1. For his justice, goodness, and truth, appearing in his word, and in all his works, v. 4. 5. 2. For his power appearing in the work of creation, v. 6. 9. 3. For the sovereignty of his providence in the government of the world, (v. 10, 11.) and again v. 16, 17. 4. For the care and grace he bears to his own chosen people, which encourages them to trust in him, (v. 12.) and again, v. 18. 22. We need not be at a loss for proper thoughts in singing this psalm, which so naturally speaks the pious affections of a devout soul toward God.

1. Rejoice, in the Lord, O ye righteous; for praise is comely for the upright.
2. Praise the Lord with harp: sing unto him with the psaltery, and an instrument of ten strings.
3. Sing unto him a new song; play skillfully with a loud noise: 4. For the word of the Lord is right; and all his works are done in truth.
5. He loveth righteousness and judgment, the earth is full of the goodness of the Lord.
6. By the word of the Lord were the heavens made: and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth. 7. He gathereth the waters of the sea together as a heap; he layeth up the depth in store-houses.
8. Let all the earth fear the Lord; let all the inhabitants of the world stand in awe of him.
9. For he spake, and it was done; he commanded, and it stood fast.
10. The Lord bringeth the counsel of the heathen to nought: he maketh the devices of the people of none effect.
11. The counsel of the Lord standeth for ever, the thoughts of his heart to all generations.

Four things the psalmist expresseth in these verses. 1. The great desire he had that God might be praised: he did not think he did it so well himself, but that he wished others also might be employed in this work; the more the better in this concert, it is the more like heaven. 1. Holy joy is the heart and soul of praise, and that is here pressed upon all good people; (v. 1.) Rejoice in the Lord, ye righteous, so the foregoing psalm concluded, and so this begins; for all our religious exercises should both begin and end with a holy complacency and triumph in God as the best of beings, and best of friends. 2. Thankful praise is the breath and language of holy joy; and that also is here required of us; (v. 2.) "Praise the Lord; speak well of him, and give him the glory due to his name." 3. Religious songs are the proper expressions of thankful praise; those are here required; (v. 3.) “Sing unto him a new song, the best you have, not that which, by frequent use, is worn threadbare; but that which, being new, is most likely to move the affections; a new song for new mercies, and upon every new occasion, for those compassions which are new every morning.” Music was then used, by the appointment of David, with the temple songs, that they might be the better sung: and this also is here called for; (v. 2.) Sing unto him with the psaltery. Here is, (1.) A good rule for this duty; Do it skilfully, and with a loud noise; let it have the best both of head and heart; let it be done intelligently, and with a clear head; affectionately, and with a warm heart. (2.) A good reason for this duty; for praise is comely for the upright. It is well-pleasing to God; the garments of praise add much to the comeliness which God puts upon his people; and it is an excellent ornament to our profession; it becomes the upright, wherein God has not so much reason to give honour to him. The proper way to praise God in a comely manner, for they praise him with their hearts, that is praising him with their glory. Whereas the praises of hypocrites are awkward and uncomely, like a parable in the mouth of fools, Prov. xxvi. 7.

II. The high thoughts he had of God, and of his infinite perfections, v. 4. 5. God makes himself known to us, 1. In his works; he must for all divine perfection; in that which God, at sundry times, and in divers manners, spake to the children of men; and that is all right, there is nothing amiss in it: his commands exactly agree with the rules of equity and the eternal reasons of good and evil. His promises all are wise and good, and inviolably sure, and there is no iniquity in his threatenings, but even those are designed for our good, by deterring us from evil. God's word is right, and therefore all our deviations from it are wrong, and we are then in the right when we agree with it. 2. In his works, and those are all done in truth, all according to his counsels, which are called the scriptures of truth, Dan. x. 21. The copy in all God's works agrees exactly with the great original, the plan laid in the Eternal Mind, and varies not in the least jot. God has made it to appear in his works, (1.) That he is a God of inflexible justice. He loveth righteousness and judgment. There is nothing but righteousness in the sentence he passes, and judgment in the execution of it. He never did or can do wrong to any of his creatures, but is always ready to right those that are wronged, and does it with delight. He takes pleasure in those that are righteous. He is himself the righteous Lord, and therefore loveth righteousness. (2.) That he is a God of inexhaustible bounty; the earth is full of his goodness, that is, of the proofs and instances of it. The benign influences which the earth receives from above, and the fruits it is thereby enabled to produce; the provision that is made both for man and beast, and the common blessings with which all the nations of the earth are blessed, plainly speak that the earth is full of his goodness; the darkest, the coldest, the hottest, and the most dry and desert part of it not excepted: what pity is it that this earth, which is so full of God's goodness, should be so empty of his praises; and that, of the multitudes that live upon his bounty, there are so few that live to his glory!

III. The conviction he was under of the almighty power of God, evidenced in the creation of the world. We believe in God, and therefore we praise him as the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, so we are here taught to praise him.

Observe, 1. How God made the world, and brought all things into being. (1.) How easily: All things were made by the word of the Lord, and by the breath of his mouth; Christ is the Word, the Spirit is the Breath, so that God the Father made the world, as he rules it, and redeems it, by his Son and Spirit. He spake, and he commanded, (v. 9.) and that was enough, there needed no more. With men, saying and doing are two things, but it is not so with God. When the Spirit of God came, with power over the world was made, so was man. The little world: God said, "Let us make man," and he breathed into him the breath of life. By the Word and Spirit the church is built, that new world, and grace wrought in the soul, that new man, that new creation.

What cannot that Power do, which, with a word, made a world? (2.) How effectually it was done; and it stood fast. What God does, he does it for a purpose, and it is perfect. Whatever God doth, it shall be for ever, Ecle. iii. 14. It is by virtue of that command to stand fast, that they continue to this day according to God's ordinance, cxix. 91.

2. What he made: He made all things, but notice is here taken, (1.) Of the heavens, and the host of them, v. 6. The visible heavens, and the sun, moon, and stars, their hosts; the highest heavens, and the sea, Rev. xiv. 6. 7. Of the treasures of them, v. 7. The earth wasat first covered with the water, and, being heavier, must of course subside and sink under it; but to show, from the very first, that the God of nature is not tied to the ordinary method of nature, and the usual operations of his powers, with a word's speaking, he gathered the waters together on a heap, that the dry land might appear, yet left them not to continue on a heap, but laid up the depth in storehouses; not only in the flats where the seas make their beds, and in which they are locked up by the sand on the shore as in store-houses, but in secret subterraneous caverns, where they are hid from the view of all, and reserved as in a store-house for that day when those foundations of the great deep were to be broken up; and they are still laid up there in store, for what use the great Master of the house knows best.

3. What use is to be made of this, v. 8. Let all the earth fear the Lord, and stand in awe of him, that is, let all the children of men worship him, and give glory to him, xcv. 5, 6. The everlasting gospel gives this as the reason why we must worship God, because he made the heaven and the earth, and the sea, Rev. xiv. 6, 7. Let us all fear him, that is, dread his wrath, and displeasure, and be afraid of having him our enemy, and standing it out against him. Let us not dare to offend him, who, having this power, no doubt, has all power in his hand. It is dangerous being at war with him, who has the host of heaven for his armies, and the depths of the sea for his magazines, and therefore it is wisdom to desire conditions of peace, see Jer. v. 22.

IV. The satisfaction he had in God's sovereignty and dominion, v. 10, 11. He overrules all the counsels of men, and makes them, contrary to their intention, serviceable to his counsels. Come and see, with an eye of faith, God in the throne, 1. Frustrating the devices of his enemies. He bringeth the counsel of the heathen to nought, so that what they imagine against him and his kingdom proves a vain thing; (ii. 1.) the counsel of Ahithophel is turned into foolishness. Haman's plot baffled; though the design be laid never so deep, and the hopes raised upon it never so high, yet, if God says it shall not stand, neither shall it come to pass, it is all to no purpose. 2. Fulfilling his own decrees; The counsel of the Lord standeth for ever. It is immutable in itself, for he is in one mind, and who can turn him? The execution of it may be opposed, but cannot in the least be obstructed by any created power. Through all the revolutions of time God never changed his measures, but in every event, even that which to us is most surprising, the eternal counsel of God is fulfilled; nor can any thing prevent its being accomplished in its times. With what pleasure to ourselves may we, in singing this, give praise to God! How easy it is, according to this thought, to make us at all times, that God governs the world, that he did it in infinite wisdom before we were born, and will do it when we are silent in the dust.

12. Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord; and the people whom he hath chosen for his own inheritance. 13. The Lord looketh from heaven; he beholdeth all the sons of men. 14. From the place of his habitation he looketh upon all the inhabitants of the earth. 15. He fashioneth their hearts alike; he considereth all their works. 16. There is no king saved by the multitude of a host: a mighty man is not delivered by much strength. 17. A horse is a vain thing for safety: neither shall he deliver any by his great strength. 18. Behold, the eye of the Lord is upon them that fear him, upon them that hope in his mercy; 19. To deliver their soul from death, and to keep them alive in famine. 20. Our soul waiteth for the Lord, he is our help and our shield. 21. For our heart shall rejoice in him; because we have trusted in his holy name. 22. Let thy mercy, O Lord, be upon us, according as we hope in thee.

We are here taught to give to God the glory, 1. Of his common providence towards all the children of men. Though he has endued man with understanding and freedom of will, yet he reserves to himself the government of him, and even of those very faculties by which he is qualified to govern himself.

2. The children of men are all under his eye, even their hearts are so; and all the motions and operations of their souls, which none know but they themselves, he knows better than they themselves, v. 13, 14. Though the residence of God's glory is in the highest heavens, yet thence he not only has a prospect of all the earth, but a particular inspection of all the inhabitants of the earth. He not only beholds them, but he looks upon them, he looks narrowly upon them (Gen. 11:6 Artic and ord) so narrowly, that not the least thought can escape his observation. Atheists think, that, because he dwells above in heaven, he cannot, or will not, take notice of what is done here in this lower world; but from thence, high as it is, he sees us all, and all persons and things are naked and open before him.

2. Their hearts, as well as their times, are all in his hand; He fashions their hearts. He made them at first, formed the spirit of each man within him, then when he brought him into being. Hence he is called the Father of Spirits: and this is a good argument to prove that he perfectly knows them; the artist that made the clock can account for the motions of every wheel. David uses this argument, with application to himself, xxxix. 1, 14. He still moulds the hearts of men, turns them as the rivers of water, which way soever he pleases, to serve his own purposes, darkens or enlightens men's understandings, stiffens or bows their wills, according as he is pleased to make use of them. He that fashions men's hearts fashions them alike; it is in hearts as in faces, though there is a great difference, and such a variety, as that no two faces are exactly of the same features, nor any two hearts exactly of the same temper, yet there is such a similitude, that, in some things, all faces and all hearts agree, as in water face answers to face, Prov. xxxii. 19. He fashions them together; (so some read it;) as the wheels of a watch, though of different shapes, sizes, and motions, are yet all put together, to serve one and the same purpose, so the hearts of men and their dispositions, however varying from each other, and seeming to contradict one another, are yet all overruled, to serve the divine purpose, which is one.

3. They, and all they do, are subject to his judgment; for he considers all their works, not only knows them, but weighs them, that he may render to every man according to his works, in the day, in the world, of retribution, in the judgment, and to eternity. 4. All the powers of the creature have a dependence upon him, and are of no account, of no avail at all, without him, v. 16, 17. It is much for the honour of God, that not only men, but all the creatures under heaven, that no force can act but in dependence on him, and by a power derived from him. (1.) The strength of a king is nothing without God; no king is sacred by his royal prerogatives, or the authority with which he is invested; for the powers that are of that kind are ordained of God, and are what he makes them, and no more. David was a king, and a man of war from his youth, and yet acknowledged God only to be his Protector and Saviour. (2.) The strength of an army is nothing without God; the multitude of a host cannot secure those under whose command they act, unless God make them a security to them. A great army cannot be sure of victory; for, when God pleases, one shall chase a thousand. (3.) The strength of a giant is nothing without God; a mighty man, such as Goliath was, is not delivered by his much strength, when his day comes to full; neither the firmness or activity of his body, he who works with the strength of his arm, and stand him in any stead, any further than God is pleased to give him success. Let not the strong man then glory in his strength, but let us all strengthen ourselves in the Lord our God, go forth, and go on, in his strength. (4.) The strength of a horse is nothing without God; (v. 17.) A horse is a vain thing for safety. In war, horses were then so highly accounted of, and so much depended on, that God forbade the Kings of Israel to use horses. (Deut. xix. 16.) lest they should be tempted to trust to them, and their confidence should thereby be taken off from God. David houghed the horses of the Syrians; (2 Sam. viii. 4.) here he houghs all the horses in the world, by pronouncing a horse a vain thing for safety in the day of battle. If the war-horse be unruly, and ill-managed, he may hurry his rider into danger, instead of carrying him out of danger. If he be called under him, he may be his death, instead of saving his life. It is therefore our interest to make sure God's favour towards us, and then we may be sure of his power engaged for us, and need not fear whatever is against us.

II. We are to give God the glory of his special grace. In the midst of his acknowledgments of God's providence, he pronounces those blessed that have Jehovah for their God, who governs the world, and has witherthall to help them in every time of need, while they were miserable, who had this and the other Baal for their God, which was so far from being able to hear and help them, that it was itself senseless and helpless; (v. 12.) Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord, even Israel, who had the knowledge of the true God, and were taken into covenant with him, and all others who own God for theirs, and are owned by him; for they also, whatever nation they are of, are of the spiritual seed of Abraham. 1. It is their honour, when they take the Lord for their God, that they direct their homage and adoration there where it is due, and where the payment of it will not be in vain. 2. It is their happiness, that they are the people whom God has chosen for his own inheritance, whom he is pleased with, and honoured in, and whom he protects and takes care of, whom he cultivates and improves as a man does his inheritance, Deut. xxxii. 9. Now has this place a text, to the honour of divine grace, (1.) The regard which God has to his people, v. 18, 19. God beholds all the sons of men with an eye of observation, but his eye of favour and complacency is upon them that fear him; he looks upon them with delight, as the father on his children, as the bridegroom on his spouse, Isa. lxxii. 5. While those that depend on arms and armies, on chariots and horses, perish in the disappointment of their expectations, God, who has so often said he shall deliver their soul from death, when there seems to be but a step between them and it; if he do not deliver the body from temporal death, yet he will deliver the soul from spiritual and eternal death; their souls, whatever happens, shall live and praise him, either in this world, or in a better. From his bounty they shall be supplied with all necessaries—he shall keep them alive in
A psalm of David, when he changed his behaviour before Abimelech; who drove him away, and he departed.

1. I WILL bless the LORD at all times: his praise shall continually be in my mouth. 2. My soul shall make him boast in the LORD: the humble shall hear thereof, and be glad. 3. O magnify the LORD with me, and let us exalt his name together. 4. I sought the LORD, and he heard me, and delivered me from all my fears. 5. They looked unto him, and were lightened; and their faces were not ashamed. 6. This poor man cried, and the LORD heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles. 7. The angel of the LORD encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them. 8. O taste and see that the LORD is good: blessed is the man that trusteth in him. 9. O fear the LORD, ye his saints: for there is no want to them that fear him. 10. The young lions do lack and suffer hunger: but they that seek the LORD shall not want any good thing.

The title of this psalm tells us both who penned it, and upon what occasion it was penned. David, being forced, by the rage of Saul, to leave his country, sought for shelter as near as he could, in the land of the Philistines; there it was soon discovered who he was, and he was brought before the king, who, in the narrative, is called Achish, his proper name, here, Abimelech, his title; and, lest he should be treated as a spy, or one that came thither upon design, he feigned himself to be a madman, (such there have been in every age, that even by idiots men might be taught to give God thanks for the use of their reason,) that Achish might dismiss him as a contemptible man, rather than take cognizance of him as a dangerous man. And it had the effect he desired; by this stratagem he escaped the hand that otherwise would have handled him roughly. Now, 1. We cannot justify David in this dissimulation. It ill became an honest man to feign himself to be what he was not, and a man of honour to feign himself to be a fool and a madman. If, in sport, we mimic those who have not so good an understanding as we think we have, we forget that God might have made our case ours. 2. Yet we cannot but wonder at the composure of his spirit, and how far he was from any change of that, when he changed his behaviour. Even when he was in that fright, or rather in that danger only, his heart was so fixed, trusting in God, that even then he penned this excellent psalm, which has as much in it as the main of the other psalms in the Psalter. This psalm is no more a psalm in the all the book; and there is something curious in the composition, for it is what is called an alphabetical psalm, that is, a psalm in which every verse begins with each letter in its order, as it stands in the Hebrew alphabet. Happy they who can thus keep their temper, and keep their graces in exercise, even when they are tempted to change their behaviour. In this former part of the psalm, David commends and exalts himself to praise God. Though it was his fault that he changed his behaviour, yet it was God's mercy that he escaped, and the mercy was so much the greater, in that God did not deal with him according to the desert of his dissimulation, and we must in every thing give thanks. He resolves, 1. That he will praise
God constantly; I will bless the Lord at all times, upon all occasions. He resolves to keep up stated times for this duty; to lay hold on all opportuni\-ties for it, and to renew his praises upon every fresh occurrence that furnished him with matter. If we hope to spend our eternity in praising God, it is fit that we should spend as much as may be of our time in this work. 2. That he will praise him openly. God shall continually be in my mouth. Thus he would show how forward he was to own his obligations to the mercy of God, and how desirous to make others also sensible of theirs. 3. That he will praise him heartily; My soul shall make her boast in the Lord, in my relation to him, my interest in him, and expectations from him. It is not vain glory to glory in the Lord.

2. He calls upon others to join with him herein. He expects them all. (v. 2.) be humble shall hear the voice of both of my deliverance and of my thankfulness, and be glad that a good man has so much favour shown him, and a good God so much honour done him. Those have most comfort in God's mercies, both to others and to themselves, that are humble, and have the least confidence in their own merit and sufficiency. It pleased David to think that God's favours to him would rejoice the heart of every Israelite.

Three things he would have us all to concur with him in.

1. In great and high thoughts of God, which we should express in magnifying him, and exalting his name, v. 3. We cannot make God greater or higher than he is; but, if we adore him as infinitely great, and higher than the highest, he is pleased to reckon this magnifying and exalting him. This we must do together. God's praises sound best in concert, and so will praise the angels. The share in God's favour, as all the saints do, should concur in his praises; and we should be as desirous of the assistance of our friends in returning thanks for mercies, as in praying for them.

We have reason to join in thanksgiving to God, (1.) For his readiness to hear prayer, which all the saints have had the comfort of, for he never said to any of them, Seek ye me, in vain. [Gen. 17. 1.] David tells us that he has found him a prayer-hearing God; (v. 4.) I sought the Lord in my distress, entreated his favour, begged his help, and he heard me, answered my request immediately, and delivered me from all my fears, both from the death I feared, and from the disquietude and disturbance produced by my fear of it. The former he does by his providence working for us, the latter by his grace working in us, to silence our fears, and still the tumult of the spirits; this latter is the greater mercy of the two, because the thing we fear is our trouble only: but our unbelieving distrustful fear of it is our sin; nay, it is often more our torment too than the thing itself would be, which perhaps would only touch the bone and the flesh, while the fear would prey upon the spirits, and put us out of the possession of our own soul. David's prayers helped to silence his fears; having sought the Lord, and left his case with him, he could with greater confidence trust the event. But David was a great and eminent man, we may not expect to be favoured as he was; have any others ever experienced the like benefit by prayer? Yes, [2.] Many beside him have looked unto God by faith and prayer, and have been lightened by it, v. 5. It has wonderfully revived and comforted them; witness Hannah, who, when she had prayed, went her way, and did eat, and her countenance was no more sordid. When we look to the world, we are darkened, we are perplexed, and at a loss; but when we look to God, from him we have the light both of direction and joy, and our way is made both plain and pleasant. These here spoken of, that looked unto God, had their expectations raised, and the event did not frustrate them, their faces were not ashamed of their confidence. But, perhaps, these also were persons of great eminency, like David himself, and, upon that account, were highly favoured, and might thus have the event as it was foretold; nay, [3.] This poor man cried, a single person, mean and inconsiderable, whom no man looked upon with any respect, or looked after with any concern; yet he was as welcome to the throne of grace as David, or any of his worthies; the Lord heard him, took cognizance of his case and of his prayers, and saved him out of all his troubles, v. 6. God will regard the prayer of the destitute, cii. 17. S. Is. 65. 25.

(2.) For the ministration of the good angels about us; (v. 7.) The angel of the Lord, a guard of angels, (so some,) but as unanimous in their service as if they were but one, or a guardian angel, encamps round about them that fear God, as the life-guard about the prince, and delivers them. God makes use of the attendance of the good spirits; for the protection of his people from the malice and power of evil spirits; and the holy angels do more good every day than we are aware of. Though in dignity and in capacity of nature they are very much superior to us, though they retain their primitive rectitude, which we have lost, though they have constant employment in the upper world, the employment of praising God, and are entitled to a constant rest and bliss there, yet, in obedience to their Maker, and in love to those that bear his image, they condescend to minister to the saints, and stand up for them against the powers of darkness; they not only visit them, but encamp round about them, acting for their good as really, though not as sensibly, as for Jacob's, (Gen. xxxii. 1.) and Elisha's, 2 Kings, vi. 17. All the glory be to the God of the angels.

2. He would have us to join with him in kind and good thoughts of God; (v. 8.) O taste, and see, that the Lord is good. The goodness of God includes benevolence to all creatures, and the benefit and beneficence of his providence and grace; and, accordingly, (1.) We must taste that he is a bountiful Benefactor, relish the goodness of God in all his gifts to us, and reckon that the savour and sweetness of them. Let God's goodness be rolled under the tongue as a sweet morsel. (2.) We must see that he is a beautiful Being, and delight in the contemplation of his infinite perfections. By taste and sight we both make discoveries, and take complacency; taste, and see, God's goodness; take notice of it, and take the comfort of it, 1 Pet. ii. 3. He is good, for he makes all those truly blessed that trust in him; let us, therefore, be so convinced of his goodness, as thereby to be encouraged in the worst of times to trust in him.

3. He would have us join with him in a resolution to seek God and serve him, and continue in his fear; (v. 9.) O fear the Lord, ye his saints; when we think and see that he is good, we must not forget that he is great, and greatly to be feared; nay, even his goodness is the proper object of a filial reverence and awe. They shall fear the Lord and his goodness, Hos. iii. 5. Fear the Lord; worship him, and make conscience of your duty to him in every thing; not fear him and shun him, but fear him and seek him, (v. 10.) as a people seek unto their God; apply yourselves to him, and be not won over to yourselves in him. To encourage us to fear God and seek him, it is here promised that these that do so, even in this wanting world, shall want no good thing. Heb. They shall not want all good thing; they shall so have of all good things, that they shall have no reason to complain of the want of any. As to the things of the other world, they shall have grace sufficient for the support of the spiritual life, 2 Cor. xii. 9. Ps. lxxxiv. 11. And as to this life, they shall have what is necessary to the support of it from the hand of God; as a Father, he will feed them with food convenient; what further comforts they desire, they shall have, as far as Infinite Wisdom sees good, and what they want in one thing shall be made up in another. What God denies them, he will give them grace to be content without, and then they do not want it. Deut. iii. 26. Paul had all, and abounded, because he was content, Phil. iv. 11, 18. Those that live by faith in God's all-sufficiency, want nothing; for in them they have enough. The young lions often lack, and suffer hunger; and they that live upon common providence, as the lions do, shall want that satisfaction which they have that live by faith in the promise. They that trust to themselves, and think their own hands sufficient for them, shall want, for bread is not always to the wise; but verily they shall be fed that trust in God, and desire to be at his finding. They that are ravenous, and prey upon all about them, shall want, but the meek shall inherit the earth; they shall not want, who with quietness work, and mind their own business; plain-hearted Jacob has potage enough, when Esau, the cunning hunter, is ready to perish for hunger.

11. Come, ye children, hearken unto me; I will teach you the fear of the Lord. 12. What man is he that desireth life, and mayest many days, that he may see good? 13. Keep thy tongue from evil, and thy lips from speaking guile. 14. Depart from evil, and do good; seek peace, and pursue it. 15. The eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous, and his ears are open unto their cry. 16. The face of the Lord is against them that do evil, to cut off the remembrance of them from the earth. 17. The righteous cry, and the Lord heareth, and delivereth them out of all their troubles. 18. The Lord is nigh unto them that are of a broken heart; and saveth such as be of a contrite spirit. 19. Many are the afflictions of the righteous: but the Lord delivereth him out of them all. 20. He keepeth all his bones: not one of them is broken. 21. Evil shall slay the wicked; and they that hate the righteous shall be desolate. 22. The Lord redeemeth the soul of his servants; and none of them that trust in him shall be desolate.

David, in this latter part of the psalm, undertakes to teach children; though a man of war, and anointed to be king, he did not think it below him; though now he had his head so full of cares, and his hands of business, yet he could find heart and time to give good counsel to young people, from his own experience. It does not appear that he had now any children of his own, at least, any that were grown up to a capacity of being taught; but, by divine inspiration, he instructs the children of his people. Those that were in years would not be taught by him, though he had offered them his service; (xxxii. 8.) but he has hopes that the tender branches will be more easily bent, and that children and young people will be more tractable; and therefore he calls this a congregated counsel unto them; (p. 11.) “Come, ye children, that are now in your learning age, and are now to lay up a stock of knowledge which you must live upon all your days; ye children, that are foolish and ignorant, and need to be taught.” Perhaps he intends especially those children whose parents neglected to instruct and catechise them; and it is as great a piece of charity to put these children to school whose parents are not in a capacity to teach them, as to feed those children whose parents have not bread for them. Observe, 1. What he expects from them; “Hearken unto me, leave your play, lay by your toys, and hear what I have to say to you; not only give me the hearing, but observe and obey me.” 2. What he undertakes to teach them—The fear of the Lord, inclusive of all the duties of religion. David was a famous musician, a statesman, a soldier; but he does not say to the children, “I will teach you to play on the harp, or to handle the sword or spear, or to draw the bow; or, I will teach you the maxims of state-policy;” but, I will teach you the fear of the Lord, which is better than all the arts and sciences, better than all burnt-offerings and sacrifices. That is it which we should be solicitous both to learn ourselves, and to teach our children.

I. He supposes that we all aim to be happy; (v. 12.) What man is he that desireth life? that is, (as it follows,) not only to see many days, but to see good comfortable days; non est vivere, sed valere, vita—It is not our being, but our well-being, that is entitled to the name of life. It is asked, “Who wishes to live a long and pleasant life?” And it is easily answered, Who does not? Surely this must look further than time and this present world; for man’s life on earth, at best, consists of but few days, and those full of trouble. What man is he that would be eternally happy; that would see many days, as many as the days of heaven; that would see good in that world where all bliss is in perfection, without the least alloy; who would see that good before him now, by faith and hope, and enjoy it shortly? Who would? Alas, very few have that in their thoughts; most ask, Who will show us any good? Few ask, What shall we do to inherit eternal life? This question implies that there are some such.

II. He prescribes the true and only way to happiness, both in this world and that to come, v. 13, 14. Would we pass comfortably through the world, and out of the world, our constant care must be to keep a good conscience; and, in order to that, 1. We must learn to bridle our tongues, and keep it well; we shall do better if we say fewer amiss, to God’s honour, or our neighbour’s advantage; Keep thy tongue from evil speaking, lying and slandering. So great a way does this go in religion, that, if any offend not in word, the same is a perfect man; and so little a way does religion go without this, that it is said, respecting him who bridles not his tongue, His religion is vain. 2. We must be upright and sincere in every thing we say, and not falsify what we speak; for words must be the indications of our minds; our lips must not part from speaking guile either to God or man. 3. We must leave all our sins, and resolve we will have no more to do with them. We must depart from evil, from evil works and evil workers; from the sins others commit, and which we have formerly allowed ourselves in. 4. It is not enough not to do hurt in the world, but we must study to be useful, and live to some purpose. We must not only depart from evil, but we must do good; for good for ourselves, especially for our own souls, employing them well, furnishing them with a good treasure, and fitting them for another world; and, as we have ability and opportunity, we must do good to others also. 5. Because nothing is more contrary to that love which never fails, which is the sum-mary both of law and gospel, both of grace and glory, than strife and contention, which bring confusion and every evil work; we must seek peace and pursue it; we must show a peaceable disposition, that there be nothing to break the peace, and to make mischief. If peace seem to flee from us, we must pursue it; follow peace with all men, spare no pains, no expense, to preserve and recover peace, be willing to deny ourselves a great deal, both in honour and interest, for peace-sake. These excellent directions in the way to life and good, are transcribed into the New Testament, and made part of our gospel-duty. (1 Pet. iii. 11, 12.) Perhaps David, in warning us that we speak no guile, reflects upon his own sin, in changing his behaviour. They that truly repent of what they have done amiss, will warn others to take heed of doing likewise.

III. He enforces these directions by setting before us the happiness of the godly in the love and favour of God, and the miserable state of the wicked under his displeasure. Here are life and death, good and evil, the blessing and the curse, plain stated before us, that we may choose life, and live. See Isa. iii. 10, 11.

1. Woe to the wicked, it shall be ill with them, however they may bless themselves in their own way.

(1.) God is against them, and then they cannot but be miserable; sad is the case of that man who, by his sin, has made his Maker his Enemy, his Destroyer. The face of the Lord is against them that do evil, v. 16. Sometimes God is said to turn his face from them, (Jer. xviii. 17.) because they have forsaken him; here he is said to set his face against them, because they have fought against him; and, most certainly, God is able to out-face the most proud and daring sinners, and can frown them into hell.

(2.) Ruin is before them; this will follow, of course, if God be against them, for he is able both to bless and to curse. The hell of the living shall be no place for them or theirs. When God sets his face against them, he shall not only cut them off, but cut off the remembrance of them, when they are alive, shall bury them in obscurity, when they are dead, shall bury them in oblivion. He shall root out their posterity, by whom they would be remembered; he shall pour disgrace upon their achievements, which they gloried in, and for which they thought they should have been remembered. It is certain that there is no lasting honour but that which comes from God. (2.) There shall be a sting in their death; Evil shall slay the wicked, v. 21. Their death shall be miserable; so it will certainly be, though they die in a bed of down, or in the bed of honour. Death, to them, has a curse in it, and is the King of terrors; to them it is evil, only evil. It is very well observed by Dr. Hammond, that the evil here, which slays the wicked, is the same word, vix, the singular number, that is used, (v. 19.) for the affliction of the righteous, to intimate that godly people have many troubles; and yet they do them not hurt, but are made to work for good to them, for God will deliver them out of them all; whereas, wicked people have fewer troubles; fewer evils befall them, perhaps but one, and yet that one may prove their utter ruin. One trouble, with a curse in it, kills and slays, and does execute; but many, with a blessing in them, are harmless, nay, godly.

[3.] Desolation will be their everlasting portion; that are wicked themselves, often hate the righteous, and the righteous hate them; and then he leads them with enmity to them and their righteousness; but they shall be desolate, shall be condemned as guilty, and laid waste for ever, shall be for ever forsaken and abandoned of God, and all good angels, and men; and those that are so are desolate indeed.

2. Yet, say to the righteous, it shall be well with them; all good people are under God's special favour and protection. We are here assured of it under a great variety of instances and expressions.

(1.) God takes special notice of good people, and takes notice who have their eyes ever to him, and who make conscience of their duty to him; The eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous, (v. 15.) to direct and guide them, to protect and keep them. Parents that are very fond of a child, will not let it be out of their sight; none of God's children are ever out of his eye, but on them he looks with a singular complacency, as well as with a watchful and tender concern.

(2.) They are sure of an answer of peace to their prayers. All God's people are a praying people, and they cry in prayer, which denotes great importance; but is it to any purpose? Yes, (1.) God takes notice of what we say; (v. 17.) They cry, and the Lord hears them, and hears them so as to make it appear he has a regard to them. His ears are open to their prayers, to receive them impatiently, to receive them readily and with delight. Though he has been a God hearing prayer, ever since men began to call upon the name of the Lord, yet his ear is not heavy. There is no rhetoric, nothing charming, in a cry, yet God's ears are open to it, as the tender mother's to the cry of her sucking child, which another would take no notice of; The righteous cry, and the Lord heareth, v. 17. This intimates that it is the constant practice of good people, when they are in distress, to cry unto God, and it is their constant comfort that God hears them. (2.) He not only takes notice of what we say, but is ready to hear us for our relief; (v. 18.) He is nigh to them that are of a broken heart, and saveth them. Note, First, It is the character of the righteous, whose prayers God will hear, that they are of a broken heart and a contrite spirit, that is, humbled for sin, and emptied of self; they are low in their own eyes, and have a sense of their own merit and sufficiency, but in God only. Secondly, Those who are so have God nigh unto them, to comfort and support them, that the spirit may not be broken, more than is meet, lest it should fail before him. See Isa. lxvii. 15. Though God is high, and dwells on high, yet he is near to those, who, being of a contrite spirit, know how to value his favour, and will save them from sinking under their burdens; he is near them to good purpose.

(3.) They are taken under the special protection of the divine government; (v. 20.) He keepeth all his bones; not only his soul, but his body; not only his body in general, but every bone in it, not one of them is broken. He that has a broken heart, shall not have a broken bone; for David himself had found, that, when he had a contrite heart, the broken bones did not proceed. The men who were not broken, who would not expect to meet with any thing of Christ here, and yet this scripture is said to be fulfilled in him, (John xix. 36.) when the soldiers brake the legs of the two thieves that were crucified with him, but did not break his, they being under the protection of this promise, as well as of the type, even the paschal-lamb, a bone of him shall not be broken; the promises being made good to Christ, through him, are sure to all the seed. It does not follow but that a good man may have a broken bone; but, by the watchful providence of God concerning him, it is often wonderfully prevented, and the preservation of his bones is the effect of this promise; if he have a broken bone, sooner or later it shall be made whole, at furthest at the resurrection, when that which is sown in weakness, shall be raised in power.

4.) They are, and shall be, delivered out of their troubles. [1.] It is supposed that they have the support of friends in this world, perhaps a greater share than others. In the world they must have tribulation, that they may be conformed both to the will of God, and to the example of Christ; (v. 19.) Many are the afflictions of the righteous, witness David and his afflictions, xxxix. 1. There are those that hate them, (v. 21.) and they are continually aiming to do them a mischief; their God loves them as his own, and God is their refuge, and no mischief can come to them, but that, between the mercy of Heaven, and the malice of hell, the afflictions of the righteous must needs be many. [2.] God has engaged for their deliverance and salvation; He delivers them out of their troubles; (v. 17, 19.) he saves them, (v. 18.) so that, though they may fall into trouble, it shall not be their ruin. This promise of their deliverance is explained, v. 22. Whatever troubles befall them, Psalms, he will not let them fall into their heart's part.

The Lord redeemeth the soul of his servants from the power of the grave, (xlix. 15.) and from the sting of every affliction. He keeps them from sinning in their troubles, which is the only thing that would do them a mischief, and keeps them from despair, and from being put out of the possession of their own souls. Secondly, They shall not hinder their everlasting bliss; none of them that trust in him shall be desolate; they shall not be comfortless, they shall not be put out of their communion with God. No man is desolate, but he whom God has forsaken, nor is any man undone till he is in hell. Those that are God's faithful servants, that make it their care to please him, and their business to honour him, and, in doing so, trust him to protect and reward them, and, with good thoughts of him, refer themselves to him, have reason to be easy, whatever befalls them, for they shall be happy.

In singing these verses, let us be confirmed in the choice we have made of the ways of God; let us be quickened in his service, and greatly encouraged by the assurances he has given of the particular care he takes of all those that faithfully adhere to him.

PSALM XXXV.

David, in this psalm, appeals to the righteous Judge of heaven and earth, against his enemies, that hated and persecuted him. It is supposed that Saul and his party are the persons he means, for with them he had the greatest struggles. 1. He complains to God of the injuries they did him; they strove with him, fought against him, (v. 1.) persecuted him, (v. 9.) sought his ruin, (v. 4, 7.) accused him falsely, (v. 11.) abused him basely, (v. 15, 16.) and all his friends, (v. 20.) and triumphed over him, v. 21, 25, 26. 11. He pleads his own innocence, that he had a care there to preserve, (v. 7, 19.) but, on the contrary, had studied to oblige them, v. 12.-14. 11. He prays to God to protect and deliver him; and appear for him; (v. 1, 2.) to comfort him; (v. 4.) to encourage him; and rescue him, v. 7, 22. to plead his cause; (v. 23, 24.) to defeat all the designs of his enemies against him; (v. 3, 4.) to disappoint their expectations of his fall; (v. 19, 25, 26.) and, lastly, to confound them, and to triumph over them, v. 4. 1. He prophesies the destruction of his persecutors, v. 4, 6, 8. V. He promises himself that he shall yet see better days; (v. 9, 10.) and promises God that he will then attend him with his praises; 15. 19. 20. tells this psalm, and praying over it, we must take heed of applying it to any little peevish quarrels and enmities of our own, and of expressing by it any uncharitable revengeful resentment of injuries done to us; for Christ has taught us to forgive our enemies, and not to pray for them, but to pray for them, as he did; but, 1. We may comfort ourselves with the testimony of our conscience, confessing our own weakness, and concerning our innocence, with reference to those that are any way injurious to us, and with hopes that God will, in his own way, and time, right us, and, in the mean time, support us. 2. We may offer ourselves and our souls to the public enemies of Christ, and his kingdom, typified by David and his kingdom, to resent the indignities done to Christ's honour, to pray to God to plead the just and injured cause of his servants and our goodness, and to believe that God will, in due time, glorify his own name in the ruin of all the irreconcilable enemies of his church, that will not repent, to give him glory.

A Psalm of David.

1. Plead my cause, O Lord, with them that strive with me: fight against them that fight against me. 2. Take hold of shield and buckler, and stand up for my help.

3. Draw out also the spear, and stop the way against them that persecute me: say unto my soul, I am thy salvation.

4. Let them be confounded and put to shame that seek after my soul: let them be turned back and brought to confusion that devise my hurt. 5. Let them be as chaff before the wind: and let the angel of the Lord chase them. 6. Let their way be dark and slippery: and let the angel of the Lord persecute them. 7. For without cause have they hid for me their net in a pit, without cause they have dug for my soul. 8. Let destruction come upon him at unawares; and let his net that he hath laid catch himself into that very destruction let him fall. 9. And my soul shall be joyful in the Lord: it shall rejoice in his salvation. 10. All my bones shall say, Lord, who is like unto thee, who deliverest the poor from him that is too strong for him, yea, the poor and the needy from him that spoileth him?

In these verses, we have: 1. David's representation of his case to God, setting forth the restless rage and malice of his persecutors; he was God's servant, expressly appointed by him to be what he was, followed his guidance, and aimed at his glory in the way of duty, had lived (as St. Paul speaks) in all good conscience before God unto this day; and yet there were those that strove with him, that did their utmost to oppose his advancement, and made all the interest they could against him; they fought against him, (v. 1.) not only undermined him closely and secretly, but openly avowed their opposition to him, and set themselves to do him all the mischief they could. They persecuted him with an unwearied enmity, sought after his soul, (v. 4.) that is, his life, no less would satisfy their bloody minds; they aimed to disquiet his spirit, and put that into disorder; nor was it a sudden passion against him that they harboured, but invertebrate malice; they devised his hurt, laid their heads together, and set their wits on work, not only to do him a mischief, but to find out ways and means to ruin him. They treated him, who was the greatest blessing of his country, as if he had been the curse and plague of it; they hunted him as a dangerous beast of prey; they digged a pit for him, and laid a net in it, that they might have him at their mercy, v. 7. They took a great deal of pains in persecuting him; for they digged a pit, (vii. 13.) and very close and crafty they were in carrying on their designs; the old serpent took them subtly, they hid their net from David and his friends; but in vain, for they could not hide it from God, who was last of all, and was quite as much for them. His enemy, especially Saul, was too strong for him, (v. 10.) for he had the army at his command, and assumed to himself the sole power of making laws and giving judgment, attainted and condemned whom he pleased, carried not a sceptre, but a javelin, in his hand, to cast at any man that stood in his way; such was the manner of the king, and all about him were compelled to do as he bade them, right or wrong. The king's word was a law, and every thing must be done according to his pleasure. He had a high hand; he has fields, and vineyards, and pre- ferments, at his disposal, 1 Sam. xxii. 7. But David is poor and needy, has nothing to make friends with, and therefore has none to take his part, but men (as we say) of broken fortunes; (1 Sam. xxii. 2.) and therefore no marvel that Saul spoiled him of what little he had got, and the interest he had made. If the kings of the earth set themselves against the Lord, and his anointed, what shall we then? (Ps. lvi. 5.) Note. It is no new thing for the most righteous men, and the most righteous cause, to meet with many mighty and malicious enemies; Christ himself is driven with, and fought against, and war made upon the holy seed; and we are not to marvel at the matter, it is a fruit of the old enmity in the seed of the serpent, against the seed of the woman.

II. His appeal to God concerning his integrity, and the justice of his cause. His enemies were not able to rebuke, much less to accuse, him, he might have appealed to his prince, as St. Paul did to Caesar; but when his prince wronged him, he appealed to his God, who is Prince and Judge of the kings of the earth; Plead my cause, O Lord, v. 1. Note. A righteous cause may, with the greatest satisfaction imaginable, be laid before a righteous God, and referred to him to give judgment upon it; for he perfectly knows the merits of it, holds the balance exactly even, and with him there is no partiality. We are ignorant how the causes were, without cause, his enemies; and that they had, without cause, digged pits for him, v. 7. Note. It will be a comfort to us, when men do us wrong, if our consciences can witness for us, that we have never done them any. It was so to St. Paul; (Acts xxv. 10.) To the Jew I have done no wrong. We are apt to justify our unaeasiness at the injuries men do us by this, That we never gave them any cause to use us so; whereas this should, more than any thing, make us easy, for then we may the more confidently expect that God will plead our cause.

III. His prayer to God to manifest himself both for him, and to him, in this trial. 1. For him; he prays that God would fight against his enemies, so as to disable them to hurt him, and defeat their designs against him; (v. 1.) that he would take hold of shield and buckler, for the Lord is a Man of war, (Exod. xv. 3.) and that he would stand up for his help, (v. 2.) for he had few that would stand up for him, and if he had ever so many, they would stand him in no stead without God: he prays that God would stop their way, that they might not overtake him when he fled from them: this prayer we may put up against our persecutors, that God would restrain them, and stop their way. 2. To him; say unto my soul, I am thy salvation; let me have inward comfort under all these outward troubles, to support my soul which they strike at. Let God be my salvation, not only my Saviour out of my present troubles, but my everlasting Bliss; let me have that salvation not only which he is the Author of, but which consists in his favour. And let me know it; let me have the comfortable assurance of it in my own breast. If God, by his Spirit, witness to our spirits, that he is our salvation, we have enough, we need desire no more, to make us happy; and this is a powerful support when men persecute us. If God be our Friend, no matter who is our enemy.

IV. His prospect of the destruction of his enemies, which he prays for, not in malice or revenge; we find how patiently he bore Shimei’s curses, &c. Let him curse, for the Lord has bidden him; and we cannot suppose that he, that was so meek in his conversation, should give vent to any intertemperate heat or passion in his devotion; but, by the spirit of prophecy, he foretells the just judgments of God, that would come upon them for their great wickednesses, their malice, cruelty, and perfidiousness, and especially their enmity to the counsels of God, the interests of religion, and that reformation which they knew David, if ever he had power in his hand, would be an instrument of. They seemed to be hardened in their sins, and to be of the number of those who have sinned unto death, and are not to be prayed for, Jer. vii. 16.—xi. 14.—xiv. 11. 1 John v. 18. As for Saul himself, David, it is probable he would have been glad to see it; he was an enemy to the great Samuel; and this would have enabled him to give his last freedom to that man, who had been his guide, and on whom he could have inflicted a just and necessary revenge; and this is the same thing as that forbidden Samuel to mourn for him, 1 Sam. xvi. 1. And these predictions look further, and read the doom of the enemies of Christ and his kingdom, as appears by comparing Rom. xi. 9, 10.

He here prays, 1. Against his many enemies; (v. 4-6.) Let them be confounded, &c. Or, as Dr. Hammond reads it, They shall be confounded, they shall be turned back. This may be taken as a prayer for general deliverance: v. 4. For they make no shame to their sins, and turn back from him; or, if they were not brought to repentance, that they might be defeated and disappointed in their designs against him, and so put to shame. But though they should, in some degree, prevail, yet he foresees that it would be to their own ruin at last; they shall be as chaff before the wind, so unable will wicked men be to stand before the judgments of God, and so certainly will they be driven away from him. It is the portion of the carcases of jerry, darkness and slipperness; (so the margin reads it;) the way of sinners is so, for they walk in darkness, and in continual danger of falling into sin, into hell; and it will prove so at last, for their foot shall slide in due time, Deut. xxxii. 35. But this is not the worst of it; even chaff before the wind, may perhaps be stopped, and find a place of rest, and though the way be dark and slippery, it is possible that a man may keep his footing; but it is here foretold that the angel of the Lord shall chase them, (v. 5.) so that they shall find no rest; shall persecute them, (v. 6.) so that they cannot possibly escape the pit of destruction. As God’s angels encamp about them that fear him, so they encamp against them that fight against him. They are the ministers of his justice, as well as of his mercy. Those that make God their Enemy make all the holy angels their enemies 2. He prays against his one mighty enemy; (v. 8.) Let destruction come upon him. It is probable that he means Saul, who laid snares for him, and aimed at his destruction. David vowed that his hand should not be upon him, he would not be judge in his own cause; but, at the same time, he foretold that the Lord would smite him, (1 Sam. xxvi. 10.) and here, that the net he had laid he should catch himself, and into that very destruction he should fall: which was remarkably fulfilled in the ruin of Saul, for he had laid a plot to make David fall by the hand of the Philistines, (1 Sam. xviii. 25.) that was the net which he hid.
tor him, under pretense of doing him honour, and in that very net was he himself taken, for he fell by the hand of the Philistines, when his day came to fall.

V. His prospect of his own deliverance, which, with committed his cause to God, he did not doubt of, v. 9, 10. 1. He hoped that he should have the comfort of it; "My soul shall be joyful, not in mine own ease and safety, but in the Lord, and in his favour, in his promises, and in his salvation, according to the promise." Joy in God, and in his salvation, is the only true solid satisfying joy. They whose souls are sorrowful in the Lord, who sow in tears, and sorrow after a godly sort, need not question but that in due time their souls shall be joyful in the Lord, for gladness is sown for them, and they shall at last enter into the joy of their Lord.

2. He promised that then God should have the glory of it; (v. 10.) All my sins shall be, Lord, who is like unto thee? (1.) He will praise God with the whole man, with all that is with him, and with all the strength and vigour of his soul, intimated by his bones, which are within the body, and are the strength of it. (2.) He will praise him as one of peerless and unparalleled perfection; we cannot express how great and good God is, and therefore must praise him by acknowledging him to be a none-such; Lord, who is like unto thee? No such praise, no such thanksgiving, can be brought to a triumphant tyranny. The formation of our bones so wonderfully, so curiously, (Excl. xi. 5. Ps. cxxxix. 16.) the serviceableness of our bones, and the preservation of them, and especially the life which, at the resurrection, shall be breathed upon the dry bones, and make them flourish as an herb, oblige every bone in our bodies, if it could speak, to say, Lord, who is like unto thee? and willingly to undergo any services or sufferings for him.

11. False witnesses did rise up: they laid to my charge things that I knew not. 12. They rewarded me evil for good, to the spoiling of my soul. 13. But as for me, when they were sick, my clothing was sackcloth: I humbled my soul with fasting, and my prayer returned unto mine own bosom. 14. I behaved myself as though I had been my friend or brother: I bowed down heavily, as one that mourneth for his mother. 15. But in mine adversity they rejoiced, and gathered themselves together; yea, the objects gathered themselves together against me, and I knew it not; they did tear me, and ceased not. 16. With hypocritical mockers in feasts, they gnashed upon me with their teeth.

Two very wicked things David here lays to the charge of his enemies, to make good his appeal to God against them; perjury and ingratitude.

I. Perjury, v. 11. When Saul would have David attainted of treason, in order to his being outlawed, perhaps he did it with the formalities of a legal prosecution, produced witnesses which are some treasonable words or overt-acts against him, and he being not present to clear himself, (or if he hadit had been all one,) Saul adjudged him a traitor; this he complains of here as the highest piece of injustice imaginable; False witnesses did rise up, who would swear any thing; they laid to my charge things that I knew not, nor ever thought of. See how much the honours, estates, liberties, and lives, even of the best men, lie at the mercy of the worst, against whose false outcry innocence itself is no fence; and what reason was he to acknowledge, with thankfulness, the hold God has of the consciences even of bad men, to which it is owing, that there is not more mischief done that way than is. This instance of the wrong done to David was typical, and had its accomplishment in the Son of David against whom false witnesses did arise, Matt. xxvi. 60. If we be at any time charged with what we are innocent of, let us not think it strange, as though it came under the hand of Satan to persecute him and his friends, who are the representatives of the prophets, even the great Prophet.

II. Ingratitude. Call a man ungrateful, and you can call him no worse; this was the character of David's enemies; (v. 12.) They rewarded me evil for good. A great deal of good service he had done to his king, witness his harp, witness Goliath's sword, witness the foreskins of the Philistines; and yet his king vowed his death, and he can no longer dwell in the land of his country. This is to the scoffing of his soul; this base unkind usage robs him of his comfort, and cuts him to the heart, more than any thing else.

Nay, he had not only deserved well of the public, but of those particular persons that were now most bitter against him. Probably, it was then well known whom he meant, it may be Saul himself for one, whom he was sent for to attend upon, when he was melancholy and ill, and to whom he was serious in his importunings to remove away the evil spirit, not with his harp, but with his prayer and prayers. All his particular and necessary, in the exercise of his spiritual powers, about his conversation with his Father, and the manifold gratification of his heart, he had a type, a figure, a shadow, in the history of David. But in the case of Saul, who was the most obnoxious to him, he had shown much respect and love. Herein he was a type of Christ, to whom this wicked world was very ungrateful; (John x. 32.) Many good works have I showed you from my Father; for which of those do you stone me? David here shows,

1. He was a tender heart, and with what a cordial affection, he had carried it toward them in their afflictions, (v. 13, 14.) They were sick, Note, Even the palaces and courts of princes are not exempt from the jurisdiction of death, and the visitation of sickness. Now, when these people were sick, (1.) David mourned for them, and sympathized with them in their grief. They were not related to him, he was under no obligations to them, he would lose nothing by their death, but perhaps be a gainer by their death; and yet he was moved with compassion as he beheld his nearest relations, purely from a principle of compasion and humanity. David was a man of war, and of a bold stout spirit; yet was he thus susceptible of the impressions of sympathy, forgot the bravery of the hero, and seemed wholly made up of love and pity; it was a rare composition of hardness and tenderness, courage and compassion, in the same breast. Observe, He took it as for a brother or mother, which intimates that it is our duty, and well becomes us, to lay to heart the sickness, and sorrow, and death, of our near relations. Those that do not, are justly stigmatized as without natural affection.

(2.) He prayed for them; he discovered not only the tender affection of a man, but the pious affection of a saint. He was concerned for their precious souls, and since he could not otherwise be helpful to them, he helped them in his prayers to God for mercy and grace; and the prayers of a saint, that an interest in heaven, were of more value than perhaps they knew and considered. With his prayers he joined humiliation and self-affliction; both in his diet, he fasted, at least, from pleasant bread, and in his dress, he clothed himself with sackcloth, thus expressing his grief, not only for their affliction, but for their sin; for this was the guise and practice of a penitent. We ought to mourn for the sins of those that do not mourn for themselves. His fasting also put an edge upon his praying, and was an expression of the fervour of it; it was so intent in his devotions, that he had no appetite to meat, nor would allow himself time for eating; "My prayer returned into mine own bosom; I had the comfort of having done my duty, and of having approved my-selves a loving neighbour, though I could not thereby win upon them, nor make them my friends?" We shall not lose by the good offices we have done to any, how ungrateful soever they are, for our re-jicing will be this, the testimony of our conscience.
2. He was base and insolently, and with what a brutish vanity, and worse than basely, they had carried it toward him; (v. 15, 16.) In mine adversity, they rejoiced. When he fell under the frowns of Saul, was banished the court, and persecuted as a criminal, they were pleased, were glad at his calamities, and got together in their drunken clubs, to make themselves and one another merry with the disgrace of this great favour. Well might he call them objects, for nothing could be more vile and sordid, than to triumph in the fall of a man of such unstained honour, and consummate virtue. But this was not all; (1.) They tore him, rent his good name without mercy, said all the ill they could of him, and fastened upon him all the reproach their cursed wit and malice could reach to. (2.) They grasped upon him with their teeth; they never spoke of him but with the greatest indignation imaginable, as those that would have eaten him up, if they could. David was the fool in the play, and his hisappearant all the talk-talk of the hypocritical mockers at feasts, it was the song of the drunkards, the comedians, who may fitly be called hypocritical mockers, (for what does a hypocrite signify, but a stage-player?) and whose comedies, it is likely, were acted at feasts and balls, chose David for their subject, bantered and abused him, while the auditi-ory, in token of their agreement with the plot, hummed, and 'grasped upon him with their teeth,' which has often been the hard fate of the best of men.
The apostles were made a spectacle to the world.
David was looked upon with ill-will, for no other reason, than because he was caressed by the people. It is a vexation of spirit which attends even a right work, that for this a man is envied of his neighbour, Eccl. iv. 4. And who can stand before envy? Prov. xxvii. 4.

17. LORD, how long wilt thou look on? rescue my soul from their destructions, my darling from the lions. 18. I will give thee thanks in the great congregation: I will praise thee among much people. 19. Let not them that are mine enemies wrongfully rejoice over me; neither let them wink with the eye that hate me without a cause. 20.
For they speak not peace; but they devise deceitful matters against them that are quiet in the land. 21. Yea, they opened their mouth wide against me, and said, Aha, aha!
our eye hath seen it. 22. This thou hast seen, O LORD; keep not silence: O LORD, be not far from me. 23. Stir up thyself, and awake to my judgment, even unto my cause, my God and my Lord. 24. Judge me, O LORD my God, according to thy righteousness;
and let them not rejoice over me. 25.
Let them not say in their hearts, Ah, so would we have it; let them not say, We have swallowed him up. 26. Let them be ashamed, and brought to confusion togeth-ether, that rejoice at my hurt: let them be clothed with shame and dishonour that magnify themselves against me. 27. Let them shout for joy, and be glad, that favour my righteous cause: yea, let them say continuantly, Let the LORD be magnified, which hath pleasure in the prosperity of his servant. 28. And my tongue shall speak of thy righteousness and of thy praise, all the day long.

In these verses, as before,
1. David describes the great injustice, malice, and insolence, of his persecutors, pleading this with God, as a plea to him, as a plea to his friends against them, and appear against them. I. They were very unrighteous, they were his enemies wrongfully, for he never gave them any provocation; they hated him without a cause; nay, for that for which they ought rather to have loved and honoured him. This is quoted with application to Christ, and is said to be fulfilled in him; (John xv. 23.) They hated me without a cause. 2. They were very rude; they had not fixed in their hearts to show him common civility; they spake not peace to him, for they had ever the good manners to give him the time of the day; like Joseph's brethren, that could not speak peaceably to him, Gen. xxxvii. 4. 3. They were very proud and scornful; (v. 21.) They opened their mouth wide against me; they shouted and huzzaed when they saw his fall; they bawled after him, when he was forced to quit the court, "Aha, aha, this is the day we longed to see." 4. They were very malicious, and said, "Let him fall.
They devised deceitful matters, to trepan and ruin them that are quiet in the land. Note, (1.) It is the character of the godly in the land, that they are the quiet in the land; that they live in all dutiful submission to government and governors, in the Lord, and endeavour, as much as in them lies, to live peaceably with all men, however they have been misrepresented as enemies to Caesar, and hurtful to kings and province. I am for peace, cxx. 7. (2.)
Though the people or God are, and study to be, a quiet people, yet it has been the common practice of their enemies to devise deceitful matters against them. All the hellish arts of malice and falsehood are made use of to render them odious or despicaable, their words and actions misconstrued, even that which they abhor fathered upon them, laws made to ensnare them. (Dan. vi. 4, &c.) and all to ruin them and root them out. They that hated David, thought so much of Haman, to lay hands on him alone, that they contrived to involve all the religious people of the land in the same ruin with him.
2. He appeals to God against them, the God to whom vengeance belongs; appeals to his knowledge; (v. 22.) This thou hast seen. They had falsely accused him, but God, who knows all things, knew that he did not falsely accuse them, nor make them worse than really they were. They carried on their plots against him with great degree of secrecy;
(v. 15.) "I knew it not, till long after, when they themselves gloried in it; but thine eye was upon them in their close cabals, and thou art a Witness of all they have said and done against me and thy people." He appeals to God's justice; Awake to my judgment, even to my cause, and let it have a hearing at thy bar; (v. 23) "Judge me, O Lord my God; pass sentence upon this appeal, according to the righteousness of thy nature and government." See this explained by Solomon; (1 Kings viii. 31, 32) and thou art appeased, to clear in heaven, and judge, by condemning the wicked, and justifying the righteous.

III. He prays earnestly to God, to appear graciously for him and his friends against his and their enemies, that by his providence the struggle might issue to the honour and comfort of David, and to the conviction and confusion of his persecutors.

1. He prays that God would act for him, and not stand by as a by-stander; (v. 17) "Lord, trampling with thou took on? How long wilt thou connive at the wickedness of the wicked? Rescue my soul from the destructions they are plotting against it; rescue my darling, my only one from the lions. My soul is my only one, and therefore the greater is the shame if I neglect it, and the greater the loss if I lose it; it is my only one, and therefore ought to be my darling, ought to be carefully protected and provided for. It is my soul that is in danger. Lord, remember me in particular; I am one of the Father of spirits, therefore claim thine own; it is thine, save it! Lord, keep not silence, as if thou didst consent to what is done against me! Lord, be not far from me," (v. 22) as if I were a stranger that thou art not concerned for; let not me be belied afar off, as the proud are."

2. He prays that his enemies might not have cause to rejoice; (v. 19) "Let them not rejoice over me, and again; (v. 24) not so much because it would be a mortification to him to be trampled upon by the objects, but because it would turn to the dishonour of God, and the reproach of his confidence in God; it would harden the hearts of his enemies in their wickedness, and confirm them in their enmity to him, and would be a great discouragement to all the pious Jews that were friends to his righteous cause. He prays that he might never be in such imminent danger, that they should say in their hearts, 'They have got him,' (v. 25)" for more that he might not be reduced to such extremity, that they should say, "We have swallowed him up;" for then they will reflect upon God himself. But, on the contrary, that they might be ashamed and brought to confusion together, (v. 26) as before, (v. 4) he desires his innocency might be so cleared, that they might be ashamed of the calumnies with which they had loaded him, that his interest might be so confirmed, that they might be ashamed of their designs against him, and their expectations of his ruin, that they might either be brought to that shame which would be a step towards their reformation, or that they might be their portion, which would be their everlasting misery.

3. He prays that his friends might have cause to rejoice, and give glory to God; (v. 27) notwithstanding the arts that were used to blacken David, and many false reports, and to frighten people from owning him, there were some that favoured his righteous cause, that knew he was wronged, and bore a good affection to him; and he prays for them; (1.) That they might rejoice with him in his joys. It is a great pleasure to all that are good, to see an honest man, and an honest cause, prevail and prosper; and those that heartily espouse the interests of God's people, and are willing to take their lot with them, they will rejoice in them, or they shall be trampled upon, shall, in due time, shunt for joy and be glad, for the righteous cause will, at length, be a victorious cause. (2.) That they might join with him in his praises, let them say continually, The Lord be magnified, by us and others, who hath pleasure in the prosperity of his servant. Note, [1.] The great God has pleasure in the prosperity of good people, not only of his family, the church in general, but of every particular servant in his family; he has pleasure in the prosperity both of their temporal and of their spiritual affairs, and delights not in their griefs; for he does not afflict willingly; and we ought therefore to have pleasure in their prosperity, and not to envy it. [2.] When God, in his providence, shows his good-will to the prosperity of his servants, and the pleasure he takes in it, we ought to acknowledge it, with thankfulness, to his praise, and to say, The Lord be magnified.

Lastly, The mercy he hoped to win by prayer, he promises to wear with praise; "I will give thee thanks, as the Author of my deliverance; (v. 18) and *my tongue shall speak of thy righteousness, the justice of thy judgments, and the equity of all thy dispensations," and this, 1. Publicly, as one that took a pleasure in owning his obligations to God; so far was he from being ashamed of them, he will do in the great congregation, and among many people, that God might be honoured, and many edified. 2. Constantly; he will speak God's praise every day, (so it may be read,) and all the day long, for it is a subject that will never be exhausted, no not by the endless praises of saints and angels.

PSALM XXXVI.

It is uncertain when, and upon what occasion, David penned this psalm, probably when he was struck at, either by Saul, or by Absalom; for in it he complains of the madness of his enemies against him, but triumphs in the goodness of God to him. We are here led to consider, and it will do us good to consider seriously, I. The sinfulness of sin, and how mischievous it is; v. 1-4. II. The goodness of God, and how gracious he is; v. 5, 6, 7. To his own creatures in general, v. 5, 6, 2. To his own people in a special manner, v. 7-9. By this, the psalmist is encouraged to pray for all the saints, (v. 10,) for himself in particular, and his own preservation, (v. 11,) and to triumph in the certain fall of his enemies, v. 12. If, in singing this psalm, our hearts be duly affected with the hatred of sin, and satisfaction in God's loving kindness, we sing it with grace and understanding.

To the chief musician. A Psalm of David the servant of the Lord.

1. THE transgression of the wicked saith within my heart, that there is no fear of God before his eyes. 2. For he flatteth himself in his own eyes, until his iniquity be found to be hateful. 3. The words of his mouth are iniquity and deceit; he hath left off to be wise, and to do good. 4. He deviseth mischief upon his bed; he setbeth himself in a way that is not good; he abhorreth not evil.

David, in the title of this psalm, is styled the servant of the Lord; why in this, and not in any other, except in xviii, title, no reason can be given; but so he was, not only as every good man is God's servant, but as a king, as a prophet, as one employed in serving the interests of God's kingdom among men, more immediately, and more eminently, than any other in his day. He glories in it, cxvi. 16. It is no disparagement, but an honour, to the greatest of men, to be the servants of the great God; it is the highest preferment a man is capable of in this world.

David, in these verses, describes the wickedness of the wicked, whether he means his persecutors in particular or all notorious gross sinners, in gener al, is not certain. But we have here sin in its causes, and sin in its colours, in its root, and in its branches.

I. Here is the root of bitterness, from which all the wickedness of the wicked comes. It takes rise, 1. From their contempt of God, and the want of a due regard to him; (v. 1.) "The transgression of the wicked, (as it is described afterward, v. 3, 4.) saith within my heart, makes me to conclude within myself, that there is no fear of God before his eyes; for if there were, he would not talk and act so extravagantly as he does; he would not, he durst not, break the laws of God, and violate his covenants with him, if he had any awe of his majesty, or dread of his wrath." Filly therefore it is brought into the form of indictments by our law, that the criminal, not having the fear of God before his eyes, did so and so.

The wicked did not openly renounce the fear of God, but their transgressions which it secretly into the minds of all those that knew any thing of the nature of piety and impiety. David concluding, concerning those who lived at large, that they lived without God in the world.

2. From their conceit of themselves, and a cheat they wilfully put upon their own souls; (v. 2.) He flattereth himself in his own eyes; while he goes on in sin, he thinks he does wisely and well for himself, and that he does not offend against the law, and danger of his wicked practices; he calls evil good, and good evil: his licentiousness he pretends to be but his just liberty; his fraud passes for his prudence and policy: and his persecuting the people of God, he suggests to himself, is a piece of necessary justice. If his own conscience threaten him for what he does, he says, God will not require it, I shall have peace though I go on. Note, Sin- ners are self-destroyers, by being self-flatterers; they could not deceive others, if they did not deceive themselves. But will the cheat last always? No, the day is coming, when the sinner will be undeceived, when his iniquity shall be found to be hateful. Iniquity is a hateful thing; it is that abominable thing which the Lord hates, and which his pure and jealous eye cannot endure to look upon. It is hurtful to the sinner himself, and therefore ought to be hateful; but it is not so; he makes less of it than he should, for the cause of the secular profit, and sensual pleasure, which may attend it; yet the meat in his bowels will be turned, it will be the gall of asps; (Job xxi, 13, 14.) when their consciences are convinced, and sin appears in its true colours, and makes them a terror to themselves, when the cup of trembling is put into their hands, and they are made to drink the dregs of it, then their iniquity will be found hateful, and their self-flattery their unseizable folly, and an aggravation of their condemnation.

II. Here are the cursed branches which spring from this root of bitterness. The sinner defies God, and even defies himself, and then what can be expected, but that he should go all to naught? These two were the first inlets of sin. Men do not fear God, and therefore they flatter themselves; and this,

1. They make no conscience of what they say, true or false, right or wrong; (v. 3.) The words of his mouth are iniquity and deceit; contrived to do wrong, and yet to cover it with specious and plausible pretences. It is no marvel, if those that deceive themselves contrive how to deceive all mankind; for whom will they be true to that are false to their own souls?

2. What little good there has been in them is gone; the sparks of virtue extinguished, their convictions baffled, their good beginnings come to nothing; they have left off to be wise, and to do good. They seemed to have been under the direction of wisdom, and the government of religion, but they have broken these bonds in sunder; they have shaken off their religion, and therewith their wisdom. Note, They that leave off to do good, leave off to be wise.

3. Having left off to do good, they contrive to do hurt, and to be vextious to those about them that are good, and do good; (v. 4.) He devises mischief with his own heart; Note, (1.) On their own imagination; when men leave off doing good, they go off praying, leave off their attendance on God's ordinances, and their duty to him, the Devil easily makes them his agents, his instruments to draw those that will be drawn, into sin, and with respect to those that will not, to draw them into trouble. Those that leave off to do good, begin to do evil; the Devil, being an apostate from his innocency, soon became a tempter to Eve, and a persecutor of the patriarchs. Abel. (2.) It is bad to do mischief, but it is worse to devise it, to do it deliberately and with resolution, to set the wits a-work to contrive to do it most effectually, to do it with plot and management; with the subtlety, as well as the malice, of the old serpent; to devise it upon the bed, where we should be meditating upon God and his word, Mic. ii. 1. This argues the sinner's heart fully set in him to do evil.

4. Having plunged into the way of sin, that way that is not good, that has good neither in it, nor at the end of it, they persist, and resolve to persevere, in that way. He sets himself to execute the mischief he has devised, and nothing shall be withholden from him, which he has purposed to do, though it be ever so contrary both to his duty and to his true interest. If sinners did not steel their hearts, and brazen their faces, with obstinacy and impudence, they could not go on in their evil ways, in such a direct opposition to all that is just and good.

5. Doing evil themselves, they have no dislike at all of it in others. He abhors not evil, but, on the contrary, takes pleasure in it, and is glad to see others as bad as himself. Or, this may bespeak his impenitency in sin. They that have done evil, if God give them repentance, abhor the evil they have done, and themselves because of it; it is bitter in the reflection, however sweet it was in the commission. Those hardened sinners have such seared stupified consciences, that they never reflect upon their sins afterward with any regret or remorse, but stand to what they have done, as if they could justify it before God himself.

Some think that David, in all this, particularly means Saul, who had cast off the fear of God, and left off all goodness; who pretended kindness to him, when he gave him his daughter to wife, but, at the same time, was devising mischief against him. But we are under no necessity of limiting ourselves so in the exposition of it; there are too many among us to whom the description applies, which is to be greatly lamented.

5. Thy mercy, O Lord, is in the heavens, and thy faithfulness reacheth unto the clouds. 6. Thy righteousness is like the great mountains; thy judgments are a great deep: O Lord, thou preservest man and beast. 7. How excellent is thy loving-kindness, O God! therefore the children of men put their trust under the shadow of thy wings. 8. They shall be abundantly satisfied with the fatness of thy house; and thou shalt make them drink of the river of thy pleasures. 9. For with thee is the fountain of life: in thy light shall we see light.
10. O continue thy loving-kindness unto them that know thee, and thy righteousness to the upright in heart. 11. Let not the foot of pride come against me, and let not the hand of the wicked remove me. 12. There are the workers of iniquity fallen: they are cast down, and shall not be able to rise.

David, having looked round with grief upon the wickedness of the wicked, here looks up with comfort upon the goodness of God; a subject as delightful as the former was distasteful, and very proper to be set in the balance against it. Observe,

1. His meditations upon the grace of God. He sees the world polluted, himself endangered, and God dishonored, by the transgressions of the wicked; but, of a sudden, he turns his eye, and heart, and speech to God; How ever it be, yet thou art good. He here acknowledges,

1. The transcendent perfections of the Divine Nature. Among men, we have often reason to complain, There is no truth or mercy, (Hos. iv. 1.) no judgment nor justice, Isa. v. 7. But all these may be found in God, without the least alloy. Wherever we may err, or amiss, in the world, we are sure there is nothing missing, nothing amiss, in him who governs it.

(1.) He is a God of inexhaustible goodness; Thy mercy, O Lord, is in the heavens. If men shut up the bowels of their compassions, yet, with God, at the throne of his grace, we shall find mercy. When men are devising mischief against us, God's thoughts concerning us, if we cleave closely to him, are thoughts of good. On earth, we meet with little content, but a great deal of discontent and unemploy ment; but in the heavens, where the mercy of God reigns in perfection, and to eternity, there is all satisfaction; there, therefore, if we would be easy, let us have our conversation, and there let us long to be. How bad soever the world is, let us never think the worse of God, or of his government; but, from the abundance of wickedness that is among men, let us take occasion, instead of reflecting upon God's pun ishments, to magnify his mercy. Those who see that he bears so much with those that so impudently provoke him; nay, and causes his sun to shine, and his rain to fall, upon them. If God's mercy were not in the heavens, infinitely above the mercies of any creature, he would, long ere this, have drowned the world again. See Isa. I. 8. 9. Hos. xi. 9.

(2.) He is a God of inviolable truth; Thy faith fulness reaches unto the clouds. Though God suffers wicked people to do a great deal of mischief, yet he is, and will be, faithful to his threatenings against sin, and there will come a day when he will reckon with them; he is faithful also to his covenant with his people, which cannot be broken, not one jot or tittle of the promises of it defeated by all the malice of earth and hell. This is matter of great comfort to all good people, that, though men are false, God is faithful; men speak vanity, but the words of the Lord are pure words. God's faith fulness reaches so high, that it does not change with the weather, as men's does, for it reaches to the skies, so it should be read, (as some think,) above the clouds, and all the changes of the lower region.

(3.) He is a God of incontestable justice and equity; Thy righteousness is like the great mountains, so immovable and inflexible itself, and so confirmed by God's thoughts, that no power on earth or in hell can prevail against it; so much truth is more certain or more plain than that, This the Lord is righteous in all his ways, and that he never did, nor ever will, do any wrong to any of his creatures. Even when clouds and darkness are round about him, yet judgment and justice are the inhabitants of his throne, xxvii. 2.

(4.) He is a God of unsearchable wisdom and design; Thy judgments are a great deep, not to be fathomed with the line and plummet of any finite understanding. As his power is sovereign, which he owes not any account of to us, so his method is singular and mysterious, which cannot be accounted for by us. How ever it is, in the sea, world; for we have his faith in the great waters. We know that he does all wisely and well, but what he does we know not now, it is time enough to know hereafter.

2. The extensive care and beneficence of the Divine Providence; Thou preservest man and beast, not only protectest them from mischief, but supplyest with that which is needful for the support of life. The beasts, though not capable of knowing and comprehending graciously provided for; their eyes wait on him, and he giveth them their meat in due season. Let us not wonder that God gives food to bad men, for he feeds the brute-creatures; and let us not fear but that he will provide well for good men; he that feeds the young lions will not starve his own children.

3. The peculiar favour of God to the saints. Observe, (1.) Their character; (v. 7.) they are such as are able, by the excellency of God's loving-kindness, to find their trust under the shadow of his wings. [1.] God's loving-kindness is precious to them; they relish it, they taste a transcendent sweetness in it, they admire God's beauty and benignity above any thing in this world, nothing so amiable, so desirable. Those know not God, that do not admire his loving-kindness; and those know not themselves that do not earnestly covet it. [2.] They therefore repose an entire confidence in him; for they have acknowledged themselves unworthy of his protection, and then think themselves equal to find themselves easy, as the chickens under the wings of the hen, Matth. xxiii. 37. It was the character of proselytes, that they came to trust under the wings of the God of Israel; (Ruth ii. 12.) and what more proper to gather proselytes than the excellency of his loving-kindness? What more powerful to engage our complacency to him and on him? Those that are thus drawn by love, will cleave to him. (2.) Their habitation is secure, happy, the people whose God is the Lord, for in him they have, or may have, or shall have, a complete happiness.

[1.] Their desires shall be answered; (v. 8.) They shall be abundantly satisfied with the fatness of thy house; their wants supplied, their cravings gratified, and their capacities filled; in God all-sufficient they shall have enough, all that which an enlightened, enlarged soul can desire or receive. The gains of the world and the delights of sense will surfeit, but never satisfy, Isa. iv. 2. But the communications of divine favour and grace will satisfy, but never surfeit. A gracious soul, though still desiring more of God, never desires more than God. The gifts of Providence so far satisfy them that are content with such things as they have; I have all, and abound, Phil. iv. 18. The benefit of holy ordinances is the fatness of God's house, sweet to a sanctified soul, and strengthening to the spiritual and divine life, with this they are abundantly satisfied; they desire nothing more, in this world, than to live a life of communion with God, and to have the comfort of the promises. But the full, the abundant, satisfaction is reserved for the future state, the house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. Every vessel will be full there.

[3.] Their joys shall be constant; Thou shalt make them drink of the river of thy pleasures. There are pleasures that are truly divine; They are thy pleasures; not only which come from thee as the Giver of them, but which terminate in thee as the Matter and Centre of them."... as pure to the eternal mind. There is a river of these pleasures, always full, always fresh, always flowing. There is ever in the Spirit, Isa. 58:11. These pleasures of some putrid middle-water, those of faith are pure and pleasant, clear as crystal, Rev. xxi. 1. God has not only provided this river of pleasures for his people, but he makes them to drink of it; works in them a gracious appetite to these pleasures, and by his Spirit fills their souls with joy and peace in believing. In heaven, they shall be for ever drinking of those pleasures that are at God's right hand, satiated with a fulness of joy, Ps. 16:11.

[3.] Life and light shall be their everlasting bliss and portion, v. 9. Having God himself for their felicity, First, In him they have a fountain of life, from which those rivers of pleasure flow, v. 8. The God of nature is the Fountain of natural life; in him we live, and move, and have our being; the God of grace is the Fountain of spiritual life. All the strength and comfort of a sanctified soul, all its gracious principles, powers, and performances, flow from God. God's Spirit and his operations fill all the sensibilities of divine things, and all its motions toward them: he quickens whom he will; and whoever will, may come, and take from him of the waters of life freely. He is the Fountain of eternal life; the happiness of glorified saints consists in the vision and fruition of him, and in the immediate communications of his love, without interruption or fear of cessation. Secondly, In him they have life in perfection. All wisdom, knowledge, and joy; so included in this light; In thy light we shall see light, that is, 1. "In the knowledge of thee in grace, and the vision of thee in glory, we shall have that which will abundantly suit and satisfy our understandings." That divine light which shines in the scripture, and especially in the face of Christ, the Light of the world, has all truth in it. When we come to see God face to face, within the veil, we shall see light in perfection, we shall know enough then, 1 Cor. xiii. 12. 2. John iii. 20. "He that believeth on him shall have the light of life now; by the communications of thy grace to us, and the return of our devout affections to thee, and in the fruition of thee shortly in heaven, we shall have a complete felicity and satisfaction. In thy favour we have all the good we can desire." This is a dark world, we see little comfort in it; but in the heavenly light there is true light, and no false light, light that is lasting, and never wastes. In this world, we see God, and enjoy him by creatures and manners; in heaven, God himself shall be with us. (Rev. xxi. 3.) and we shall see and enjoy him immediately.

II. We have here David's prayers, intercessions, and holy triumphs, grounded upon these meditations.

1. He intercedes for all saints, begging that they may always experience the benefit and comfort of God's favour and grace. v. 10. (1.) The persons he prays for are those that know God, that are acquainted with his actions, and to whom he knows he owes much for theirs: the upright in heart, that are sincere in their profession of religion, and faithful both to God and man: those that are not upright with God, do not know him as they should. (2.) The blessing he begs for them, is, God's loving-kindness, that is, the tokens of his favour toward them; and his righteousness, that is, the workings of his grace in them; or his loving-kindness and righteousness are his goodness, according to our promises; they are mercy and truth. (3.) The manner in which he desires this blessing may be conveyed: Oh continue it, draw it on, as the mother draws out her breasts to the child, and then the child draws out the milk from the breasts. Let it be drawn out to a length equal to the line of eternity itself; the happiness of the saints in heaven will be in perfection, and yet in continual progression, as some think; for the fountain there will be always full, and the streams always flowing. In the meantime it is a supply of those blessings in this life, of which this psalm is a type.

2. He prays for himself, that he might be preserved in his integrity and comfort; (v. 11.) "Let not the foot of pride come against me, to trip up my heels, or trample upon me; and let not the hand of the wicked, which is stretched out against me, prevail to remove me, either from my purity and integrity, by any temptation, or from my peace and comfort, by any trouble." Let not those who fight against God, triumph over him who desire to cleave to him. They that have experienced the pleasure of communion with God, cannot but desire that nothing may ever remove them from him.

3. He rejoices in hope of the downfall of his enemies, in due time; (v. 12.) "There where they thought to have gained the point against me, they are themselves fallen; taken in that snare which they laid for me." There, in the other world, (so some,) there where the saints stand in the judgment, and are already placed in the happiness of bliss, the fruits of iniquity are cast in the judgment, are cast down into hell, into the bottomless pit, out of which they shall, assuredly, never be able to rise, from under the insupportable weight of God's wrath and curse. It is true, we are not to rejoice, when any particular enemy of ours falls; but the final overthrow of all the workers of iniquity, will be the everlasting triumph of glorified saints.

PSALM XXXVII.

This psalm is a sermon, and an excellent useful sermon it is; calculated not (as most of the psalms) for our devotion, but for our conversion; there is nothing in it for amusement or praise, but it is all instruction; it is Maschiol—a teaching psalm; it is an exposition of some of the hardest chapters in the book of Providence, the advancement of the wicked, and the disgrace of the righteous, a solution of the difficulties that arise thereupon, and an exhortation to conduct ourselves as becomes us, under such dark dispensations. The work of the prophets, (and David was one,) was to explain the law. Now the law of Moses had promised temporal blessings to the Israelites, but this law pronounced temporal miseries against the disobedient, which principally referred to the body of the people, the nation as a nation; and, when they came to be applied to particular persons, were instances of particular blessings. The wicked of the destruction and ruin which the wicked are nigh to, (v. 2, 9, 10, 20, 30, 36, 38,) and the salvation and protection which the righteous are sure of, from all the malicious designs of the wicked, as v. 4, 5, 18, 19, 37, 38, 39, 40. Because of the particular mercy God has in store for all good people, and the favour he shows them, v. 11, 16, 18, 19, 22-25, 28, 29, 37. III. He prescribes very good remedies against this sin, and against the wicked, and great encouragement to use those remedies, v. 34. In singing this psalm, we must teach and admonish one another rightly to understand the providence of God, and to accommodate ourselves to it; at all times carefully to follow God, and to patiently to bear the event with God, and to believe that, how black soever things may look for the present, it shall be well with them that fear God, that fear before him.

A psalm of David.

1. FRAY not thyself because of evildoers, neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity: 2. For they shall
We do well for our own souls, we shall see little reason to envy those that do so ill for theirs.

Here are three excellent precepts, which we are to be ruled by; and, to enforce them, three precious promises, which we may rely upon.

1. We must make God our Hope in the way of duty, and then we shall have a comfortable subsistence in the world; v. 1. (1.) It is required that we trust in the Lord, and do good, that we may dwell in God, and conform to Him. The life of religion lies much in a believing reliance on God, his favour, his providence, his promise, his grace, and a diligent care to serve him and our generation, according to his will. We must not think to trust in God, and then live as we list; no, it is not trusting God, but tempting him, if we do not make conscience of our duty to him; nor must we think to do good, and then to trust to ourselves, and our own righteousness and strength; no, we must both trust in the Lord, and do good. And then, (2.) It is promised that we shall be provided for in this world; So shalt thou dwell in the land, and verity thou shalt be fed. He does not say, "So shalt thou get preferment, dwell in a palace, and be feasted." This is not necessary; a man's life consists not in the abundance of these things; but, "Thou shalt have a place to lie down, in, and every day. The Lord is thy portion, the valley of vision, and thou shalt have food convenient for thee." This is more than we desire, it is as much as a good man will intend for, (Gen. xxxviii. 20.) and it is enough for one that is going to heaven. Thou shalt have a settlement, a quiet settlement, and a maintenance, a comfortable maintenance; Verity thou shalt be fed, (so some read it,) thou shalt be fed by faith, as the just are said to live by faith, and it is good living, good feeding, according to the promises. "Verity thou shalt be fed, as Elijah in the famine, with what is needful for thee." God himself is a Shepherd, a Feeder, to all those that trust in him, xxi. 1.

2. We must make God our heart's delight, and then we shall have our heart's desire; v. 4.) we must not only depend upon God, but solace ourselves in him. We must be well pleased that there is a God, that he is such a one as he has revealed himself to be to us. If he is good, we must delight ourselves in his beauty, bounty, and benignity; our souls must return to him, and repose in him, as their Rest, and their Portion, for ever. Being satisfied of his loving-kindness, we must be satisfied with it, and make that our exceeding joy, xliii. 4. We were commanded (v. 3.) to do good, and then follows this command, to delight in God, which is as much a privilege as a duty. If we make conscience of obedience to God, we may then take the comfort of a complacency in him. And even this pleasant duty of delighting in God, has a promise annexed to it, which is very full and precious, enough to recompense the hardest services; He shall give thee the desires of thy heart. He has not promised to gratify all the appetites of the body, and the humours of the fancy, but to grant all the desires of the heart, all the cravings of the renewed sanctified soul. What is the desire of the heart of a good man? It is this, to know, and love, and live to, God, to please him, and to be pleased in him.

3. We must make God our Guide, and submit in every thing to his guidance and disposal; and then all our affairs, even those that seem most intricate and perplexed, shall be made to issue well, and to our satisfaction, v. 5, 6.

(1.) The duty is very easy; and if we do it aright, it will make the way easy. Come thou this way to the Lord; roll thy way upon the Lord, so the man reads it, Prov. xvi. 3. Ps. lv. 22. Cast thy burden upon the Lord, the burden of thy care, 1 Pet. v. 7. We must roll it off ourselves, so as not to afflic and perplex ourselves with thoughts about future events, (Matth. vi. 23.) not to cumber and trouble ourselves either with the contrivance of the means, or with the expectation of the end, but refer it to God, leave it to him, by his wise and good providence to order and dispose of all our concerns, as he pleases; Re tell thy way unto the Lord; (so the LXX) that is, 'By prayer spread the case, and all the care about it, before the Lord.' (as Jephthah uttered all his words before the Lord in Mizpah, Judg. xi. 11.) 'and then trust in him to bring it to a good issue, with a full satisfaction that all is well that God does.' We must do our duty, (that must be our care,) and then leave the event with God; 'Sit still, and see how the matter will fall,' Ruth iii. 18. We must follow Providence, and not force it; subscribe to Infinite Wisdom, and not prescribe.

(2.) The promise is very sweet; [1.] In general, "He shall bring that to pass, whatever it is, which thou hast committed to him, if not to thy contrivance, yet to thy content. He will find means to extricate thee out of thy straits, to prevent thy fears, and bring about thy purposes, to thy satisfaction." [2.] In particular, "He will take care of thy reputation, and bring thee out of thy difficulties, not only with confidence, but with triumph. He will bring forth thy righteousness as the light, and thy judgment as the noon-day;" (v. 6.) that is, "He shall make it to appear, that thou art an honest man, and that is honour enough." First, It is implied that the righteousness and judgment of good people, may, for a time, be clouded and eclipsed, either by remarkable rebukes of Providence, (Job's great afflictions darkened his righteousness,) or by the malicious censures and reproaches of men, who give them bad names, which they no way deserve, and lay to their charge things which they know not. Secondly, It is promised that God will, in due time, roll away the reproach they are under, clear up their innocence, and bring forth their righteousness, to their honour; perhaps in this world, at furthest, in the great day, Matth. xiii. 43. Note, If we take care to keep a good conscience, we may leave it to God to take care of our good name.

7. Rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for him: fret not thyself because of him who prospereth in his way, because of the man who bringeth wicked devices to pass. 8. Cease from anger, and forsake wrath; fret not thyself in any wise to do evil. 9. For evil-doers shall be cut off: but those that wait upon the Lord, they shall inherit the earth. 10. For yet a little while, and the wicked shall not be: yea, thou shalt diligently consider his place, and it shall not be. 11. But the meek shall inherit the earth; and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace. 12. The wicked plottheth against the just, and gnasheth upon him with his teeth. 13. The Lord shall laugh at him; for he seeth that his day is coming. 14. The wicked have drawn out the sword, and have bent their bow, to cast down the poor and needy, and to slay such as be of upright conversation. 15. Their sword shall enter into their own heart, and their bows shall be broken. 16. A little that a righteous man hath is better than the riches of many wicked. 17. For the arms of the wicked shall be broken: but the Lord upholdeth the righteous. 18. The Lord knoweth the days of the upright; and their inheritance shall be for ever. 19. They shall not be ashamed in the evil time; and in the days of famine they shall be satisfied. 20. But the wicked shall perish, and the enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs: they shall consume, into smoke shall they consume away.

In these verses, we have,
I. The foregoing precepts inculcated; for we are so apt to disquiet ourselves with needless, fruitless, discontented and distrusts, that it is necessary there should be precept upon precept, and line upon line, to suppress them, and arm us against them.

Let us rest in the Lord, for he is good; 'Rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for him;' (v. 7.) be well reconciled to all he does, and acquiesce in it, for that is best that is, because it is what God has appointed; and be well satisfied that he will still make all to work for good to us, though we know not how or which way. Be silent to the Lord," so the word is; not with a sullen, but a sub-misive, silence. A patient bearing of what is laid upon us, and a patient expectation of what is further pointed out to us, are as much our interest, as they are our duty; for it will make us always easy, and there is a great deal of reason for it, for it is making a virtue of necessity.

2. Let us not compose ourselves at what we see in this world; "Fret not thyself because of him who prospereth in his wicked way; who, though he is a bad man, yet thrives and grows rich and great in the world; no nor because of him who does mischief with his power and wealth, and brings wicked devices to pass against those that are virtuous and good, who seems to have gained his point, and to have run them down; if thy heart begins to rise at it, stroke down thy folly, and cease from anger;" (v. 8.) check the first stirrings of discontent and envy, and do not harbour any hard thoughts of God and his providence upon this account; be not angry at any thing that God does, but forbear that wrath; it is the worst kind of wrath that can be.

Note, A fretful, discontented, spirit lies open to many temptations; and those that indulge it are in danger of doing evil.

II. The foregoing reasons, taken from the approaching ruin of the wicked, notwithstanding their prosperity, and the real happiness of the righteous, notwithstanding their troubles, are here much enlarged upon, and the same things repeated in a pleasing variety of expression.

We are cautioned (v. 7.) not to envy, the wicked, either worldly prosperity, or the success of their plots against the righteous. The reasons here given respect these two temptations severally.

God's people have no reason to envy the worldly prosperity of wicked people, nor to grieve or be uneasy at it.

(1.) Because the prosperity of the wicked will soon be at an end; (v.9.) 'Evil-doers shall be cut off by some sudden stroke of divine justice, in the midst of their prosperity; what they have got by sin, will not only flow away from them, (Job xx. 28.) but they shall be carried away with it. See the end of these men, (lxxviii. 17.) how dear their ill-got gain will cost them, and yet you will be far from envying them, or from being willing to espouse their lot, for better, for worse. Their ruin is sure, and it is very near; (v. 10.) Yet a while longer, and the wicked shall not be what they now are; they are brought into desolation in a moment, lxiii. 19. Have a little patience, for the Judge stands before the door, Jam. 5. 9. Moderate your passion, and hold in your hand; (Phil. iv. 5.) and when it comes, it will be an utter ruin, and he and shall be extirpated, the day that comes shall leave him neither root nor branch; (Mal. iv. 1.) thou shalt diligently consider his place, where but the other day he made a mighty figure, but it shall not be, you will not find it; he shall leave nothing valuable, nothing honourable, behind him. To the same purport, (v. 20.) The wicked shall fall for their own iniquity, for the time of their joy shall be the period of all their joy, and a passage to endless misery; Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord, but undone, for ever undone, are the dead that die in their sins. The wicked are the enemies of the Lord; such they make themselves, who will not have him to reign over them, and as such he will reckon with them; They shall consume as the fat of lambs, they shall consume into smoke. Their prosperity, which gratifies their sensuality, is but the prelude to their ruin, for such lambs, but loose and washy; and when their ruin comes, they shall fall as sacrifices to the justice of God, and be consumed as the fat of the sacrifices was upon the altar, whence it ascended in smoke. The day of God’s vengeance on the wicked, is represented as a sacrifice of the fat of the kidneys of rams; (Isa. xxxiv. 6.) for he will be honoured by the ruin of his enemies, as he was by the sacrifices; damned sinners are sacrifices, Mark ix. 49. This is a good reason why we should not envy them their prosperity; while they are fed to the full, they are but in the fattening for the day of sacrifice, like a lamb in a large flasce; (Hos. iv. 16.) and the more they prosper, the more will God be glorified in their ruin. (2.) Because the condition of the righteous, even in this life, is every way better, and more desirable, than that of the wicked, v. 16. In general, a little that a righteous man has of the honour, wealth, and pleasure of this world, is better than the riches of many wicked. Observe, [1.] The wealth of the world is so dispensed by the Divine Providence, that it is often the lot of good people to have but a little of it, and of wicked people to have abundance of it; for thus God would show us that the things of this world are not the best things, for if they were, those would have most, that are best and dearest to God. [2.] That a godly man’s little is really better than a wicked man’s much; see Prov. xv. 16. 17. xvi. 8. xxxiii. 6. A godly man’s estate, though ever so little, is better than a wicked man’s estate, though ever so much, for it comes from a better hand, from a hand of special love, and not merely from a hand of common providence; it is enjoyed by a better title, God gives it to them by promise, (Gal. iii. 18.) it is theirs by virtue of their relation to Christ. There is that in it of all things, and it isput into a better hand, it is sanctified in those who receive by the blessing of God; unto the pure all things are pure. Tit. i. 15. A little where with God is served and honoured, is better than a great deal prepared for Bala, or for a base lust. The promises here made to the righteous, secure them such a happiness that they need not envy the prosperity of evil-doers. Let them know to their cost, (1.) First. That they shall inherit the earth, as much of it as Infinite Wisdom sees good for them; they have the promises of the life that now is, 1 Tim. iv. 8. If all the earth were necessary to make them happy, they should have it. All is theirs, even the world, and things present, as well as things to come, 1 Cor. iii. 21, 22. They have it by inheritance, a safe and honourable title, not by permission only and connivance. When evil-doers are cut off, the righteous sometimes inherit what they gathered; the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just, Job xvii. 17. Prov. xiii. 22. This promise is here made, 1. To those that live in the fear of God, and those that wait upon the Lord, as dependants on him, expectants from him, and suppliants to him, shall inherit the earth, as a token of his present favour to them, and an earnest of better things intended for them in the other world. God is a good Master that provides plentifully and well, not for his working servants, but for his waiting servants. 2. To those that live a quiet and peaceable life, who were neither guilty of sin, nor guilty of sin, nor guilty of unbelief or enmity to those that wait upon the Lord, as dependants on him, expectants from him, and suppliants to him, shall inherit the earth. They are in least danger of being injured and disturbed in the possession of what they have; and they have most satisfaction in themselves, and consequently the sweetest relish of their creature-comforts. Our Saviour has made this a gospel promise, and a confirmation of the blessing he pronounced on the meek, Matth. v. 5. Secondly, That they shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace, v. 11. Perhaps they have not abundance of wealth to delight in, but they have that which is better, abundance of peace, inward peace and tranquillity of mind, peace with God, and then peace in God, that great peace which they have that love God’s law, whom nothing shall offend; (exix. 163.) that abundance of peace which is in the kingdom of Christ; (lxiii. 7.) that peace which the world cannot give, (John xiv. 27.) and which the world cannot have, Isa. lii. 21. This they shall delight themselves in, and in it they shall have a continual feast; while they that have abundance of wealth do but cumber and perplex themselves with it, and have little delight in it. Thirdly, That God knows their days, v. 18. He takes particular notice of them, of all they do, and of all that happens to them. He keeps account of the days of their service, and not one day’s work shall go unrewarded; and of the days of their suffering, that for those also they may receive a recompense. He knows their fair days, and has pleasure in their prosperity; he knows their cloudy and dark days, the days of their affliction, and, as the day is, so shall the strength be. Fourthly, That their inheritance shall be for ever. Their time on earth is reckoned by days, which will soon be numbered; God takes cognizance of them, and gives them the blessings of every day in its day; but it was never intended that their in- heritance should be confined within the limits of these days; so, that must be the portion of an immortal soul, and therefore must last as long as that lasts, and will run parallel with the longest line of eternity itself; Their inheritance shall be for ever; not their inheritance in the earth, but that incorruptible, indefeasible, one, which is laid up for them in heaven. They that are sure of an everlasting inheritance in heaven, and that other world have no reason to envy the wicked their transitory possessions and pleasures in this world. Fifthly, That, in the worst of times, it shall go well with them; (v. 19.) They shall not be ashamed of their hope and confidence in God, nor of the profession they have made of religion; for the comfort of that will stand them in stead, and be a real support to them, in evil times. When others droop, and are in great distress and strait, they shall have reason to rejoice and be glad of heart; in fine, Observe, even in the days of famine, when others are dying for hunger round about them, they shall be satisfied, as Elijah was; some way or other God will provide food convenient for them, or give them hearts to be satisfied and content without it; so that, if they should be hardly bestead and hungry, they shall not (as the wicked do) fret themselves, and curse their king and their God, (Isa. viii. 21.) but rejoice in God as the God of their salvation, even when the fig-tree does not blossom, Hab. iii. 17, 18.

2. Good people have no reason to fret at the occasional success of the designs of the wicked against the just; though they do bring some of their wicked devices to pass, which makes us fear they will gain their point, and bring them all to ruin; yet let us consider of the coming, and not fret ourselves so as to think of giving up the cause. For,

(1.) Their plots will be their shame, v. 12, 13. It is true, the wicked plotteth against the just, there is a rooted enmity in the seed of the wicked one against the righteous seed; their aim is, if they can, to destroy their righteousness; if that fall, then to destroy them. With this end in view, they have acted with a great deal of art and policy, contrivance, (they aim to do,) they practise against the just, and of cursed zeal and fury, they grasp upon them with their teeth; so desirous are they, if they could get it into their power, to eat them up, and so full of rage and indignation are they, because it is not in their power; but by all this they do but make themselves ridiculous; the Lord shall laugh at them, ii. 4, 5. They are proud and insolent, but God shall pour contempt upon them; he is not only displeased with them, but he despises them and all their attempts vain and ineffectual, and their malice as impotent and in a chain; for he sees that his day is coming, that is, [1.] The day of God's reckoning, the day of the revelation of his righteousness, which now seems clouded and eclipsed. Men have their day now; this is your hour, Luke xxii. 53. But God will have his day shortly, a day of recompenses, a day which will set all to rights, and render that ridiculous which is plaisted for glorious; he is going to stand for judgment; (1 Cor. iv. 3) God's day will give a decisive judgment. [2.] The day of their ruin, the wicked man's day, the day set for his fall, that day is coming; which denotes delay, it is not yet come, but certainly it will come. The believing prospect of that day will enable the virgin, the daughter of Zion, to despise the rage of her enemies, and laugh them to scorn, Isa. xxxvii. 22.

(2.) Their attempts will be their destruction, v. 14, 15. See here, [1.] How barbarous they are in their designs against good people. They prepare instruments of death, the sword and the bow, no less will serve; they hunt for the precious life; that which they design, is, to cast down and slay; it is the blood of the saints they thirst after. They carry on the design very far, and it is near to be put in execution; they have drawn the sword, and bent the bow; and all these military preparations are made against the helpless, the poor, and needy; this shows them to be very cowardly; and against the guileless, such as be of upright conversation, that never gave them any provocation, nor offered injury to them, or any other person; this shows them to be very wicked. Uprightness itself will be no fence against their malice. But, [2.] How justly their malice recoils upon themselves; their sword shall turn into their own heart; which implies the preservation of the righteous from their malice, and the filling up of the measure of their own iniquity by it. Sometimes that very thing proves to be their own destruction, which they projected against their harmless neighbours; however, God's sword, which their provocations have drawn against themselves, will give them their death's wound.

(3.) Those that are not suddenly cut off, shall yet be so disabled to do any further mischief, that the interests of the church shall be effectually secured; Their bones shall be broken; (v. 15,) the instruments of their cruelty shall fail them, and they shall lose those whom they had made tools of, to serve their bloody purposes with; nay, their arms shall be broken, so that they shall not be able to go on with their enterprises. But the Lord upholdeth the righteous, so that they neither sink under the weight of their afflictions, nor are crushed by the violence of their enemies. He upholds them both in their integrity, and in their prosperity, and they that are so upheld by the Rock of ages, have no reason to envy the wicked the support of their broken reeds.

21. The wicked borroweth, and payeth not again: but the righteous showeth mercy, and giveth. 22. For such as be blessed of him shall inherit the earth; and they that be cursed of him shall be cut off. 23. The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord; and he delighteth in his way. 24. Though he fall, he shall not be utterly cast down: for the Lord upholdeth him with his hand. 25. I have been young, and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread. 26. He is ever merciful, and lendeth; and his seed is blessed. 27. Depart from evil, and do good; and dwell for evermore. 28. For the Lord loveth judgment, and forsaketh not his saints; they are preserved for ever: but the seed of the wicked shall be cut off. 29. The righteous shall inherit the land, and dwell therein for ever. 30. The mouth of the righteous speaketh wisdom, and his tongue talketh of judgment. 31. The law of his God is in his heart; none of his steps shall slide. 32. The wicked watcheth the righteous, and seetheth to slay him. 33. The Lord will not leave him in his hand, nor condemn him when he is judged.

These verses are much to the same purport with the foregoing verses of this psalm, for it is a subject worthy to be dwelt upon. Observe here,

1. What is required of us, as the way to our happiness; which we may learn both from the characters here laid down, and from the directions here given. If we would be blessed of God,

1. We must make conscience of giving every body their own; for the wicked borroweth, and payeth not again, v. 21. It is the first thing which the Lord our God requires of us, that we do justly, and render to all their due. It is not only a shameful paltry thing, but a sinful wicked thing, not to repay what we have borrowed. Some make this an instance, not so much of the wickedness of the wicked, as of the misery and poverty to which they are reduced by the just judgment of God, that they shall be necessitated to borrow for their supply, and they be in no capacity to repay again, and so lie at the mercy of their creditors. Whatever some men seem to think of it, as it is a great sin for those that are able to deny the payment of their just debts, so it is a great misery not to be able to pay them.

2. We must be ready to all acts of charity and beneficence; for as it is an instance of God's good ness to the righteous, that he puts it into the power of his hand to be kind, and to do good, (and so some understand it,) God's blessing increases his little, to that degree that he has abundance to spare for the relief of others; so it is an instance of the goodness of the righteous man, that he has a heart proportonable to his estate; he shows mercy, and gives, v. 21. He is ever merciful, or every day, or all the day, merciful, and lends, and sometimes there is as true charity in lending as in giving; giving and lending are then acceptable to God, when they come from a merciful disposition in the heart, which, if it be sincere, will be constant, and will keep us from being rendered unprofitable. He that is truly merciful will be ever merciful.

3. We must leave our sins, and engage in the practice of serious godliness; (v. 27.) Depart from evil, and do good; cease to do evil, and abhor it; learn to do well, and cleave to it. This is true religion.
